The AFL-CIO expressed hope that the Reagan Administration "will move quickly to appoint a competent health and safety professional to head the agency."

Director Bert Seidman of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security said, "We're very pleased" by the resignation. "We think what he's been doing in his time at OSHA has been harmful to workers and we're hopeful that whoever replaces him will want to administer the program in a way that will restore its effectiveness."

In announcing his resignation that takes effect July 1, Rowland echoed the statement of his predecessor Thorne Auchter, Jr., who quit last year, in saying that his "mission has been accomplished."

Labor Sec. William E. Brock noted that Rowland "faced difficult and controversial issues while maintaining his commitment with integrity and diligence. This Administration owes him a debt of gratitude for his unflagging commitment and tireless efforts on behalf of President Reagan."

In his 10 months as head of OSHA, Rowland came under repeated criticism for his decisions to weaken current standards or not to regulate at all.

Decision assailed

In April, his decision not to issue a federal standard requiring that farm workers be provided toilets and water for drinking and washing was assailed by Congress, labor and minority groups.

In mid-May, Rowland again came under fire for OSHA's collaboration with officials of a giant shipbuilding firm in Newport News, Va., aimed at scuttling 70 percent of safety rules covering shipyards. Rowland holds up to $50,000 stock in Tenneco, Inc., parent firm of the shipyard and agribusiness operations that employ numerous farm workers.

Rowland, who was chairman of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission prior to heading OSHA, said he "enjoyed my four years of service to President Reagan."

A millionaire lawyer and a key fundraiser in Reagan's 1980 campaign, Rowland was given a presidential recess appointment to head OSHA last July, but was never confirmed by the Senate. His appointment was challenged by unions because he lacked a health and safety background and for his poor record on rulings while heading OSHRC. He voted against upholding OSHA citations in 84 percent of the cases he reviewed between 1981 and 1984.

Under Rowland and Auchter, OSHA has issued only one new health standard regulating hazardous substances in the workplace in the past four years. And according to a recent report of the Office of Technology Assessment, OSHA has had little, if any, effect on reducing occupational injuries. The OTA attributed recent declines in injuries and deaths to the economic recession.

In early May, Rowland was criticized by Rep. Gerry Sikorski (D-Minn.) for alleged personnel practices at the agency which had helped foster an atmosphere of "fear and intimidation." Sikorski, chairman of the House Post Office & Civil Service Subcommittee on Investigations, questioned Rowland about a meeting at which agency managers were urged to "kick ass and take names" in order to rid the agency of staff members who took issue with OSHA's retreat on enforcement of regulations.

Ethics report

Just hours after Rowland's resignation was announced, the Office of Government Ethics issued its review of conflict-of-interest charges that had been leveled against the OSHA head for his participation in decisions which may have softened rules affecting companies in which he has extensive stock holdings.

Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee, had requested the OGE's opinion based on conflict-of-interest allegations.

OGE Director David H. Martin wrote to Hawkins that Rowland had acted within the law in participating in the rulemaking proceedings on ethylene oxide, formaldehyde and benzene while having a financial interest in Tenneco, Exxon, Eastman Kodak and Monsanto.

Martin noted that Rowland—by reason of the conflict-of-interest waiver that former Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan had granted him—did not have to excuse himself from rulemaking actions.

Women's Defense Fund cites O'Grady, Edelman

Jane O'Grady, an AFL-CIO legislative representative, and Marian Wright Edelman, president of the Children's Defense Fund, are the 1985 recipients of the Advancement of the Rights of Women award from the Women's Legal Defense Fund.

O'Grady was cited for her efforts on equal employment opportunity, day care, pension reform and the Equal Rights Amendment.

Edelman was honored for her leadership role in child care programs, teenage pregnancy care and exposing the impact of budget cuts on children's welfare.

Wider toxic hazard rule ordered

is no legal justification for affording broader trade secret protection in the hazard communication standard than state law affords."

The court noted that OSHA's initial protections for trade secrets were expanded after chemical manufacturers pressed for wider exemptions in the name of trade secrets. The definition grew to include not only the chemical formula or processes, but also chemical identity, including those that can be determined by sophisticated chemical analysis, or "reverse engineering."

Directing the agency to develop a new definition of trade secrets, the court specified that the "definition shall not include chemical identity information that is readily discoverable through reverse engineering."

In ordering OSHA to adopt a rule permitting access to trade secret information by workers and their unions, Judge Gibbons cited the USWA's argument that non-health professional workers have in a number of instances used chemical identity information to improve workplace safety and that they should be permitted access to information about the chemicals used in the workplace. OSHA had limited access to trade secret information to health professionals.

Similar hazards

In addressing the limitation of coverage to just the manufacturing sector, the court pointed out that "workers in sectors other than manufacturing are exposed to the hazards associated with the use of toxic materials or other harmful physical agents." It noted that no statement was given on why it was not feasible to require that all other workers be given the same protections as must be given to those workers in the manufacturing sector.

Arguments by the Labor Dept. that "the communication rule will 'trickle down' to uncovered workers because containers will be labeled" failed to persuade the court, which also "explicitly" rejected the agency's contention that its "priority-setting authority is unreviewable." The court held that it could review the department's determination of which industries would be covered by a standard.

A number of states have adopted more stringent right-to-know laws which the federal standard purported to preempt.

The states argued that the hazard communication rule is not a standard, but rather a regulation. Standards under the federal safety law are "explicitly preemptive," the court noted, while regulations would have to be reviewed under the Administrative Procedure Act. The court determined that the communication rule is a standard, but in doing so, said the Labor Dept.'s inclusion of preemption "appears to have been motivated at least in part by the desire to reduce the regulatory burden posed by multiple state laws."

Economic sag confirmed by key indicators

A drop in the government's main economic forecasting barometer provided fresh evidence that the nation's economy continues to move at a sluggish pace.

The Commerce Dept. reported that the index of leading economic indicators—the gauge for anticipating performance of the economy in the coming months—declined two-tenths of 1 percent in April, the first actual downturn this year.

The report meshed with other data showing April orders for machine tools down 27 percent from a year ago and nonfarm productivity for the first quarter down 2.5 percent—about twice the estimated decline reported a month ago.

The drop in the leading indicators showed that a recent lowering of interest rates so far has had little impact on the economy.

Of the 10 components of the index, six were negative—orders for plant and equipment, money supply, vendor performance, average workweek, building permits, and net business formation. The four positive indicators were new orders for consumer goods and materials, change in prices of sensitive materials, stock prices and average weekly initial claims for unemployment compensation.

The report included upward revisions of the index for the previous two months. The February figure went from a rise of five-tenths of 1 percent to seven-tenths, and the March figure was changed from a decline of two-tenths of 1 percent to a gain of one-tenth.

34 percent plunge

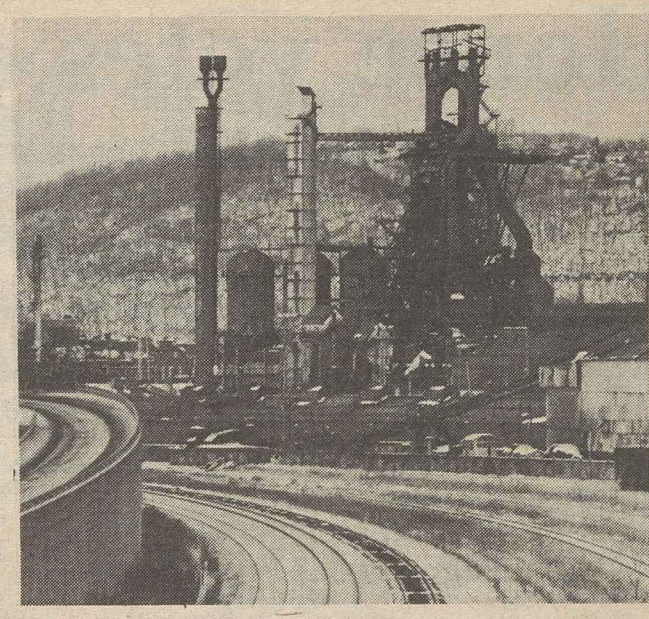
The April total of machine-tool orders at $183.5 million represented a drop of 34 percent from March, in addition to the over-the-year decline, the National Machine Tool Builders' Association reported. This pattern also was evident in other capital-goods industries. The Commerce Dept. reported that orders for all types of non-defense capital goods totaled $25.32 billion in April, a drop of 6.9 percent from the previous month and 2 percent below April 1984.



The revised report on productivity issued by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics showed output per worker hour in the private business sector alone declined at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 3.5 percent instead of the 1.9 percent originally estimated. BLS reported that it was the first quarterly decline in productivity since the second quarter of 1982 during the Reagan recession.

Manufacturing was the only major sector to show a productivity increase, although the rise was smaller than first reported—six-tenths of 1 percent rather than 1.6 percent.

CORRECTION

A referendum on Idaho's "right-to-work" law will be held as part of the November 1986 elections. Until then, unless a temporary injunction issued by a state judge is overturned, the anti-union law passed by the legislature earlier this year will not take effect. The AFL-CIO News erroneously reported that the referendum would to be held this November.

Steelworkers press to preserve giant blast furnace at Duquesne Works from demolition.

U.S. Steel's sleeping giant

Friends rally to rescue Dorothy Six

Pittsburgh — Chanting "Dorothy Six is going to rise again," some 1,000 Steelworkers and supporters rallied in the rain at the Duquesne Works in an effort to stave off U.S. Steel Corp.'s June 10 deadline to begin tearing down what was once the nation's largest and most productive blast furnace.

"If it takes blocking the mill with our bodies, we won't let them tear it lown," said Mike Stout, grievance committee chairman of USWA Local 1397 in Homestead, Pa., and a leader in the Tri-State Conference on Steel, which joined with the USWA in trying to attract investors to buy the mill.

The 21-year-old Dorothy Six could produce 5,000 tons of iron a day and in 1984 captured the company award for beating production goals. Now, Steelworkers are maintaining a round-the-clock vigil at the mill to prevent the company from beginning any demolition work on the 15-story-high blast furnace.

The rally was preceded by a parade that included marching bands, drill teams and fire companies.

U.S. Steel shut down the Duquesne Works last year, throwing 2,850 members of USWA Local 1256 out of their jobs. The company had planned to raze Dorothy Six to make way for an industrial plant. Demolition, originally scheduled 15 months ago, has been delayed three times.

Show them how

Andrew V. "Lefty" Palm, director of USWA District 15, who has led the drive to reopen the Duquesne Works, noted the USWA has lobbied with the company in the past against imports. "If U.S. Steel and the rest of the industry are paying attention, we've shown them how they can hire more workers, produce more steel. Instead of knocking down mills, they'll be knocking down imports," Palm said.

If mills like the Duquesne Works are dismantled, the growth in the U.S. market for semifinished steel will be filled by imports, rally speakers warned.

"Ideally, U.S. Steel should get back into the business of making steel at Duquesne," Palm said. He noted that the decision of U.S. Steel to keep the plant closed will keep American workers out of jobs while adding to the nation's growing trade deficit.

Efforts to save the mill have gained increasing support from both Democrats and Republicans in Congress. Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) pledged to help the Steelworkers and the Tri-State Conference attract an investment group to buy the plant. Local 1256 President Mike Bilcsik welcomed Heinz's support at the rally and noted. "Here's Sen. Heinz—at the pinnacle of the Republican party—helping us out. The cause is picking up a lot of legitimacy."

Congressional support

During a tour of the Monongahela Valley steelmaking sites a week before the rally, congressional representatives from Minnesota and Ohio decried the demise of the plant and noted that the demand for semi-finished steel will be on the increase for the rest of the century.

Rep. James Oberstar (D-Minn.) noted that the mines in his district provide the iron ore used in furnaces like Dorothy Six and "if you aren't making steel, we aren't making steel, we aren't mining iron ore." And Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio) said that the warehouses and shipping yards in Toledo aren't as busy as they were when the steel mills were running strong. "What happens here affects us all," she said.

USWA President Lynn R. Williams stressed that the closing of the Duquesne mill "was precipitous and unwarranted, both economically and socially," and that its continued operation was vital to the region and to the country. A marketing study, commissioned by the union "reinforces our position," he said.

The market study showed that demand for semi-finished steel will be 11 to 15 million tons annually by 1989, up from 6.2 million tons in 1984.

A financial study, also commissioned by the USWA, is attempting to identify prospective buyers and investors to save Dorothy Six.

Unions score Defense Dept. on contracting-out policy

The civilian employees of the Dept. of Defense provide vital support services as part of the nation's security and Congress should throttle the DOD's effort to eliminate civilian jobs and contract out work, government employee unions told a House Appropriations subcommittee.

Kenneth T. Blaylock, president of the Government Employees, testified on five personnel topics concerning DOD's budget and urged Congress to limit contracting out of work, provide adequate pay for civilian employees and end the agency's replacement of full-time workers with part-time and temporary employees.

Rodney A. Bower, president of the Professional & Technical Engineers, told the Subcommittee on Defense that the Navy's plan to reduce the workforce in its shipyards by more than 5,500 employees by the end of the year is a false economy that will reduce defense readiness and actually increase costs. He charged also that the Navy implemented the plan in a manner that has been "secretive and evasive."

Blaylock expressed alarm at the increase in the amount of DOD work being contracted out. He urged legislation to require an annual report on the extent and costs of contracting out, eliminate high annual cost increases based on contract modifications, insure competitive bidding and require a 15 percent cost savings differential for work contracted out by the agency.

Blaylock said the absence of effective budgetary controls on the size and cost of the contracted-out workforce "is an absolute scandal." The AFGE estimates that contracting out costs will be $40-$50 billion in fiscal 1986, roughly comparable to DOD's entire civilian payroll.

Blaylock also pointed to a growing inequity between pay raises given military personnel and those received by DOD's civilian workforce. If federal employees have to take a 5 percent pay cut next year while military personnel get 3 percent raises, that will increase the military's pay advantage to more than 40 percent since 1969, he noted.

Blaylock also cited a statement by the personnel manager for the Charleston, S.C., Naval Supply Center that the Navy will be converting every full-time vacancy into part-time jobs.

Part-time reasoning

"We do not run a part-time defense effort, and you cannot run a full-time defense effort with part-time employees," Blaylock warned. The DOD's "rumblings" about closing some military bases are a scare tactic aimed at warding off budget cuts, he charged.

Bower, whose union represents some 11,000 engineering and technical workers in Navy shipyards, testified that the repair workload is "expected to increase" as the Navy reaches its goal of a 600-vessel fleet. The Navy's official policy has been that its shipyards do 70 percent of the repair work with the remainder contracted out to private shipyards.

That balance will shift, Bower said, even though Navy officials "have explicitly declared that their purpose in reducing the Navy shipyard work force is not to change the 70/30 balance."

Bower stressed that by law the union is entitled to be informed of substantive changes in conditions of employment and to present recommendations regarding the changes. He said the union has not been allowed to exercise its consultation rights and has "met resistance" in its efforts to discuss the changes with Navy officials.

John Driscoll, Keith Henning to retire

Two long-time leaders of AFL-CIO state federations have announced plans to retire.

L. Keith Henning, executive secretary of the Wyoming AFL-CIO for the past 15 years, will retire July 1, and John Driscoll, president of the Connecticut AFL-CIO since 1961, will step down in September.

Henning, 56, was named executive secretary emeritus by the Wyoming AFL-CIO executive board, which appointed State Federation President John M. Faunce to succeed him. Faunce is president of Utility Workers Local 127 in Casper.

Henning entered the labor movement as a member of the Machinists while working on the Union Pacific Railroad. He became a fire fighter in 1956 and rose through the ranks of his IAFF local and the state organization before becoming an international representative and a district vice president. He was named executive secretary of the Wyoming AFL-CIO in 1970.

Driscoll, 74, in the course of a union career dating back to 1937, served as an officer or staff member of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, the CIO, the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers and the Auto Workers. He was sub-regional director of the UAW when he was elected president of the Connecticut AFL-CIO in 1961. His successor will be elected at the state labor federation's convention next September.

Filling the Gap at OSHA

WITH THE DEPARTURE of Robert A. Rowland from his post as interim director of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, Labor Sec. William Brock has an opportunity to do a great service to the working men and women of America.

Rowland was named last July to head OSHA after the original Reagan appointee to the job, Thorne Auchter, Jr., resigned to take a job with a Kansas City company. His new employer had benefited from reduced fines for safety violations during Auchter's term.

The AFL-CIO opposed Rowland's nomination for the clear, sound reason that his service on the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission had been dedicated to serving the interests and of employers. Like Auchter, Rowland believed the best way to exercise health and safety laws, rules and regulations was with little or no enforcement at all.

Previous administrations had appointed health experts to the OSHA posts. Under President Reagan, OSHA administrators, like most other federal "plum book" jobs, were turned over to ideologues seeking every opportunity to practice their reactionary theories of government.

THE AUCHTER-ROWLAND team was proud that in four years it had produced only one new health standard regulating dangerous substances handled by workers. The Reaganites blamed some inaction on the Office of Management & Budget, an arm of the White House, but it was clear that neither Auchter nor Rowland put workers' risks at the top of their priorities.

At one point, the American public was treated to the spectacle of one federal agency warning consumers about products that might carry traces of a dangerous preservative known as EDB, while OSHA still had not written a standard to protect workers who actually handle EDB every day.

Rowland was forced into the spotlight recently when he refused to draft a standard for basic sanitary conditions for migrant field workers, which a federal court had ordered OSHA to consider.

That obstinate posture brought environmentalists, minority representatives and members of Congress to rally around the position that organized labor had previously taken to criticize Rowland's concept of public service.

Now, the new Secretary of Labor has a chance to put OSHA back into the business of protecting workers.

Administering the federal safety and health codes in America's workplaces should not be subject to partisan politics or ideological experimentation.

OSHA jobs should be filled with professional health and safety experts—individuals who would direct and inspire the staff of the agency to carry out the law as it was intended to protect all Americans wherever they work.

For a Fair Tax

THE AFL-CIO has long worked to bring fairness to the federal tax code and we favor measures that genuinely fulfill that objective. We therefore welcome the President's tax initiative and will support those elements of his announced program that are consistent with that aim, such as those that remove additional numbers of the poor from the tax rolls.

We regret, however, that President Reagan has not, in his message, fulfilled the expectations he had previously raised. Parts of his announced program appear in fact to contradict the sweeping claims with which he launched it. . . .

The AFL-CIO will carefully review the President's entire tax package with the goal of making constructive and practical suggestions that would assure that the system is as understandable and enforceable as possible, that tax expenditures are limited to those that clearly meet the tests of the public interest and regional equity, and that the present abuses that place unfair burdens on working Americans are eliminated.

Cut-rate youth wage bill no cure for job shortage

By Press Associates, Inc.

When the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 was enacted, it was described as "a floor under wages, a roof over hours and a break for kids."

It was the last major piece of New Deal legislation. Roosevelt's support in Congress was weakening. Labor wanted a strong law. Southern Democrats demanded a differential. The bill was being watered down, stirring Roosevelt's anger.

Roosevelt called on all his skills to get the bill passed. Sen. Claude Pepper was in a tough fight for renomination in Florida. FDR's aides got financial help for him in return for fighting speeches for the wage-hour law to influence votes in Congress. It worked. Pepper won big and a discharge petition got 218 signatures in the House in a matter of hours.

That was nearly a half-century ago and employers in search of cheap labor have been seeking a subminimum wage ever since.

The Reagan Administration's proposal for a Youth Employment Opportunity Wage (YEOW) of $2.50 an hour during the summer for teenagers 16 through 19 was unveiled at a Senate hearing.

Labor Sec. William E. Brock made the best case he could for a proposal that was shaped before he took over the Labor Dept.

Breaking the cycle

The key to solving youth unemployment, Brock said, is to break the "no experience, no work" cycle. Training is part of the solution and perhaps the best-long-term answer, he said. But training is not now part of Reagan's cut-rate wage bill.

Brock was leading into praise for such programs as the Job Training Partnership Act, which targets over $2 billion to youth and is primarily controlled by business. His agency also provides $825 million to the states to fund 770,000 summer jobs for disadvantaged youth.

Brock cited estimates that the subminimum wage would create 400,000 new summer jobs. He said other nations have made use of youth differentials, including Canada and Sweden.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison told the Senate panel that labor opposes the subminimum because it discriminates against workers based on their age, it would not create jobs, it would displace older workers, and past wage subsidies and subminimums have not alleviated youth unemployment.

Denison noted that the current federal minimum wage of $3.35 an hour has become a subminimum wage. One measure is as a proportion of the average wage paid to production workers. In the 1950s and 1960s, the federal minimum was 50 to 60 percent of the average wage. In 1978, when the minimum was raised in steps, it was 48 percent; today, it is less than 40 percent.

Working poor

Denison said there are 6 million workers now employed at or near the current minimum wage. These "working poor," women and black adults, would be threatened by the cheaper labor of teenagers at $2.50 an hour.

Brock's reference to the youth differential in other industrial nations is faulty staff work at the Labor Dept. In Scandinavia, for example, about 10 to 15 times as much money is put into training, retraining and job placement as in the United States, and in the context of a strong social welfare program. Exploiting ghetto youth at $2.50 an hour and laying them off on Oct. 1 is hardly a comparable approach.

Labor expressed support for a measure sponsored by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.), because it builds on tested programs which successfully placed low-income youths in part-time jobs during the school year and full-time jobs in the summer. Education and training are an integral part of the Hawkins bill.

Hawkins opposed the Reagan bill, saying, "Putting a shovel in teenagers' hands without giving them schoolbooks as well will not work." He said he would be willing to work with Brock if the Administration wants to get serious about cracking the teenage unemployment problem and agrees to combine work, education and training.

MEMO FROM COPE

ENOUGH, ALREADY. . . another actor decides to make a try for high political office. Fred Grandy, a regular on TV's "Love Boat," re-establishes residence in his home town of Sioux City, Iowa, plans to seek GOP U.S. House nomination against incumbent Democrat Rep. Berkley Bedell.

BIG COMEBACK FOR HUNGER in Reagan years, Physicians Task Force study shows, estimating 20 million Americans today are malnourished. Study charges "the recent . . . return of (wide-scale) hunger to America can be traced in substantial measure to clear and conscious policies of the federal government." That's the Reagan Administration it's talking about. Since the report, kindly Sen. Jesse Helms has proposed to slash another $3-$5 billion out of the food stamp program.

HOW LONG will we be taken in by scare rhetoric of Reagan Administration? Budget Director David Stockman recently said budget package worked out between Senate and White House is "last, best and only chance to contract the permanent structure of federal spending" enough to have "a fighting chance" to make ends meet in the '80s. In other words, either do it our way or suffer. The Administration refuses to face the possibility of an alternative to massive program cuts—i.e., a tax bill that is not merely "revenue-neutral" but revenue-producing from those sources that have ducked fair taxation for years, wealthy individuals and the corporations. A proper tax proposal could help recoup some of the billions in revenue kissed off in 1981 Reagan tax giveaway.

Odds 'n Ends

CON JOB NEVER LETS UP as nation is subjected to continuing barrage of comments that only way to reduce deficit is to slash services. The few in Congress willing to challenge this notion not yet able to muster enough vocal support from others to make public sit up and take notice. However, the House Democratic budget avoids meat-ax cuts of people-helping programs, doesn't harm social security recipients in any way—and obliges Pentagon to share some of sacrifice others must shoulder.

REAGAN STILL GETS AWAY with malarkey that pins deficit woes on all his predecessors but exempts his own programs of massive tax cuts for rich and corporations, huge defense build-up.

DO CITIZENS REMEMBER Reagan assurances for 20 years prior to his presidency and the years of it that he would be the one to cut back deficits? In his first televised address to nation as President, he said do what he asks and Shazzam, budget will be balanced in three years. He deplored Carter deficits of $50 billion-plus.

WELL, NOW THEY'RE AT $200 billion-plus, and the annual interest we have to pay on that debt is almost triple the entire deficit in Carter's last budget. Still, Reagan has all kinds of scapegoats—except his own programs. He keeps hitting government as a "magic money machine" that he claims Democrats (and his predecessors) kept turning on. He inveighs against the "puzzle palaces" in Washington, as if he—as head of government—has no relationship to them or they to him.

HOW RICH UNDERWRITE RIGHT shows up in report on foundation grants dealing with, among others, contributions by Richard Scaife, one of the Pittsburgh Mellon family. Scaife kicked in $1 million to Richard Nixon's 1972 campaign. In recent years, his family foundation, the Scaife Foundation, put up nearly $2.8 million for various rightist and conservative organizations. Among the contributions: $500,000 to Heritage Foundation, which was founded with funding from Coors brewing family; $440,000 to several ultra-conservative regional legal groups—Capital Legal Foundation, Mid-America Legal Foundation, Mid-Atlantic Legal Foundation, Pacific Legal Foundation; $65,000 to Intercollegiate Studies Institute, an old-line right-wing group working the nation's campuses.

CAN YOU GUESS TOP THREE contributors to federal candidates in 1983-84 election cycle among all political committees? Well, they're all trade PACs, and they were: Realtors PAC gave $2,429,552 to federal candidates; American Medical Association PAC gave $1,839,464; Home Builders PAC gave $1,625,539. The top money-raiser by a huge margin was National Conservative PAC with $19,514,822. The bulk of that was spent in actually raising money and in "independent expenditures" to boost the Reagan re-election campaign.

Messy for Jesse

A $10 million suit has been filed against Sen. Jesse Helms and his campaign committee. Plaintiff is Steve Cram & Associates, a Virginia-based direct mail house which claims Helms owes it $83,000 for fund-raising work done for Helms's successful 1984 re-election campaign.

The suit charges hanky-panky by the Helms campaign in allegedly diverting for other purposes some proceeds from mailings that were due the mailer, Cram. It is messy in that not only Helms, but two of his associates and a front for his campaign committee are named in the suit.

Whatever the merits, $83,000 ought to be peanuts for the North Carolina Republican. His '84 campaign raised $16.5 million.

Seeks 100,000 Conversions

GOP Goes Among the Heathen

The Republican Party has launched a 100-day test program in four states to convert 100,000 registered lost-soul Democrats to the true faith.

The target states are Florida, Pennsylvania, North Carolina and Louisiana. The party has set up a $500,000 fund to finance the program, which aims at creating registration switches of 45,000 Democrats in Florida, 25,000 in Louisiana and 15,000 each in Pennsylvania and North Carolina.

The test states were picked because each has a Senate race in 1986 and in each voters register by party, which simplifies the tracking of results. In addition, according to GOP spokespersons, recent registration trends have favored the party in at least the three selected southern states.

The Senate situations in each state are borderline and could be affected by any substantial change in registration and party allegiance, either way. In Louisiana, what would doubtlessly have remained a sure Democratic seat becomes iffy with the retirement of Sen. Russell Long. In each of the other states, incumbent Republicans are marginal for several reasons, among those the narrowness of their 1980 victories: Paula Hawkins (Fla.) 51.7 percent of the vote; John East (N.C.) 50 percent; Arlen Specter (Pa.) 50.5.

Dubbed "Operation Open Door," the GOP campaign will involve direct mail, door-to-door canvassing, phone banks and TV advertising to get registered Democrats to switch parties.

A concurrent campaign will be waged by the GOP at a different level to persuade more Democratic office-holders to come on over. Reportedly, one inducement will be a White House reception at the end of the 100-day campaign, hosted by President Reagan, for all elected officials who see the light.

Two recent converts will be used in the four target states to prevail on Democrats at-large and elected Democrats to join them. They are former Rep. Kent Hance (see story this page) and former UN Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick.

Political Money I

If you're concerned about runaway political spending, take heart.

In the recent mayor's race in Laytonsville, Md., challenger Larry Barker spent $14.63. Three-term Mayor Charles White didn't spend a penny.

The mayor was re-elected, and no one has charged he "bought" the election.

Political Money II

On the other hand, if you're not so much concerned with the amount of money spent on campaigning as with a balance in funding, maybe this will cheer you:

Democratic committees, though still trailing their GOP counterparts badly in contributions, made up some ground in 1983-84 over the 1981-82 election cycle.

In the earlier cycle, the GOP National Committee and its House and Senate campaign committees raked in $191.1 million to $31.7 million for the three equivalent Democratic groups—roughly a 6-1 advantage.

In 1983-84 the spread was $246.1 million for GOP committees to $58.8 million for Democrats, slightly better than 4-1. It's still a far cry from funding parity, but every little gain counts.

Hance Bolts to GOP—Eyes Texas Statehouse

Another Democrat bolted to the Republicans, but it's hard to get over-wrought about Kent Hance's switch in party allegiance.

The former Texas Democratic member of the U.S. House—he gave up his seat in an unsuccessful run for the Senate last year—announced recently he's not comfortable any more with Democrats and feels more at home among Republicans, especially if they look kindly on his notion to run for governor against his former Democratic colleague, incumbent Gov. Mark White.

Hance, as a House member, rung up a 62 percent "wrong" record on the AFL-CIO scorecard, so he voted mostly Republican anyway.

His shift to the GOP follows by little more than a year fellow Texan Phil Gramm's leap across party lines. Gramm, who as a Democrat tipped off his party's legislative strategy to the GOP, bolted, re-won his House seat in a special election and was elected to the Senate as a Republican last November, succeeding John Tower.

Hance, as a Democrat, co-sponsored President Reagan's tax proposals of 1981 at the same time Gramm was co-sponsoring Reagan budget proposals. Largely, the legislative record of both had been Republican a long time before their party change was made official.

Hance's defection follows that of eight Texans elected to local offices as Democrats last November who jumped party since. Texas GOP officials think this, in turn, will lead to some party switching by state legislators.

Button Time

Presidential campaign paraphernalia for 1988 is already hitting the market. Some Democrats are sporting Cuomo lapel buttons, and an ad in the right-wing publication Human Events offers pins promoting a GOP "Dream Team" of Rep. Jack Kemp for President and former UN Ambassador Jeane Kirkpatrick as his running mate. Another is Kirkpatrick—a Democrat recently turned Republican—on her own for President, and there's one for Vice President Bush as well.

Senate moves to undermine Davis-Bacon

Organized labor will fight to eliminate a provision in the Senate's defense authorization bill exempting military construction projects of less than $1 million from the Davis-Bacon Act.

"The legislative process is not over," President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said after the Senate voted 49 to 49 to retain the provision.

"This is only one phase in the process," Georgine said. "We are hopeful we can turn it around."

The House defense authorization bill passed earlier this spring does not have the exemption, and the Building Trades unions and their allies will press to keep it out of the final measure that emerges from the House-Senate conference committee that will reconcile the conflicting measures.

The BCTD plans a postcard campaign aimed at those senators who voted against an amendment sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) that would have stricken the prevailing wage exemption from the defense bill.

Expressing his disappointment with the vote, Georgine warned that the exemption provision "would deprive thousands of workers of prevailing wage protections and would not, in real terms, save the federal government any money because they will be using substandard craftsmen to do the work."

Fair wage law

The Davis-Bacon Act, enacted in 1931, was one of the nation's first fair wage standard laws. It was designed to outlaw wage exploitation in federal construction by preventing employers bidding for government contracts from undercutting local area labor standards. The law requires that construction workers on federal projects be paid the "locally prevailing wage" for their skills.

A major concern of organized labor is that national security as well as the safety and well-being of armed services personnel will be jeopardized by an unskilled workforce which will arise as a result of undermining the prevailing wage requirement.

Predictably, employer associations such as the anti-union Association of Building Contractors and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce hailed the Senate action as a victory in their campaign to repeal Davis-Bacon.

The exemption provision, sponsored by Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Tex.), not only would eliminate the prevailing wage requirement from projects of less than $1 million but also would change the way that prevailing wage rates are determined.

Gramm's amendment would require that the prevailing wage be pegged to wages paid 50 percent or more of the workers in a particular occupational classification in a local labor market, including helpers, rather than the existing 30-percent standard.

The Gramm amendment also would prohibit using urban pay rates to determine rural rates in an area and vice versa.

In his move to strike down the amendment, Kennedy declared that Gramm's plan was an "indefensible assault on the

Trade deficit for April hits $11.8 billion

By James M. Shevis

A surge in the U.S. trade deficit with other countries, combined with another decline in new orders for domestically produced goods, served to aggravate the ills of the nation's economy, which has slowed markedly in recent months.

In separate reports, the Commerce Dept. said that the U.S. merchandise trade deficit widened by $11.85 billion in April at the same time new orders for durable goods fell five-tenths of 1 percent, the third monthly drop in a row.

The two developments are both sides of the same coin. Factory orders at home are down because they are being diverted to foreign countries where they can be produced with cheap labor. And this helps balloon the U.S. trade deficit.

Remedies needed

AFL-CIO Economist Mark Anderson said the continued decline for the nation's trade accounts underscores the need for strong action to defend U.S. industries and workers.

"The Administration's policy of benign neglect is having truly tragic consequences," he said. "Unemployment remains at recession levels and 130,000 jobs have been lost in manufacturing in the last three months alone.

"It is incumbent upon Congress to exert leadership in the trade area, and enact legislation to arrest this damaging decline."

April produced the third largest monthly rise in the trade deficit on record, the largest this year. It followed deficits of $11.05 billion in March, $11.45 billion in February, and $10.28 billion in January.

If the trade deficit continues to grow at the pace set in the first four months of the year, the nation will run a $133.9 billion deficit for the year. Last year's trade deficit

House adopts sanctions as anti-apartheid weapon

Congress moved closer to final passage of legislation that would impose stiff economic sanctions against South Africa unless that country takes steps to dismantle its racist system of apartheid.

By a vote of 295 to 127 that reflected wide bipartisan support, the House approved a bill to prohibit U.S. bank loans to the South African government, halt new investments in South African business, ban the importation of Krugerrand gold coins into the United States, and end the export of computers to South Africa.

Fifty-six Republicans joined 239 Democrats in approving the sanctions. Voting against were 121 Republicans and six Democrats.

In addition, the bill establishes conditions under which two of the sanctions could be waived for limited periods. The legislation also sets penalties for enforcing the sanctions.

Earlier in the week, the Republican-controlled Senate Foreign Relations Committee overwhelmingly approved similar legislation. The 16 to 1 vote indicated that the measure will have no trouble clearing the full Senate.

While not as tough as those proposed by the AFL-CIO, the sanctions were backed by organized labor, which warned Congress earlier this spring that the apartheid system could lead to bloody conflict unless it is soon dismantled.

The congressional action sent a strong signal to the Reagan Administration that the American public rejects its policy of "constructive engagement" that winks at South Africa's apartheid system.

Former civil service chief pulls out under heavy fire

By John R. Oravec

Donald J. Devine, the Reagan Administration's tight-fisted and combative director of the Office of Personnel Management, withdrew his nomination for a new term as head of the federal civil service.

Devine's pullout came a day after the General Accounting Office charged that he "illegally circumvented" federal law in an attempt to retain authority over OPM after his old term expired in late March.

Just before his four-year term ended, Devine secretly signed an order giving himself full power to continue running the agency although he was legally required to step down.

Instead, he took a job as executive assistant to the acting director of OPM, Loretta Cornelius. In testimony to the Senate Government Affairs Committee, Cornelius said she had not been informed of Devine's secret order, but that Devine later asked her to say she had known about it.

At earlier hearings, federal employee unions testified that Devine was unfit to hold OPM office.

President Keneth T. Blaylock of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. accused Devine of having "demeaned the integrity of his office" by his blatantly partisan administration of the federal civil service.

Showing no regret over Devine's departure, Blaylock commended the Senate committee for its close scrutiny of the former OPM director's performance.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue assailed OSHA's failure to issue a grain dust standard in address to Grain Millers convention delegates.

OSHA blasted on rule delay to defuse grain dust hazard

Toronto — The failure of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to issue a federal grain dust standard was blasted by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in a speech to the Grain Millers' convention here which unanimously adopted a resolution urging immediate action by OSHA.

"We're tired of the stalling," Donahue said. "We want a safe working place for your members and for other workers in similar facilities."

He stressed the difference between the United States and Australia, which has had strict controls on the accumulation of grain dust for decades. There have been only minor explosions in Australian grain processing facilities over the past 60 years, Donahue said. In the United States, however, 205 workers have been killed in 374 explosions over the past 26 years.

"The calloused indifference on the grain standard is typical of an OSHA, a Labor Dept. and an Office of Management & Budget that knows the price of everything and the value of nothing," he said.

Robert F. Harbrant, president of the federation's Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., voiced similar concern, noting that the Grain Millers and FAST have worked together to pressure OSHA for a standard.

But, he noted, "we still do not have a grain standard, because the rich and powerful businesses and the insensitive government continue to try and make you believe they do not know the cause of grain dust explosions. This is inexcusable, unbelievable, unconvincing and in short—a damn lie."

NLRB politicized

The 227 delegates to the convention also adopted a resolution objecting to the politicization of the National Labor Relations Board by the Administration. It charged that President Reagan's appointments to the Board "constitute a perversion of both the board's role and the appointment process, in order to effectuate the anti-union philosophy of employers."

Another resolution supported the petition of the National Corn Growers to bar concessions under President Reagan's Carribean Basin initiative that permit "unfairly subsidized" Brazilian ethanol to enter the United States without duty to compete with domestic production.

Other resolutions adopted by the delegates related to constitutional changes and internal policies.

Among other convention speakers were Ontario Federation of Labor President Clifford G. Pilkey, Canadian Labor Congress Sec.-Treas. Shirley Carr, Assistant Director Charles McDonald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak of AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Jeff Fiedler, FAST's corporate affairs director.

Trojan Luggage goes on labor's Unfair List

Trojan Luggage Co. of Memphis, Tenn., has been placed on the AFL-CIO Unfair List at the request of the Furniture Workers, the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. announced.

The listing is in support of the UFWA Local 282, which struck Trojan in April after the company demanded that workers pay $50 a month toward negotiated group health insurance benefits. Wages at Trojan average only $4.96 an hour, the UFWA pointed out.

Trojan demanded the give-back even though it posted profits in each of the last three years, the union reported. The company is maintaining operations with strikebreakers.

15,500 out in New York

Hotel strike counters demand for givebacks

New York—Some 15,500 workers, represented by the nine-union Hotel & Motel Trades Council, are on strike against 54 major hotels here. The unions warned that the strike would be expanded to more hotels unless progress is made in the bargaining talks that have been dragging on for 14 months.

The council, a coalition representing 25,000 workers at 165 hotels, charged that the settlement of the strike is being prolonged by the multinational hotel chains. "The problem is not with the small hotels," said council representative Henry Sheinkopf. "It's a clear case of gangsters with attache cases deciding union policies. The multinationals are carpetbaggers with no allegiances to this city."

Strike issues

The council on June 6 filed unfair labor practice charges against the Hotel Association charging that the employers' group is prolonging the strike by making its members agree to an illegal "mutual assistance pact."

The unions said they had been prevented from signing separate agreements with hotels represented by the association.

The central issues in the strike, the first against the hotels in 46 years, include wages and demands by employers for a two-tier pay scale, employee contributions to benefit funds, merging of some job titles, extension of probationary period, and the exemption of some jobs from union coverage.

Both sides have narrowed their differences over the last 14 months. The unions are seeking a first-year pay raise of 6.5 percent as part of a 25-percent increase over four years. Hotel owners want to limit the first year increase to 4.5 percent in a five-year package, with raises of $14.50 a week in each of the remaining four years. The trades council noted that the weekly wage formula would be only a 2-percent increase. The average wage for the hotel workers is $315 a week.

Unions comprising the council are the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 6, Electrical Workers Local 3, Operating Engineers Locals 94, 94A and 94B, Service Employees Local 144, Firemen & Oilers Local 56, Painters Local 1422, Office & Professional Employees Local 153, Upholstery Workers Local 43 and Carpenters Local 1.

The unions set up picket lines June 1 at 45 of the 165 hotels involved in the bargaining. The strike was later expanded to 54 hotels.

Seventy-six hotels have signed agreements committing them to accept the pattern contract as negotiated between the council and the Hotel Association.

Bargaining talks have continued sporadically since the strike began with federal mediators attempting to narrow the gap between the two sides.

The strikers have received strong support from other unions, including the garbage collectors, cab drivers, musicians and deliverers of food and supplies. When uncollected trash accumulated to cause a health hazard at some hotels, the city's sanitation department was called in to haul away the garbage, with the hotels having to pick up the tab.

The struck hotels are remaining open with supervisors providing minimal services.

Round-the-clock picket lines have been confined to areas behind police barracades. Several pickets have been injured thus far during the strike with two reportedly slashed by two scabs outside the Sheraton Centre on June 3. Pickets have reported being struck by objects thrown at them from the upper floors of the hotels.

Among the events taken out of the struck hotels was the Tony Awards ball which is held in conjunction with the presentation of Broadway's theatrical awards. It was moved from the New York Hilton to the Grand Hyatt Hotel.

Mayor Ed Koch refused to cross the picket lines to give a speech to a pediatricians' convention at the Waldorf-Astoria, and Rep. Maro Biaggi cancelled a $100-a-plate fund raiser that was to be held at the Sheraton Centre.

Devine's pullout gratifies unions in civil service

to repair the damage done to federal personnel practices over the past four years," Blaylock said.

One of President Reagan's staunchest ideological supporters, Devine had been under fire for political activities on behalf of Republican congressional candidates in the 1984 campaigns and earlier.

But with the revelation of Devine's secret order, his chances of confirmation by the Republican-controlled Senate faded quickly. While denying he had done anything wrong in keeping control of the agency after his term ended, Devine announced he was withdrawing his nomination.

Blaylock, who heads the Government Employees, branded Devine a foe of collective bargaining and accused him of trying to replace career federal workers with political appointees.

Earlier, Devine told a Senate Civil Service subcommittee that he saw nothing wrong with his taking an active role in political campaigns while drawing a federal salary as the top administrator of the OPM. Devine insisted that as a presidential appointee he was not subject to the Hatch Act, which prohibits political activities by government employees.

But it was the Reagan Administration that brought charges of Hatch Act violations against Blaylock and Presidents Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers and Moe Biller of the Postal Workers—although all three have been on long-term leave without pay from their government jobs.

In her testimony to the committee, Acting OPM Director Cornelius said she had not learned of Devine's secret order until almost five weeks after he signed it.

She said Devine told her he had forgotten to inform her, but he subsequently urged her to say she had been fully aware of it. Cornelius said she decided to fire Devine when she uncovered the order.

Asked about charges that he had lied to Cornelius about his scheme to continue his authority over OPM, Devine said, "I can say absolutely and without reservation I did not tell her or anyone a lie."

The GAO decision said Devine illegally "exceeded his authority" by delegating absolute power to the OPM executive assistant—the position he assumed after his term as director ran out.

New policy on disability claims hit

The Reagan Administration's highly touted announcement that it will follow court precedents on the payment of social security and disability benefits is "misleading" and "inadequate" because it does not apply to the lower steps of the claims procedure, the AFL-CIO said.

Larry Smedley, associate director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, charged that the Dept. of Health & Human Services chose to "ignore the first two levels" of the four-step claims procedure, when it should have extended the benefit of judicial ruling to all levels of the process.

HHS Sec. Margaret M. Heckler had announced that the department, in a "new approach," will apply appeals court rulings on social security issues to similar cases within a judicial circuit.

Under HHS's old policy of "nonacquiescence," the department applied circuit court decisions that disagreed with its policies only to the specific cases that prompted the rulings. It ignored the court precedents when processing subsequent similar cases.

Appeals process

The new approach allows local hearing officers and state agency officials to continue to ignore the circuit court rulings that conflict with agency policy. Cases that are appealed to an administrative law judge or finally to the Appeals Council may benefit from the new approach as being subject to the appeals court precedents.

Eileen P. Sweeney, an attorney for the National Senior Citizens Law Center, noted that under the new Administration policy "persistent people who appeal may get the benefit of circuit court precedents" while those who do not appeal will not benefit.

During Reagan's first term, nearly a half-million persons were dropped from the social security disability rolls on the ground that they were no longer too ill or disabled to work. Hundreds of thousands carried appeals to the courts and were restored to the benefit rolls when the courts ruled in their favor. The SSA, however, refused to acquiesce to extending the rulings to similar cases.

The Administration's decision to try a "new approach" resulted directly from a court challege to its nonacquiescence policy by the City of New York and the American Civil Liberties Union on behalf of some 25,000 persons who unsuccessfully applied for benefits or who were cut from the disability rolls.

Job security heads goals at Westinghouse

Pittsburgh — Job security protections head the list of union objectives in negotiations for 26,000 workers at Westinghouse Electric Corp. plants across the country.

President William H. Bywater of the Electronic Workers stressed as bargaining opened here that the IUE and other unions in the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of General Electric & Westinghouse Unions also will be seeking improvements in the pension plan, wages, cost-of-living adjustments, health insurance and other provisions.

Also involved in the initial stage of the talks are the Electrical Workers and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers. Along with the IUE, they bargain for the bulk of Westinghouse workers represented by the 13-union CBC coalition under contracts that expire July 21.

Negotiations opened May 14 on new contracts between the unions and General Electric to replace agreements expiring June 30.

Since the current contracts were signed three years ago, the number of union employees has dropped from 100,000 to 80,000 at General Electric and from 41,500 to 34,000 at Westinghouse.

During this period, Westinghouse pension plan assets grew 55 percent to $3.4 billion, Bywater noted. But while employee contributions rose 51 percent, the company's contribution fell $91 million—down 48 percent.

Cruel realities

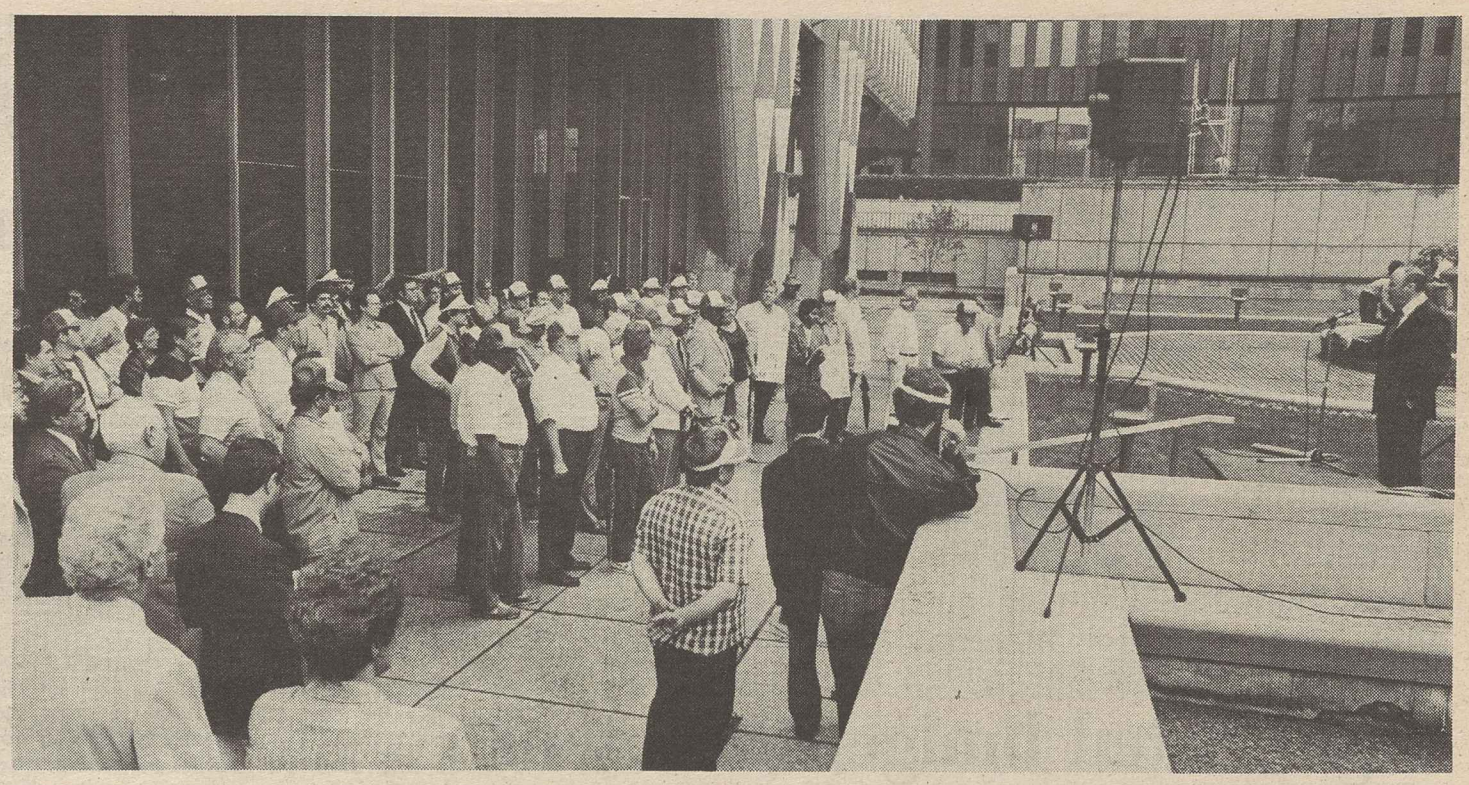
"We are deeply concerned and troubled at the wide disparity between the soaring profitability of the company . . . and the cruel realities that face present and former IUE members of the Westinghouse family," said Bywater, who heads the CBC steering committee.



"Westinghouse most certainly can upgrade its pension program."

The unions also face a move by Westinghouse to end the history of national contracts and negotiate separate agreements covering workers at 27 different locations.

But the company's "autonomous business unit approach" was sharply rejected by the unions.

IUE "sought and was granted in the mid-40's status as a single national bargaining unit at Westinghouse by the National Labor Relations Board in conformance with national policies for promoting labor-management stability," Bywater pointed out national bargaining remains "vital to the interests of the people we represent," he stressed.

Other unions in the CBC are the Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers, Steelworkers, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Machinists, Carpenters, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

IUE President Bywater addresses rally at the opening of Westinghouse contract negotiations in Pittsburgh.

Arizona convention assails Reagan anti-worker policy

Flagstaff, Ariz. — Administration attempts to saddle workers, the elderly and the poor with a disproportionate share of the federal deficit burden and its failure to curb the mounting trade imbalance were major targets throughout the three-day Arizona State AFL-CIO convention here.

Retired Steelworkers' official Larry Spitz, who heads the Union Club of Sun City, criticized the Reagan Administration's continuing attacks on social programs, including social security and its drive to tax health and hospitalization insurance and other job-related protections. He emphasized the enormous growth of the public debt under President Reagan.

Cheap labor

Earl McDavid, western director of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., pointed out that this year the nation's trade deficit is expected to soar to $150 billion—five times the level when Reagan took office. He said that while American business has set up shop overseas to exploit cheap labor, the Administration has done little or nothing to curb imports.

State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock told the 250 delegates that the "biggest disappointment" of the 1985 session of the legislature was its refusal to raise the weekly unemployment benefit higher than $135—"far below all of the other western states."

Business executive Bill Schulz, a Democrat, who lost narrowly in his 1984 bid to unseat U.S. Sen. Barry Goldwater (R) and plans to run for governor next year, urged "an environmental tariff . . . to save the dying copper industry." He said that while the copper industry was "once arrogant, it is now scared to death" by copper imports that are produced under lax, if any, enforced environmental and worker safeguards.

Schulz pledged that as governor he would push for a tax on imported copper to cover domestic environmental costs, which he estimated are about 10 cents a pound.

Other speakers included Assistant Regional Director Ed Collins, State COPE Director David Gregory, Arlyn Plowman of the Rocky Mountain Safety & Health Project, AFL-CIO Region VI COPE Director LaMar Gulbransen and Susan Dunlop, assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Aycock was re-elected to a 10th two-year term. Charles Huggins of the Electrical Workers was elected president, succeeding Pete McGhee of the Pipefitters who did not seek re-election. McGhee was named president emeritus and an honorary member of the executive board. All vice presidents were re-elected.

Jobless cut off

Despite a 13.4 percent unemployment rate, West Virginia jobless workers are no longer eligible for federal extended benefits. Although it has the highest overall state unemployment rate, West Virginia "triggered off" the extended benefits program May 18 when the state's insured jobless rate dropped below 6 percent.

The Reagan Administration imposed new restrictions on the program in 1981 and excluded long-term unemployed workers who had exhausted their regular state benefits.

Only Alaska with 10.4 percent unemployment, Idaho at 9.5 percent, and Puerto Rico at 22.4 percent remain eligible for extended benefits because their insured jobless are above 6 percent. Jobless workers in five other states with double-digit unemployment rates—Louisiana, Oregon, Alabama, Mississippi and Michigan—aren't eligible for the additional compensation.

Bipartisan House vote sets stiff anti-apartheid sanctions

and the Senate, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said South Africa's black trade union movement "holds the greatest promise for the ultimate elimination of apartheid through peaceful means." He noted also that the country's black trade unionists fully support the economic sanctions even though they might mean some short-term economic dislocation for them.

"They see no other solution," Donahue testified.

Labor's main concern with the House bill, as well as with the companion measure approved by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, is that they fail to press for the abolition of South Africa's preventive detention laws. These laws, which have been used to jail without charge scores of black trade union leaders, serve mainly to harass and intimidate, Donahue observed.

Of the two bills, the House measure sponsored by Rep. William H. Gray III (D-Pa.) is the more stringent. The Administration opposes either proposal on the grounds that sanctions will lend support to apartheid hardliners in Pretoria and make matters worse for South Africa's black majority.

During debate on the House floor, Rep. Mark Siljander (R-Mich.), who carried the Administration's banner and argument against the Gray bill, said the plan to bar new investment by U.S. firms operating in South Africa would only hurt black workers, who might face layoff.

Responding to Siljander, whose bill to suspend the sanctions for three years was overwhelmingly defeated, Gray said his proposal would not cause the loss of a single job, not even "any of those precious slave jobs in the mines." Gray added:

"Do we stand with the victims or do we stand with the oppressors? No matter how we try to rationalize it, that is the question."

Support for some action against South Africa has been building for years in the West, particularly in the United States since last year when scores of blacks were killed by South African police called in to put down demonstrations.

The AFL-CIO policy for even tougher sanctions than those proposed in the legislation now before Congress is in line with that of other free world unions affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Ohio court orders jobless aid for hospital lockout victims

Columbus, Ohio—Workers locked out by the Ohio Valley Hospital Association when it closed its hospital in anticipation of a strike by union nurses are entitled to unemployment benefits, the state supreme court ruled.

The decision upheld two lower court rulings that members of the State, County & Municipal Employees and of the Licensed Practical Nurses & Skilled Hospital Employees Professional & Economic Security Program, Inc., were entitled to benefits.

The Ohio Nurses Association threatened to strike on Jan. 3, 1979. On the day before the strike, the hospital reduced its patient load to zero and laid off all its workers. The nurses' strike ended on Mar. 5, 1979, the hospital was reopened and all employees were recalled to work.

Some 650 workers were denied jobless benefits during the walkout. The denial was upheld by the Bureau of Employment Services Board of Review which cited state law prohibiting payment of benefits to anyone whose "unemployment was due to a labor dispute."

AFSCME and LPN/SHEP appealed and won rulings in both the common pleas court and the state court of appeals that their members were entitled to benefits because their unemployment was due to a lockout.

Upholding those rulings, the state's high court cited an Illinois supreme court decision in a similar case. The Ohio supreme court described the non-striking union members as "innocent bystanders who were unemployed because the hospital board of trustees created a 'lockout.'"

Mangone named head of Auto Workers' CAP

Detroit—Orazio "Joe" Mangone has been named director of the Auto Workers' national Community Action Program, UAW President Owen Bieber announced.

Mangone, CAP's assistant director since 1982, first joined the UAW in Cincinnati, served as chair of the Greater Cincinnati Citizenship Council, the forerunner to today's CAP Council.

As an international representative in 1967, he helped set up the Ohio CAP and in 1978, he joined the national CAP staff.

Mangone succeeds Henry Lacayo as CAP director. Lacayo is now president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland joins Flight Attendants on Washington picket line to rally support for striking United Airlines pilots.

Tight-fisted budget threatens key Labor Dept. programs

The Reagan Administration's narrow approach to reducing the federal budget deficit could seriously undermine essential Labor Dept. programs, particularly those that provide job training and needed assistance to unemployed workers, the AFL-CIO warned at congressional hearings.

The federation expressed particular concern over proposed cutbacks in the department's appropriations for job safety and health enforcement, adjustment assistance for workers who lose their jobs to the flood of imports, services provided by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, funding of the summer youth employment program, and staffing of other department programs.

The most disturbing proposal in the department's request for fiscal year 1986 is in employment and training, Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor told a House Appropriations subcommittee.

"The epitome of this regressive policy is the proposal to eliminate the Job Corps," Taylor said. "The Job Corps serves, successfully, some of the people most difficult to employ in our society."

Most Job Corps trainees usually have a limited education, are from the minorities and have never held a full-time job, she noted. Yet despite these odds, the Labor Dept.'s own data for 1984 show that more than 60 percent of the Job Corps students who completed training found employment, and another 15 percent went on for more education.

Good return

Taylor cited findings of an in-depth study that $1.45 is returned to society for each $1 invested in the Job Corps.

The federation also called for reauthorization of the Trade Adjustment Assistance program, "which the department presumes will expire without renewal." Reauthorization of the program would require new appropriations for benefits, training, job search and relocation assistance.

Taylor noted that President Reagan proposed to replace the Trade Adjustment Assistance program for laid-off workers with services provided under the Job Training Partnership Act's dislocated worker program.

"But what he does not mention," she said, "is that he is also proposing that the JTPA dislocated worker program be cut back by more than 50 percent."

Cutbacks or total elimination of JTPA funds would adversely affect the operations of the federation's Human Resources Development Institute, which has made an effective contribution to the operation of dislocated worker programs.

Taylor asked how the department could justify a reduction in "slots" for the summer youth employment program with the nation's overall teenage jobless rate at 17.7 percent and the rate for black youth at 39 percent.

She questioned the agency's rationale in claiming the slots are not needed because of a projected decline in the youth population and generation by "the improving economy" of a greater supply of summer jobs.

Pointing to low employee morale at the Labor Dept. that has resulted from "insensitive and often hostile" leadership during Reagan's first term, Taylor said organized labor welcomes the appointment of William E. Brock as the new Secretary of Labor.

She suggested that both the Labor Dept. and the nation's workers will benefit from the resignation of Robert A. Rowland as head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

"President Reagan's policies as implemented at the Labor Dept. in the past have been harsh," she observed. "We remain hopeful that Mr. Brock's appointment is more than just a change of stewardship" for a federal agency that has had its effectiveness undermined by the White House Office of Management & Budget.

wages of construction workers across this country."

He charged the exemption would not save the government anything but would "strip both union and nonunion workers on military construction projects . . . of all the prevailing wage protections currently provided under every other type of federally supported construction project."

The real purpose of the Gramm amendment, Kennedy charged, is "to repeal the concept of prevailing wage on all military construction projects for all practical purposes."

Kennedy cited estimates of the Congressional Budget Office that 95 percent of all military contracts and 40 percent of the dollar volume of those contracts would be exempted under the Gramm amendment.

Pilots charge 'bad faith'

United spurns U.S. bid to reopen strike talks

United Airlines stiffened its union-busting stance against the Air Line Pilots, rebuffing the request of the National Mediation Board to meet with ALPA to settle the back-to-work issues and end the three-week-old strike.

United "is and has been bargaining with its employees in bad faith," ALPA charged on learning of United's refusal to meet.

The company has stalled settlement of the strike by keying on "reprisal issues," the union said.

ALPA President Henry A. Duffy noted that 566 of the 570 pilots United trained over the past year refused to cross the picket lines. The company has vowed not to hire those pilots who cost more than $10,000 each to train. The union said United was "shooting itself in the foot" by sticking to that decision.

Duffy affirmed the ALPA's support for these pilots, saying, "We will not stand by and watch United Airlines take its revenge against 566 pilots who became convinced the ALPA position was correct and joined our effort." Duffy identified this as the major issue remaining in the strike.

The air carrier is also insisting that strikebreakers and newly hired pilots receive "super seniority" over those that went on strike.

The Pilots said they will remain on the picket line until the company also agrees not to retaliate against some 30 supervisors (flight instructors) who have honored the picket lines. United says the union does not represent these workers, but in fact they are ALPA members.

Solidarity

The Pilots also pledged to remain on strike until a back-to-work agreement with the Flight Attendants is reached. The AFA is conducting informal talks with the company. More than 90 percent of the AFA's members at United have stayed off the job.

ALPA flatly rejected United's contention that the Pilots are attempting to assert bargaining representation for supervisors and AFA members.

"The Flight Attendants have their own union and their own negotiating rights," ALPA pointed out.

"We're only saying that they respected our picket lines, and in turn, we have let the airline know we will not return until AFA reaches an acceptable back-to-work agreement," the Pilots stressed.

And as for the fill-in supervisors, the union noted that it wants them to return to their management jobs at the conclusion of the strike.

No new bargaining sessions had been planned as the strike entered its fourth week.

United, in a mailgram to the Mediation Board on June 5, refused its request for both sides to meet the next day in Washington. It said the company and the union had reached a settlement and charged that the back-to-work issues raised by ALPA were outside the union's jurisdiction and not negotiable.

ALPA had earlier accepted the board's request. The company's reply, however, was that "no meaningful discussions can take place until ALPA drops their demands on these issues."

The intervention of the NMB in seeking to settle the dispute stems in part from the impact the strike is having on airline passengers as United has had to cancel 86 percent of its daily flights. There has also been an economic impact on some cities and especially on tourist trade for Hawaii, ALPA said.

Money matters settled

The economic issues of the strike were settled when a tentative agreement was reached on May 24. The company got some of the concessions that it sought, said ALPA spokesman Sam O'Daniel, a United pilot for 21 years. "It's hard to believe that the company is being this vindictive. I'm willing to fight this forever."

His sentiments reflected the views of the 5,000 United pilots, more than 94 percent of whom are on the picket line. To maintain that solidarity and to keep the membership informed, the ALPA has used a series of closed-circuit, coast-to-coast teleconferences to discuss pre-strike and post-strike preparations and to answer members' questions. The teleconferences linked 19 cities.

A second phase of the ALPA's efforts involves twice-weekly meetings of pilots and their spouses in small groups to view union-produced videotapes and to conduct roundtable discussions. Communication moves both ways in the meetings as the members receive the latest information on the strike and their concerns are relayed back to headquarters.

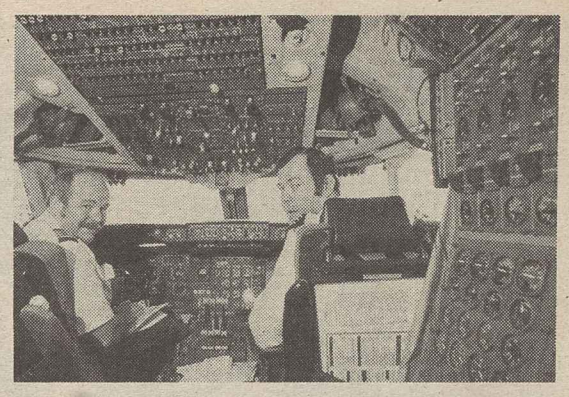
Unions awarded OSHA funds for safety education

Thirteen AFL-CIO affiliates have been awarded $1.2 million from the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's shrinking New Directions grants program.

The annual awards are provided on a three-to-five year basis. Under the Reagan Administration, funding for the grants has been slashed severely, from the high of $14 million under the Carter Administration to this year's budget request of just $3.2 million. OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland recently told a congressional panel the New Directions grants had the lowest priority among OSHA programs.



Typically, those awarded grants have identified a serious problem in construction or industry and developed an educational safety and health program to deal with it, according to OSHA.

The federation affiliates awarded grants are the Grain Millers, $180,000; Asbestos Workers, $100,000; Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers, $110,000; Service Employees, $145,000; Rubber Workers, $90,000; Maine AFL-CIO, $45,000; Florida AFL-CIO, $110,000; California State Building & Construction Trades Council, $90,000; North Dakota State Building & Construction Trades Council, $65,000; Texas Building & Construction Trades Council, $65,000; Washington Building & Construction Trades Council, $115,000; West Central Illinois Building & Construction Trades Council, $60,000 and Painters' District Council 9 in New York, $90,000.

OSHA said a decision would be made later on funding for the Laborers' Alaska District Council.

IAM cargo handlers load supplies into an Ethiopia-bound transport jet, while ALPA crew and flight attendants make last minute preparations for the Flying Tigers' mercy mission for starving Africans.

Airline union volunteers reach out to Ethiopia

Union members joined forces with their airline employers to provide vital shipments of food to the starving people of Ethiopia. In two separate campaigns, Machinists, Flight Attendants and Air Line Pilots at Flying Tigers and Eastern Airlines organized mercy missions to aid famine victims in Africa.

"Lifelift for Ethiopian Relief," sponsored by Los Angeles-based Flying Tigers' employees, left New York's Kennedy airport with 234,771 pounds of medical supplies, food and clothing valued at over $1 million. The Flying Tigers' workers donated not only their money but their time and talents to the aid project.

An employee committee spent a short three and one-half weeks organizing the airlift and finding answers to seemingly endless questions, such as, "Could a 747 freighter acually land in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia?"

Food and medical supplies needed to be located and transported to New York, fuel had to be purchased, and volunteer flight crews had to be found. Fund-raising efforts were started and donations poured in from the company's offices in Japan, Taiwan, Australia, Hong Kong, Singapore, Europe and throughout the United States.

Worldwide, workers responded to the committee's call that someone must care.

Once in Ethiopia, the food, clothing and medical supplies would be distributed through Interaction, a coalition of 125 private relief organizations active in the country. Since last November, Interaction has shipped $40 million worth of needed medicines and other goods to Ethiopia.

Last minute flight preparations continued at New York's JFK Airport with IAM members giving up their off days to load supplies and service the 747. A dozen cargo handlers worked through the night to complete the final preparations.

18-hour flight

The 747 left New York with two crews on board for the 18-hour flight. ALPA members Randy Patterson, captain, First Officer Charles Cozard and Second Officer Charles Gallardo flew the first leg of the trip, joined by Flight Attendants Becky Rasmussen and Michele Rizza and IAM member and mechanic Charles Millman. The ALPA crew was later relieved by Captain Hal Ewing, First Officer Mick O'Connor and Second Officer Paul Zahner.

On the ground in Addis Ababa, handlers began unloading the cargo, bound for refugee camps located outside the city. After six hours on the ground, the crew continued on to Taiwan.

Flight attendants who joined the mercy mission pointed out that warehouses in the United States are full of goods and food to be shipped to Ethiopia, but the cost of a charter flight is nearly $300,000. Flying Tigers' workers are continuing their fund-raising efforts and hope to coordinate future missions.

Union members at Eastern had the same idea. While the Flying Tigers' life-lift was underway, Eastern workers in the Miami area had formed "People of Eastern Helping People," an employee group to channel aid to the African famine victims. Committee leaders — including Buddy Sugg, IAM; Gary Kosak, ALPA, and Mary Kenny, Transport Workers—began a campaign that resulted in 60,000 tons of food, medicine and diet supplements donated to World Vision, a service organization active in Ethiopia since 1961.

Eastern agreed to donate a plane if the committee could guarantee a maintenance crew and raise the $94,000 needed for fuel and landing fees.

Workers took their appeal to Miami area communities, appearing on local radio and television shows, and collected more than $100,000.

Generous citizens

A Boca Raton, Fla., couple donated nearly $60,000, two-thirds of the amount needed for fuel. "I'm going to be 97 in two weeks and this is my last chance to do something good for humanity," said Fred Krusell. "I saw what you were doing and that you needed help. This is something I want to do for the people in Ethiopia."

The Eastern committee was contacted by the Northwest Medical team in Oregon which volunteered two doctors, 14 nurses and five technicians for an extended tour in Ethiopia. The first mercy shipment left Miami after 75 IAM members spent their days off loading the aircraft, and a second airlift followed six weeks later.

The committee continues in full swing and is working to establish an industry-wide cooperative and continuous airlift service to Ethiopia.

Foreign trade deficit widens as U.S. plant orders plunge

was a record $123 billion, the biggest by any nation in history.

A major reason for the April increase in the trade deficit was a sharp rise in imported autos. "The rise in imports of automobiles was largely from Japan, marking the beginning of a new fiscal year and the end of the voluntary restraint program," Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said.

"Imports of Japanese automobiles surged to $1.4 billion from $1 billion in March and an average of $1.1 billion per month during 1984."

Unions in the auto industry had warned that the removal of voluntary limits on the import of Japanese-made cars in April would flood the U.S. market and cause further job losses.

Auto imports

Auto imports made further inroads last month. The nation's major auto producers reported sales of domestic-make cars fell 4.9 percent in the last 10 days of May from the year-earlier level as importers made gains. Sales of European cars rose 11 percent from May 1984 while Japanese-made units climbind 9.8 percent.

For the first four months of 1985, the U.S. merchandise trade deficit was $44.63 billion, or $2.6 billion greater than the same period last year.

During that period, the pattern in manufacturing trade has continued to deteriorate. Manufacturing exports rose $2.9 billion, while imports increased $9.3 billion. The U.S. deficit in the trade of industrial machinery, computers, communication, autos and aerospace goods rose to $14.3 billion in the first four months of 1985 compared to a deficit of $9.4 billion over the same period last year.

The continuing flood of imports translates into the loss of American jobs. Government and trade officials estimate that every $1 billion in trade creates 30,000 jobs. On that basis, last year's whopping trade deficit of $123 billion cost the nation about 3.7 million jobs.

Imports have virtually destroyed such American industries as color television, shoes, cameras, and farm equipment.

The Multifiber Arrangement (MFA), which has given the U.S. textile industry a measure of protection against low-priced foreign competition, is seen increasingly as a model for providing orderly trade while minimizing disruption among U.S. industries. The 24-year-old international agreement allows western governments, including the United States, to set quotas on imports of texiles from low-wage countries.

Last month, a group of top-level business and labor leaders commissioned by former U.S. Trade Representative William Brock called for a new national trade policy as a prerequisite to negotiating a new round of multilateral trade negotiations, saying:

"It is hard to see how the U.S. could benefit (from the talks) since we would be entering negotiations from a weak position due to the overvalued dollar and massive trade deficits."

The group's position coincided with an AFL-CIO Executive Council statement at its May meeting that the U.S. push for multilateral trade negotiations "should not be allowed to take the place of needed efforts to deal with specific trade problems and should not substitute for specific action correcting the imbalance of exchange rates."

The high value of the American dollar has made foreign goods less expensive than domestic goods, and U.S. businesses and consumers have been quick to take advantage of the price difference, con-

ILGWU pact provides gains in pay, benefits for 125,000

New York — The Ladies' Garment Workers reached agreement with several clothing manufacturers' associations on wage and benefit increases that will eventually affect some 125,000 members of the union.

Meanwhile, the Clothing & Textile Workers, unable to reach an accord with the Clothing Manufacturers Association on a contract to replace one that expired May 31, extended the old agreement for four months. The ACTWU talks involve 53,000 workers in the men's and boys' clothing industry.

The ILGWU's settlement with associations of employers in dress, coat and suit, sportswear, and raincoat manufacturing, provide for no pay raises in the first year of the three-year pacts, but will increase employer contributions to fringe benefits by 2.75 to 3.75 percent. Wage boosts of 6 percent and 5 percent will take effect in the second and third years, respectively.

ILGWU Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur said talks with other industry associations and apparel contractors are continuing and agreements are expected within a week.

When bargaining began earlier this year, employer negotiators demanded a three-year pay freeze. A major factor in the negotiations was the impact of huge apparel imports on the industry.

ACTWU's four-month extension of its contract with the CMA came after both sides sought a breather in the tough bargaining. The CMA opened the talks with demands for a 15-month pay freeze, a freeze on benefits, and other concessions.

Chicago doctors pick Hospital-Health Care union

Chicago — Nearly 400 physicians at Cook County Hospital chose the Hospital & Health Care Employees as their collective bargaining representative.

Union President Henry Nicholas said "this may be the largest group of salaried physicians ever to seek union representation."

The doctors filed for recognition following an organizing drive that began shortly after Illinois' new public employee collective bargaining law took effect last year. Nicholas said the doctors are dissatisfied with their lack of voice in patient care and conditions of employment.

Two-thirds of the doctors in the bargaining unit signed authorization cards, the union said. They include surgeons, pediatricians, radiologists, anesthesiologists and internal medicine practitioners. Nearly all other health care workers at the hospital are already unionized.

Salvadoran visitor

President Jose Napoleon Duarte of El Salvador and the family of slain American trade unionist Michael Hammer meet for the first time since his death in 1981. Duarte, in Washington for talks with U.S. officials, promised to reactivate a Salvadoran investigative unit on the murders of Hammer, Mark Pearlman and Jose Rodolfo Viera in the light of new evidence. Hammer and Pearlman were representatives of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development. From left, are Michael Hammer, Jr., Hammer's widow Maria, Duarte, AIFLD Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr., and his wife, Jane.

Narrow job disease ruling erodes Virginia coverage

Richmond, Va.—A Virginia supreme court ruling will make it nearly impossible for victims of occupational disease in the state to get workers' compensation benefits and underlines the urgent need for federal regulations in this area, the AFL-CIO said.

The court decision, which overturned an award made by the Industrial Commission of Virginia, severely constricts the scope of compensable job-related occupational diseases.

"This is an atrocious decision for the workers in Virginia," said Jim Ellenberger, compensation specialist with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security.

"Virginia is headed in the opposite direction from the other 49 states" on workers' compensation, Ellenberger charged. "This is an invitation to employers and their insurers to contest every claim for occupational disease."

State AFL-CIO President David H. Laws called the ruling "horrible."

Workers abandoned

"It's another case where workers have been abandoned," he said.

Laws reported that efforts are being made to persuade Gov. Charles Robb (D) to call a special session of the legislature to reverse the effects of the decision.

The impact of the ruling is just now being felt, Laws said. He cited reports that the Industrial Commission has dropped some persons who have been receiving benefits in the past for occupational diseases.

The state supreme court ruled that "a condition gradually incurred on account of repeated, work-related trauma" is not compensable as an occupational disease under the Virginia Workers' Compensation Act.

The case involved a member of the Communications Workers, Brenda Gilliam, who in January 1983 filed a claim against her employer, Western Electric. Gilliam had contracted tenosynovitis, an "inflammation of the lining of the tendon sheath . . . of the long flexors of the thumb in both hands," according to Dr. Charles Emich, an orthopedic surgeon.

An award by the deputy commissioner of the Industrial Commission ordering Western Electric to pay Gilliam's medical costs was upheld by the full commission.

But the court ruled that the Workers' Compensation Act does not cover "an ordinary disease of life, a 'disease to which the general public is exposed outside of the employment," unless it falls within one of the two exceptions expressly stated.

Basis of ruling

The judges said that based on the statute and past commission decisions, "we have held that disability resulting from work-related aggravation of such a disease is not compensable."

The court cited the ruling in Holly Farms vs. Yancey, a decision where compensation was denied for a back injury. The judges interpreted the "legislative intent" of the General Assembly when it repealed a list of occupational diseases from inclusion in the compensation law.

The judges agreed with the contention of Western Electric that legislators intended to narrow the coverage of the act by repealing the list. But a 1969 legislative task force said the list was removed to assure broad coverage, because it was feared that listing specific illnesses could result in exclusion of other ailments.

Federal study faults VDT conditions

Albany, N.Y.—The working conditions of video display terminal operators at two state agencies should be improved with better furniture, reduced glare and less stressful schedules, a federal report specifies.

Prepared by the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH), the report was presented to the joint safety and health maintenance committee of New York State and the Civil Service Employees Association. CSEA, which is Local 1000 of the State, County & Municipal Employees, represents about 100,000 state workers.

James Corcoran, CSEA safety director, said that under a proposed contract with the state, the recommendations of the report will be implemented over the next three years.

The report was based on an ergonomic evaluation of 40 VDT workplaces at the two agencies and responses to questionnaires from 905 VDT operators. It recommended replacement of most of the chairs and tables at the work stations and the use of more flexible work breaks, periods for stretching and relaxing, variety in work assignments, and training in the use of adjustment features found in VDT work stations. It urged correction of other work station design flaws such as limited screen and keyboard positioning and glare from overhead lighting fixtures.

Debate heating up

Unions mark progress in pay equity campaign

By Candice Johnson

The debate surrounding the issue of pay equity for women is heating up, with legislation or legal action pending in Congress, in nearly every state legislature and in hundreds of communities.

While unequal pay has been the rule rather than the exception for working women, the success of many AFL-CIO unions in establishing the principle of equal pay for work of comparable value—through lawsuits and collective bargaining—is putting a new face on so-called women's work.

The drive to eliminate sex-based wage discrimination has met growing opposition from the Reagan Administration, however. Diana Rock, who heads the Women's Rights Program of the State, County & Municipal Employees, testified recently before a House Post Office & Civil Service subcommittee on three areas where the Administration has fought the concept of pay equity: the U.S. Civil Rights Commission's report opposing comparable worth, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's inaction on dozens of wage discrimination complaints, and the Justice Dept.'s intervention on the side of the employer in a pay equity dispute filed by the Illinois Nurses Association.

GAO study

Rock urged Congress to support the findings of the General Accounting Office's pay equity study and adopt methods to eliminate the federal wage discrimination problem.

The Administration's opposition to comparable worth is shared by a number of business groups, including the Chamber of Commerce.

Unions representing state and local workers have pursued pay equity through lawsuits, collective bargaining and other legal action. The state of Minnesota, with strong support from AFSCME, reviewed its wage scales in 1979 and found women workers were paid 25 percent less than men for jobs rated higher in responsibility and accountability.

"It was clear we had a dual wage structure based on sex," said State Employee Relations Commissioner Nina Rothschild. "There wasn't a single case of a female-dominated job that paid as much as or more than the equivalent male-dominated job class."

The state legislature required equal pay for comparable work in 1982 and implemented pay equity raises averaging $1600 for more than 8,000 workers. The cost—4 percent of the state's payroll—was much lower than anticipated, neutralizing much of the hysteria that surrounded the issue. In 1984, Minnesota voted to require all local governments to study and correct their pay systems, and the state anticipates its pay inequities will be corrected by 1987.

AFSCME last month won the first round in a pay equity lawsuit against Nassau County, N.Y., when U.S. District Judge I. Leo Glasser refused to dismiss the union's suit filed on behalf of some 5,500 county workers in primarily female jobs. The union brought suit in April 1984, joined by its local affiliate, the Civil Service Employees Association, and 10 employees, eight women and two men, who are employed as nurses, domestic workers, case workers and investigators.

AFSCME President Gerald McEntee applauded the court's decision and said the union would continue its campaign to remedy "what we believe is widespread sex-based wage discrimination in the county's workforce." He said the court had sent "a signal to employers that wage discrimination is against the law and that employees have the right to litigate possible remedies."

The suit against Nassau County is similar to the 1983 landmark decision won by the union in Washington State, when U.S. District Judge Jack E. Tanner ruled that some 15,000 workers in traditionally female jobs were being underpaid and ordered wage increases with back pay to counteract the discrimination. The state has appealed that ruling.

AFSCME recently negotiated a breakthrough pay equity settlement with the city of Los Angeles, giving extra salary increases to some 4,000 workers in jobs primarily held by women. The three-year agreement provided for "equity raises" of 11 to 15 percent on top of a 9 percent across-the-board wage increase.

In a separate situation, the Service Employees have filed an EEOC complaint charging Los Angeles County with "deliberately maintaining sex and race segregated job classifications." An SEIU survey of county pay records found wage differentials of up to $10,500 between white-dominated and minority-dominated jobs and $7,000 between jobs employing men and women at comparable levels.

Upgrading pressed

The union earlier filed a comparable worth lawsuit against the state of California seeking upgraded job classifications and back pay awards. The state admitted substantial differences in pay between traditional men's and women's jobs and called for wages to be set "on the basis of comparability of the value of work." The SEIU and its affiliate, the California State Employees Association, have filed suit on behalf of 39,000 workers to force the state to follow through on that policy.

Comparable worth also was at the heart of a 10-week strike against Yale University earlier this year by clerical workers, members of Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 34. Wage discrimination was clearly documented with the university paying men nearly $700 a year more than women, and white workers $1,000 a year more than blacks for comparable work. The workers won across-the-board pay increases plus equity raises in a new 17-step pay scale.

Solidarity against Hitler detailed in labor booklet

A booklet on German-American trade union solidarity in the struggle against Hitler's fascist reign has been issued by the AFL-CIO.

Hitler's rise to power in 1933 brought an end to democracy in Germany and the beginning of more than 20 years of iron-fisted rule which spread through much of the world until the dictator's fall in 1945.

The 45-page booklet, with forewords by Federation President Lane Kirkland and Ernst Breit, president of the German Trade Union Federation (DGB), tells how American trade unions helped their persecuted German colleagues during this period.

The publication was originally printed in German for a special meeting last December of DGB and AFL-CIO leaders in Dusseldorf.

Single copies are available at no charge from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815-16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

A Crackpot Scheme

FACED WITH the greatest federal budget deficits in history and a national debt that has doubled in size in four years, some members of the Senate have reached for a political device they hope will solve the problems for them.

This device is the so-called Balanced Budget Amendment embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 13 now before the Judiciary Committee. While the title sounds attractive enough, it is little more than a clever advertising slogan that covers up the potential serious mischief that such legislation could cause.

Since the federal government has been operating with a deficit since Lyndon Johnson last balanced the books 20 years ago, mandating a balance by Constitutional Amendment is a copout of the worst kind.

The chief supporters of the plan are the same people who helped produce the current record level of red ink by slashing the federal tax base so deeply it cannot produce enough revenue to pay the bills the same politicians keep running up.

President Reagan has given hypocrisy a bad name by promoting the amendment after failing five consecutive times to come close to proposing a balanced budget for Congress to consider.

The arguments against SJR 13 are clear enough:

- The Constitution should not be used to enshrine a dubious economic concept, that the federal budget must at all times be in balance.
- Such an amendment would take away from elected officials the responsibility for managing the economic well-being of the country through the fiscal powers of taxing and spending.
- The Federal Reserve System would then have the sole power to manage the economy through its control of the money supply. Federal courts would be the arbiters of federal accounting.
- Congress would lose the essential flexibility to respond to national dangers such as war or depression.

SINCE IT would take a three-fifths vote of Congress to "unbalance" the budget under this amendment, effective control over economic policy would be left in the hands of a minority of members.

The supporters of this amendment are seeking to achieve several goals. In the short term, they want to make a publicity coup by voting for something that makes it appear they are the paragons of responsibility.

In truth, these right-wing zealots are seeking to further reduce the federal government's capacity to protect the health and promote the general welfare of the American people through enlightend public programs.

These reactionaries would defile the character of the world's greatest legal document—the U.S. Constitution—with a provision that would lock in place for the indefinite future one of their crackpot schemes.

We trust that enough members of the Senate have enough respect for the Constitution and for representative government to give SJR 13 an early burial.

Devine Departure

SOME YEARS AGO, former Sen. William Fulbright coined a title for a book, "The Arrogance of Power." A critic commented the title could also have been: "The Power of Arrogance."

Either title would be fitting to describe the four-year, destructive career of Donald Devine, who withdrew his name this week from consideration for a second term as director of the federal Office of Personnel Management.

Devine, one of those arch-conservatives recruited by the Reagan Administration to put in action its reactionary policies, found that the Senate Government Affairs Committee could not recommend his reappointment to the OPM.

By departing, Devine has made a notable contribution to lifting the morale of federal workers. They can only hope that the replacement for this reactionary ideologue will be a personnel professional who will treat the government's employees with fairness and dignity.

Reagan skirts real issues with cut-rate pay scheme

By Norman Hill

New York—Conservatives, both black and white, have long argued that poor people do not benefit in the long run from welfare and other "interferences in the free market" such as minimum wage laws. Rather, the argument goes, they are priced out of the labor market and become sucked into a cycle of dependency. For example, the black conservative, Thomas Sowell, has attributed the rise in black teenage unemployment in comparison with white teenage unemployment since the 1950s to the rise in the minimum wage.

Such arguments have resulted in many policy prescriptions. The latest to be pushed in a big way is the youth subminimum wage bill, which is meant to combat teenage unemployment, especcially black teenage unemployment.

The bill would allow youth under 20 to work for $2.50 an hour (the minimum wage is now $3.35). It would supposedly prevent the displacement of older workers by taking effect only between May and October and by mandating heavy penalties to employers who take on under-20 youth to replace older workers.

Proponents of the bill say it would create 400,000 new jobs and give many unemployed youths sorely needed experience in developing work habits and discipline.

Missing evidence

There are serious flaws in this plan. Even Walter Williams, the black conservative economist who has long advocated a subminimum wage for youth, when he was asked some years ago, "How many more jobs for teenagers might be created with a subminimum wage?" replied: "There's no theoretical evidence to answer that question. It all relates to what economists call 'elasticity'—the response of employment to wage increases or decreases—and that cannot be measured very well." In other words, he doesn't know—which is more than some proponents of this bill will admit.

The idea that a subminimum youth wage would create jobs and not displace older workers is very hard to believe. Employers will not find more low-skilled jobs to offer merely because they can legally pay $2.50 an hour. However, if they can get away with firing their $3.35-an-hour workers and replacing them with the cheaper teenagers, they may very well do so.

The subminimum bill cannot really create jobs; it can only depress wages at the bottom level of the labor market. The minimum wage itself has become an ipso facto subminimum, since it has steadily fallen with respect to the average wage. It fell from 51 percent of the average wage in the 1960s to 46 percent in the 1970s—and today is 41 percent.

Flawed thesis

According to Sowell's thesis, then, black youth unemployment ought to have fallen during the '70s, and '80s, but instead it was skyrocketing.

Proponents of the bill also are ignoring the fact that a large percentage of businesses are already exempt from minimum wage laws—mainly small businesses, which employ a third of the workforce.

The real causes of the rise in black youth unemployment over the decades can be traced to some large trends, such as the mechanization of agriculture in the rural South; the decline of smokestack industries and all its effects on the black community; the tightening of the job market in the 1970s and '80s; the exit from cities of the black middle class, portions of which traditionally provided an informal job network, and the growth of the "underclass."

The government must take on the difficult tasks of promoting economic development and initiating greater educational and job opportunities for those who need it most. The subminimum wage is simply another way for the Reagan Administration to avoid dealing with the real problems.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Effective Lobbying At The Grassroots: Baltimore Activists Show How It's Done

When the AFL-CIO decided to experiment with a new concept called grassroots lobbying, Henry Koellein, President of the Baltimore Central Labor Council, was one of the first local labor leaders to see the program's potential. Today, several years later, Henry is one of the more respected leaders in the Baltimore community and with a core group of concerned workers is having a powerful impact on the Baltimore political scene.

"We meet regularly with our congressperson, maybe once or twice a month," he explains. "We go in there with eight or ten local union leaders". This way we make sure he or she really gets the message and understands our concerns."

One of the most shining accomplishments was their ability to reach and discuss issues with Congressman Clarence "Doc" Long of Maryland's second district. By keeping the dialogue open with face-to-face meetings, they were able to change the voting record of Long from 53 percent right to 93 percent right, a 41 percent increase.

Particularly significant was their ability to dramatically change Long's attitude on an important natural gas pricing issue in the city. "We're very proud of that one" exclaims Henry.

"I think the greatest thing that happened here with Congressman Long is that he really didn't understand the issue and the concerns we were outlining in our letters to him. But when we went in there, we sat down and showed him how it was affecting his constituents. We showed him how the big natural gas companies were just making a 'land slide' profit. They had a lock on the transport of gas and they wouldn't transport cheap gas, only expensive gas.

"So we equipped him to go back into Congress and get on the floor and fight about this issue," said Koellein.

When talking about the grassroots program and the materials provided by AFL-CIO, Henry reported, "We're using the fact sheets and the packets and we're giving them right to the congressman or woman when we meet with them. We know we're right and these materials help back us up. When you've got the facts in front of you, its difficult for them to get out of the way."

Henry has also been able to use the local Baltimore media to advantage. A number of his letters have been printed in the local papers. Recently he was paid by the Baltimore Sun to write an editorial, with his own byline, on the perils of the Reagan-proposed Youth Subminimum wage bill.

In keeping with his community - minded nature, Henry then donated the $125 he received for the piece to the local community services program.

American Workers Scoring High Marks For Their Productivity

With the balance of trade between the U.S. and Japan worsening each year, many are pointing accusative fingers at the American worker. "If our quality and productivity were only as good as the Japanese." they say, "then we could compete." But recent reports in the Wall Street Journal and USA Today show American workers highly productive and quality minded. So what are the reasons for America's production failings? Poor tools and a lack of quality commitment from managers!

A few U.S. companies in the know, the Journal says, are quietly solving quality control problems through prevention. This includes additional worker training, re-engineering of their products and redesigning of the workplace.

Meanwhile, figures reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics and reported in USA Today show workers in the U.S. are still the most productive in the world, with those in Germany, Canada and France the closest behind. Next in line were workers in the U.K., Italy and Japan.

While other nations have been investing heavily in new plants and equipment making workers more efficient, U.S. companies have been spending profits on unproductive acquisitions and wasteful takeover fights.

Fight Continues To Save Benefits From Taxation

Working families can claim a partial victory in the fight to save their hard-earned life support benefits, but the fight is far from over.

The Reagan Treasury Department in its new proposal to reform the nation's tax system, reacted to the outcry of workers and their families and abandoned his plan to tax life insurance, legal service, education and child care payments made by employers on behalf of their employees.

However, the tax package, which gives big new tax breaks to the wealthy, will tax health insurance, unemployment, and worker compensation, black lung and death benefits. These are the heart of America's system of worker protections and some, like workers compensation, have been on the books and above taxation since 1918!

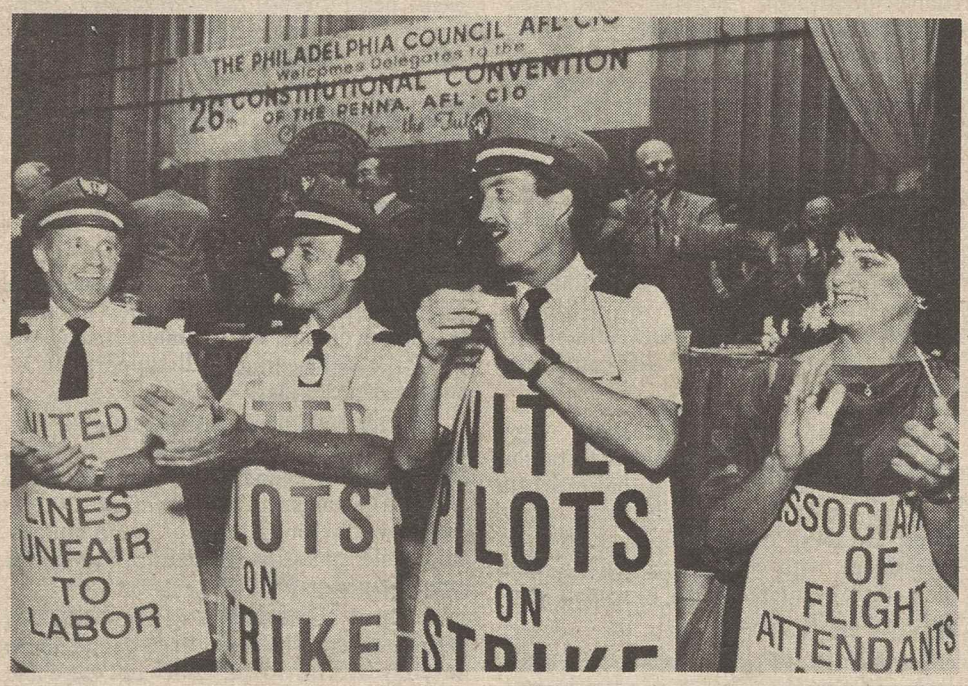
The so-called tax reform treatment of employee benefits differs from a Treasury Department proposal submitted earlier this year in several ways. Where the earlier Treasury plan would have taxed health care payments above a ceiling of $70 per month for individuals and $170 for families, the new Reagan plan taxes the first dollar contributed, up to and including the first $120 contributed for individuals and the first $300 per year contributed in behalf of families. This is a reduction of $7.9 billion in tax impact.

Now that the Administration has given the bill its top priority, working families too must redouble their efforts to save the protections they have worked so long and hard to win. Write your congressman and senators today, tell them that the President's tax reform package will be unfair to working Americans unless they work to remove the provisions for taxation of life-support benefits. Tell Congress to work for legislation that forces big corporations to pay their fair share of taxes.

Hearings Being Held In Both Houses To Deal With Rash Of Corporate Raids

Hearings have been scheduled in key congressional committees to deal with the growing problem of corporate takeovers, which often cost jobs and uproot communities.

In the Senate, the AFL-CIO will testify before the Securities Subcommittee of the Senate Banking Committee this month to stop this growing trend which is threatening the country's economic health. On the House side, hearings are also slated before the Telecommunications Subcommittee of the House Energy Committee.



Several bills have already been introduced and more are expected, dealing with the problem in part or in full.

"The billions of dollars used to finance as well as to fend off takeovers is money that is not available for strengthening the national economy," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a recent public statement, "America can ill afford this waste of scarce resources, and the losses being suffered now are only the beginning.....Workers too often finance the costs of the raid by job losses or pay cuts."

Kirkland asks tax plan change to remedy tilt against workers

Delegation of striking United Airlines pilots and Flight Attendants who are respecting ALPA picket lines welcomes announcement at the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention in Philadelphia of a tentative agreement in the four-week strike. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue broke the news of the accord as the United union members took their case to the convention.

'Reform' proposals viewed as creating new inequities

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to make the federal tax system fairer by reshaping President Reagan's tax proposal—strengthening its reform features and scrapping elements that would worsen existing inequities.

Federation President Lane Kirkland told the House Ways & Means Committee that the present tax structure fails the test of fairness by taxing income from wages and salaries more heavily than non-wage income.

For the trade union movement, Kirkland said, "the key test of a tax reform proposal is the extent to which it diminishes unfairness toward people who work for their money and eliminates favoritism toward people whose money works for them."

Reagan plan unfair

On that score, Kirkland testified, "much of the President's program falls short." Many two-earner families would end up paying higher taxes under the Administration proposal than they do under present law. But the wealthiest taxpayers, who were the big winners in the earlier rounds of tax cuts, would come out thousands of dollars ahead.

Kirkland and other union witnesses testifying at the House hearings voiced strong objections to provisions of the Administration plan that would tax health insurance benefits, workers' compensation and black lung payments, and end the low-income exemption for taxation of unemployment benefits.

They protested strongly the Administration proposal to end the federal tax deduction for state and local income, property and sales taxes.

"For five years, this Administration has built upon the concept of 'new federalism' to shift responsibility to the states," Kirkland noted. Yet, "the states that have tried hardest to meet these responsibilities would be penalized and their tax base eroded under the Reagan proposal."

Equally contradictory—"in direct conflict with the President's avowed pro-family sentiments"—is Reagan's proposal to abolish the second-earner tax deduction and end the child care tax credit, Kirkland said.

Ending the two-earner deduction recreates the marriage penalty and targets working families for tax increases, Kirkland noted. A working couple with one child, buying a home on a $35,000 income, could be hit by a tax increase of more than 20 percent under the Reagan plan, he charged.

In his testimony and in response to questions by committee members, Kirkland proposed alternatives to the tax changes opposed by the AFL-CIO that would avoid any revenue loss to the government.

A key element of any tax reform plan, he stressed, must be an assurance that

Pilots reach settlement in United Airlines strike

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots and United Airlines agreed on a tentative new contract that would end the four-week strike against the nation's biggest air carrier.

The settlement came in sight when the two sides endorsed a new back-to-work proposal by National Mediation Board Chairman Helen Witt, who is mediating the talks.

The tentative accord would leave it to a federal judge to resolve the thorny back-to-work issues that kept the strike going even after economic issues were settled May 24.

U.S. District Court Judge Nicholas Bua, who had been previously scheduled to hear charges of unfair labor practice brought by ALPA against United before the walkout, now will rule also on three main points of contention between the parties:

- United's demand to give some 270 non-striking union pilots who crossed picket lines "super seniority" over those who went out on strike.
- ALPA's insistence that the airline hire 570 people it trained as new pilots but who refused to work when the walkout began May 17.
- The status of experienced captains and first officers hired as replacements.

If the tentative setlement is approved by the union's 27-member United council, and no hitch develops in the Flight Attendants' talks on a back-to-work agreement for its members who honored ALPA's picket lines, strikers could begin to return to work within days.

The ALPA council has final authority

Legislation asked to block looting of pension funds

Legislation is needed to curb employer raids on pension funds set up for workers, the AFL-CIO testified at House hearings.

Bert Seidman, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, expressed the AFL-CIO's concern at an "increasing trend" by employers to terminate so-called "overfunded" pension plans, pay off employees with annuities to cover benefits already earned and pocket the difference.

A recent example, he noted, was the action taken by United Airlines during the recent strike to close out its pension fund in order to return nearly $1 billion to the corporation.

Such employers are "breaking their pension promises and diverting what is right-

New Gallup Poll

Public support for unions gaining

By Arlee C. Green

The public's opinion of organized labor has turned up over the last four years as 58 percent of those responding to a Gallup Poll expressed approval of unions, up from 55 percent in 1981.

Even more pronounced was the drop in the percentage of the public with a negative view of unions, from 35 percent in 1981 to 27 percent this year.

Union families registered an 81 percent approval rate in the Gallup Poll, up from just 73 percent at the beginning of the first Reagan term. The regard for labor unions also improved among non-union families, from 50 percent in 1981 to 52 percent in 1985.

The 1985 approval-disapproval rate of 58 percent to 27 percent, compares to the 1981 rate of 55 percent and 35 percent, and the 1973 rate of 59 percent and 26 percent. According to Gallup's past polls, labor's best year might have been 1957 when its approval rate was 76 percent with only an 18 percent disapproval rate.

Support for unions is greatest in population groups with higher than average representation in the trade union movement, including blacks, blue-collar workers, Democrats, residents of regions outside the South and union families, reported George Gallup, Jr.

Highest approval

The approval rating for unions was 59 percent among men and 57 percent among women. Support was highest in the 18-29-year-old age bracket, at 62 percent. In the 30-49 age range, approval was expressed by 56 percent, and the over-50 group registered 57 percent favorable to labor.

Gallup reported that 67 percent of the Democrats in the poll approved unions, compared to 57 percent of the independents and 48 percent of the Republicans. Those with incomes under $25,000 favored unions by 60 percent while the approval rate was 55 percent for those with family incomes over $25,000.

The survey, taken Apr. 12-15, showed that unskilled blue-collar workers supported unions by 66 percent, compared to 58 percent among skilled blue-collar workers, 56 percent among white-collar workers and 55 percent for business and professional workers.

By education, the poll showed the highest support, 60 percent, among high school graduates. Those with college degrees and those with less than a high school diploma registered identical 58-

2.3 million factory jobs lost to nation since 1979

A new Labor Dept. study shows that 2.3 million factory jobs have been lost in 35 states and the District of Columbia as a result of the two recessions that have hit the nation since 1979.

"These are jobs that are gone forever unless U.S. policies are changed," said Arnold Cantor, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research. "The numbers show both the unbalanced nature of the economy and the problems in the so-called recovery.

"The report points conclusively to the critical need to do something about our deficits in trade as well as with the budget deficit at home."

America's trade deficit with other countries shot up by $11.85 billion in May, giving the nation a total deficit in trade of $44.63 billion for the first four months of the year. At this rate, the United States will run up a deficit of $133.9 billion for 1985.

Government and private economists estimate that every $1 billion in trade represents 30,000 American jobs.

The study by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics indicates that six states have been hurt most by job losses since 1979 — Illinois, 324,000; Pennsylvania, 286,000; Ohio, 270,300; Michigan, 240,400; New York, 169,000, and Indiana, 128,800.

Some gains

Some states gained jobs during the period, among them California with 88,100: Florida, 79,700, and Arizona, 42,000.

The study was made at the request of some members of Congress who wanted more data on the erosion of jobs with the shift from manufacturing to services that has been going on for a number of years.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told a congressional Joint Economic Committee hearing on the study that the switchover has a profound impact on workers. "There is a clear restructuring going on in this country," she observed.

The BLS said that of 139 manufacturing industries surveyed in the study, 107 still have employment levels equal to or less than levels before the 1980 recession. Only 32 industries have registered employment gains above their pre-recession levels.

The largest job losses since 1979 were reported in blast furnaces and basic steel products, construction and related products, construction and related machinery, women's and misses' outerwear, plastic materials and synthetics, footwear (except rubber footwear), weaving mills, glass and flatware, and knitting mills.

Industries with the largest job gains were communication equipment, electronic components and accessories, office and computing machines, commercial printing, miscellaneous plastic products, guided missiles, space vehicles and parts, newspapers, motor vehicles and equipment, and periodicals.

Continuing deadlines

Of the industries that failed to regain their lost employment, 48 accounted for about half the total 2.3 million jobs lost, BLS said. These same industries have continued to lose employment since the 1981-82 Reagan Recession.

The remaining 59 industries have gotten back some jobs since the trough of the 1981-82 downturn, but are still below their peaks before 1980, the government study reported.

Juel D. Drake

John H. Lyons

Iron Workers tap Juel Drake as John Lyons steps down

Juel D. Drake was unanimously elected president of the Iron Workers by the union's executive council to fill the unexpired term of John H. Lyons, who was installed as president emeritus. Lyons had been president of the union since 1961.

Lyons, who stepped down because of failing health, is an AFL-CIO vice president and the senior member of the Executive Council. He is chairman of the council's standing committee on economic policy and its ad hoc committee on defense.

Drake, 70, has been secretary of the Iron Workers since 1971. He will serve as president until the next election at the union's August 1986 convention in Las Vegas.

Lyons, 65, has been a member of the union for 47 years. In 1954, he was appointed an international representative and organizer. Lyons served as a vice president from 1958 to 1961, when he was elected president by the executive council to succeed his father, John H. Lyons, Sr., who died.

An AFL-CIO president since 1967, Lyons also serves as a vice president and member of the executive councils of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Metal Trades Dept. since 1962.

He currently is chairman of the federal Labor Advisory Committee for Trade Negotiations & Trade Policy and a member of the President's Commission on Strategic Forces. Lyons's labor expertise was tapped by six U.S. Presidents as he served on many federal advisory panels.

Drake joined Iron Workers Local 229 in San Diego in 1939. He served as sergeant-at-arms and as an executive board member prior to being elected business manager and financial secretary-treasurer of the local in 1945. He was president of the Building & Construction Trades Council of San Diego County in 1946-47 and was appointed an international organizer in 1948.

He became an international vice president in 1956 and was re-elected to that post four times. Drake also served as acting president of the Iron Workers Washington-Baltimore District Council from 1954 to 1958, and later was president of the Iron Workers California District Council.

Since 1972, Drake has been chairman of the Labor Committee and co-chairman of the National Maintenance Policy Committee of the National Erectors Association.

Coalition seeks court order for field sanitation standard

A coalition of farm worker groups is seeking an appellate court review of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's refusal to issue a field sanitation standard.

The 49-page petition for review urges the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to find that OSHA's decision last April was "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, and not in accordance with law." The petition asks the court to require OSHA to issue a standard within 30 days.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO and several affiliates, and church and farm worker groups, called on Labor Sec. William E. Brock to reverse the agency's decision. Brock has met with representatives of concerned organizations on the issue.

The court battle for a field sanitation standard spans a dozen years. In 1982, a settlement was reached whereby OSHA agreed to "make a good faith effort to undertake and complete the development of a field sanitation standard to protect farm workers."

The farm coalition contends the record collected by OSHA at 15 days of field hearings in 1984 "overwhelmingly supports" the issuance of a standard. It notes the testimony of each of OSHA's five expert witnesses, along with testimony from major medical organization, numerous elected officials and other public employees, labor unions, environmental, religious and civil rights groups all support the issuance of a standard.

The farm workers petition charges that OSHA violated the agreement. It states that the term "good faith" imposes upon the OSHA officials "an obligation to exercise their discretion in favor of promulgating a field sanitation standard, if the record supported that result."

At issue is the health of some 550,000 farm workers who have been found to be severely at risk to parasitic and pesticide related diseases.

Experts OSHA hired to analyze the hearing records concluded that migrant farmworkers were up to 59 times more likely to get parasitic diseases than the general public, nearly 25 times more likely to suffer from pesticide-related illnesses, and more than four times more likely to suffer heat-related problems.

The petition stresses that the reasoning used by former OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland in refusing to issue a standard is based on grounds "that either were not raised in the record or are inconsistent with (OSHA's) regulatory duties."

Rowland, whose record at OSHA has been strongly criticized, announced his resignation last month.

Texas legislature approves labor-endorsed measures

Austin, Tex.—Major legislative gains, including passage of a right-to-know bill, were made by organized labor in the just-ended Texas legislative session.

Texas AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard said 27 measures sought by unions representing refining, manufacturing, railroad, teacher, federal, auto and public employees were adopted.

In addition, building trades unions helped kill Republican-sponsored legislation aimed at repealing the state's prevailing wage law and establishing a statewide electricians licensing board.

The right-to-know bill was sponsored by State Rep. Ed Watson, a former Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers local president.

It requires manufacturers, chemical processors and transporters to advise employees and outside emergency units, including fire departments, of the presence and nature of hazardous material on a work site or en route.

The legislature also adopted a state water plan that calls for a $1.5-billion construction program.

Additionally, it extended unemployment insurance coverage to 145,000 farm workers and adopted a work share program to allow laid-off workers to work part time and still receive reduced unemployment benefits.

The Texas Federation of Teachers, which was the only education organization to support a billion-dollar public education reform package last year, won passage of several measures, including a guaranteed duty-free lunch period for teachers.

The labor movement also helped kill a measure sponsored by the Chemical Council to limit the state agriculture commissioner's power to impose pesticide regulations and a measure sought by the finance industry to permit second mortgages on homesteads.

Resignation of maritime agency chief hailed

"It's a great day for America's shipbuilders, its shipyard workers and their unions," said President Paul Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., commenting on the resignation of Adm. Harold E. Shear as head of the Maritime Administration.

"He was Reagan's front man, mouthing the Administration's maritime policy, encouraging companies to build foreign. His resignation was overdue," Burnsky declared.

Shear's resignation followed widespread criticism of his piloting of the agency into a tidal wave of shipping bankruptcies, the latest of which came on the day after his resignation and cost $135.6 million. He had approved an elaborate rebuilding plan for two federally insured ships that went bankrupt.

Marine Engineers President Jesse Calhoon recently said of Shear, "He's ineffective and he doesn't understand the business. It's a disaster . . . I've never seen any agency in the disarray this one is in."

Shear faithfully carried out the Reagan Administration plan to cut back subsidies to shipping firms and to eliminate construction subsidies to U.S. shipyards. This result in a sharp rise in the number of commercial ships built in foreign shipyards, at the expense of the jobs of U.S. workers.

Burnsky termed the plight of the nation's merchant marine "one of the Administration's best kept secrets. We are down to 350 U.S.-flag ships, while the Russians have thousands."

The Washington Post reported last year that Shear had approved a controversial plan to convert three defective liquid gas tankers to dry cargo carriers. The conversion work was done by a naval architectural firm whose president previously employed Shear and had paid him a $45,000 severance fee.

One of the three ships was damaged in a storm and the others last month were involved in $135.6 million default. There have been more than $200 million in defaults covered by the agency since 1983 and its reserve fund now has only $9 million to cover more than $7 billion in outstanding loan guarantees.

Kirkland asks changes in Reagan tax proposal to avoid new injustices

corporations pay a fair share of the nation's tax burden. Corporate tax cuts enacted early in the Reagan Administration "generated enormous revenue losses, created a new industry around the buying, selling and leasing of tax writeoffs, and opened gaping inequities," Kirkland said. He urged Congress to:

- Reject the proposed "deep cut" in the corporate tax rate. "Each percentage-point cut in the corporate rate from the present 46 percent to the proposed 33 percent costs the Treasury $2 billion to $3 billion yearly in revenue," he said.
- Strengthen the corporate minimum tax and end the "open scandal over the fact that major corporations whose profits total billions of dollars pay little or no taxes."
- Curb tax privileges of the oil and gas industry, which the Treasury proposed last November but the President abandoned in the final version.
- Go further than the President proposed to curtail the foreign tax credit, reject the Administration proposal for a 10-percent deduction for corporate dividends, and eliminate tax incentives that encourage corporate takeovers.

Redress needed

Kirkland also urged Congress to scale back the sharp reduction in tax rates for wealthy individuals proposed by the Administration. The lowering of the top tax bracket proposed by Reagan would give 25 percent of the total tax reduction—an average of $10,000 each—to the one-half of 1 percent of the population with incomes over $200,000.

He suggested that Congress add a fourth income-tax bracket to the three proposed by the Administration.

Other AFL-CIO proposals would establish a fair minimum tax for high-income individuals and end the preferential tax treatment of capital gains.

Kirkland expressed labor's opposition to proposals that would end worker deductions of various job-related expenses such as protective clothing, tools and union dues. And he protested that a proposal to eliminate federal financing of presidential elections through earmarking of a tax dollar is clearly motivated by ideology, not tax simplification.

In response to questions as to the justification for not taxing workers on the value of employer-provided health insurance, Kirkland said:

If Congress would enact a comprehensive national health care plan—as labor has urged and as virtually every other developed nation has put in place—the AFL-CIO would drop opposition to taxation of health insurance job benefits.

Labor witness

In other union testimony before the Ways & Means Committee:

- State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee said that Reagan "correctly read the mood for tax reform in this country, but has viewed it through his own distorted prism." By curtailing the tax resources of state and local governments, McEntee charged, Reagan's tax plan would hurt states that have the greatest needs and that have done the the most to try to meet those needs.
- Teachers President Albert Shanker said Reagan's call for educational reform would be thwarted by ending deductibility of local and state taxes. It could create "a real crisis in education financing," he warned.
- The Communications Workers found through a survey that a large portion of their members would end up paying higher taxes under the Administration plan, CWA Executive Vice President James Booe testified. He cited as examples a single telephone operator with one child and an income of $21,264 a year, who would pay an additional $174 in taxes; a married worker in a $23,340 two-income household who would pay $361 more, and a couple in a $43,884 two-income household, whose tax bill would be $559 higher.
- Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin expressed concern that the professed goal of "simplification" of the tax structure is being used to make the income tax less progressive. The effect, he said, is to further profit the wealthy while adding new taxes on worker job benefits.
- Postal Workers President Moe Biller said the decline of corporate taxes as a source of revenue has both added to the deficit and forced a disproportionate share of the tax burden on to workers. Against a background of favoritism to the wealthy, he said, union members are skeptical about fairness of the Administration plan.
- Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz said his union welcomes provisions to lift the tax burden from the lowest income households but is concerned that the imposition of taxes on health care benefits would hit that group hardest. Preventive care, diagnostic services, prescription drugs, eye and dental care—all beyond the resources of most lower-income workers—would be especially jeopardized.
- Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden said the UAW would be prepared to support revenue-raising tax legislation as a means of reducing the budget deficit and meeting public needs. But the union is strongly opposed to the further tilt toward the wealthy contained in the President's proposal. Warden warned that a new round of "windfall benefits to the wealthy . . . can only serve to reinforce the public's deep-seated feeling that the tax code is basically unfair."
- Members of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees are concerned both over taxation of fringe benefits and the threat of job loss through changes in the business entertainment deductions, Legislative Consultant Robert E. Juliano said.
- The Fire Fighters called the committee's attention to a section of the President's proposal dealing with so-called "tax-favored retirement plans." Harold A. Schaitberger, the union's governmental affairs director, said the effect on some fire fighters and police officers would be to subject their pension payments to a 20-percent excise tax in addition to normal income tax.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testifies for tax fairness, with Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor, right, and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Ruling on shoe import quota gives workers partial victory

American shoe industry unions welcomed as a partial victory the International Trade Commission's call for cutting footwear imports, but expressed concern over the ITC plan to exempt items with a customs value below $2.50 from proposed quotas.

"We will continue to work for their inclusion," said President Murray Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers and President William Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers in a joint statement.

"Many American workers in the domestic footwear industry produce shoes in this price category, and they deserve the protections given to other workers," Wynn and Finley stresed.

The flood of foreign-made shoes rose 25 percent last year to capture 74 percent of the U.S. market.

Under the ITC plan, the influx of non-rubber footwear would be limited to 474 million pairs a year for the next two years. That ceiling would be lifted by increments of 3 percent a year over the next three years so that total imports would be no more than 564 million pairs in early 1990. Shoe imports in 1984 totaled 726 million pairs.

The exempted $2.50-footwear, which would retail at about $5 a pair, would affect mainly sandals, leather thongs and other casual items.

The ITC plan will be sent to President Reagan July 1 for final action. Under federal law, he has 60 days to accept, reject or alter the ITC recommendations. The proposals would be implemented within 15 days after his approval.

Quotas retroactive

Under the package of recommendations the ITC proposed, the import quotas would become effective retroactively to June 1. The quotas would have their greatest effect on Taiwan, Korea, Brazil, Italy, Spain, Hong Kong and the Philippines.

One of the recommendations calls for the quotas to be auctioned off to would-be importers, with the government selling import licenses to the highest bid to help defray the cost.

The ITC vote reversed the commission's action a year ago, when the panel ruled that imported footwear was not hurting the U.S. shoe industry or its workers. Pressure for quotas increased as imports rose sharply last year, and the ITC ruled in May that the domestic industry had been hurt enough that a remedy was needed.

Runaway plants get U.S. blessing

The Reagan Administration is openly encouraging American manufacturers to move their production facilities overseas to exploit cheap labor and reap more dollars.

This is the charge levied by Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.) in letters to the President and Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige that came to light this week.

Bentsen is chairman of the Senate Democratic Working Group on Trade Policy and ranking Democrat on the Senate Finance Subcommittee on International Trade. He complained to Reagan and Baldrige that a Commerce Dept. official in April had responded to charges that Taiwan and other foreign countries were targeting certain areas of the U.S. economy with the following observation:

"If U.S. producers are to compete successfully at home and abroad, they must adapt their production and marketing efforts to meet the economic challenge of their competition.

"In some cases, this necessitates adjustments such as the transfer of manufacturing facilities to foreign countries where production costs, primarily labor, may be less expensive."

Policy position

In his letters, Bentsen said that the recommendation by Timothy Hauser, director of the Commerce Dept.'s Office of Multilateral Affairs, "suggests that it is government policy to actively encourage such transfers."

Bentsen wrote Reagan that the transfer of manufacturing capacity abroad "should not even be regarded benignly, let alone encouraged." He cited figures from the U.S. International Trade Commission showing that nearly 30 percent of the manufactured goods now consumed in the United States are imported.

"Transfers of manufacturing abroad are accelerating," Bentsen pointed out. "This trend is contrary to the national interest because reestablishing similar facilities in the United States in the future will be prohibitively expensive."

Hauser's recommendation that U.S. manufacturers move out of the country was contained in an Apr. 22 letter to Don Flanders, president of the Southwestern Furniture Manufacturers who also heads his own furniture making firm in Arkansas. Flanders had written Baldrige on behalf of Texas and Arkansas furniture producers that Taiwanese companies apparently were targeting the American furniture industry as an area in which they could successfully compete.

Flanders said the U.S. furniture industry is being destroyed by imports from Taiwan, which he said amounted to $290 million in 1983 and $390 million in 1984 and which are expected to total $1.2 billion this year.

Bentsen said the problem of runaway firms is one of increasing national concern and is evident in a wide variety of industries.

"This statement (by Hauser) all but announces an affirmative policy of forcing U.S. manufacturing overseas, a policy that is stupid and harmful to the national interest," Bentsen said.

House budget called 'fairer' version

The AFL-CIO has urged a House-Senate conference committee to tilt toward the House-passed version of a congressional budget resolution because it "more adequately addresses the concerns of workers, the unemployed and the poor."

It preserves full social security benefits while maintaining "a fair balance" in defense and domestic spending reductions, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison noted.

Denison wrote the conferees that the Senate version is superior in one area — ful funding of revenue-sharing.

Otherwise, he said, the House funding levels for a broad range of needed domestic programs "should be strongly supported over the Senate position of program elimination or severe cutbacks."

Denison expressed the AFL-CIO's regret that "Congress has not yet shown a willingness to turn to revenues from a corporate and personal minimum tax to alleviate the problem of massive deficits."

Labor hits federal loopholes as reason for bank failures

There will be more problem banks and more bank failures so long as loose federal regulations encourage financial institutions to make high-risk investments in order to compete for deposits through high interest rates, the AFL-CIO warned.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, expressed concern at Senate hearings that a depressed economy and heavy competitive pressures are raising the risk of a banking system crisis.

As regulation of financial institutions has been relaxed, Schechter noted, "competitive escalation of interest rates paid to depositors led to a lowering of credit standards in order to place the funds in investments that would recoup the cost of money plus a profit margin."

His testimony, before the Senate Banking, Housing & Urban Affairs Committee, noted a rise in home foreclosures and business bankruptcies in recent years. At the same time, high interest rates have contributed heavily to the overvaluation of the dollar, spurring imports that force still more U.S. firms out of business.

Court ruling

In his Senate testimony and in a letter to a House subcommittee, Schechter welcomed a recent decision by a federal appellate court closing a regulatory loophole that had enabled banks to cross state lines to establish affiliates that would provide both non-bank and banking services.

One bill being considered by the House Subcommittee on Financial Institutions would "grandfather in" existing banking relationships that were barred by the court decision. Other bills would permit mergers and aquisitions of banks and savings institutions across state lines, or allow national banks to set up branches in other states if permitted by state law.

Schechter urged both congressional committees to reject such legislation, stressing the long-term danger of a concentration of financial power in the hands of a few large, regional banks.

He expressed concern that the federal "rescue" of the Continental Bank after it had been made insolvent by a policy of high risk loans that couldn't be repaid went beyond the deposit insurance provided by law.

The precedent of 100 percent insurance for depositors of over $100,000, Schechter said, "signalled to large depositors that they need not be concerned about the operations and soundness of a big bank and indicated to big banks that they could take high risks and be bailed out."

He urged legislation to deny "such an absolute safety net" for big investors seeking high returns.

OSHA prodded by court to move on formaldehyde

The Auto Workers welcomed a federal appeals court's decision to require the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to move further toward issuance of a standard on formaldehyde.

The ruling, which scolded the agency for its 43 months of delay, stated that if OSHA fails to act by Oct. 1, 1985, "the court will then entertain a motion to compel OSHA to issue a standard."

The UAW and other unions had asked the court to require the agency to issue a standard on formaldehyde on an expedited basis.

"We're disappointed that OSHA has not yet placed a standard on the table and that the court did not order them to do so right now," said Dr. Frank Mirer, director of the UAW health and safety department.

Twice refused

OSHA has twice refused to take emergency action on formaldehyde after being petitioned by the UAW and 14 other unions. As the result of a suit by the unions, the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia had ordered OSHA to act by Apr. 15, 1985.

On the final day of the court deadline, OSHA issued an advanced notice of proposed rulemaking, the first step in a multi-year process of hearings and reviews that leads to a standard.

The unions then asked the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to compel OSHA to act. The court on June 3 rejected OSHA's request for dismissal of the suit and noted that during the year that the case was on remand to the lower court, OSHA had enough time "to secure substantial information relevant to a proposed standard."

The appellate court noted, "while issuance of an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking instead of proceeding at once to the rulemaking stage may have some value, we cannot allow it to cause undue deferral of already much-delayed action."

Loss of jobs, benefits

Corporate takeovers victimize the workers

Workers and communities need protection against the destructive effects of corporate mergers and takeovers, AFL-CIO Vice President Wayne E. Glenn testified at House hearings.

Glenn, who is president of the Paperworkers, stressed the "serious effects on jobs, wages, working conditions and job security" of the takeover wars that have reached epidemic proportions in the business world.

He called for changes in tax, securities and banking laws that would remove the economic incentive for corporate takeovers. Glenn also urged Congress to act on plant closing legislation to curb the shutdowns that are frequently the byproducts of corporate raids, and for stricter antitrust enforcement.

"No matter which side wins control in a takeover battle, workers, customers and the community in which the company is located are the likely ultimate losers," Glenn noted.

Workers pay

"Workers too often involuntarily finance the costs of the raid by job losses or pay cuts. And consumers end up paying higher prices for the company's products," he testified. Productive assets are sold off and the assets of the raided corporations are used to pay off the high costs of the raid.

Freedom of the press is threatened by concentration of ownership in the communications fields, Glenn warned. "The power of big corporations and big financial institutions is getting bigger and bigger as a result of mergers and takeovers."

Glenn cited studies showing that corporate raiders frequently treat the enterprises they acquire as "a cash cow to be milked and then discarded." Apart from the well-publicized cases involving shutdowns of manufacturing facilities employing thousands of workers, Glenn noted "the many smaller and less well-known cases where takeovers also led to lost jobs."

One such example was a takeover by the Chattanooga Glass Co. of the Glass Container Corp. in 1983, which resulted in closing of an Indiana plant employing 167 workers and a Mississippi facility with 219 workers. This year, the parent firm was itself taken over by Diamond Bathurst, which proceeded to close down a Texas plant employing 349 workers.

Corporate raiders

Glenn noted the development of "a whole new class of raiders" financing takeover bids with borrowed funds that are then repaid by milking the assets of the acquired firms.

Sometimes, he noted, the goal is tax credits that can be used by the takeover corporation — with consequent revenue loss to the federal treasury.

Workers' pension plans are often bargaining chips in takeover manipulations, Glenn noted, and under present law "the workers' interests need not be considered." Sometimes, he said, an overfunded pension plan can make a takeover more attractive because it can be terminated and the "surplus assets" used to help pay for the takeover.

Unions and the workers they represent have a "clear, direct and obvious interest" in the impact of corporate takeovers, Glenn stressed. But neither side in the takeover battle is likely to consider the effect of their actions on jobs and communities.

Glenn outlined the AFL-CIO's proposals for:

- Changing tax laws affecting capital gains, depreciation, loss carryovers and interest deductions so as to stop subsidizing corporate mergers and takeovers.
- Curbing "greenmail" — the buyout of raiders through a guaranteed profit on the stock they acquired—by prohibiting its deduction as a business expense to the payer and as a low-taxed capital gain to the beneficiary.
- Strengthening of securities laws to protect stockholders and to bring about earlier disclosure of takeover raids.
- Barring banks and trustees from investing in "the unsound speculative instruments of the corporate raider."
- Development of mechanisms to protect the interests of workers and communities.

Apart from the direct impact, Glenn pointed out, the "merger-takeover mania" shrinks the pool of credit available for productive uses.

"The billions of dollars used to finance, as well as to fend off, takeovers is money that is not available for strengthening the national economy," he testified. "The time, effort and imagination that corporate managers devote to waging and combatting takeover battles are time, effort and imagination that are being siphoned off from the more important tasks of building better products and providing better services at a better price," Glenn stressed.

James Leary dies at 77, retired regional director

Vancouver, Wash. — James J. Leary, who retired in 1973 as AFL-CIO director for Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana and Wyoming, died of a brain tumor May 31 at Vancouver Memorial Hospital. He was 77.

Leary, who came out of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, also had been a member of the Steelworkers and Farm Workers. He joined the CIO staff in 1947 and was with the AFL-CIO organizing staff from 1955 until his retirement.

Leary began working in the coal mines in Butte, Mont., at the age of 16. Besides holding office with Miners Local 1, he served as secretary-treasurer of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers from 1940-47.

Survivors include his wife Irene and three children. A memorial service will be held at the Immaculate Conception Church in Butte on June 15.

Stock exchange pact beats clock

New York — With just five minutes to spare, clerks and pages at the New York Stock Exchange reached tentative agreement with management on a new three-year collective bargaining agreement, averting a walkout by 1,300 workers.

The Stock Exchange and Security Industry Automation employees, members of Office & Professional Employees Local 153, had been without a contract since last November.

The union overwhelmingly rejected an earlier management proposal and voted 911 to 76 to strike unless agreement could be reached.

An all-night bargaining session ended with the tentative setlement at 7:55 a.m., just minutes before the exchange was scheduled to open.

Local 153 Sec.-Treas. Michael Goodwin said job security was a key issue in the dispute, because the exchange had announced plans to phase out nearly 300 jobs over the next three years. The tentative settlement would give workers with more than 10 years of service greater job protection while implementing reduced work weeks instead of layoffs for employees with less seniority.

Pact provisions

Other provisions of the agreement include:

- A 21.5-percent wage and benefit package retroactive to November 1984, including a 5-percent yearly wage increase.
- Eligibility for early retirement at age 55 with 75 percent of benefits.
- Increased severance pay and improvements in pensions.

The settlement would raise the top weekly rate for transactions reporters to $650 by November 1986. It also includes a recall provision, giving hiring priority to laid-off workers and provides time and one-half pay for clerical workers after a 35-hour workweek.

The agreement will be submitted to the local's membership for ratification, this time with approval recommended by the bargaining committee.

The union's strike deadline had been extended twice at the request of Federal Mediator Rosemary LeBoeuf who called the two sides to the late-night bargaining session. The walkout would have been the first at the exchange since 1948.

to approve or reject the settlement. Rank-and-file members do not have to vote on it.

ALPA stressed that it will not go back to work until the Flight Atendants reach an acceptable back-to-work agreement with the carrier. More than 90 percent of United's attendants have stayed off the job during the strike.

Members of the Machinists remained on the job to comply with a no-strike clause in their contract.

John Zeeman, United's executive vice president for marketing, indicated that it might take the airline three to four weeks after approval of the settlement to return to normal. United has been operating only about 14 percent of its normal 1,550 daily flights during the strike.

Sticking point

Until talks deteriorated and broke down over a back-to-work agreement, the main sticking point in the negotiations was United's demand for a two-tier pay scale under which newly hired pilots would receive about 40 percent less than levels provided in the old contract.

Initially, United wanted the two-tier system to run for 20 years. The pay issue was tentatively resolved when the parties agreed on a two-level scale that would last for five years, after which the issue would be submitted to binding arbitration.

The pilots, who had previously agreed to defer a 6-percent wage increase in exchange for a reduced number of flying hours, also improved their vacation schedule and reached agreement on other issues. The old contract expired in April 1984, but ALPA was not free to strike until May 17 under terms of the Railway Labor Act, which governs labor relations in both the airline and railway industries.

Hands off social security

At a Capitol Hill rally, National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman assails Administration-backed effort to deny social security recipients their cost-of-living adjustment and urges House conferees to hold fast against the Senate-passed cutback. More than 3,000 delegates to the NCSC legislative conference joined in the rally before they fanned out to lobby their congressmen and senators to prevent weakening of social security.

Unemployment rate remains at 7.3% as decline in factory jobs continues

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment remained a major problem in May as the official jobless rate hung on at a high 7.3 percent for the fourth month in a row.

While that stagnation was bad enough, there were other concerns raised by the government's monthly report on employment and unemployment.

For one, manufacturing employment fell by 28,000 in May, the fifth straight monthly decline. The Bureau of Labor Statistics said that already this year some 163,000 manufacturing jobs have been lost.

Also, the number of Americans holding part-time jobs because they were unable to find full-time work shot up by 250,000 to 5.9 million, the highest level in more than a year.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that as of March the nation's economy had lost 2.3-million factory jobs since March 1979.

And during the 30 months of fragile recovery from the Reagan Recession, the manufacturing sector has regained only 60 percent of the jobs that were lost during that two-year downturn, she said.

Hard-hit industries

In fact, Norwood told the panel, "six industries—steel, tobacco, textiles, chemicals, petroleum and coal products, and leather manufacturing—have employment levels that are below the levels at the trough of the recession."

What growth in jobs there has been has been almost entirely in the service sector. Norwood pointed out that since May of last year, nearly nine of every 10 new jobs have been in services.

The monthly payroll survey showed that nonfarm employment rose by 345,000 to 97.5 million in May, with virtually all the gain occurring in the services sector. About 111,000 of the new jobs were in health or business-related fields, BLS said.

However, the BLS survey of households which provides the basis for the unemployment rate showed almost no change in employment during the month, with the total number of jobholders at a seasonally adjusted total of 107 million

Officially, there were 8.4 million unemployed last month in a total workforce of 115.3 million.

But the Full Employment Action Council, a coalition of religious, labor, civil rights, rural, youth and other groups, estimated there were "well over 15 million" Americans affected by unemployment in May, and said the true national jobless rate was 13.4 percent. The FEAC's figures include both the underemployed and the so-called discouraged workers—those who have stopped looking for work because they think there are no jobs for them. At the end of March, there were 1.3 million discouraged workers.

In a study of the states hardest hit by unemployment, the coalition pointed to the unevenness of the recovery, noting that since 1979 the nation has witnessed a redistribution of the unemployment burden.

Benefits lacking

To make matters worse, the FEAC said, fewer than half the officially unemployed from the 10 hardest-hit states collect unemployment insurance benefits. The 10 are West Virginia, Louisiana, Oregon, Alabama, Mississippi, Alaska, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, and Idaho.

In a report on unemployment insurance benefits, the Labor Dept. said only 2.5 million people were collecting such benefits in the week ended May 18, a drop of 41,000 from the previous week.

The weakest manufacturing industries in May were apparel and textiles and electrical equipment. Construction employment, on the other hand, was up 30,000 after seasonal adjustment to 4.7 million.

Senate vote on Davis-Bacon

The Senate voted to exempt most military construction contracts from Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage requirements, and to otherwise weaken labor standards on military contracts.

The key vote came on a labor-supported amendment by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to restore full Davis-Bacon Act coverage. It lost on a 49-49 tie vote. As the AFL-CIO sees it, the vote clearly separated senators voting for and against the interest of workers.

NLRB lets employer renege on pact's missing union bug

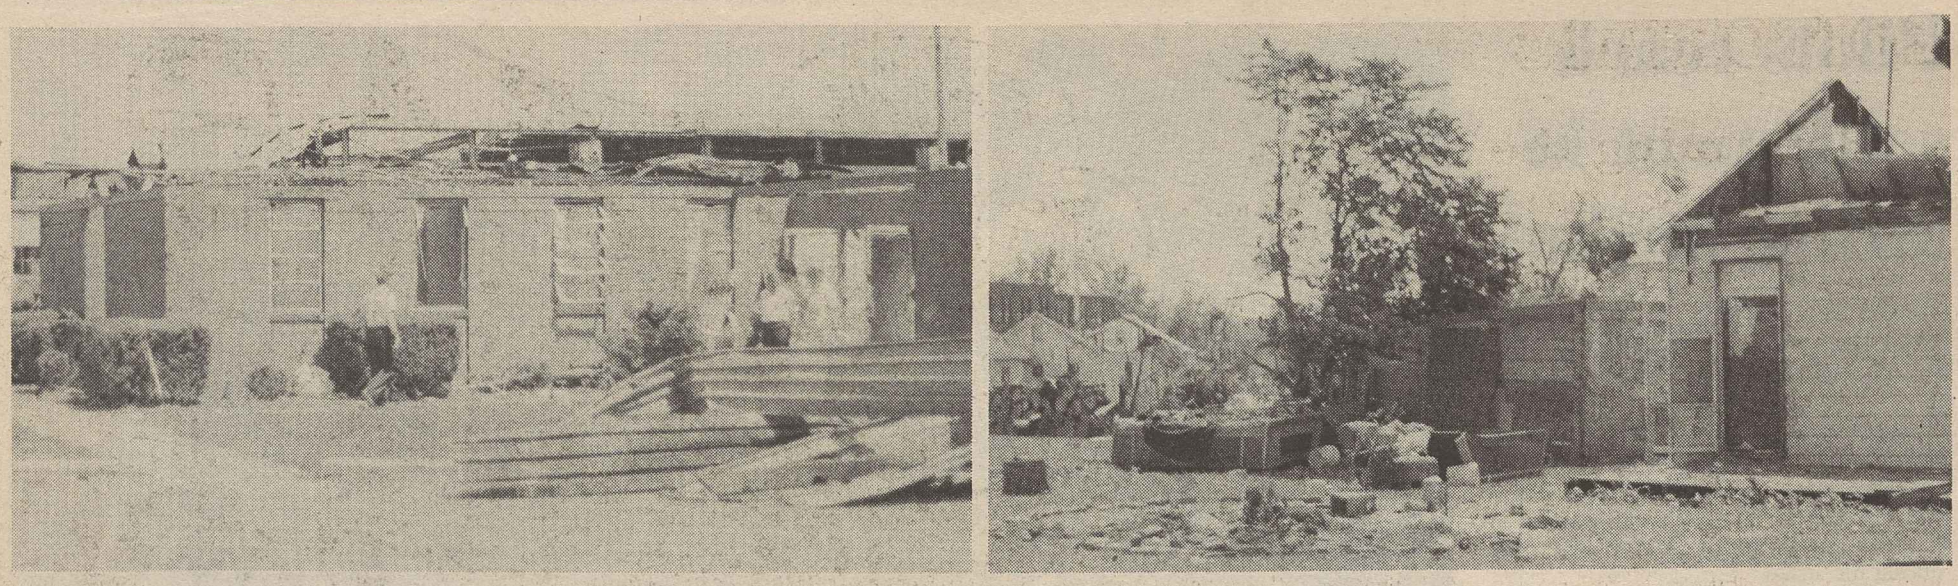
A split National Labor Relations Board let a Kansas City power company off the hook from using a union bug on its collective bargaining contract with the Electrical Workers even though management had agreed during negotiations to keep the label.

On top of that, the 2-1 NLRB ruling held IBEW Local 1464 committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to sign the 1980 agreement with Kansas City Power & Light Co. because of the missing bug.



Board Chairman Donald L. Dotson and Member Robert P. Hunter insisted in the majority ruling that "the inclusion of the union bug on the final printed version of the contract was not a matter involving the relationship between employees and the employer."

Their decision was based on an opinion by NLRB General Counsel Rosemary Collyer.

"While the presence of the union bug . . . may have a symbolic value for the (union), it nevertheless constituted at most a peripheral concern, something akin to a ministerial matter, rather than a material aspect of the collective bargaining relationship," the majority said.

Member Patricia Diaz Dennis dissented, pointing out that the final contract failed to carry all the agreed-to terms. "A party is not free in negotiations to agree to permissive subjects, delete the permissive subjects from the written agreement, and then compel the other party to sign the inaccurate written agreement on pain of violating" federal labor law, Dennis noted.

Earlier, an NLRB administrative law judge had recommended that the power company's complaint against the union be thrown out. "No matter how trivial the (NLRB) general counsel and the employer view the bug, the union should not be forced to forfeit what it secured during negotiations," wrote ALJ Jay Pollack.

Tornado aftermath in Ohio: Steelworkers Local 1338 union hall in Niles and demolished homes in Newton Falls.

Volunteers assist tornado victims in three states

By Candice Johnson

Union members are pitching in to console families, serve meals and restore communities ravaged by tornadoes in Pennsylvania, Ohio and New York. At least 93 people were killed and 600 injured by the violent storms in late May that hopscotched through parts of the three states before slamming into Ontario.

In Pennsylvania, the storm cut a swath across a seven-county area just north of Pittsburgh before moving toward Lake Erie. Relief efforts in the Beaver Valley area began immediately, said Joseph Spanik of the Beaver County United Way labor liaison and a member of Laborers Local 833.

"Saturday morning, we went into action," with relief workers searching for missing persons, clearing away debris and providing housing and medical care for tornado victims, he said. Members of Electrical Workers Local 712 joined in the clean up effort, along with building trades members from nearby Allegheny County. Nearly 2,000 volunteers turned out, with crews working 16 to 18 hours a day. Relief efforts are continuing, with the National Guard and the Salvation Army distributing food and clothing, while Red Cross volunteers make home visits and provide medical care.

Quick response

As the storm moved on, union members in Pennsylvania's northwestern corner also responded quickly to the call for help. Within one hour of the storm's explosion, members of Laborers Local 603 were in the field, working with chainsaws to clear roads while heavy equipment operators set out to rescue victims still trapped by debris. Gene Adams, United Way Community Services liaison representative, said 720 volunteers were working in the six-county area, and in the towns of Albion, Wheatland and Atlantic, hardest hit by the storm. Steelworkers, Electronics Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and Teamsters all joined in the clean up effort, and apprentices and retirees from the Northwestern Council of Carpenters pledged to rebuild the demolished homes of families not having insurance coverage.

National Red Cross staff in the Erie area are coordinating relief efforts and have set up seven service centers, 14 food preparation centers and 10 feeding centers, where 36,155 meals have been served since June 1.

Pennsylvania residents suffered not only the loss of their homes and property, but many lost their jobs as well. In Wheatland, a town of 1,200 people, tornadoes destroyed 95 percent of the town's industries.

Adams said more than $355,500 had been donated to the Red Cross disaster relief fund, through union fund-raising drives at plant gates and other contributions. AFL-CIO Community Services Director Frank Emig has urged local unions to channel their contributions to the Red Cross through the three state federations.

Rescue teams in northeastern Ohio—where the tornadoes first touched down—also came from the ranks of organized labor, said Beth Curley of the Communications Workers, who is a Red Cross labor liaison representative in Warren. Red Cross and labor volunteers immediately went to work aiding disaster victims, with teachers stationed at service centers and operating engineers clearing away rubble.

Ray Reber, a furloughed steelworker opened a food kitchen while other members of USWA Local 1375 organized clean up crews.

Heavy damage

Curley estimated the cost of the Red Cross operation would be nearly $500,000 in Ohio alone. Local drives have raised $421,000 to date to offset the estimated $60 million worth of damage across the state. The tornadoes in Ohio killed 13 people and injured another 248. More than 400 people lost their homes.

Residents of the Jamestown, N.Y., area were more fortunate. Four homes there were destroyed and several more damaged, but no deaths were reported.

UFCW drive in Northwest organizes convenience stores

Portland—Plaid Pantry, a chain of 123 convenience stores in Oregon and Washington, is going union.

The Food & Commercial Workers describe the development as one of the largest convenience store organizing victories in the nation.

The campaign got its impetus in the Portland metropolitan area where UFCW Local 1092 won collective bargaining rights in a National Labor Relations Board election for some 450 clerks employed at 104 Plaid Pantry outlets.

And now the union is on a roll. It subsequently organized nearly 20 more stores in Salem, Ore, and Vancouver, Wash.

Local 1092 President Mike Herford termed the successful organizing drive "a great victory for us and organized labor" throughout the Northwest.

Because of a high turnover rate at Plaid Pantry, only 262 workers were eligible to vote in the NLRB election here even though all 450 employees in Multnomah, Clackamas, Washington and Yamhill counties will be represented. Some 200 workers were terminated from the time the UFCW filed for the election until the day it was held two months later, Local 1092 organizer Jeanine Meyer noted.

One of the major concerns of workers in the new bargaining units is low wages, Meyer said. Clerks are paid only $3.50 an hour and workers in charge of stores get $4.20. They get few benefits, no premium pay for working off-hours and work six- to nine-hour shifts without a break.

Plaid Pantry owner John Piacentini, a former Local 1092 member and now a millinonaire, had pledged to bargain in good faith with the union, but hired a management consulting firm to deal with union negotiators. And despite an earlier pledge to recognize the union, Piacentini has filed objections to the Portland organizing victory.

Plaid Pantry stores reportedly gross between $80 million and $100 million a year.

GOP takeover in California curbs Farm Worker gains

Sacramento, Calif.—A new report on the effectiveness of California's nine-year-old Agricultural Labor Relations Board shows that while unions generally have fared well under the state's pioneering farm labor law their success rate has declined under Republican Gov. George Deukmejian.

While unions won 71 percent of the 1,010 worker representation elections held since 1975, the rate of victory has fallen off since 1978, the report by California Auditor General Thomas W. Hayes reveals.

In the first three years of the law's implementation, unions won 74 percent of the elections. Since then, however, the union victory rate has averaged 64 percent and in the year beginning July 1, 1983 the rate fell to 48.5 percent, the lowest yet.

The report also found that the number of unfair labor practice charges brought as complaints by the board's general counsel has declined since David Stirling was named to the post in 1983.

Stirling's critics, headed by the Farm Workers, charge that he is not enforcing the law. ALRB Member Jerome Waldie, an appointee of former Gov. Jerry Brown, renewed that charge at a May 30 hearing on the report before the Joint Legislative Audit Committee. Waldie and the UFW accuse Stirling of favoring growers in enforcement policies.

From 1975 to 1982, the general counsel's office issued an average 141 complaints a year, the report showed. In the two years since July 1, 1982, the number of complaints averaged 75 a year.

In addition, the percentage of charges received by the board that were incorporated into complaints against employers has dropped sharply from 60.4 percent in fiscal year 1975-76 to 25.3 percent in the previous fiscal year.

The report said that the ALRB received and processed 8,545 unfair labor practice charges in the first nine years of the law. Of that number, 88 percent were filed against employers, usually charging coercion of workers, discrimination against workers for union activities, refusal to bargain, and denial of access to grower property.

Employer charges

Of the 12 percent of charges against unions, most charged coercion of employees, illegal picketing, and bad faith bargaining.

The auditor general's report noted that 61 percent of the unfair labor practice charges were resolved without litigation, compared with over 90 percent of such charges resolved without lawsuit under the National Labor Relations Act.

Similarly, a high percentage of ALRB decisions are appealed to the courts, the report showed. Of 506 decisions by ALRB administrative law judges since 1975, 442 were appealed to the full board. Of that number, 335 upheld the administrative law judge at least in part. Among those 335 decisions, 224 were appealed to the courts.

percent rates of approval. Those surveyed who had attended but not completed college gave unions a 53-percent vote of support. The poll found that along racial lines, 74 percent of blacks favored unions compared to 55 percent of whites.

The lowest regional approval came from the South where 51 percent favored unions. This compares to 63 percent support in the Midwest, 60 percent in the East and 59 percent in the West.

The survey was taken among 1,525 adults in more than 300 scientifically selected communities, according to Gallup, and the sampling has an accuracy rating of 95 percent with an error of three percentage points in either direction.

Reforming the Reforms

THE TAX HEARINGS being held by congressional committees are serving a most useful purpose, somewhat to the surprise of the more jaded observers of the Washington scene.

Few issues are more complex, and most Americans probably welcomed the Administration's assurance that its tax reform package would make the system simpler, fairer, and allow a cut in the federal income tax for nearly everyone without adding further to the huge federal deficit.

Even those who regretted that tax reform was not being used to reduce the deficit were prepared to welcome what appeared to be a move to shift some of the tax burden from low- and middle-income households to corporations that have long escaped any meaningful contribution to federal revenues. That was the most positive aspect of the tax package the Treasury Dept. put together last November.

There are still some elements of the final White House version to applaud. But thanks in part to the congressional hearing process, Americans and their representatives in Congress are learning about the pitfalls and booby traps.

Some of the most welcome reforms, it turns out, have been dropped—a tribute to the political clout of the oil and gas industry, among others.

TO THE labor movement, the test of tax fairness is that persons whose income is from paychecks should not be taxed at higher rates than those whose money comes from investment profits. Unfortunately, under the President's "reform," unearned income would continue to be given preference over earned income.

And, inexplicably, the relatively modest steps toward shortening the list of tax avoidance measures available to corporations would be linked to a revenue-losing reduction in the corporate tax rate.

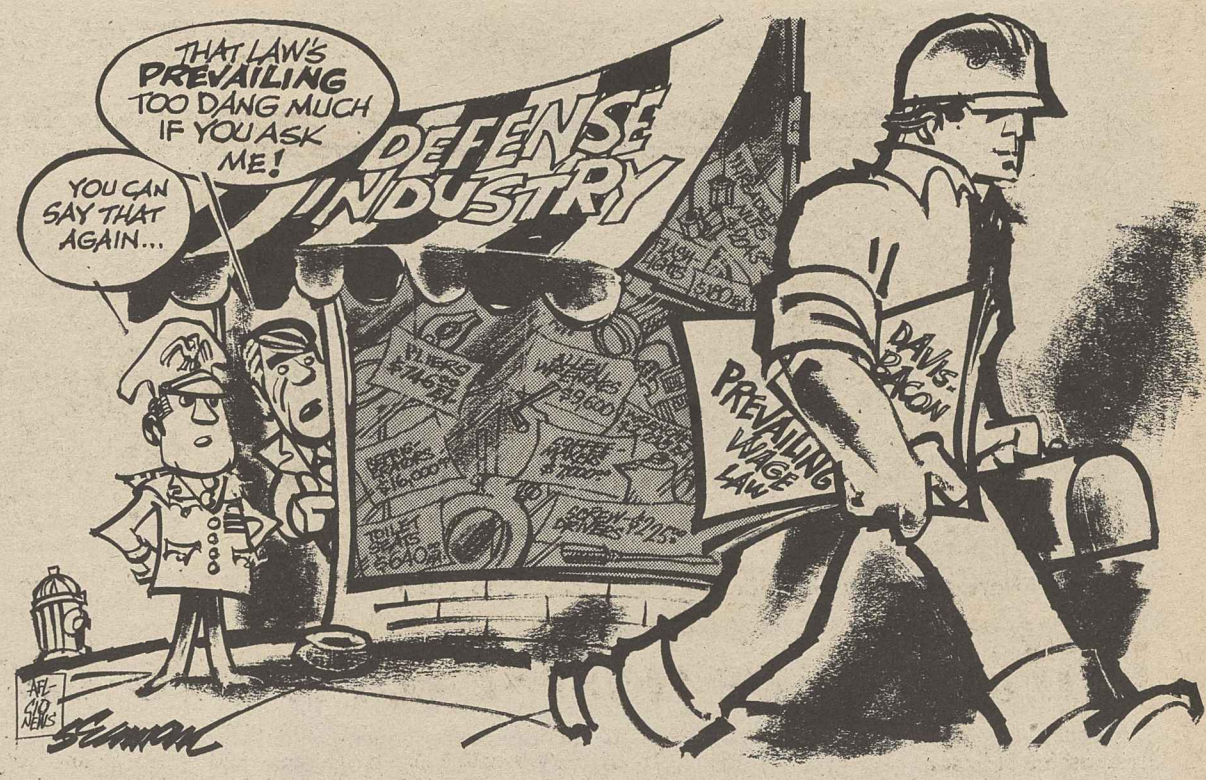
Because of the incomplete nature of the reform elements, the Administration has proposed some enormously damaging changes to offset the revenue loss from a reduction in the top rates of the federal income tax. The result, whether intended or not, would further harm America's workers and gravely diminish the ability of states and cities to provide essential services.

What can be said of a proposal to place an additional tax on every worker whose employer provides a health insurance plan—now an almost universal job benefit necessitated by the absence of a comprehensive national health care system?

How can an Administration which has argued that many of the services provided by the national government be made the responsibility of cities and states then turn around and seek to erode the local and state tax base?

What twisted reasoning can motivate a proposal to re-establish the "marriage penalty" and thus revoke one of the very few genuine tax reforms of recent years?

These are some of the questions that have been raised at congressional hearings, and not just by unions. Let us hope that the committee members were listening.



IT WAS THE trade union movement, however, that pointed up most effectively the bottom-line result of the Administration tax package on people in a variety of economic circumstances.

Twenty-five percent of the reduction in individual taxes will go to the one-half of 1 percent of people with incomes over $200,000 a year. Their windfalls will average $10,000 each.

But what of working Americans, especially those in two-earner families with child care expenses?

The Communications Workers did a sampling of real live people, union members who earn paychecks and pay taxes. It found, and reported to the House Ways & Means Committee, that eight out of 11 such workers would end up paying more in taxes under the Administration proposal than at present.

There is no reason to abandon the search for tax reform or to scrap the positive features of the Administration's plan because of such glaring deficiencies. But there is every reason to reshape and improve on what the President has sent to Congress.

Children chief casualties in losing war on poverty

By Press Associates, Inc.

When photographers cover a war, their favorite subjects to illustrate suffering are children.

The innocence and helplessness of children make them the saddest victims of any war. That is why the United States must understand its children are the victims in a war the nation is losing.

"Children in Poverty," a report prepared for the House Ways & Means Committee by the Congressional Research Service and the Congressional Budget Office, is a documentation of the nation's apparent evacuation of its efforts to end poverty. The report's statistics, culled from Census Bureau data, present a grim outlook:

- After the Johnson Administration declared its "War on Poverty," the child poverty rate was cut in half to a record low of 13.8 children per 100 in 1969. By 1983, the child poverty rate had climbed back 60 percent above its 1969 low.
- In 1983, 13.8 million children were classified as officially poor, with more than one in five children living in poverty.
- While children represented less than 27 percent of the overall population in 1983, they comprised almost 40 percent of the 35.3 million poor.
- The number of poor children increased by 3 million from 1968 to 1983, even though the total population of children fell by 9 million.

Familiar factors

Most of the factors associated with poor children were familiar: race, family composition and education and age. For example, almost half of all black children are poor; one-third of all Hispanic children are poor, and one-sixth of all white children are poor.

More than half—55.4 percent—of the children in female-headed families were poor in 1983. A child is four times as likely to be poor if living in a female-headed family than a male-headed family because "women in general have lower rates of labor force participation, command lower wages than men and have fewer assets than do men," the report said.

Adding in age and education, the report draws a composite contrast of poverty. The poverty rate for children of white, married couples whose father is at least 30 years old and a high school graduate is 6.5 percent. For children in black, single, female-headed families where the mother is under 30 and did not complete high school, the poverty rate is 92.8 percent.

Rebutting program cutters

Among other conclusions by the agencies that contradict arguments neoconservatives propound for cutting social programs:

- Whether poverty is measured before or after government transfer payments and whether the income counted includes or excludes non-cash benefits and money paid as taxes, child poverty rates rose especially sharply from 1979 to 1983.
- Although overall federal spending for income security programs rose 83 percent in constant dollars from 1973 to 1983, federal spending for social insurance and cash welfare benefits to poor children declined by some 6 percent over the period. Total available cash and food stamp benefits fell by 20 percent from 1976 to 1983.

Among policy options for reducing child poverty explored in the report are increasing Aid to Families with Dependent Children and food stamp benefits; expanding AFDC benefits to poor two-parent families, instead of single-parent families only, and expanding Medicaid and the supplemental food program for women, infants and children.

The effort would not be cheap. Legislation introduced by Representatives Harold E. Ford (D-Tenn.) and Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) incorporates several of these options at an estimated first-year cost of $5 billion to $6 billion.

But the alternative, as the report demonstrates, is to condemn a growing number of America's children to poverty.

Message from constituents

Workers in St. Louis don't like Rep. Richard A. Gephardt's proposal to tax their employer-paid health insurance and related benefits. At a Capitol Hill meeting, Executive Sec. William Steinke of the St. Louis Newspaper Guild, left, hands Gephardt a petition with more than 3,000 signatures protesting the unfair tax measure. Steinke told the Missouri Democrat that he couldn't find one person in Gephardt's 3rd Congressional District that supported the congressman's anti-worker position.

Legislation pressed to block plundering of pension funds

fully workers' money to other uses," Seidman charged.

"A pension plan is not a conditional or discretionary gift by the employer," he stressed. "Rather it represents current wages withheld to pay a benefit on retirement. The amounts contributed by the employer to the fund should, therefore, be an irrevocable payment which the employer cannot withhold or recapture, just as an employer cannot withhold or recapture cash wage payments."

Hearings on the issue were held jointly by the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, chaired by Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), and the Select Committee on Aging, whose chairman, Rep. Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.), has sponsored a bill to deal with the problem.

Roybal's bill, with some modification, "would effectively deal with the abuses" that have arisen, Seidman said. A principal feature would be the requirement for a business necessity test before an "overfunded" plan can be terminated so that the employer can recover excess assets. It includes a number of safeguards to protect workers and retirees.

Seidman noted that defined benefit plans which are terminated are often replaced by defined contribution plans, which the AFL-CIO considers generally inferior and more risky for workers.

Because of the complexity of the issue, Seidman acknowledged, it may take some time for Congress to shape legislation that would be broadly acceptable. And while the AFL-CIO favors the approach of the Roybal bill, "we are willing to work with all interested parties to design acceptable solutions and legislation."

In the interim, he urged a temporary moratorium on processing of pension plan terminations intended for the recapture of assets. Without such a moratorium, he warned, "the wave of terminations will continue as unscrupulous employers attempt to grab pension assets before Congress acts."

Geneva parley opens

Soviets opposed in bid to undercut ILO rules

Geneva — American worker, employer and government delegations to this year's conference of the International Labor Organization are joining forces to defeat new Soviet-bloc attempts to undermine the United Nations specialized agency.

AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving J. Brown, who heads the U.S. worker delegation, said the conference will "certainly be hearing a lot of rhetoric" from the Soviets and other East European delegates.

"But I believe we have the votes," Brown said. For one thing, he pointed out, there is no debate this year on the Arab-Israeli dispute. And that means that Arab countries, which have always been able to count on East bloc votes, do not feel any obligation this year to back Moscow.

The conference began on June 7 and is scheduled to conclude on June 27. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland was due to join the U.S. worker delegation at the end of the first week, which was devoted largely to opening statements, selection of officers and determining which of numerous proposed resolutions should receive priority.

One ILO official suggested that it was possible, "indeed, quite probable, that the East bloc draft resolution on structural reforms will not even get through the resolutions committee."

Soviet charges

The Soviet bloc charges that the ILO is "pro-Western," is "anti-socialist" and "discriminates against socialist countries both in its decisions and its employment of nationals from socialist countries."

ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard denied all these accusations in a formal published reply.

What the Soviet bloc wants above all is a change in ILO supervisory machinery —in effect, the introduction of a double standard in monitoring the compliance of member nations with ILO conventions and standards on workers' rights and trade union freedoms. Moscow and its allies say there should be less rigid application of ILO standards in their countries because of their "difference and economic and social systems."

Blanchard, in his letter, flatly declared that ILO standards must be applied equally to all member countries.

The communist countries did not push for any vote on the issue during the Governing Body session that preceded the full conference of the 151-member countries.

East bloc warnings of unspecified "action" if the ILO's committee on application of standards continues to castigate communist states for violating rules on workers' freedoms are not taken seriously by most other members or by the ILO itself.

Small sanction

The "economic sanctions" that Soviet delegate Leonid Kostin has been talking about involve only small sums of money paid toward ILO field projects.

Brown noted that the East bloc, while criticizing the ILO for alleged anti-socialist bias, at the same time is making full use of the organization's machinery to attack Western nations.

Actual business of this year's conference centers on occupational health and safety, including safety in the use of asbestos, and equal opportunities and treatment for men and women workers.

Besides Brown and Kirkland, the U.S. worker delegation includes James E. Baker, the AFL-CIO European representative; Federation Vice Presidents John T. Joyce, president of the Bricklayers, and John J. Sweeney, president of the Service Employees; Gen. Counsel Laurence S. Gold; Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald; Margaret M. Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security; Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch; Eugenia Kemble, director of the Free Trade Union Institute; Patrick J. O'Farrell, executive director of the African-American Labor Center, and Atty Edward J. Hickey, Jr.

The American government sent a 17-member delegation headed by Under Sec. of Labor Robert W. Searby. American employers have a 10-member group at the conference, led by Charles H. Smith, Jr., chairman of Seico Industries Inc.

Kirkland calls for renewed 'spirit of solidarity'

Nashville — AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned that labor must not confuse confidence with complacency in the current confrontation with change in this country, but must "summon up, from every level of our movement, that spirit of solidarity" needed to overcome the obstacles.

"Our movement today is challenged on virtually every front — political, organizing, and economic," Kirkland told local and state labor leaders at regional conferences here and in Indianapolis.

"There are powerful forces in this country that want labor's mission confined to collective bargaining, at most. They want us to retreat from the political arena, leaving that field exclusively to them," he said.

Determined

"The champions of special privilege and the foes of human progress cannot beat us for long unless we quit, and we do not propose to present them with such a cheap and easy victory. We are not going to quit—not today, not tomorrow and not ever."

Kirkland told the trade unionists who gathered at the main conferences here and in Indianapolis as well as those at satellite meetings in other communities in the regions that state federations and city central bodies must be brought up to their maximum effectiveness.

"And we must involve our members more actively in the trade union mission."

The regional conferences, which began in March, were designed to encourage that involvement. The Nashville conference drew members from South and North Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi, Tennessee, and West Virginia. Smaller meetings were held in Memphis and the Florence-Sheffield-Muscle Shoals, Ala., areas and in Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tenn.

The Indianapolis sessions attracted participants from Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, and Wisconsin, with satellite meetings in Danville, Decatur, and Peoria, Ill., Dayton and Columbus, Ohio, and Richmond, Ind.

This year's round of conferences winds up July 13-14 in Tulsa, Okla., where delegates will be drawn from Arkansas, Kansas, Louisiana, Missouri, Nebraska, Oklahoma and Texas.

In his remarks to the plenary sessions of the conferences, Kirkland stressed labor's role as the "main line of defense for the plain people of this country."

The rich can take care of themselves, he said — "and they do that exceedingly well" — but labor's mission "is to make sure that those who don't have enough power are not kicked around by those who have too much."

Lingering recession

Asked at a news conference whether the nation could lapse into another recession this year, Kirkland pointed out that it "never, in our view, recovered from the last recession" of 1981-83.

"A lot of people have done very well in this so-called recovery. A lot of people have gotten rich," he said. "Other people have suffered and continue to suffer. At the alleged peak of a recovery, we still have almost 7.5 percent of the people unemployed and we have hundreds of thousands that have been unemployed for very long periods of time. I don't call that prosperity."

One of the biggest problems facing the country, he said, is the steady erosion of its manufacturing sector. "And the policies of the Reagan Administration have contributed heavily to that," he said.

"This Administration has borrowed three quarters of a trillion dollars at very high rates of interest in order to give rich people extraordinary tax cuts, to put through a tax bill heavily loaded to the side of the most fortunate people in our society.

"At the same time, they have used that deficit which they created to dismantle the constructive and necessary role of the federal government in a modern society," he said.

Trojan/Dante luggage strikers pledged full support

Memphis — South of downtown Memphis, not far from the levee along the Mississippi, striking members of Furniture Workers Local 282 are battling to preserve their modest pay and benefits scale.

These employees of Trojan/Dante Luggage Co. are fighting against the nefarious effects of so-called free trade as well as the "greed" of their bosses, as AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland put it.

Kirkland visited the picket line during a side trip from the Nashville regional conference and pledged the federation's full support to the strikers.

Surrounded by Local 282 members, he announced that the Trojan/Dante company had been placed on the AFL-CIO's "unfair" list. He was accompanied by Lowell Daily, secretary-treasurer of the Furniture Workers.

The company produces luggage under the brand names Hampton, Vagabond, Newport, Nassau, Going to Grandma's, Monterey, Aspen, Magnum, Biscayne, Executive Briefs and Dante.

A few years ago, Trojan employed 700 Furniture Workers to make its line of luggage here. Now, only 64 workers are employed assembling luggage from imported components.

This use of cheap overseas labor enabled the company to make substantial profits and to reward the factory boss with a salary increase from $51,000 to $148,000 a year.

Still, when Local 282 President Willie Rudd sat down to negotiate a new contract last winter, management insisted on a wage freeze and a giveback that would require workers to pay from $45 to $65 a month for medical insurance. The workers earn an average of $4.96 an hour.

From the grassroots

Hundreds of senior citizens gather at the Capitol for intense and determined lobbying to make sure their social security benefits are not frozen, as the Senate-passed budget demands. The delegation from the National Council of Senior Citizens legislative conference voiced strong support for the House-passed budget that will keep their benefits intact. (Story, Page 4.)

Rights unit rejects pay equity concept in sex bias claims

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission followed the Reagan Administration policy line and refused to act on sex discrimination complaints that charge employers with using a double standard to set pay for jobs held primarily by men and by women.

Its decision was criticized by the AFL-CIO, which reiterated labor's commitment to pay equity and pledged a continued effort "through collective bargaining, legislation and legal action."

By the EEOC's reasoning, an employer would virtually have to confess to illegal sex discrimination for the government to require remedial action.

EEOC Chairman Clarence Thomas told a news conference that the commission found no basis in law for inferring sex discrimination because of pay differences in jobs that require comparable levels of skill, effort and responsibility.

The EEOC can act only in the event of "straightforward discrimination," Thomas insisted. He gave as an example of such discrimination a case where an employer "admits the jobs are equal" as the result of a job evaluation but continues to differentiate in pay on the basis of sex.

The EEOC policy statement reflected the position taken two months earlier by a majority of the Civil Rights Commission—another agency whose policies have been reshaped by Reagan appointees.

Growing backlog

A backlog of EEOC cases involving sex discrimination complaints had grown to 250, many of them brought by unions, while the agency pondered the language it should use in disavowing any cause for federal intervention.

Two unions that have been especially active in pressing pay equity issues under the Civil Rights Act's ban on sex discrimination sharply criticized the EEOC's position.

State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee said the EEOC explanation "stood logic on its head." Under the Reagan Administration, he said, it has been transformed from "a catalyst for change in efforts to remove bias from the nation's wage scales" into a focal point of opposition to pay equity—the "issue of the 1980s."

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney said the 1964 Civil Rights Act made sex-based wage discrimination clearly illegal, and a 1981 Supreme Court decision—known as the Gunther case—established that illegal discrimination could exist even if the jobs held by men and women were not the same under the more rigid standards of the subsequently enacted Equal Pay Act.

The case the EEOC chose as the vehicle for a policy statement had been brought by AFSCME and involved a claim that a local housing agency paid lower rates to women in jobs requiring "equal or more skill, effort and responsibility" than higher-paid jobs held largely by men.

In rejecting the claim of sex bias in the setting of pay rates, the EEOC stressed its unwillingness to interfere with the marketplace valuation of the worth of a job. Illegal sex discrimination can't be proven

3 executives convicted for murder of worker

Chicago—Three former executives of a silver recovery firm here were found guilty of murder in a landmark trial stemming from the death of a worker who inhaled fumes from open vats of cyanide at the plant.

That plant, owned by Film Recovery Systems Corp., had been visited by an inspector from the Occupational Safety & Health Administration just two and a half months earlier. Due to a "records check" policy adopted by the Reagan Administration in October 1981, the OSHA compliance officer was prevented from physically inspecting the workplace. His review of company records showed little time lost to on-the-job injuries.

Reckless conduct

Those found guilty are Steven J. O'Neil, president of the now defunct firm in Elk Grove Village, north of Chicago; Charles Kirschbaum, the plant manager, and Daniel Rodriguez, the plant foreman. The three were convicted also on 14 counts each of reckless conduct stemming from injuries to other workers at the plant.

Cook County State's Atty. Richard Daley, whose office prosecuted the case, called the plant the world's largest gas chamber. It contained 140 open vats of cyanide solution.

Judge Ronald J. P. Banks, who presided over the eight-day, nonjury trial at the Cook County Circuit Court, found the three men guilty in the death of a 61-year-old Polish immigrant, Stefan Golab, on Feb. 10, 1983. Golab, according to prosecutors, inhaled a lethal dose of cyanide fumes as he prepared to connect a pump used to clean out a 1,000-gallon vat at the plant.

Prosecutors said Golab staggered as he attempted to hook up the pump to the vat. Told to go outside, he instead went into the plant's lunchroom. Fellow workers testified that Golab began shaking, rolled his eyes backward and emitted foam from his mouth. He lapsed into unconsciousness and died en route to the hospital.

The main prosecution witness was Dr. Robert J. Stein, the Cook County medical examiner. Stein testified that Golab had a lethal level of cyanide in his blood. When the autopsy was performed, Stein said, a smell of bitter almonds—the odor associated with cyanide—spread throughout the examining room.

Government data signal weakness in U.S. economy

The nation's economy, which has been virtually stagnant since last summer, showed further signs of weakness in the government report projecting economic growth in the current quarter.

The Commerce Dept. issued a "flash" estimate of an annual growth rate of 3.1 percent in real gross national product—the total value of goods and services—for the April-June period. This is less than what economists generally regard as needed to provide the jobs for a growing work force.

The "flash" or preliminary estimate of real GNP is based on assumptions by government economists that sales are increasing and business spending is on the rise. But these assumptions are not fully shared by most private analysts, and the Com-

AFL-CIO blasts plan

Child labor in National Park jobs?

The AFL-CIO has accused the National Park Service of undercutting the ban on child labor abuse in a proposal to allow park concessionaires to hire 14- and 15-year olds. The Park Service also wants to lift the restriction on working hours for children.

In filing a formal protest with the Interior Dept. agency, the federation said elimination of the child labor restrictions would expose younger teenagers to employer exploitation and hazardous working conditions.

The rule change also would add to the job problems of older teenagers, AFL-CIO Economist John L. Zalusky warned. The government's overall unemployment rate for 16- to 19-year olds in May was 18.9 percent.

"Adding more young teenage workers to an already glutted workforce serves no purpose, except that of concessionaires," Zalusky observed.

The Service Employees, who represent workers at concessions in the national park system, also protested the proposed repeal of the child labor rule. The SEIU based its opposition to the change on three grounds:

- The impact on the safety and health of the workers and public which uses park facilities.
- The incentive for younger teens to drop out of school when offered year-around jobs by concessionaires.
- Further aggravation of the job shortage by expanding the workforce with 14- and 15-year-olds.

"Repeal of the child labor rule creates no new jobs," SEIU President John J. Sweeney pointed out.

The Park Service initiated the proposed change at the request of concessionaires, who contend they often can't fill all their job openings because of restrictions.

As set forth in the Federal Register, the Park Service proposal is to "delete a child labor regulation in its entirety."

A major concern over the rule change centers on the hazards child workers would encounter in their jobs as stable hands, garage maintenance helpers, ski lift operators and short-order cooks.

Another problem, Zalusky said, "is that although there is a 9 p.m. limit on hours worked by 14-year-olds under the Fair Labor Standards Act, there is no control of the social environment in which they work." He noted that the youngsters could be exposed to cocktail bars and other unsuitable places.

"It is intolerable for the Park Service to

Probing the issues

Reporters are filled in on a gamut of issues affecting workers and their unions by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a Washington Journalism Center seminar. The discussion ranged across such topics as labor's role in politics, congressional lobbying, job security, comparable worth, international affairs, union organizing and federal labor law. Moderating the session is Julius Duscha, left, director of the center.

3 executives convicted of murder in worker's death from toxic fumes

The defense contended that Golab died from a heart attack that was unrelated to his work.

A month after Golab's death, OSHA issued two citations listing safety violations it had found and called for fines totaling $4,850. The violations included the failure to classify the open vats "as a hazard potential," lack of safe clothing and safety equipment, a shortage of signs warning of cyanide and other dangers, failure to provide respirators, failure to screen workers to determine if they were strong enough to work with respirators, lack of cold running water with which to wash off splashed cyanide, and the lack of a cyanide antidote in first aid kits.

At a settlement conference, OSHA area administrator Josephine O'Brien slashed the proposed fines in half. The use of settlement conferences was begun under the Carter Administration but greatly expanded under Reagan.

After announcing his guilty finding, Judge Banks revoked the bail for the three company officials and ordered them jailed until sentencing on June 28. They face jail terms of 20 to 40 years. Under Illinois law, there is only one classification of murder and it carries a minimum prison sentence of 20 years.

Nearly 20 of the plant's former workers, all but one of whom were illegal aliens, testified that they vomited almost daily because of the fumes in the plant. The workers had no union representation.

A team from Cook County Hospital reported at least two-thirds of the firm's workers suffered at least 10 times a month from each of the four symptoms of cyanide poisoning—dizziness, taste of bitter almonds in the mouth, headaches and nausea and vomiting.

Warning labels destroyed

Prosecutors introduced evidence showing that some workers at the plant had been ordered to scrape or burn off the skull and crossbones warning labels from drums of cyanide.

The company officials repeatedly ignored the instances of nausea and vomiting among the workers, the prosecutors said. They noted that while the antidote for cyanide is relatively inexpensive and widely available, none was kept at the plant.

The workers in the plant abraded old photographic and X-ray film into chips which they dropped into the open cyanide vats to extract the silver.

The cyanide soaked chips were loaded into cans which the company trucked to dozens of sites in the state. Nearly 7,000 tons were left in 171 truck trailers. The state of Illinois is suing to recover the millions of dollars it cost to have the residue destroyed.

Besides the three men convicted, the judge found Film Recovery and Metallic Marketing Systems guilty of involuntary manslaughter and 14 counts of reckless conduct. The companies, which own half the stock in the operation, were fined $10,000.

The judge dropped all charges against another defendant, Gerald Pett, the plant's vice president, saying the prosecutors had failed to prove any of the charges against him.

A fifth defendant, Michael T. MacKay, Film Recovery's vice president and an owner, has been indicted, but remains free in his home state of Utah, where Gov. Scott M. Matheson has twice refused to allow his extradition to Illinois. Norman H. Bangerter, a spokesman for the governor, said Matheson would restudy the case if he were to receive another extradition request. Daley, the Cook County state's attorney, said the request would be made.

Daley said, "These verdicts mean that employers who knowingly expose their workers to dangerous conditions leading to injury or even death can be held criminally responsible for the results of their actions.

Attorneys for the convicted men said the case would be appealed.

Southern Regional Council sets up new labor institute

Atlanta—The Southern Regional Council has established a labor institute under the chairmanship of former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall to promote "economic and social justice" in the workplace.

The new body, known as the Southern Labor Institute, will help "assure that citizens and leaders throughout the region understand the consequences of low wages on living standards in the South," Marshall said. "The new institute will provide an open setting in which workers can help resolve this and other collective problems. . . . We want to open up new channels of communication between workers and their communities."

Experienced director

Executive director of the institute is Kenny Johnson, who has worked with a broad range of community and civil rights leaders, black elected officials, and union leaders in the South. In the early '70s he was assistant executive director of the Scholarship, Education & Defense Fund for Racial Equality. Recently, he was field director of a national project to increase black voter participation.

Vice chairman of the institute's board is William Lucy, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

Other labor members of the board are Howard D. Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Ed Ball, secretary of the Steelworkers; Jim Parker, retired organizing director of the Carpenters; M. C. Hargett, regional director of the Operating Engineers; J. Bill Becker, president of the Arkansas AFL-CIO; E. T. Kehrer, regional civil rights representative of the AFL-CIO, and Ruth Ellinger, educational director, Texas AFL-CIO.

Also on the board are Tony Harrison, past president, and Steve Suitts, executive director of the Southern Regional Council; Samuel DuBois Cook, president of Dillard University; Elizabeth Koontz, former director of the U.S. Women's Bureau; Ann Richard, Texas state treasurer; Julius Chambers, an attorney from Charlotte, N.C.; Ruby Martin, an attorney from Virginia; and Prof. Daniel Pollitt of University of North Carolina Law School.

Formed in 1944, the Southern Regional Council is the South's oldest biracial organization.

Public unions applaud move on wage rules

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. welcomed the decision of the Labor Dept. to begin monitoring state and local governments for compliance with federal wage and hour laws.

"We are gratified that the Labor Dept. has articulated a clear enforcement policy to carry out the U.S. Supreme Court's decision that state and local governments must comply with federal minimum wage and overtime laws," said Al Bilik, executive director of the PED State/Local Division.

The Labor Dept.'s enforcement policy was developed in response to the Supreme Court decision last Feb. 19 in Garcia vs. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority. That ruling upheld the constitutionality of applying the Fair Labor Standards Act to virtually all state and local government jobs. The decision represented a reversal of a 1976 high court ruling in another case.

"The Supreme Court mandate, and now the Labor Dept.'s enforcement policy, will require state and local employers to extend to their employees the basic coverage given other workers under federal law. No longer will state and local workers be accorded second-class status," Bilik said.

Under the new policy, those state and local governments found not to be in compliance will be ordered to give the affected workers back pay to Apr. 15, 1985, the date when all appeals from the Feb. 19 ruling were exhausted.

Bilik commented that while the public employee unions would have preferred that the effective date for compliance be Feb. 19, "we are, nonetheless, pleased that the Labor Dept. had the resolve to move forward with a precise plan."

The PED, which represents federal, postal, state and local workers nationwide, has been working since the court ruling to coordinate organized labor's response to the decision.

Retired COPE official Esther Murray dies

Pasadena, Calif.—Esther Murray, who retired in 1969 as Eastern Area director of COPE Women's Activities, died June 11 at the age of 82.

Murray joined the CIO Political Action Committee in 1950 as director of women's activities and in 1955 became co-director of COPE's women's activities—a forerunner of Volunteers in Politics.

A pioneer in union voter registration programs, Murray is credited with helping bring a dramatic increase in union member participation in politics and election campaigns.

She had earlier been an official with the Democratic Party in California and was a candidate for Congress in 1950.

Survivors include one son, Dr. Bruce Murray, five grandchildren and a nephew, House Majority Whip Thomas S. Foley (D-Wash.). Services were held June 19 in Spokane, Wash.

ICFTU measures advance

Soviet bloc maneuvers stymied at ILO parley

Geneva — This year's International Labor Conference passed the midway point with the Soviet bloc isolated in attempts to gain exclusion from compliance with standards on trade union freedoms.

AFL-CIO delegates played key roles in lobbying against Soviet-initiated moves to dilute International Labor Organization monitoring of workers' rights in communist countries.

James Baker, deputy AFL-CIO representative in Europe, said the U.S. workers' delegation was "very happy indeed" over the successful rejection of the Soviet bloc campaign.

"But this is really a victory for the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, which put forward three of the five draft resolutions accepted for consideration," Baker said.

The communist bloc draft resolution, calling for creation of a working party to discuss modifying ILO machinery on the application of standards, placed last on the consideration list.

That means it would never even be discussed either in the resolutions committee or in the conference plenary session because of lack of time.

The ICFTU resolutions focusing on urgent labor problems in Africa and on hazard control and accident prevention were the first two accepted for consideration. An employers' group draft resolution on creation of job opportunities placed third, followed by another ICFTU proposal on working conditions in the rural sector.

Double-standard

In fifth place for consideration is the East European proposal for a working party on treating communist states differently from others in applying ILO conventions on the right of workers to associate and other basic freedoms. It got no support from developing countries.

ILO officials said only the first proposed resolution addressing issues affecting African countries is likely to make it to the plenary session. The resolutions committee was deluged with 270 proposed amendments to the draft text.

A large volume of submitted amendments also slowed action on proposed new international conventions on stricter controls on worker exposure to asbestos and assurances of equal opportunity for men and women workers.

Both drafts ran into more than 100 proposed amendments apiece, which all but ruled out any final adoption at this year's conference.

AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving J. Brown delivered the major address to the plenary session as head of the American workers' delegation.

Federation President Lane Kirkland, attending during the second week of the conference, concentrated on renewing contacts with his counterparts from other countries and did not address the conference.

Brown told the 1,000 delegates from the ILO's 151-member countries that workers in many countries are faced with an "almost impossible situation—unemployment and inflation."

Worst of both

"It is one of the major contradictions of our times—declining jobs and a high cost of living," he said. "Unless there's some major attempt to cope with this problem, the political stability of many nations will be threatened. This depressing picture is not only confined to the nations of the free world, but also is true of the totalitarian nations in spite of their propaganda about full employment."

Brown reiterated the long-standing position of U.S. workers that ILO standards must be applied equally to all countries "irrespective of the nature of their economic and social system."

He also denounced "managements that exploit the present economic adversity to hinder or destroy unions."

Labor Sec. William E. Brock told the conference that the United States is allied with nations that are "resisting either the formal or de facto dismantling" of the ILO system of standards and supervision.

Brock noted that he knew of "no truly democratic country in which trade unions do not play a significant political role. Certainly they do in the United States," he said in citing the AFL-CIO's ongoing political activities.

Solidarity leader

A highlight of the conference came with an address by Jerzy Milewski, European representative of Poland's outlawed Solidarity labor movement.

Milewski charged that the Polish regime is guilty of "murders and attacks on lesser-known activists," not only those who make the headlines in the world's free press.

He appealed to world governments to continue their support of Poland's free trade union movement, stressing that Solidarity "continues to represent the workers in Poland, and Polish society has never stopped supporting our organization."

Soviet and other East European delegates, as well as Cubans and Nicaraguans, walked out when Milewski spoke. But the Chinese remained, although they did not applaud at the end.

Grass-roots campaign

Labor's campaign against taxation of health insurance and other job benefits is spurred by this mailing from the Cleveland AFL-CIO to members of affiliated unions. Sebastian Lupica, executive secretary of the central body, shows the sacks of mail alerting union members to the threat.

Stronger pension laws urged to protect workers' benefits

Congress should consider legislation to strengthen pension rights and protect workers against loss of earned benefits, the Steelworkers and the Auto Workers urged.

Both unions, testifying before the Senate Special Committee on Aging, advanced a three-part approach:

- A rise in the annual premium that single-employer pension plans pay for the program termination insurance provided through the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.
- A requirement that pension benefits be fully vested — in effect, guaranteed — after five years rather than 10 years.
- Encouragement of "portability" between pension plans so that workers will not be penalized because of plant closings and the mobility of employment that is a feature of the American economic system.

That last point is less amenable to a legislative solution, but both unions emphasized its importance.

Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan stressed that "pension benefits are earned by an employee." Whether vested or not, a worker should be able to transfer his pension credits and the assets to pay for them to another pension plan when he changes jobs, Sheehan urged.

UAW Associate Gen. Counsel Alan V. Reuther suggested that a national portability program could be established in stages.

"It could develop within industries and later be extended between industries," he said. "Another approach would be to require pension portability among employers receiving government contracts, starting perhaps in the defense industry."

Both union witnesses sharply criticized the Administration approach of IRAs—the tax-deferred individual retirement accounts that have been most heavily used by persons in higher income brackets.

"In an era of severe budget deficits in which vital social programs are being curtailed or eliminated, why should a tax shelter which disproportionately benefits the well-to-do and causes a huge annual loss of revenue to the federal government be preserved, much less expanded?" Sheehan asked.

Reuther expressed concern that "the continued expansion of IRAs will wind up undermining public support for social security and the private pension system . . . the programs that represent the best means of providing adequate retirement income security to working men and women."

16 states remain above 8 percent in unemployment

The unevenness of the so-called recovery from the Reagan Recession surfaced in a government report showing that 16 states and the District of Columbia still have historically high rates of unemployment in excess of 8 percent.

The report by the Bureau of Labor Statistics for April also showed that joblessness in five states continued at double-digit levels.

West Virginia remained the state with the highest unemployment rate—12.5 percent—followed by Louisiana with 11.2 percent, Oregon with 10.6 percent, Michigan with 10.3 percent, and Alaska with 10 percent.

Several of the states with jobless rates between 8 and 10 percent are clustered in heavily industrialized areas of the East and Midwest, including Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa.

The percentages derive from state and local data and are not adjusted for seasonal fluctuations in the workforce.

Lowest rate

Massachusetts had the lowest unemployment rate in April, 3.7 percent. The most rapid job growth was reported in Arizona, Georgia, Nevada, and New Hampshire, each of which had over-the-year gains of 6 percent or more.

Most of the job gains were in services, trade, and finance, BLS said, with only about half the states showing over-the-year growth in manufacturing jobs.

Among the 253 metropolitan areas for which BLS reported jobless rates, McAllen-Edinburg-Mission, Tex., had the highest, 19.9 percent, followed by Modesto, Calif., with a jobless rate of 17.4 percent.

Car telephone dumping laid to Japanese firms

Japanese manufacturers of car telephones have been dumping their product in the United States, unfairly undercutting their American competition, the Commerce Dept. charged.

The government finding, which resulted from a petition filed by Motorola, Inc. last November, came as U.S. negotiators met in Tokyo to discuss the rising import of Japanese car phones and other radio equipment into this country. A hearing on the case has been set for July 23.

18 N.Y. hotels put on unfair list

New York—The strike by 16,000 members of the nine-union Hotel & Motel Trades Council enters its fourth week with the two sides remaining far apart on wage and benefit issues.

But the pressure on the employers was increased and the spirits of the strikers boosted by the placement of 18 major hotels on the AFL-CIO's unfair list. They are:

The Harley of New York, Helmsley Palace, Howard Johnson Motor Inn, Marriott's Essex House, New York Hilton, Park Lane, Pierre Hotel, Plaza Hotel, Ramada Inn, Regency, St. Moritz, St. Regis, Sheraton Centre, Sheraton City Squire, Sheraton Russell, Summit, Waldorf Astoria and Windsor Harley.

The presidents of the nine international unions involved in the strike joined in a telegram to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland requesting that the hotels be placed on the unfair list. In following through, Sec.-Treas. John Mara of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. said the action should remind union members and their families not to patronize the struck hotels.

Show of solidarity

The more than 5,000 strikers and their supporters from 20 local unions marched from the Plaza Hotel through downtown Manhattan on June 14 in a demonstration of solidarity.

The Hotel & Motel Trades Council is sticking to its goal of a 6.5 percent wage increase after agreeing to limited changes in job assignments, a key item on the bargaining agenda of the employer association that represents the 53 struck hotels.

"Now that we have job interchange, we've agreed to what they wanted; they'll have to agree to what we want on wages," council spokesman Henry Sheinkopf said. "They have offered 5 percent increases on a five-year contract. That is unacceptable."

The State Mediation Board has named a five-member citizens panel to recommend terms for settlement of the strike. Enio V. Carrion, chairman of the New York City AFL-CIO Hispanic Labor Committee, is a member of that panel.

Bargaining has continued on a sporadic basis throughout the strike with the longest session occurring June 18 when the two sides met for four and one-half hours.

Rep. Claude Pepper and Sen. Donald Riegle are applauded at NCSC legislative conference for their pledge on social security.

Air Line Pilots back to work after 29-day strike at United

The Air Line Pilots, ending a 29-day strike against United Airlines, began returning to their jobs at the nation's largest airline.

The return to work followed announcement by the Association of Flight Attendants that it would not hold the pilots to their agreement to remain off the job until AFA members had settled with the company.

About 90 percent of the AFA's 8,000 members at United honored ALPA picket lines, and the Pilots had made their own return to work conditional upon the company's settling with the Flight Attendants.

The AFA said in a statement that because of United's "persistent efforts to negotiate a punitive back-to-work agreement," it was releasing the ALPA from its pledge.

"Signing an agreement that punished the decent men and women who exercised their rights as American citizens to stand up for their principles and honor a legal and justified picket line on our property would clearly not be in the best interest of our members," the AFA said.

"Rather than agree to such terms, we will vigorously litigate and arbitrate the terms and conditions of our return to work."

The ALPA's 27-member Master Executive Council at United subsequently ratified a new four-year agreement in Chicago on June 14. Rank-and-file membership approval is not required under the union's procedures.

While full terms of the agreement were not disclosed, the main economic issues had been made known earlier. A week after the strike began, the parties agreed to a new pay scale under which newly hired pilots would receive 40 percent less than levels provided in the old agreement. The two-tier system would run for ve years after which the issue would be submitted to binding arbitration if the two sides could not reach agreement.

Pay raises

In addition, all pilots will get raises of 9.5 percent over the span of the contract.

Despite that agreement, the return to work was held by the company's insistence on "super seniority" for some 270 non-striking union pilots who crossed the picket lines, ALPA's determination to stand by the flight attendants who honored the lines, and the union's insistence that United hire some 570 new second officers trained by the airline but who refused to work when the strike began May 17.

United recruited thos 570 as "expansion" pilots, then told them 24 hours before the strike they were expected to become strikebreakers. All but a handful refused.

All parties agreed to let a federal district court judge in Chicago decide those issues. A hearing on the legalities began June 17 and was expected to take 10 days before a ruling would be issued.

United, which sought the new two-tier wage schedule to become "cost competitive" with other airlines, sought to maintain flight service during the walkout. Because of the strike's effectiveness, however, the airline was able to mount only about 15 percent of its 1,550 daily flights.

United President James Hartigan said the airline would have virtually all of its schedule resumed by the first of July.

Teachers repel NEA in Detroit landslide vote

Detroit — The Detroit Federation of Teachers beat back a challenge by a decisive 3-1 margin over the Michigan Education Association to retain representation rights for the city's 11,400 public school teachers. The American Federation of Teachers affiliate has represented the Detroit unit since it was first organized 21 years ago.

The MEA, an affiliate of National Education Association, "failed to convince teachers in Detroit that they could represent teachers in an urban school district," said DFT president John Elliot. "All they could offer were promises. The DFT, on the other hand, had a clear record of impressive gains for the teachers."

The victory in Detroit is part of a trend of NEA rejections sweeping through the state. Over the last 18 months, five NEA bargaining units have switched to the Michigan Federation of Teachers, the AFT reported.

On Capitol Hill

Seniors rally against social security freeze

Hundreds of senior citizens from all over the country rallied on Capitol Hill to protest the plan by the Republican-controlled Senate to freeze social security cost-of-living adjustments—a key issue for House and Senate conferees negotiating on the 1986 budget.

Earlier, the House voted 258-170 for a budget that keeps social security intact, while the Senate voted 50-49 to eliminate next year's COLA. The Senate budget also would terminate several vital social programs and drastically reduce others.

A long caravan of buses led by antique cars brought the seniors to the Capitol during a three-day legislative conference of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

They were greeted at the Capitol by seasoned backers of the elderly, including Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.) and Representatives Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Edward Roybal (D-Calif.) and Ronald Wyden (D-Ore.).

Riegle reminded the rally that social security benefits have been cut drastically since the Reagan Administration took office. "You've already done your share," he said. "It's time for those who haven't done their share to reduce the federal deficit."

Administration intent

NCSC President Jacob Clayman, pointing to a 1921 Model T Ford that led the caravan, said, "It's the intention of this Administration to take us back to the time when old people were forced to go to the poor farm."

The elimination of the social security COLA would push 500,000 below the poverty line, he warned.

NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton said the council's members want "to remind Congress that social security cuts do not reduce the deficit in any real way. They are angry that the Senate approved a freeze on their COLA while increasing an already swollen military budget. Seniors want to see the House bill—which reduces the deficit without burdening the elderly—prevail in the budget conference."

In a keynote address to the conference, Senate Minority Leader Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) said efforts by the Republican-controlled Senate to impose large burdens for deficit reduction on elderly Americans is "unfair and unjust."

Unforgivable action

Byrd said it was "unforgivable, after the Congress took the painful steps necessary to set social security on a sound financial footing a few years ago, that the President would propose to cut social security benefits in order to balance deficits appearing elsewhere in the federal budget."

House Rules Committee Chairman Claude Pepper told the seniors that since 1981 the Republicans have been making "the people covered by Medicare pay more and generally get less and less."

He reminded delegates that in 1965 when the Medicare program was enacted by Congress, the elderly of America were paying 20 percent of their own income for their medical care.

of their personal income for their medical care," he said.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.) accused President Reagan of "indulging in wishful thinking" when he said that if a strong bipartisan majority in both the House and Senate demanded a freeze of the social security COLA, he would have to "pay attention to it because that would be a mandate."

President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, who is chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on Union Retirees, accused the Reagan Administration and its right-wing supporters of scheming to "tear down everything the labor movement and the NCSC have struggled so hard to see built. They are trying to roll the clock back to the 1930s."

Grassroots force

He called on delegates to repel the right wing with grassroots power generated by organized and dedicated union retirees.

Winpisinger noted that 22 Senate Republicans are up for re-election in 1986, and "we would all do well to remember how they are trying to steal your money this year and vote them out of office next year."

Other speakers included Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), Representatives Barney Frank (D-Mass.) and Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) and economist Steve Max of Citizen Action.

The conference also made note of several milestone birthdays this year: the 50th of social security; the 20th of Medicare and Medicaid—and the 80th of Jake Clayman, who was president and secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. before becoming president of the NCSC.

already resolved through collective bargaining agreements based on pay equity principles.

Reagan job rights panel abandons pay equity

through a comparison of the value of "dissimilar jobs which command a different wage in the market," the agency asserted.

Unions raising the pay equity issue—in negotiations, EEOC cases and court suits—point out that the task of evaluating jobs for salary purposes is hardly insurmountable and is regularly undertaken in both the private and public sectors of the economy.

The EEOC decision, predictably, was applauded by employer organizations. The National Association of Manufacturers said employers now could "rest easier" in the knowledge that the commission "will not get into the business of determining the inherent worth of jobs."

Rejection of a claim by the EEOC does not preclude the persons or groups affected from bringing court suits alleging illegal sex discrimination, and a number of union-sponsored cases are pending in trial or appellate courts.

Poll finds concern at import-linked job losses

Most Americans think the trade policies pursued by the Reagan Administration are wiping out U.S. jobs, a nationwide poll showed. They would favor limiting imports even if it reduces the choice among products which they can buy.

The United States trade deficit under the Reagan Administration has soared to more than $130 billion annually with Japan accounting for nearly a third of that amount. The May trade deficit with Japan was $3.4 billion.

One-fourth of the 1,509 persons interviewed by telephone in the New York Times/CBS News poll listed the trade deficit as the first or second most important national issue, compared to tax reform, arms control, budget deficit and conflicts in Central America. Seven in 10 felt current trade policies are costing U.S. workers their jobs.

"The majority of Americans think we're being taken to the cleaners," said Mark Anderson, a foreign trade specialist with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research.

Anderson cited lack of access to foreign markets, the effect of an overvalued U.S. dollar and the heavily subsidized exports from a number of developing countries as reasons for the high trade deficit.

The public views the loss of jobs as a heavy impact of current trade policies. Some 47 percent said imports were hurting their communities, and 69 percent believed that foreign trade is costing U.S. workers their jobs. However, 53 percent also said that foreign trade helps the U.S. economy.

Three-fourths of the respondents from the industrial midwestern states of Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio and Wisconsin blamed imports for the loss of jobs.

The phrase "strong dollar" was not fully understood, the poll revealed. Sixty percent of those polled considered it good for U.S. trade.

Seventy percent said that limiting imports is a good idea, and 60 percent still agreed to limiting imports even if it reduced the consumers' choices. Even with the prospect of retaliatory trade measures by America's trading partners, 41 percent of those polled still agreed that imports should be limited.

Asked whether they had ever not bought an item because it was not made in America, 43 percent said "yes," up from 36 percent two years ago.

Commenting on the poll results, former U.S. Trade Representative William D. Eberle noted that the U.S. received 64 percent of all the exports of developing countries, a far higher proportion than other rich countries. The European Economic Community receives 25 percent, Japan 8 percent and the rest of the countries of the world 3 percent.

NLRB backlog thins as pro-employer bias rises

National Labor Relations Board Chairman Donald L. Dotson and NLRB General Counsel Rosemary M. Collyer told a House subcommittee that the board has been reducing its backlog of cases and anticipates further improvement now that it has its full complement of five members.

But union witnesses and members of the House Employment & Housing Subcommittee suggested that one reason for the reduced backlog is that many workers and their unions have given up on the NLRB process because of long delays and a pattern of favoring employers.

Food & Commercial Workers Gen. Counsel George R. Murphy told the House panel that the 50-year-old National Labor Relations Act, which was "intended to promote economic stability in labor-management relations, no longer serves that function."

"We're not using the board anymore except for a few pending cases," Murphy said. "Where we have the economic power, we're going to use it. The union is better off taking the matter straight to the streets with whatever economic power it has. I'd rather be devoured by a shark than nibbled to death by a swarm of minnows," he declared.

"Employers can delay an unfair labor practice proceeding interminably and, consequently, destroy a union organizing campaign through a war of attrition," Murphy told the panel.

He cited examples including:

- The clearly unlawful actions of a California food store in firing its unionized workers and engaging in a "sham sale of the store to a non-union corporation controlled by the same owners." The workers involved have been waiting nearly two and one-half years for justice, he said.
- A refusal to bargain charge that dragged on for four-and-one-half years, by which time it didn't matter since only one of the original union members was still employed at the Texas establishment.

Murphy and Pamela Ames, an official of the American Nurses Association, said organizing health care workers had become much more difficult as a result of a 1984 board decision which limited the definition of what constitutes an appropriate bargaining unit in a health care facility.

Ames, a former organizer for the registered nurses organization, said, "When I organized a group of nurses at a hospital in Middletown, Ohio, in 1979, I never thought I'd be sitting here in 1985 without ever having seen a bargaining table. . . .

"Nurses who enthusiastically organize for collective bargaining purposes one year, but do not reach the negotiating table for five or more years—if ever—lose their interest in the representation process and ultimately their rights."

Dotson said the May 23 confirmation of new board members Wilford Johansen and Marshall Babson will put the board at full strength for the first time since August 1983, which he said will help cut the backlog.

The NLRB's backlog of unfair labor practice and representation cases reached a record of 1,647 in February 1984, but declined to 1,236 as of June 1, Dotson said. He said the board has been using a "speed team" to expedite cases.

Asked by Rep. Sander M. Levin (D-Mich.) about organized labor's view of the Reagan-appointed board as being biased against unions, Dotson replied, "That's nothing new. There always have been people on both sides of the fence who have been dissatisfied with board actions."

Levin then said, "I think the level of disrespect and despair about getting a fair hearing before the board has reached a new height."

Failure to deliver

Subcommittee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) termed the backlog a continuing serious problem despite some improvement. But "working men and women continue to be denied their rights. The government continues to fail to deliver on its promise" to fairly oversee labor-management relations, he charged.

NLRB Gen. Counsel Collyer insisted that "the bones of this operation are sound, even if we may have a few creaking joints."

She said the backlog has been cut largely because the intake of new NLRB cases had fallen nearly 10 percent between the first six months of fiscal 1984 and the first six months of fiscal 1985.

Child care credit called preferable to tax deduction

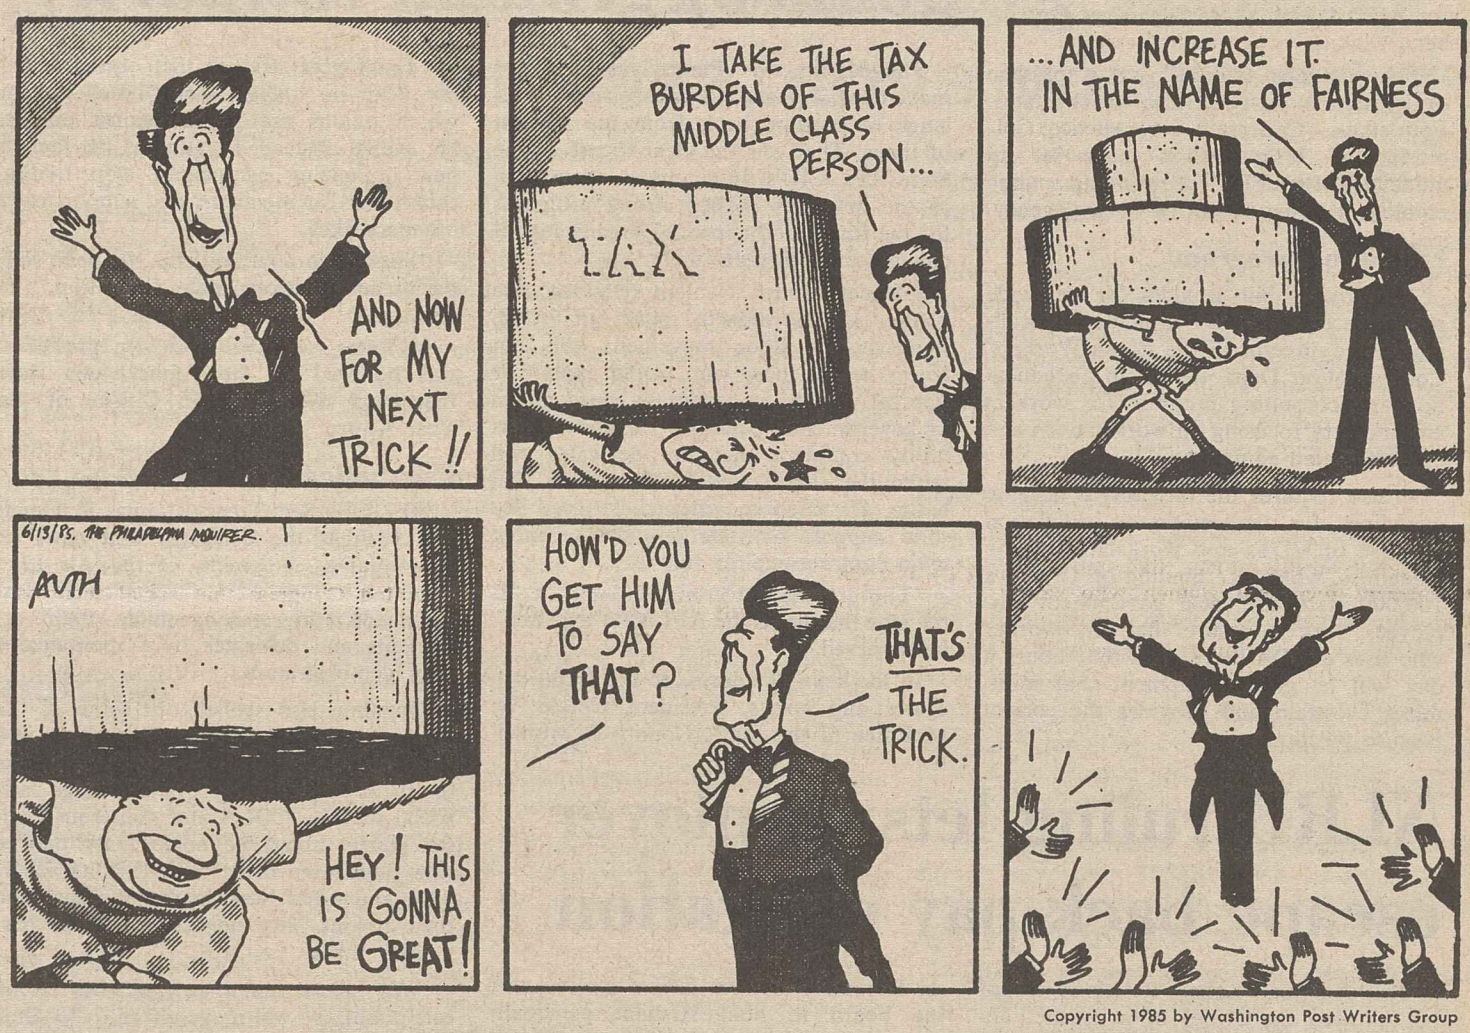
President Reagan's proposal to change the present child care tax credit into a tax deduction would penalize low-income households while providing a bigger tax break for those in higher income brackets, the State, County & Municipal Employees testified at Senate hearings.

The existing credit allows working families to subtract a portion of the child care expenses they incur from the federal income tax they owe. The credit is highest—30 percent—at the lowest income level and drops to a 20 percent credit at incomes of $28,000 and higher. If child care expenses are the same, the low-income working parent now has a bigger tax savings than the higher-income family.

That would be reversed under the Administration proposal, AFSCME pointed out. Stanley Hill, associate director of District 37 in New York City, testified for the national union at a Senate Finance Committee hearing on "low-income issues in the President's tax reform proposal."

Persons who do not itemize returns—a category that includes most lower-income households—would lose all child care tax benefits under the President's plan, Hill noted.

For those who do itemize, the value of the deduction would be highest for persons in the higher income brackets—thus reversing the tilt of present law.



Hill cited the advantage over present law for a high-income household that now can take a maximum tax credit of $960. If the family is in the top 35 percent tax bracket, under the President's proposal for a deduction it would be able to reduce its tax bill by $1,680. But the low-income family "in which child care costs may make the critical difference between being able to work and not being able to work, will get nothing," Hill pointed out.

Bigger bite

The AFSCME testimony welcomed other portions of the Administration bill that would exclude more low-income households from the federal income tax. Nevertheless, the union stressed, the combined income and social security tax would take a bigger share of the earnings of a poverty-level household under the President's proposal than was the case in 1979.

Hill also urged the committee to consider the impact that ending the deductibility of state and local taxes would have on low-income households—even if they are not directly affected because they don't use the long-form tax return.

States whose tax base would be weakened by the loss of deductibility are those which use their resources to provide most adequately for the needy, Hill noted. He cited as an example state-set Aid to Families with Dependent Children grants based on need.

New study to explore effects of VDT rays on pregnancy

New York — Dr. Irving J. Selikoff, an internationally known specialist on workplace health hazards, is investigating what effects radiation from video display terminals may have on pregnancy.

The four-year study will be jointly administered by the Services Employees, the 9to5 National Association of Working Women, and Selikoff, a professor at Mount Sinai School of Medicine, who has conducted major health studies for unions on the hazards of asbestos and vinyl chloride.

In announcing the start of the long-range VDT study, SEIU President John J. Sweeney observed that "what we have here is a potential hazard of enormous proportions." He suggested the study should have been conducted 15 years ago, "when the machines first began flooding workplaces."

Today, more than 10 million office and clerical workers use VDTs.

Research has found that non-ionizing radiation from VDTs is similar to weak pulsed magnetic fields that produce biological defects in chicken embryos.

Selikoff said "we are investigating these questions to answer the legitimate concerns of the millions of office workers who wonder if VDTs pose a reproductive hazard."

The study will involve up to 12,000 volunteers, both VDT-users and a "control group" of non-VDT-users.

The study will be funded by a grant from the March of Dimes. Selikoff's laboratory is supported by the American Cancer Society.

Selikoff is the 1979 recipient of the Murray-Green-Meany Award, the AFL-CIO's highest honor, for his pioneering work in occupational health.

Actors' Equity elects Dewhurst as president

New York—Colleen Dewhurst has been elected President of Actors' Equity Association to succeed Ellen Burstyn, who did not seek re-election. Dewhurst has served on the union's governing council since 1983. Burstyn will serve as fourth vice president.

Other officers elected in the mail balloting for three-year terms are First Vice President Barbara Colton, Second Vice President Mary Lou Westerfield, Third Vice President Patrick Quinn and Recording Sec. Lynn Archer. Fifteen members of Equity's governing council also were elected.

Rail unions seek new accords for 300,000 workers

Unions representing workers employed by the nation's major railroads continued to negotiate for new agreements to replace those that expired a year ago, but little progress was reported.

The 13 unions represent about 300,000 workers on Class I railroads, those with annual operating revenues of $83.5 million or more. They account for about 95 percent of all freight moved in the country.

Bargainers for the United Transportation Union, the largest operating union, were meeting daily with the carriers in talks conducted by the National Mediation Board. Management of the railroads is represented at the bargaining table by the National Railway Labor Conference.

Agreements between the parties became "amendable," or open for renewal, on June 30, 1984. The main unresolved issues are wages and work rules.

Besides the UTU and the Yardmasters, the other unions involved in the negotiations are the Signalmen, Carmen, Maintenance of Way Employes, Railway & Airline Clerks, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, Train Dispatchers, Electrical Workers and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers.

Oregon enacts first state law on VDT safety

Salem, Ore.—Oregon became the first state to enact legislation governing the use of video display terminals when its House of Representatives passed a VDT bill by a 31-29 vote. The Senate had approved the legislation by a near-unanimous vote in February.

The bill must be acted on by Republican Gov. Victor Atiyeh who has been "less than enthusiastic" about it, according to Chuck Mendenhall, director of governmental relations for the Oregon Public Employees Union, a 17,000-member local of the Service Employees.

"The passage of this bill in Oregon is a tremendous breakthrough for the safe and productive use of VDTs across the United States," SEIU Legislative Director Geri Palast said. The SEIU and 9 to 5, National Association of Working Women, jointly pressed for passage of the Oregon VDT bill through their national Campaign for VDT Safety, which began last December.

The campaign's initial goal is passage of legislation or guidelines in 18 states. Four states—California, New Mexico, Colorado and Massachusetts—have set up guidelines for VDT use among public employees either statewide or by agency.

Education program

The Oregon bill provides for statewide education on safe VDT operation by calling on the director of the state's Workers' Compensation Dept. to set up an education and consulting program for workers and industry focusing on workstations and the automated equipment.

It also requires the director to develop guidelines for the purchase, installation and use of VDTs and workstations. The guidelines, which are binding on Oregon's 100,000 state and local government employees, seek to insure that any worker who uses a VDT more than four hours a day will be given equipment that minimizes eyestrain and provides the correct posture position.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee addresses the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO convention which honored him as the state AFL-CIO Citizen of the Year.

Pennsylvania unions shape goals of growth, solidarity

Philadelphia — Pennsylvania's labor movement is ready to take on the challenge of battling back from the hardest of times. That was the clear theme of the State AFL-CIO's 26th annual convention as the delegates shaped strong programs for the future and approved organizational changes to implement them.

President Julius Uehlein reiterated the pledge of the officers report that "the Pennsylvania labor movement will not cower before those who would exploit or oppress workers in corporate board rooms or governmental palaces." He said he was "fully confident that the delegates will ignite the spark" and solidarity for that battle. He cited the immediate need for solid support of state employees whose main contract expires July 1.

"The growing government workforce is the glue that holds the AFL-CIO together," he observed.

In the keynote address to the 1,100 delegates and guests, President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees stressed that organized labor "can no longer afford" situations in which unions are pitted against unions. He called instead for unions to launch new organizing campaigns, stop raiding each other for members, and support each other's strikes.

"More than anything else, we need solidarity and a strong state federation," he declared.

McEntee, an AFL-CIO vice president, was honored by the Pennsylvania state federation with its 1985 Citizen of the Year Award.

Pact hailed

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue brought the delegates first news of the tentative settlement of the Air Line Pilots strike against United Airlines, and he joined with striking pilots, flight attendants and delegates in a spontaneous floor demonstration.

Donahue also spelled out some of the major challenges unions face at the national level. Citing the unrelenting attacks on the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law, social security COLA and numerous critical budget areas, he noted that "they've now added the drive to tax health insurance and other benefits that workers and their unions have negotiated at the bargaining table.

"We face a major struggle, but let no one doubt, we will move ahead," Donahue declared.

John Perkins, national director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, told the delegates the notion that the labor movement was "left for dead" by President Reagan's re-election is "a media myth fostered by syndicated second-guessers."

"We're alive and kicking and feisty . . . and we're in the game for keeps," he declared.

U.S. economy shows signs of weakness

merce Dept. projections have proved overly optimistic in the past.

In the first quarter, for example, the government's flash estimate was for a 2.1-percent increase in real GNP. As additional data flowed in, this figure was revised to 1.3 percent. Subsequent revisions put the figure at seven-tenths of a percent and finally at three-tenths of 1 percent.

The economy grew at an annual rate of 4.3 percent in the final quarter of 1984.

Even if the flash estimate for the April-June period were to hold up, it would be less than the Administration's forecast for all of 1985, an increase of 3.9 percent. Economists generally figure a growth rate of 4 percent is necessary to keep up with an expanding labor force.

Other economic developments that concerned analysts included a sharp 14 percent drop in new housing starts in May, another decline in the use of factory space, and a drop in personal income.

Even this week's half-percent reduction in the prime lending rate that major banks charge their best corporate customers was seen as a sign of the economy's current weakness. While ordinarily a welcome development, the drop in the prime may reflect weaker demand for credit, particularly business loans.

The 14 percent decline in housing starts last month—the sharpest drop in 15 months—reversed a two-month rise. The Commerce Dept. said new starts declined in every region of the country except the Midwest.

Starts were off in both single-family houses and buildings with five or more units. Single-family units were down 10 percent from April's level.

The May decline was the steepest since a 23 percent drop in March 1984. Last month's level of starts was 6.9 percent below that of a year earlier.

Meanwhile, reflecting the decline in the economy's manufacturing sector, the Federal Reserve Board reported that factory capacity utilization fell four-tenths of 1 percent to 80.3 percent in May.

NLRB ruling lets employer escape back-pay obligation

The National Labor Relations Board has allowed the owner of a defunct apparel firm to get off the hook for back pay owed workers he fired illegally in a 1978 organizing drive.

In a 2-to-1 ruling, the board rebuffed its own general counsel who had filed a motion last December to hold Martin Arsham personally liable for some $31,000 in back pay owed the workers. NLRB Chairman Donald Dotson and Member Robert Hunter teamed up against lone dissenter Patricia Diaz Dennis, who charged the unlawfully discharged workers were denied justice.

The case goes back to April 1978 when Local 29 of the Ladies' Garment Workers obtained authorization cards from a majority of the employees of Martin Arsham Sewing Co., a small Cleveland-based firm. The union then sought recognition and bargaining only to run into stiff opposition from Arsham who assembled his 15 employees, and threatened:

"Whoever signed the cards can get their coats and leave." All 15 employees walked out and struck the company.

In a preliminary finding, the board held 18 months later that the workers had been "constructively discharged" because of their support for the union and ordered Arsham to reinstate them with back pay.

Arsham balked, refused to honor the board's order and filed a petition for bankruptcy in December 1981. Three months later, he sold all the assets of the firm to Drape Factory, Inc., for $20,000. Arsham and his wife are the sole owners of Drape Factory.

In December 1984, NLRB Gen. Counsel Rosemary Collyer filed a motion with the board to hold Arsham personally liable for the back-pay payments, reasoning that Arsham had converted his firms's assets to his own personal use and intermingled his personal and corporate funds with the intention of avoiding payment of back pay. Dotson and Hunter said they found no evidence to show that the workers had been prejudiced by Arsham's various legal and financial maneuvers, or that he had caused the firm to go into bankruptcy.

Hearing denied

Member Dennis saw things differently, arguing that at the very least the board should grant Collyer's request for a hearing on the matter.

"My colleagues once again mount a defense for an employer that does not bother to present its own," she said. "This time, however, my colleagues not only put on the employer's defense but also deny the general counsel a chance to rebut it.

"While I believe the defenses are legally without merit, I find most disturbing the majority's refusal to accord the general counsel an opportunity to address them," she said.

"In their zeal to both raise and adopt Arsham's possible defenses, Chairman Dotson and Member Hunter summarily deny justice to the discriminatees whom Arsham unlawfully discharged in a mass firing seven years ago.

"If there is allegedly 'insufficient evidence' on the present record to find Arsham personally liable, there is certainly no evidence in Arsham's favor."

back away from its responsibility to protect the health and safety of these youths as well as their educational and social opportunities," Zalusky said.

FLSA protections would be lacking for the young worker at a number of concessions and for subcontractors whose gross annual revenues don't meet the $362,500 standard for interstate commerce.

State and local safeguards also are in question since concessionaires and subcontractors often contend they are exempt from those regulations because they operate their businesses in federal enclaves.

"By simply contracting out and lifting the ban on child labor, the Park Service is walking away from its responsibility," the federation statement said.

10,000-member union joins CWA

New York — The Communications Workers welcomed the decision of the 10,000-member United Telephone Workers to join the CWA ranks, saying the move strengthens both organizations.

The independent UTW, which this spring disaffiliated from the Telephone International Union, a non-AFL-CIO union, represents about 8,000 New York telephone workers and some 1,800 employees of AT&T Information Systems (AT&TIS).

In balloting completed June 14, UTW members voted 3 to 1 to merge with CWA. The vote was 3,841 to 1,243. The UTW becomes part of CWA District 1, which is headquartered here and covers New England, New York, and New Jersey.

UTW members sell equipment in phone stores, write orders, and carry out billing operations.

UTW President Vincent Messina said the vote culminated a three-year effort to affiliate with CWA "and we are very happy to be a part of the mainstream of the labor movement." He added: "As part of the CWA, we will be in a very strong position as we prepare for bargaining in 1986 with both New York Tel and AT&TIS."

The unaffiliated Telephone International Union has lost large locals in Pennsylvania and Connecticut in recent months.

A Purpose to Politics

THERE ARE powerful forces in this country that want labor's mission confined to collective bargaining, at most. They want us to retreat from the political arena, leaving that field exclusively to them.

Some who aspire to leadership in the Democratic Party are proposing that the party further distance itself from its natural and most vital constituency—that it turn a cold shoulder on labor, on the minorities, and on women's issues.

Their apparent formula for electoral success is to stake out a piece of the conservative field and call it the new center.

They want to move to something vaguely defined as the "middle of the road."

Somehow I had always thought that the path of political progress, like other highways, worked best when the middle of the road was reserved for dividing lines and not for heavy traffic.

The proponents of this new course claim to speak for the great middle class. But they insult the middle class by defining it as those who have it made and don't give a damn for those who are still struggling for a piece of the pie or a place in the sun.

Well, we know what the middle class really is. This labor movement is the engine that has been moving people into the middle class for a hundred years. And we are still doing that.

IT IS ALSO our business to keep those who have made it into the middle class from falling or being pushed out of it. That, too, is labor's mission.

If we allowed ourselves to be pushed out of politics, not just one party but both parties would be controlled by the bankers, the oil barons, and the admen, lawyers, consultants and lobbyists for corporate greed.

Labor is the only force in American life whose mission is to make sure that those who don't have enough power are not kicked around by those who have too much.

We give a purpose to politics that is beyond the comprehension of those who lust after the pleasures of power for its own sake, or who see politics as the road to personal gain.

We are the main line of defense for the plain people of this country who are not trying to live high on the hog at the expense of their neighbors—who are just trying to pay the mortgage, put food on the table, and get their kids through school.

That's why we intend to stay in politics.

Pension Pickpockets

AS ANYONE who has ever negotiated a contract can testify, there is no free lunch at the bargaining table.

In the give-and-take of negotiations, tradeoffs are inevitably made. An employer's pay proposal is sweetened and a union drops a bid for an additional paid holiday. Or workers make clear that this is the year to upgrade pension benefits, even if it means passing up a pay raise that otherwise would be obtainable.

When certain employer costs go up, as with premiums on health insurance, both parties are aware that this will be a factor in the next round of bargaining. And the condition of a pension fund obviously is going to influence a decision on whether to raise pensions for retirees as well as those who will retire in the future.

Because of a period of high interest rates, a number of employer-financed pension plans have built up assets that are greater than needed to assure payment of promised benefits. To a disturbing degree, employers have been shutting down pension plans, paying off workers with annuities to cover benefits they have already earned, and pocketing the difference. For some large corporations, the windfall amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Morally, workers have a clear claim to a voice in the disposition of funds set aside for their retirement. But until the moral obligation is matched by a legal obligation, employers will continue to take advantage of the loophole in the pension protection law.

That's why the law needs to be changed.

OSHA shirking its duty at hazardous waste sites

By Press Associates, Inc.

In January 1984, an electric equipment manufacturer's warehouse in Jacksonville, Fla., exploded, setting on fire materials containing polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs).

Exposure to PCBs has been linked to reproductive problems, nervous system and liver damage and possible liver and pancreas cancer. PCBs easily enter the body through the lungs and skin.

At high temperatures, PCBs break down into equally hazardous chemicals, such as dioxins. Because of these hazards to humans and the environment from inert PCBs, the Environmental Protection Agency banned their production in 1977.

Despite these dangers, fire fighters called to the warehouse fire site were not informed about the presence of PCBs, according to Richard Duffy, the Fire Fighters' health and safety director. PCBs can easily penetrate the neoprene protective clothing commonly used by fire fighters.

Duffy told a House Government Operations subcommittee that after the fire, dayworkers were hired to clean up the site "without any formal training whatsoever."

Such examples from the IAFF, AFL-CIO, Teamsters and other expert witnesses led the panel to conclude that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration is failing in its responsibility to protect workers in the large and growing hazardous waste industry.

Inadequate inspection

The blistering report unanimously adopted by the panel described OSHA inspection programs for toxic waste sites as "grossly inadequate."

OSHA inspected only six Superfund sites and 11 non-Superfund hazardous waste sites in fiscal 1984, out of thousands of potentially dangerous sites. Most of the inspections of non-Superfund sites were "partial" rather than "comprehensive," the panel noted.

What Subcommittee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) called OSHA's "Catch-22" inspection system for hazardous waste sites was denounced by the panel as "irrational and wholly unsatisfactory." Former OSHA chief Robert A. Rowland testified that OSHA targets inspections based on industries' and employers' safety and health records. But, because the toxic waste industry has not been inspected regularly, there is no record on which to base future inspection targeting, so it gets left out of OSHA's targeting system.

Stiff requirements

Testimony from Teamsters working at waste sites documented how OSHA apparently requires a dead body before it will respond to complaints. The blinding of a worker by caustic soda from a burst pipe was not enough to bring OSHA inspectors on site.

This portrait of OSHA's current inaction is especially appalling when the potential exposure of workers in what are by definition the nation's most toxic worksites is considered.

The lowest estimate of abandoned toxic waste sites is more than 20,000. With an estimated 50 workers required to clean up an average site, one million jobs may be involved.

Without proper protections, these workers could be exposed to chemicals that cause cancer, reproductive damage and a host of other serious health problems.

Given the potential growth of the industry, it also would seem apparent that OSHA must respond to labor's demand for a comprehensive standard governing toxic waste sites that includes continuous training, engineering controls, work practice rules specfic to cleanup, medical and exposure monitoring and assessment, and expanded right-to-know rules.

OSHA has shirked its duty to protect hazardous waste site workers for too many years. A good faith start by OSHA's new leadership would include these protections among the agency's highest priorities.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Rich Get Even Richer Under Reagan Tax Plan

Statistics released by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities show that the wealthy will fare much better than others if the President's tax plan is adopted. While the average wage earning family may notice a slight reduction in taxes, it should be noted that those who traditionally itemize deductions or take the two income earner deduction will likely be paying more in taxes, not less.

Plant Closing Bill, Double Breasting Leg. Slated For Mark-Up

H.R. 700, the important civil rights bill that would restore federal bans against discrimination, has been voted out of the House Education and Labor Committee. However, the committee adopted amendments that deal with federal funding of abortions which could seriously damage the bill's chances for passage.

The House Judiciary Committee also reported out H.R. 700, but did not address this volatile subject.

It has been the intent of Congress in passing civil rights legislation over the past 20 years that institutions which accept federal money not be allowed to use that money in situations where discrimination on the basis of race, sex, age or physical disability exists. However, in 1984, the Supreme Court weakened these statutes in its now famous Grove City decision.

H.R. 700 is simply a bill to correct this Supreme Court interpretation. It is a civil rights bill; other issues should be taken up under normal legislative procedures, not added to H.R. 700. Urge your member of Congress to support H.R. 700 from the House Judiciary Committee without substantive change.

Do Consumers Pay When Corporations Are Taxed?

While the President's tax package is being debated in Congress, many conservatives are pushing the idea that corporations shouldn't be taxed at all. "Corporations don't pay taxes, people do" can be overheard at cocktail parties throughout the nation's capital these days, "After all," they say, "it only adds to consumer prices."

It's enough to make one stop and think, but not for long. Closer examination of some of our largest corporations shows that many of the most successful companies are also paying the most in taxes --and isn't this how it's supposed to be?

During the period 1981-83, the Whirlpool Corporation paid approximately 46 percent of its profits in taxes, while General Electric, its chief competitor, not only paid no taxes, but received hundreds of millions of dollars in refunds from the U.S. Treasury. In the showrooms, however, Whirlpool products are no more expensive than GE's.

In the oil industry, Exxon paid 34 percent of its 1983 profits in taxes, Mobil, 6 percent and Texaco received a tax refund. Yet, the price at the pump again is virtually the same for all three. So where is the impact of taxation?

Today, corporations are paying only about 8.5 percent of the nation's total tax load. But this was not always the case. During the 1950's and 60's, when the economy was setting records for economic growth and the stock market was booming, corporations were paying more than 25 percent of all taxes collected. It was largely the Reagan tax act of 1981, experts report. that accelerated the reduction in taxes paid by corporations down to a mere trickle, while guess who was picking up the slack? Families and individuals! Meanwhile, this loss of revenue from large corporations and the wealthy is in a large part to blame for the swelling federal deficit that now threatens the very future of our children.

Since it was the President who engineered this huge shift in taxes away from corporations, we can be sure of one thing: the final tax bill - if it survives - will undoubtedly suffer heavy pressure from lobbyists and rewriting of the provisions that would restore corporate taxes back to pre-Reagan levels.

Amendment Threatens Civil Rights Measure

Mark-ups are scheduled in the House for two important worker bills. H.R. 1616, a bill sponsored by Reps. Clay, Ford and Conte to deal with the tragedy of plant closings and H.R. 281, a measure that would halt the spread of damaging double breasting by contractors. Both are slated for mark-up July 26 in the House Labor-Management Subcommittee of the Education and Labor Committee. The plant closing bill is also slated for mark-up on the same date in the Employment Opportunity Subcommittee.

As of this week, the Clay bill on double breasting had over 130 cosponsors, and proponents are well on their way to securing a floor date. The bill would require that unionized contractors apply all provisions of their collective bargaining agreement to both union and non-union parts of their operations. This would effectively halt the practice where some companies spin off a new, non-union arm to bid against itself.

The plant closing bill would go a long way toward remedying the damage that many communities and workers suffer. It would require a company to give 90 days notice before closing a plant or making permanent layoffs. The Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service would serve as arbitrator to help work out a solution between workers and owners, and it would establish a National Commission on Plant Closings and Worker Dislocation that would study the problem in depth and make recommendations for new solutions to Congress.

Senator Paul Simon (D-IL) is expected to introduce a companion bill to H.R. 1616 in the U.S. Senate soon.

You Couldn't Pay Me To Do That

U.S. fast-food operations are paying their employees above the federal minimum wage of $3.35/hr. on the average and are having trouble finding any takers, a recent Bureau of National Affairs survey reports. Nevertheless, Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT), with the backing of the White House, wants a new law lowering the minimum wage for teenage workers -- a measure he claims will induce businesses to create new jobs.

Provisions in existing law allow restaurants and other small businesses to pay $2.85/hr., to their young workers. The Administration is proposing that this be dropped to $2.50. Meanwhile, these fast-food companies are now paying an average of $3.59/hr. for full-time help and can't fill their positions. Several of the restaurants surveyed are paying bonuses to their employees who bring others in to work.

Perhaps Burger King would pay the Senator from Utah a bonus if he could round up a few unwitting youngsters - but not at the minimum wage!

Pease Bill Would Save Trade Adjustment Assistance Before September Deadline

The House Ways and Means Committee has begun hearings to save the critical Trade Adjustment Assistance program which compensates workers whose jobs have been destroyed by imports. Slated to expire in September under the Reagan budget, the program is meager but vital first aid for the massive injury and job loss that millions of Americans have already suffered -- much lately the result of the U.S. $123 billion trade deficit.

What America really needs, the AFL-CIO maintains, is an expanded program that covers workers employed by independent suppliers of parts and services with more liberal standards and simplified procedures that would maximize the program's impact. But first it must be saved from extinction.

What you can do: Write your congressman and senators today, urging them to work for passage of H.R. 1926, the bill sponsored by Rep. Donald J. Pease (D-OH) in the House and S. 23, a similar measure sponsored by Senators Moynihan (D-NY) and Heinz (R-PA) in the Senate.

Plant closing, contract bills gain support

Two bills high on labor's legislative priority list won subcommittee approval, clearing the way for action by the full House Education & Labor Committee.

One measure, pressed by building trades unions, would curb "double-breasted" operations by contractors who set up non-union subsidiaries to avoid complying with union agreements to which they are a party. The subcommittee-approved Construction Industry Contract Security measure would require contractors to apply provisions of a collective bargaining agreement to all their operations.

The other bill, of special importance to industrial unions, would require firms to provide at least a 90-day notice of a plant closing or the permanent layoff of 50 or more workers. If workers were represented by a union, the employer would be obligated to provide all relevant information related to the closure decision and discuss alternatives that might save jobs.

Each of the bills has more than 100 co-sponsors. Both were acted on favorably by the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, whose chairman William L. Clay (D-Mo.) is a principal cosponsor. The Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities, headed by Rep. Matthew G. Martinez (D-Calif.), shared jurisdiction over the bill and approved it the same day.

Although the plant-closing measure was introduced with bipartisan support, with Rep. Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.) as a principal sponsor, the subcommittee divided along party lines on the bill.

Task force planned

Members of both parties, however, welcomed a letter from Labor Sec. William E. Brock declaring his intention to set up a task force with labor, management and congressional representation to study problems of plant closings and worker dislocation, and make recommendations. One of the provisions would establish a bipartisan National Commission on Plant Closings to develop policies to avoid shutdowns and assist affected workers.

Congressional action on legislation to curb double-breasted contractor operations was a major goal of more than 3,000 delegates to the national legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. held in April.

Clay, in his address to the conference, gave this succinct description of the bill: "Simply, it says that no legal loophole will be allowed which permit those contractors who have entered into a collective bargaining agreement to weasel out of it."

Building trades unions see the legislation as restoring the original intent of Congress to give prehire agreements in the construction industry the same status as collective bargaining agreements in other types of employment. The bill would prevent employers from repudiating prehire agreements without a decertification election.

Immigration measure falls short on fairness

Carl Perkins remembered

Senate panel asked to work for consensus

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue welcomed a new attempt by Congress to shape effective immigration reform legislation, but said a bill being considered by a Senate Judiciary subcommittee fails the test of fairness.

Donahue said the AFL-CIO favors legislation that would:

- Prohibit the employment of undocumented workers and penalize employers who hire them.
- Strictly forbid employment discrimination on the basis of national origin or resident legal alien status, with effective penalties for violations.
- Set up a generous amnesty plan so that aliens who came across the border illegally but have established roots in the United States can obtain legal residence status.
- Strictly limit employer use of temporary foreign workers brought into the United States.

Safeguards inadequate

Donahue praised the enforcement mechanism of the bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.). It would penalize employers who hire illegal aliens, with fines mounting for repeat offenses.

But he expressed disappointment—and disagreement—with other sections of the Simpson bill. It doesn't adequately shield persons legally in the United States from employment discrimination, Donahue noted. That's been a serious concern to many Hispanics and other identifiable minority groups.

Also, Donahue protested, it would defer a legalization program for persons already in this country until a presidential commission certifies that the flow of illegal immigration has been stopped.

While the bill would let undocumented workers continue in the jobs they now hold, they would be barred from new employment. Thus their present employers "would

New York hotel strike settled with major gains

New York—Employees of 53 of the city's busiest hotels celebrated the end of their four-week strike with a huge rally at Madison Square Garden, where they voted overwhelmingly to ratify a new five-year contract.

The agreement, which won unanimous approval of the nine-union Hotel & Motel Trades Council's 475-member wage and policy committee, provides wage increases totaling 30 percent and substantial improvements in benefits.

"It's a great victory," Council President Vito J. Pitta said. "We got 85 percent of what we wanted."

The council, which represents 25,000 workers at 165 hotels, limited the strike to 53 luxury hotels.

Besides an average 6-percent annual wage increase, the five-year agreement provides significant improvements in pension payments and a number of new benefits, including a college scholarship fund for children of hotel workers.

Some 16,000 workers are covered by the contract. They include waiters, house keepers, bellhops, reservations clerks, chefs, bartenders and other hotel service workers.

The accord was signed June 26, and received the unanimous approval of the 25-member board of the Hotel Association of New York, the industry group that negotiated for the hotel owners.

Workers began returning to their jobs

'Not on hazard list'

Fireworks blast shakes OSHA

Hallett, Okla.—The Occupational Safety & Health Administration was unaware of the existence of the Aerlex Corp. fireworks plant here that exploded June 25, killing 21 workers, mainly teenagers hired to aid in filling the orders for Fourth of July fireworks displays.

Davis Layne, deputy regional administrator for OSHA in Dallas, said the agency had never inspected the fireworks plant. "We didn't have any record or indication that the facility existed. It's not on our high-hazard list at all," Layne said.

An explosion at the plant six years ago leveled two buildings, but no workers were injured. That blast was attributed to reflections of sunlight from an automobile mirror which investigators said ignited a fire. Workers had enough warning then to escape after the initial alarm.

Jim Brown, OSHA's area director in Oklahoma City, Okla., said the company was not required to report the explosion six years ago "because there were not five people hospitalized and no one was killed." He added, "We haven't inspected. We didn't know it existed."

The Aerlex plant has been producing powerful fireworks that are used in aerial displays for a dozen years. It employed more than 10 percent of Hallett's 200 residents.

Layne pointed out that OSHA is responsible for inspecting such plants along with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms. The BATF is concerned with the storage of explosives used at the plant, while OSHA's responsibility covers the workers' safety in the manufacturing end, Layne said.

BATF inspected the plant last February and determined that it was operating safely.

Press reports noted that some of the victims were under 18 years of age. Spokesman Bob Cuccia of the Labor Dept.'s Employment Standards Administration said it is illegal to hire workers under age 18 to manufacture aerial fireworks.

Three of the five buildings at the site were leveled by the blast that threw some of the bodies more than 200 yards. Mary Lewis, whose house trailer less than a mile from the site was shifted off its foundation, said, "They worked until late at night, and then started again real early in the morning to make all of the fireworks."

A BATF spokesman said plants like the one at Hallett use explosive black powder for aerial displays and even a slight change in temperature can make it unstable.

Hedging on CPI

New York—The bulls and the bears of Wall Street are having fun these days with a new gadget—a futures contract based on movement of the government's consumer price index.

The CPI futures primarily represent a hedge against inflation. Put another way, the Coffee, Sugar & Cocoa Exchange, which handles the sales, is running what amounts to a legalized gambling operation.

The players in this case are the big money rollers. Sellers are speculators such as real estate developers, banks or businesses that have borrowed heavily and are concerned that future inflation may not be as high as they had counted on. Prospective buyers include managers of pension funds, individual retirement accounts, Keough, 401k and annuity plans who fear rising inflation may depreciate their assets.

Trading in the new CPI futures began June 21. In the first three days, the exchange traded 103 of the CPI contracts.

Originally, the exchange asked permission of the government to deal in other data, including changes in monthly housing starts and banks' prime lending rates. But it settled for trading in CPI data for the time being, after the Commodity Futures Trading Commission okayed its request in April.

Trading in the CPI futures contracts no sooner got off the ground than Commissioner Janet L. Norwood of the Bureau of Labor Statistics announced new safeguards to prevent leakage of the BLS price data each month.

"This is the first time that a federally produced general purpose statistic is being sold on an exchange in the same way as grain, pork bellies, or anything else," Norwood told reporters.

If the bulls and the bears of Wall Street have their way, it won't be the last.

IMF comparison finds value of American pay continues to lead world

American workers put in fewer hours to pay for basic food and shelter needs than nearly any other group of workers around the world.

That's the essence of a new report of the International Metalworkers' Federation comparing the purchasing power of workers' time in various countries.

The conclusion that Americans work fewer hours to buy the same item than other workers worldwide holds up in each of the five specific industries surveyed by the IMF. The industries are steel, shipbuilding, auto, electrical engineering and mechanical engineering.

Besides the United States, the countries surveyed were Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, West Germany, Great Britain, Ireland, Italy, Japan, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, the Philippines, India, Indonesia, South Korea, Malaysia, Hong Kong, Bangladesh, Mauritius, New Caledonia, Brazil, Mexico, Trinidad & Tobago, Chile, Peru, Venezuela, Colombia, Kenya and Zimbabwe.

The report, which compares average net hourly earnings of members of IMF affiliates in 1984, is based on a method of calculating "purchasing power parities" developed by West Germany's federal statistics office. The method is a system showing rates of exchange between the Deutschmark and currencies of other nations.

"One of the objectives of an international comparison of net earnings is to determine differences in standards of living between workers performing the same quantity and quality of work—differences resulting from gaps in the purchasing power of their incomes," the IMF observed.

The IMF is the largest of the international trade union secretariats, which group workers according to trade or industry. The IMF has some 160 affiliated unions representing about 12 million workers in 70 countries.

The 55-page report, which may be obtained by writing the IMF at its Geneva headquarters, lists the working time in hours and minutes that were required last year to buy various consumer items. The categories include food, clothing, gasoline, rent, durable consumer goods such as autos and television sets, as well as taxes.

Net earnings

The survey defines net hourly earnings as the average hourly wage after deduction of workers' social security contributions.

In almost every category, the United States was clearly ahead of other countries. The average American steelworker, for instance, has to work only 12 hours and 45 minutes to buy a man's woolen suit whereas Swiss workers must put in 18 hours and 45 minutes, Swedes 31½ hours, Italians 33 hours and 45 minutes, and Japanese 28½ hours.

An American steelworker puts in only 29 hours to buy a 10-inch color TV set, compared to 140 hours in Sweden, 101 in the Netherlands, 69 in Australia, 45 in Canada, and 4,107 in Kenya.

While Americans generally bought their automobiles cheaper than other peoples of the world, some countries beat them out. The U.S. steelworker needed to work 680 hours for a car, while in Canada, the average steelworker worked only 639 hours to buy the comparable automobile; in Japan, the time was 482 hours, and in Luxemborg, 616 hours. All other countries surveyed showed longer times than the U.S. rate.

Real earnings of workers down for month and year

Workers' buying power tumbled in May for the second straight month, largely the result of a decline in average weekly hours worked.

The three-tenths of 1 percent drop over the month in real, or inflation-adjusted, wages of nonfarm production and nonsupervisory employees also reflected a two-tenths of 1 percent rise in the government's Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W).

Average hours worked per week fell three-tenths of 1 percent in May, the same as in April. It was another sign of steady deterioration in the nation's industrial base. The Bureau of Labor Statistics also reported a two-tenths of 1 percent decline in average weekly earnings in May, which further reduced purchasing power.

Inflation factor

The average factory worker in May grossed $299.25 a week, but after inflation since 1977 was taken into account the average take-home weekly pay was only $171.10.

Over the year, workers' real earning power was off 1.4 percent, BLS said. Last month's drop was the fifth consecutive month in which over-the-year purchasing power was down.

Both BLS's consumer price guides—CPI-W and the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U)—rose by two-tenths of 1 percent last month. CPI-W is used in figuring increases in certain payments such as social security under federal programs.

Three major components of the indexes—transportation, food, and clothing—posted declines in May. Only housing showed price acceleration.

The two-tenths of 1 percent rise in transportation costs reflected smaller increases in gasoline prices and declines in new and used car prices. Gas at the pump rose by five-tenths of 1 percent, compared with a sharp increase of 3.1 percent in April.

New car prices declined by two-tenths of 1 percent while used car prices dropped 1.4 percent. Food prices fell two-tenths of 1 percent, mainly the result of lower prices for meat, poultry, fish, eggs, fruits and vegetables.

The surge in housing costs—six-tenths of 1 percent over the month—reflected sharp increases in homeowner costs and rents.

Steelworkers press efforts to keep LTV coke ovens hot

Aliquippa, Pa.—The Steelworkers won agreement from LTV Corp. to cooperate in a study to determine whether the company's coke, iron and steelmaking operations here can be independently operated.

Nevertheless, at a June 25 meeting of company officials and a coalition of union, community and political leaders, LTV said it would proceed with its planned shutdown.

The firm began shutting down the coke plant the next day. It plans to end the iron and steelmaking operations in July. Some 900 more jobs will be lost by the closings.

Rich Vallecorsa, president of USWA Local 121 said the company agreed to cooperate, to keep its doors and its books open.

"LTV isn't U.S. Steel" he stressed, in reference to a similar situation at U.S. Steel's Dorothy Six blast furnace at its Duquesne Works. There, the company refused to aid in the feasibility study and refuted its findings. But U.S. Steel is working with the union in efforts to find a buyer for the Duquesne facility.

At the June 25 meeting with LTV officials, the union officers were joined by community leaders, representatives of Pennsylvania's U.S. Senators, several state legislators, county commissioners and the mayors of Pittsburgh and Aliquippa.

A group of Western Pennsylvania representatives asked House Democrats to help them get up to $350,000 in state money for the feasibility study.

Coke plant the key

Vallecorsa, who suggested the meeting with LTV, told the coalition and the company, "We can't predict what will happen to steelmaking or steel markets, but our steelworkers want to make steel and we believe Aliquippa Works still has a future and we can save the coke plant.

"We did everything humanly possible to keep it open," Vallecorsa said. "We did everything the company wanted—remanned departments, went from single craft to multi-crafts. It's the high volume of imports and (LTV's) merger with Republic Steel—that's what shut it down."

He explained that the plant is being shut down from "hot idle" to "cold idle," a move that could damage the inside brick oven lining if not done properly.

"I would have preferred for it to remain on hot idle during the study period," Vallecorsa said. The coke plant produced coke for use in steelmaking and a gas byproduct that was used in the rest of the mill.

The layoff of the 900 steelworkers will drop employment at the Aliquippa works to around 700, Vallecorsa said, down from a high of some 10,000 in 1981.

The plant produced nearly 3 million tons of steel per year at its peak. Now it produces none. Vallecorsa said that only the 14-inch mill, which makes small beams and other products, and the tin plate department, remain open.

Leather Goods leader Ralph Cennamo dies

Bridgeport, Conn.—Ralph Cennamo, president of the Leather Goods, Plastics & Novelty Workers, died of cancer June 26 at his home here. He had been seriously ill for the past year.

Cennamo, who was 66, had been secretary-treasurer for seven years before he was elected president in 1982. Earlier, he served as organizing director and as an international representative. He had been a member of the LGPN since 1937.

In a message to his wife Ann, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue described Cennamo as "a staunch trade unionist and a leader who fully earned the trust and affection of the members of the union he served for nearly a half-century."

In addition to his wife, survivors include three children. Funeral services were scheduled June 29 at St. Raphael Church in Bridgeport.

Congress deadlocked on budget

A House-Senate conference on the shape of next year's federal budget broke up over Republican insistence that social security recipients give up their cost-of-living increase and that military spending be further increased.

Negotiators for the Republican-controlled Senate formally broke off efforts to reconcile the differences in the budget resolutions passed by the two congressional bodies. Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) said his side would not return to the conference table unless the House was willing to agree to at least some cut in the COLA or social security and government retirement plans.

House conferees had offered to allow military spending to rise in line with inflation as the Senate had sought. In effect, it would have provided a COLA for the Defense Dept. as well as for social security recipients and federal retirees. But the tradeoff was rejected by the Senate side.

House Budget Committee Chairman William H. Gray III (D-Pa.) told the Senate negotiators that the House is firmly set against cutting back inflation protection for social security beneficiaries.

The conference had made little progress on other issues in disagreement before the breakup. Both versions projected savings of more than $50 billion over the cost of continuing present programs unchanged. The Senate would do so by sharp cuts in most domestic programs and outright abolition of some. The House would trim less deeply on the domestic side but freeze the military budget.

Congress will be in recess during the week of Independence Day, returning July 8. Despite the announced breakup, there was speculation that a new effort at budget reconciliation would be made, whether in formal session or otherwise.

Failure of Congress to agree on budget goals would not prevent the normal course of congressional appropriations and authorization bills. The House and Senate could, if they choose, abide by the spending restrictions and priorities set in their respecticive budget resolutions.

While the White House expressed the hope that a conference agreement on budget restrictions can still be worked out, several participants in the negotiations faulted President Reagan for contributing to the breakdown by resisting any significant compromise on the part of the Senate. To the Reagan Administration, the budget fight is at least as much on behalf of a conservative philosophy of curtailment of the role of government as over the budget savings to be achieved.

Role of OPIC seen factor in flight of jobs

The Overseas Private Investment Corp. has done more harm than good and should be abolished, the AFL-CIO urged.

OPIC was set up by Congress to encourage U.S. firms to invest in less-developed nations by offering insurance protection against risks arising out of unsettled conditions or civil strife.

But the effect, AFL-CIO Economist Mark A. Anderson testified, has been to encourage a flight of jobs and capital out of the United States.

Anderson's statement to the House Foreign Affairs Committee stressed the sharp growth in the U.S. trade deficit and warned that the continuation and expansion of OPIC sought in pending legislation would aggravate this country's economic problems.

America's workers are continually told of the need to make the United States more competitive, Anderson noted—often "in the form of demands for reduced wages and poorer working conditions." Meanwhile, the U.S. government refuses to follow the example of other nations that use various forms of subsidies and industrial targeting to gain an advantage.

Negative role

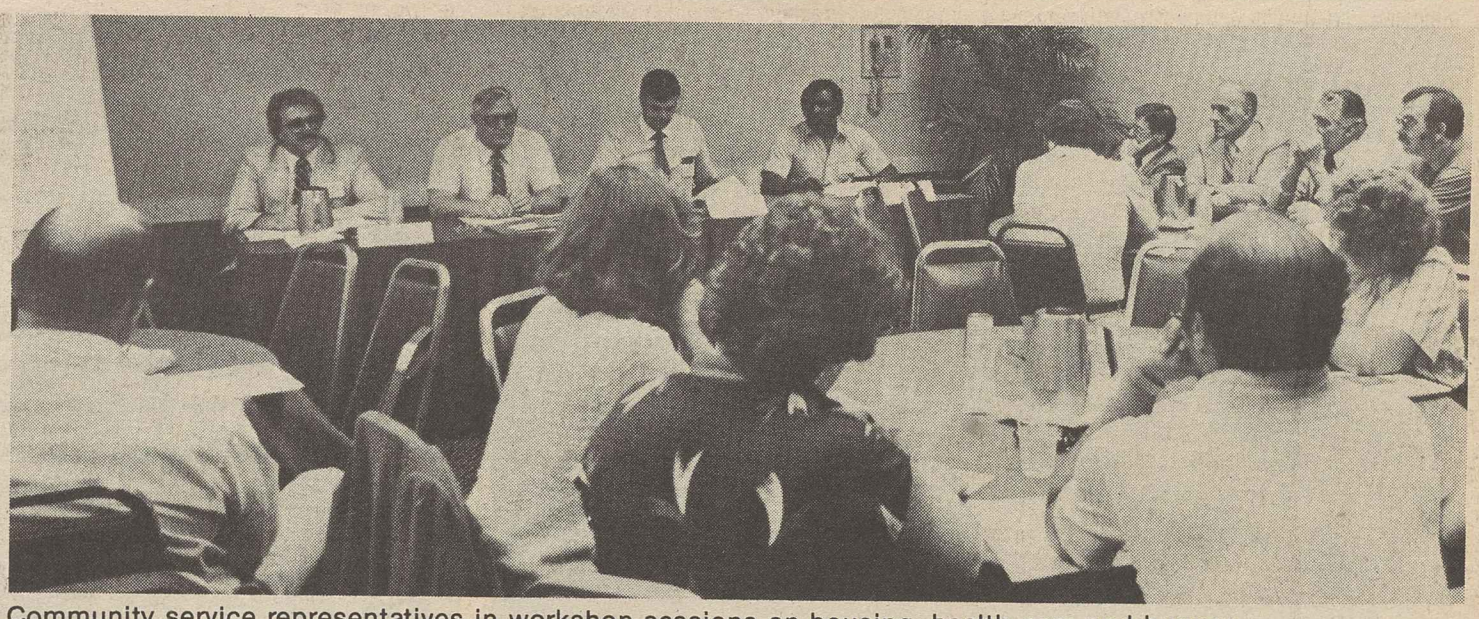
But by providing a government subsidy through OPIC, Anderson said, "the U.S. is intervening in the market." The purpose of the intervention, however, isn't to help industry. On the contrary, he noted, OPIC's role is "to neutralize a significant domestic advantage—the stable and democratic environment in America."

When it last renewed the program, Congress directed OPIC not to assist any investment "likely to cause a significant reduction in the number of employees in the U.S." But "OPIC is not fulfilling these obligations," Anderson charged.

The AFL-CIO statement also expressed concern at the lack of consideration of the effects of OPIC projects on human rights.



One bill before the committee would expand OPIC insurance coverage to include "loss due to business interruption."

Would that mean that the United States is going to offer a form of "international strike insurance?" the AFL-CIO statement speculated.

UTU ousts Teamsters at Long Island Railroad

New York—The United Transportation Union ousted the Teamsters as representative of 820 maintenance of way employees of the Long Island Railroad, the National Mediation Board announced.

In the NMB-supervised representation election, the UTU drew 459 votes to 161 for the Teamsters. The IBT had represented the LIRR track crews since July 1979.

Community service representatives in workshop sessions on housing, health care and hunger.

Community Services conference focuses on good neighbor policy

By Candice Johnson

Boston—Participants in the AFL-CIO Community Services national conference exchanged ideas and searched for new ways to lessen the hardships of growing numbers of working poor and jobless Americans.

More than 350 labor community service specialists from across the country attended the four-day session, with workshops and discussions focusing on health care, housing and food needs.

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Frank Emig said in his keynote address that labor should be proud of its years of service to union members and their neighbors. "Labor's interests extend far beyond our own ranks, and our community programs demonstrate the concern organized labor has for all citizens, in our country and in other countries that need our help."

Economy faulted

Emig said current economic conditions are to blame for millions of Americans living in poverty, who are "denied food, shelter and medical needs." He urged the community services workers to "respond to this changing situation with our strengths and knowledge."

Boston Mayor Raymond L. Flynn welcomed the participants to the city and applauded their continuing compassion and good works in communities throughout the nation.

Flynn criticized the Reagan Administration's tax plan, warning that working families and the poor would bear the brunt of the Reagan program.

He noted organized labor's historic role in "uplifting people and fighting for shelter, food and job opportunities," stressing that advocacy must continue. "Our job is to make certain we close the gap between rich and poor. There must be economic justice for all people," he concluded.

Dr. J. Larry Brown, chairman of the Physicians' Task Force on Hunger in America, said no segment of the American public has lost more ground in the war against hunger than working people. "The new poor" are the once productive families now found in breadlines across America, Brown said.

According to the Census Bureau, the number of poor in America has grown to 35 million—an increase of 10 million since 1978.

Brown said the most recent tour of the physicians' group found real hunger throughout the nation, from the Mississippi Delta to New Mexico's Rio Grande Valley, where church officials see poverty as the worst in 15 years.

"Hunger in America's breadbasket was perhaps most upsetting," Brown said, where children in Illinois suffered from advanced nutritional diseases common to third world countries.

Brown noted that 20 years ago the federal government acted promptly to eradicate malnutrition through food stamps and other feeding programs. Although poverty still existed, ten years later the task force found hunger virtually eliminated.

"Now in 1985, hunger has returned to America," he said.

Brown blamed the Reagan Administration's sharp cuts in food programs and high unemployment for the return of hunger, calling it "the predictable consequence of known government policies. Hunger was caused by government and can only be solved by government. We can feed people if our priorities are right," he stressed.

Workshops gave participants an opportunity to review strategies for helping the needy in their communities. "Operation Can," organized by Nancy McCormick of the Auto Workers in Richmond, Ind., involved food collection efforts in a smaller community while Clarence E. Watz of the Steelworkers recounted labor's campaign in Pennsylvania to win the nation's first state mortgage assistance program.

One session was devoted to improving labor's image in the media and the community. AFL-CIO Information Director Murray Seeger said organized labor's mission is positive and progressive and that "union members must fight back against errors and misconceptions held by newspapers, radio and television."

Media relations

Loretta Ucelli, assistant to Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock, outlined a program for union members to become more familiar with the news media, and Machinists Communications Director Robert J. Kalaski urged participants to inform local press and television of their community activities.

"Tell them what you're doing," Kalaski said. "Show them we're concerned about hunger, housing, joblessness, the elderly, for all workers, union and non-union."

Other speakers included William S. Hoffman, director of the Auto Workers social security department; Michael R. Lemov, executive director of the Food Research & Action Center; Jo-Ann Eccher, director of Boston's Project Bread Hunger Hotline; and Allen J. Fishbein, director of the Neighborhood Revitalization Project.

Unions negotiate 72 new contracts at Beverly chain

The two AFL-CIO unions making deep inroads in organizing Beverly Enterprises, the nation's largest nursing home chain, are following up their gains with solid contract settlements.

Since the first of the year, the Service Employees has settled contracts at 37 Beverly nursing homes, bringing to 43 the number of homes in the chain now under SEIU contracts.

Over the same time span, the Food & Commercial Workers has negotiated contracts at 35 Beverly facilities.

"The winning of the contracts means we really have put down roots in this company," UFCW President William H. Wynn declared. "Our organizing at Beverly this year has risen to a great extent because of our success in negotiating decent first contracts."

The Beverly organizing wins and contract gains are the result of a national accord reached between the unions and the company last year under which the company agreed to allow its workers to organize and bargain in a "non-coercive" atmosphere while the unions agreed to drop a two-year "corporate campaign" against the firm.

Beverly owns or operates some 940 nursing homes in 44 states. The two unions estimate that about 9,000 of the chain's 87,000 employees are now unionized.

So far, the unions have won 62 representation elections at Beverly homes in 21 states while losing only 27. Wynn noted that the UFCW recently launched a major drive at Beverly homes in Florida, and SEIU is keeping up its organizing efforts at the company.

Carl Perkins remembered

Labor honors a valued friend

Boston—Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky), the longtime chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee was posthumously honored during the AFL-CIO Community Services Conference here as the recipient of the federation's 1985 Murray-Green-Meany award.

Perkins was selected by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to receive labor's highest tribute for humanitarianism for his lifetime of service on behalf of American workers.

The award, which includes a medallion and a $10,000 grant was presented to Mrs. Perkins at a dinner in conjunction with the AFL-CIO community services national CSA conference.

In making the presentation, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue recalled Perkins's role in the drive for full employment, higher education and dignity for working people.

"No man ever understood better than Carl Perkins the meaning of work, the dignity of work, and the need that men and women have for work that makes them productive, self-supporting and self-reliant," Donahue said.

In all the battles for a fair minimum wage, job safety and education and training, he observed, "America's working people could count on having Carl Perkins at their side. He played a part—an indispensable part—in the enactment of the most humane and liberating social legislation of the last quarter-century."

Continuing struggle

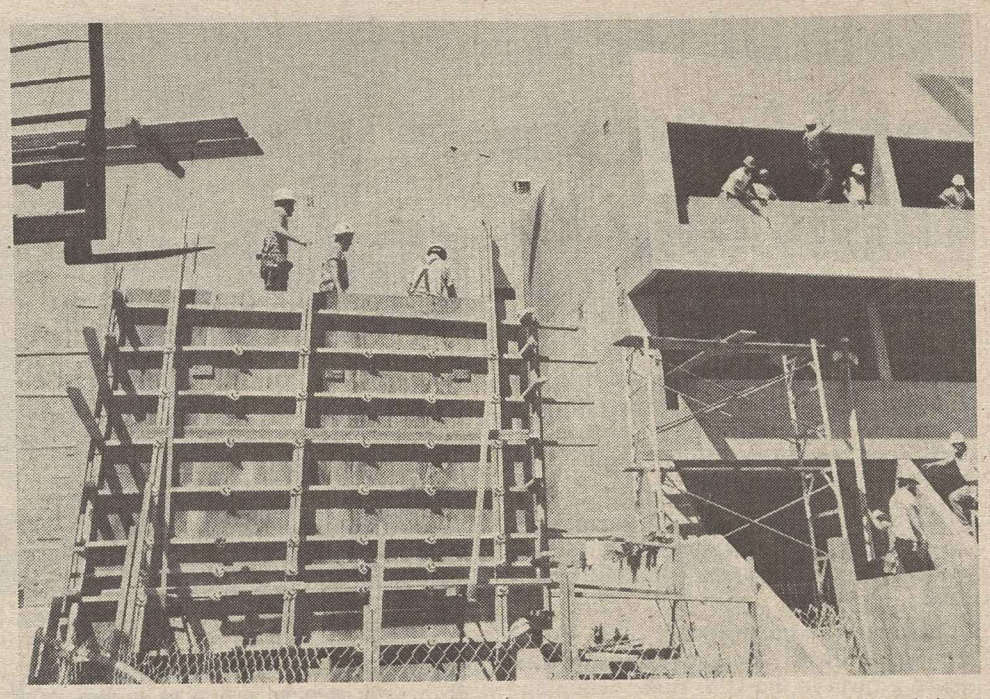
Donahue pledged that the labor movement would continue, "in our friend's courageous and humane spirit, the struggle to make our country the healthiest, best-educated, most protective and most creative society that human beings can achieve."

Donahue was joined in the awards presentation by AFL-CIO Vice President Alvin E. Heaps, head of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union and chairman of the federation's Committee on Community Services.



Perkins, who was born in Hindman, Ky., began practicing law in 1935. He was elected to Congress from the state's 7th District in 1948 and became chairman of the House Education & Labor Committee in 1967. A staunch advocate of antipoverty programs, federal aid to education and civil rights, Perkins led Congress in enacting the Elementary & Secondary Education Act, full employment legislation and other programs to aid working Americans. He died in 1984.

Mrs. Perkins accepted the honor on her husband's behalf and said the cash award would be donated to the Carl D. Perkins Memorial Scholarship trust fund, established to give college grants to needy students in the Hindman area.

The Murray-Green-Meany Award is presented annually as a memorial to AFL and CIO leaders William Green and Philip Murray and George Meany, first president of the merged federation. Last year's winner was Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.). Previous winners have included Msgr. George G. Higgins, Danny Thomas, Walter F. Mondale, Presidents Harry S Truman and Lyndon B. Johnson, and Eleanor Roosevelt.

Operating Engineers Local 675 pension fund will help generate about $150 million of union construction work in the next five years in Florida.

In Palm Springs, Calif., Marquis Resort hotel is being built by union labor and will be staffed by unionized workers. It will open on Labor Day.

Court clears job-creating pension fund investments

Fort Lauderdale, Fla.—A federal court ruling here has boosted the opportunity for trustees of so-called Taft-Hartley pension funds to make job-creating investments in construction projects and real estate.

The 52-page decision by Judge Jose A. Gonzalez, Jr., of the U.S. District Court for Southern Florida held that the trustees of the Operating Engineers Local 675 pension fund did not violate the "prudent man" provisions of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act in its financing, construction and leasing of a new headquarters building for the fund and the local union.

The judge said the Labor Dept. failed to prove in its 1981 lawsuit that the trustees had breached their fiduciary duties to the pension plan's participants and beneficiaries.

Uncertainty over the Labor Dept.'s narrow interpretation of the "prudence" rules of ERISA had caused many trustees of Taft-Hartley pension funds—those jointly administered by union and employer representatives—to avoid making investments in real estate ventures.

Many union pension trustees, especially in the building trades, have wanted to aid their members through investments that would create jobs and work for the pension plan participants.

There is an estimated $80 to $100 billion in jointly trusteed pension fund assets, but only 4 to 5 percent of that amount has been invested in real estate.

The Labor Dept. has taken a hard line on ventures to create jobs or work, so-called social investing, at the possible expense of returns on equity.

Local 675 Business Manager Dennis Walton, chairman of the fund's trustees, said, "This ruling vindicates our position; we were right from the start. We have generated more than $200 million in union-built construction including a $150-million project now underway."

"Job-creating investment is legal. It can work as long as you do it with diligence and care," said Atty. Gerald M. Feder, who argued the case for the trustees.

Martin Levenson, an actuary for Segal Advisors, Inc., whose firm works with a number of union funds, said, "There is nothing in the law that prevents these investments, but many trustees were apprehensive about the way the Labor Dept. interpreted the provisions."

Law clarified

He pointed out that the ruling clarifies the investment provisions of the law. As long as the trustees approach these investment decisions in a prudent way, they will be on safe ground, Levenson said.

The documentation of the investment procedures by the trustees of Local 675's pension fund "was a key element in convincing the judge of their prudence" in investing, he stressed.

The Labor Dept.'s case centered on purchase of a 95-acre parcel of land in Pompano Beach by the pension fund to construct a building and leasing a part of it to the union. The venture was financed by the fund.

The land was bought in August 1979 for $2.37 million. Eighty acres of that parcel was sold recently to a Dallas-based developer for $13.9 million.

Local 675 leases 60 percent of the 11,258-square-foot building that cost $1.8 million to build. The union's rent is designed to provide the pension fund an average annual return of 10 percent during its five-year lease.

Judge Gonzalez criticized the Labor Dept.'s lack of evidence, noting, "The department's charges are indeed serious, but its bark is worse than its bite."

The ruling noted that the "prudence" rule demands that fudiciaries perform their duties "with the care, skill, prudence and diligence...that a prudent man acting in a like capacity...would use."

Judge Gonzalez pointed out that ERISA requires only that the trustees "vigorously and independently investigate the wisdom of a contemplated investment; it matters not that the investment succeeds or fails, as long as the investigation is intensive." He stressed that the Local 675 trustees "always worked with current information, and often hired independent consultants to verify the earlier work of other advisers."

The decision defended the prudence of the trustees' decisionmaking, noting they "continually sought the advice of their attorneys," employed professional engineers for test borings, obtained two appraisals before purchasing the property, selected both the designer and contractor by competitive bidding, hired an independent real estate manager to negotiate a lease with the union, and eliminated certain aspects of the project when it appeared to be over budget.

The judge declared in his ruling that if the trustees' action is not prudent as defined by the regulations, "then virtually nothing they would have done would have been prudent in the (Labor Dept.'s) view short of forgoing the project altogether. Arguably 'that' view would be imprudent given the plethora of information available to the trustees suggesting that the project was going to be a smashing success!"

Although the Labor Dept.'s lawsuit had charged the trustees with a variety of violations, the judge elected to try initially only the issue of "prudence." He had previously dismissed charges that the fund's mortgage program and construction of the office building violated ERISA. He had also refused to consider charges that the fund had improperly reimbursed the union for services provided by Walton.

Labor Dept. rapped

The court rapped the Labor Dept.'s arguments that the pension fund overpaid for construction because it used union labor, and that it undercharged the local for rent. He particularly found fault with the department's expert witness who had used incomplete cost data and failed to take into account certain factors relating to the cost of the building.

The judge also rejected the Labor Dept.'s contention that developers' fees should have been built into the rent charged the union, even though no developer was used on the project.

He also struck down the idea that the fund should have calculated the cost of capital used in financing construction the same as if it had been borrowed from an outside source. The ruling held the use of pension funds to finance construction to be prudent.

AFL-CIO urges denial of trade preferences to nations that violate their workers' rights

The AFL-CIO called on the Reagan Administration to deny special trade status to nine countries that it said are "flagrant violators" of basic workers' rights.

Each of the countries—Chile, Guatemala, Haiti, South Korea, Nicaragua, Paraguay, the Philippines, Romania, and Suriname—are guilty of "many or all of the following violations," the federation charged:

- Suppression of independent unions.
- Restrictions on the freedom of association and collective bargaining.
- Punishment of striking workers.
- Denial of the right to strike.
- Intimidation, arrest or murder of union activists.
- Use of forced or compulsory labor.
- Torture and beating of imprisoned trade unionists.

GSP provisions

In testimony before a government interagency panel, Executive Director Eugenia Kemble of the AFL-CIO's Free Trade Union Institute urged that the nine countries be denied any further right to ship certain goods duty free into the United States under provisions of the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), a part of the Trade & Tariff Act.

The Act was amended by Congress in 1984 to mandate the exclusion of countries that violate labor rights.

"We know that there are real teeth in the new GSP trade union rights provisions," Kemble told the GSP subcommittee of the Trade Policy Staff Committee.

"While there are a number of other GSP beneficiary states which violate worker rights, we are here to urge the United States Trade Representative and the President to strike those countries from the list."

Kemble said the violations came to light from reports by the AFL-CIO's own extensive network of international affairs specialists, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, investigations by the International Labor Organization, the news media, U.S. government reports, and eye witness accounts.

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber, singling out South Korea as a violator of worker rights, charged that that country's military government is a major obstruction in the development of trade unions.

In testimony submitted to the panel, Bieber said some Korean auto workers last year earned between 64 cents and $1.19 an hour, and worked 50 to 60 hour weeks without overtime premiums.

"Those low wages and long hours are due largely to their government's repression of the trade union movement there, which should be the vehicle to improve the situation," he said.

Kemble said the AFL-CIO welcomed inclusion of the worker protections in the Trade & Tariff Act even though it has been critical of a number of provisions in the law.

In the past, the federation has sought removal of South Korea, Taiwan, and Hong Kong from the GSP list, mainly because these countries are well developed and do no longer need to be given preferential treatment.

New standards

She said labor also welcomes inclusion in the GSP of standards concerning workplace safety and health, minimum age for the employment of children, minimum wages, and hours of work.

"We seek to use this forum to draw attention to some of the most blatant offenders of worker rights and to test the strength of the new GSP legislation," Kemble told the panel.

Her testimony was accompanied by a description of the current status of trade unionism in each of the nine countries cited.

3 TWA unions fight Texas Air takeover tactic

Three unions at Trans World Airlines have formed a coalition to head off the planned takeover of the carrier by the anti-labor Texas Air Corp.

The unions—Machinists, Air Line Pilots and the unaffiliated Federation of Flight Attendants—are currently in negotiations with TWA and are concerned about the effect of a Texas Air takeover.

The union coalition was formed after Texas Air announced it would acquire TWA if outside financing were available. Texas Air is the parent company of Continental Airlines and New York Air—two carriers that have flouted labor law.

Texas Air's chief executive officer, Frank Lorenzo, was at the helm two years ago when Continental filed for bankruptcy, unilaterally abrogating collective bargaining agreements and sharply reducing the size of the workforce.

The three TWA unions are exploring their options, including a possible buyout of the airline.

Bargaining on a new Machinists contract covering some 12,000 mechanics has been going on since last October. The ALPA contract covering 4,000 pilots expires at the end of June, and the attendants have been holding mediated talks since May 1984.

Tripartite concept upheld

ILO conference acts on job safety, health

Geneva—Measures to improve occupational safety and health protections of workers highlighted the 1985 annual conference of the International Labor Organization.

Other significant decisions taken by ILO delegates included the adoption of new conventions, recommendations and resolutions on equal employment opportunities for women, better statistical input from governments, and help for famine-stricken Africa.

One conference resolution called for the economic isolation of South Africa to signal the world's revulsion at that nation's apartheid policy.

The three-week conference saw the Soviet bloc totally rebuffed in its efforts to dilute the ILO's tripartite structure and weaken its supervision of labor standards. Many participants termed the conference the most successful in recent years.

ILO Director Francis Blanchard of France commended the 2,000 delegates from the 141 participating nations for approving a two-year budget totaling $253 million.

Larger role

Blanchard, noting the "lack of acrimony" in the debates, said this will enable the ILO to take a larger role in global industrial relations. He said it will also permit the organization to convene a high-level technical meeting in 1986 on unemployment problems, with the participation of government officials, trade union leaders and international economic organizations.

Key conference actions included:

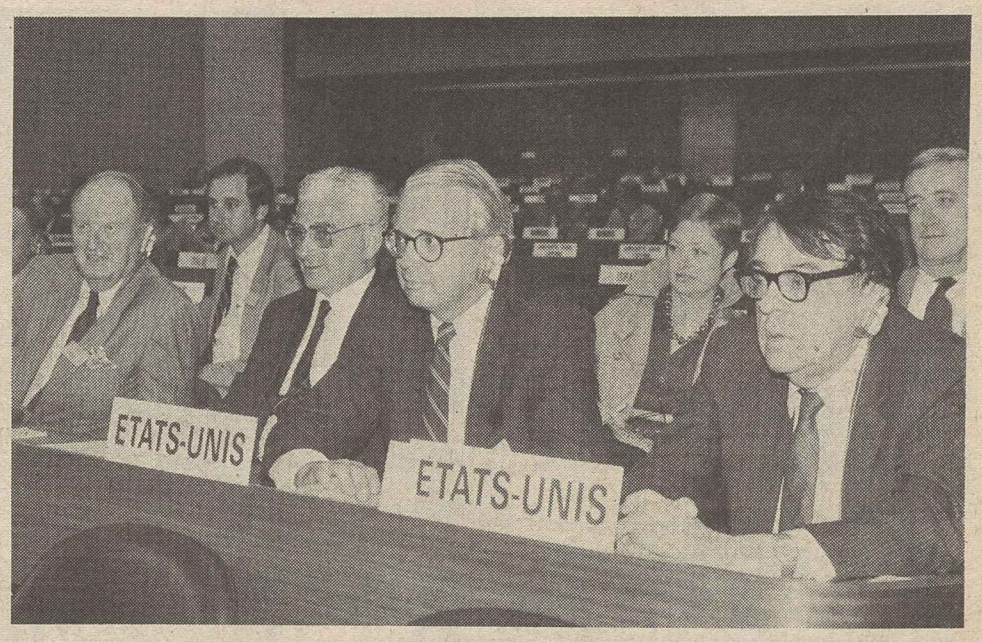
• Recommendations to promote the development of occupational health services covering workers in all branches of economic activity, with the stated goal of eliminating job-related health risks and improving the working environment.

• A resolution expressing "deep concern" at the increasing risks and growing number of accidents in handling hazardous substances and chemical products. It urged government-worker-employer action to reduce hazards.

• Preparation for adoption at the 1986 conference of safety standards on the use of asbestos. A draft text calls for stricter national laws restricting the use of certain types of asbestos, regulating exposure, and setting standards for demolition of buildings containing asbestos.

• A convention urging governments to improve labor statistics and provide more reliable information to monitor and plan economic and social progress.

• A resolution calling for food programs for African countries and increased ILO assistance.



In his closing address, Blanchard chided the communist bloc—though without naming the Soviet Union and its satellites—for its challenge to ILO authority.

"Standard-setting is the foundation of this international organization," Blanchard said. "By joining the ILO, states have freely accepted in advance the obligations arising out of the constitution. They freely accepted the procedures of the ILO."

Blanchard strongly urged the strengthening of collective bargaining between free and independent employer and worker organizations, an ILO basic principle which the Soviet bloc is trying to modify.

"Nothing would be more harmful to the interests of the workers than to set about weakening trade unions, or the placing of employer organizations under the government's thumb or, on the contrary, giving them too much power," Blanchard declared.

As for the Soviet bloc claim that progress can only be achieved through "class struggle," Blanchard retorted that "this was not the feeling of a large majority" of the conference participants.

Kirkland lauds ITU efforts to repel Teamster takeover

The Typographical Union's efforts to repel a takeover attempt by the unaffiliated Teamsters have the full support of the AFL-CIO and its member unions.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assured ITU President Robert S. McMichen in a letter that the federation "continues to stand solidly with you and the entire ITU membership.

"Your fight to protect the proud ITU tradition of democratic unionism and to keep your union within the mainstream of organized labor deserves, and has, our fullest support," Kirkland said.

ITU members will be mailed ballots on July 8 to vote whether to merge with the Teamsters. The ballots will be tallied Aug. 21.

Kirkland pledged that the more than 700 AFL-CIO central labor bodies are prepared to assist the ITU locals "confronted with the Teamsters aggressive takeover effort."

ITU area meetings were held in Toronto and Winnipeg with others set for New York on June 30, St. Louis on July 6 and San Francisco on July 7 to explain and debate the Teamster document. All five officers of the union—those in favor of merger and those opposed—have been debating the issue in their monthly Typographical Journal columns, and pro- and anti-merger groups have promoted their positions in general membership mailings.

The Typographical Union, founded in 1852, represents 45,000 active and 30,000 retired members. All 75,000 members are eligible to vote in the referendum.

'83 election

The balloting, to be conducted by the American Arbitration Association, is on a merger document drawn up by former ITU President Joseph Bingel after he lost the presidency in November 1983 to McMichen by more than 5,000 votes, but refused to yield the office. McMichen won a Labor Dept.-supervised rerun election by 13,000 votes.

Between elections, Bingel and his executive council drafted a merger proposal with the Teamsters and tried to rush it to referendum. That effort was blocked by a federal court injunction and later by convention action. The injunction was lifted and a merger document between the ITU and the Graphic Communications Union stalled after having been approved by the executive councils of both unions. Last March, the GCIU council in March 1985 withdrew its support for the agreement citing a lack of time for full consideration.

Others interested

Since then, the Machinists and the Communications Workers have both expressed interest in starting merger talks with the ITU if future discussions with GCIU are unproductive.

Kirkland, who has strongly urged the ITU to merge with an AFL-CIO affiliate, noted the "considerable progress" the union made toward merging with GCIU and the interest of "other appropriate AFL-CIO affiliates."

"I know that defeat of the Teamsters will enable a proper merger to occur quickly and smoothly," Kirkland said.

UTU cracks rail impasse, 12 unions continue talks

The United Transportation Union reached a tentative agreement with the nation's major railroads, wrapping up a year of negotiations that ended in the hands of federal mediators.

Details of the settlement with the National Railway Labor Conference, the industry's bargaining arm, were withheld pending ratification.

The UTU is the largest operating union, representing conductors, trainmen, and firemen. Its members account for approximately one-fourth of the 350,000 workers employed by the nation's Class I carriers, which move about 95 percent of all rail freight in the country. Conrail is not included in the agreement.

The UTU agreement covers wages, work rules and other contractual matters such as insurance and benefits. It replaces a contract that had been open for renegotiation since July 1, 1984.

Under the union's constitution, ratification of the accord must be completed within 21 days after the proposal is distributed to UTU's 400 general chairmen across the country. Local chairmen in turn poll members. A final tally is expected by the end of July.

Walter C. Wallace, a member of the National Mediation Board, had sat in on the talks since last December.

Meanwhile, 12 other railroad unions continue to bargain with the carriers. The Yardmasters are negotiating directly with the NLRC. The unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, the other operating union, is taking part in mediated sessions. Chairman Helen Witt is scheduled to meet with representatives of the railroads and 10 railway craft unions on July 8.

The 10 craft unions are the Signalmen, Carmen, Maintenance of Way Employees, Railway & Airline Clerks, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Firemen & Oilers, Train Dispatchers and Electrical Workers.

Tax shelter held wrong approach to job training

The AFL-CIO called for a national commitment to full employment and urged rejection of a House bill that would encourage workers and employers to put aside tax-sheltered money to help pay for any future retraining needs.

Legislation to authorize individual training accounts through employer-employee contributions of $250 a year is being considered by the House Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities. It's the wrong approach, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote Subcommittee Chairman Matthew G. Martinez.

Jobs for all

"Jobs and training for all workers, including displaced workers, must be part of the nation's basic economic and social policy," Denison insisted. "Job information, job counseling, and job training and placement services should be fully and freely available to all workers."

Denison acknowledged that the programs now in place to deal with job dislocation and training are inadequate. But the solution is not to relegate the problem to inadequate individual responsibility, he stressed.

Instead, Denison urged, "job and training programs for displaced workers and youth should be greatly expanded and training allowances should be provided. There should be more targeted job training opportunities for adult workers, including women and minorities."

By contrast, he said, the proposed legislation would "add to existing problems with the federal tax code" and would raise new problems of fairness "by failing to address the needs of those already unemployed or displaced and those who cannot afford to set aside a portion of their earnings in an individual training account."

Student grants hold key to college

Federal grants to needy college-bound students should be continued and expanded, not cut back, the AFL-CIO urged at House hearings.

The Pell Grants program, which the Reagan Administration wants to further restrict, has already shrunk in value through inflation and budget restrictions of recent years. The Administration budget would cut back funding still further.

AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields noted in her testimony that some three-fourths of the students receiving Pell Grants come from families with incomes below $15,000 a year. Nearly one-third are minority students.

Since 1979, she noted, the value of Pell Grants has shrunk from 46 percent of average college costs to less than one-third.

"Unless this pattern is reversed," Shields warned, "large numbers of low- and middle-income qualified students will conclude that they cannot afford to go to college."

Shields stressed the labor movement's commitment to the principle that ability to pay should not restrict access to higher education. Each of the four budgets President Reagan has submitted sought cutbacks in student aid, Shields noted. She commended Congress for resisting many of them.

Now, she urged, reauthorization of the higher education assistance program gives Congress an opportunity to increase the level of student assistance and ease some of the restrictions on eligibility.

She urged that the basic grant for eligible students be set at $2,600 for the 1986-87 academic year, or $500 more than was actually funded for the current year. The amount would rise by $200 a year. Pell Grants are reduced by the amount the student's family would be expected to contribute based on household income.

Shields also proposed a more adequate formula for covering the costs of college expenses, including books, transportation, and room and board.

If access to college education is defined "not by ability but by bank balance," Shields told the House Subcommittee on Postsecondary Education, "workers and their families will be the poorer for it." But, she stressed, "so will America."

Hotel unions get 30% raise in N.Y. strike

immediately following the membership vote.

The strike began June 1, when the old contract expired. Before the walkout, the council settled with four independent hotels on wage increases that approximated the final agreement.

The old agreement paid hotel workers an average weekly salary of $315 to $320.

The new contract calls for salary increases of 6.5 percent in the first year, 6 percent in the second, and 5.5 percent in the third and fourth years.

Pension benefits will rise from $262 to $300 a month over the next three years.

New benefits include a prepaid legal plan, nurseries for newborn children, an alcoholism and drug treatment program, and eyeglasses.

Pitta said the agreement also calls for full amnesty of the striking workers.

"This was not an economic strike. It was an attempt to beat the union," Pitta said in praising the workers' solidarity. Pitta issued a warning to hotel owners who may be seeking a so-called union-free environment. "They won't get it in New York," he stressed.

The unions comprising the council are the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees Local 6, Electrical Workers Local 3, Operating Engineers Locals 94, 94A and 94B, service Employees Local 144, Firemen & Oilers Local 56, Painters Local 1422, Office & Professional Employees Local 153, Upholstery Workers Local 43, and Carpenters Local 1.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, with Legislative Rep. Jane O'Grady, gives labor's proposals for immigration reform at Senate hearings.

Donahue calls for changes in immigration reform bill

be given virtually unchecked power" over the terms and conditions of their employment, Donahue pointed out.

On the issue of temporary foreign workers, the legislation "does just the opposite of what a reform bill should do," Donahue testified.

"It turns over the production and harvesting of America's crops to imported short-term "guest workers," Donahue charged. The result, he warned, would be a new "bracero program," similar to the long-abandoned policy of contracting for the importation of Mexican farm labor, but without even that program's minimal safeguards against exploitation.

Such a program "exacts too high a moral cost from this country to be tolerated," Donahue testified.

In the last Congress a House-Senate conference committee deadlocked on immigration legislation and no final action was taken. Donahue praised Simpson's efforts over the years to shape a bill acceptable to the many groups affected. He said the AFL-CIO believes that "immigration legislation is necessary" and is prepared to work with congressional committees to develop an effective bill.

Donahue said the AFL-CIO remains hopeful that differences on the nature of immigration reform can be resolved.

When Congress last considered immigration legislation, he noted, the Labor-Management Group made up of union and business leaders agreed to the urgent need for "a system of identification and employment record verification that protects local workers and U.S.employers while prohibiting the employment of undocumented workers."

"We still believe those solutions can be achieved," he stressed, "so that legislation can be passed that would establish tough and enforceable sanctions against employers who hire the undocumented as well as against employers who discriminate against individuals who are legally entitled to work." Such a bill, he said, would also "establish a generous legalization program to allow and encourage participation to the maximum extent feasible by those persons who, since their original unlawful entry, have settled and developed roots in this country."

New trade bill gains strong endorsements

A bipartisan bill to update U.S. trade laws to cope with unfair tactics by foreign producers has been introduced in the House and Senate with strong endorsement from a coalition of unions and businesses.

The legislation would allow industries to seek relief from import penetration resulting from actions of foreign governments in targeting portions of the U.S. market and providing various subsidies and incentives so that their exports will have a trade advantage.

One provison would identify as an unfair trade practice a policy by a government of indirectly subsidizing exports by underpricing government-owned or controlled natural resources that are sold to its exporting companies.

Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel said existing U.S. laws and policies fail to deal effectively with targeting practices aimed at establishing foreign products in the U.S. market. Samuel is co-chairman of the Labor-Industry Coalition for International Trade (LICIT), which includes top officers of nine AFL-CIO unions and as many corporations. Corning Glass Works Chairman Amory Houghton, Jr., is LICIT's other co-chairman.

Bipartisan support

Many of the cosponsors of the legislation joined industry and union leaders at a Capitol Hill news conference to mark the introduction of the bill. It's principal sponsors in the House are Representatives Frank Guarini (D-N.J.) and John J. Duncan (R-Tenn.), both members of the Ways & Means Committee. The principal Senate sponsors, John Heinz (R-Pa.) and Max Baucus (D-Mont.), serve on the counterpart Senate Finance Committee, which also has jurisdiction over trade matters.

It makes clear that enhanced competitiveness in the marketplace is one of the goals of trade policy, with safeguards to assure that consumers will not be the losers if temporary import restrictions are imposed.

Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers President Joseph M. Misbrener predicted at the news conference that stronger international curbs on unfair trade practices would have a healthy effect on world trade, increasing commerce among nations under improved international rules.

Improved job injury benefits pressed by Arkansas unions

Hot Springs, Ark.—Workers' compensation improvements head the Arkansas AFL-CIO's goals for the next session of the state legislature.

Delegates to the state federation's 15th biennial convention also called for strong right-to-know measures to protect workers from toxic hazards; automatic adjustment of the state minimum wage when the federal rate increases, and renewed efforts to lessen the state tax burden on lower-income people.

Workers compensation benefits in Arkansas are 51 percent below the national average even though many jobs in the state are among the most hazardous in the country, the convention resolution noted. It cited a report that in one recent year 154 workers were killed on the job and more than 40,500 were injured. The convention endorsed a state referendum for improvements in benefits scheduled for the 1986 general election.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressed in an address to the delegates that the federation would continue its fight against taxation of employer-paid benefits that President Reagan favors in his tax plan.

"At the same time the President is talking about 'succumbing to special interests' on the subject of tax reform," Donahue said, "it is the President himself who succumbed to the oil, gas and other wealthy interests."

Donahue noted that Senate action to strip Davis-Bacon prevailing wage protections from most military construction was accomplished with the vote of four Democratic senators who misled the labor movement—including Arkansas' Dale Bumpers.

Other speakers included President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees, National COPE Director John Perkins, Gov. Bill Clinton and Sen. Bumpers.

In other convention action, President J. Bill Becker was re-elected for a new two-year term along with Sec.-Treas. Jim D. Clark and Vice-President Tom McFalls. Also elected was the 20-member executive committee.

Lee Minton dies, led Glass Bottle union 25 years

Fort Myers, Fla.—Lee Webb Minton, retired AFL-CIO vice president and president emeritus of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers, died June 22 at his home here. He was 73.

Minton joined the Glass Bottle Blowers, a forerunner union of the GPPW in 1937. He served on the union's executive board for several years before he was elected treasurer in 1945, vice president in April 1946, and president in August 1946. Minton headed the union for 25 years until his retirement in 1971.

In a message to his family, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said Minton's life was one of devoted service to America's working people. "He was a staunch trade unionist whose diligence and leadership touched many lives."

Minton was a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council from 1956 to 1975. He also served on the board of trustees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development and as an advisory board member of the Agency for International Development.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer six institutes and workshops during July and August. The schedule:

TV: The Cool Medium, June 30-July 3—A three-day workshop to coach officers of AFL-CIO central bodies on working with television reporters and facing the video cameras.

Corporate Finance & Investment Practice, July 9-12—A program to examine investment banking, corporate acquisitions, mergers, leveraged buyouts and the general financial behavior of U.S. corporations. The program is cosponsored by the Food & Allied Service Trades and the Industrial Union Departments.

Bargaining for Improved Health Care Benefits, July 21-24—An institute to equip union negotiators to deal more effectively with single employer health care benefit programs.

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, Aug. 4-9—An institute concentrating on the presentation of mock grievance cases before professional arbitrators. The exercises are videotaped for self criticism.

Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications, Aug. 11-16—A workshop for editors and would-be editors on the basics of producing union publications, cosponsored by the International Labor Communications Association.

An off-campus institute on arbitration techniques will be offered at the University of Colorado, Boulder, July 28-Aug. 2.

More than 65 union leaders will be on campus July 28 to Aug. 2 for their semi-annual week-in-residence. They are working for bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies in a program cosponsored with Antioch University.

AFL-CIO affiliates using the center's facilities in July for their own staff training programs are: Operating Engineers, July 7-12; United Teacher Press Association, July 8-10; Committee on Political Education, July 14-19; Railway & Airline Clerks, July 14-19, and Carpenters, July 21-26.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development is tutoring 38 Spanish-speaking women unionists from 14 Latin American countries on trade union techniques until July 19.

More information on these and other labor studies is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. 301/431-6400.

Solidarity 1776

THAT WAS quite a list of grievances that the Continental Congress drew up in the summer of 1776 in Philadelphia.

Thomas Jefferson was chairman of the drafting committee and ended up doing most of the work himself, which even then was not exactly unique for committee chairmen.

When he submitted the draft to the representatives of the 13 colonies, there was a lot of nit-picking and some changes that Jefferson called "deplorable."

He was going a bit too far, some delegates complained, in so strongly condemning Britain for fostering the slave trade.

But there was basic agreement that the colonists could no longer put up with absentee rule by an authoritarian king, and negotiations had gotten nowhere.

The colonists had tried for a peaceful settlement, but sometimes there's not that alternative when an arrogant management just keeps saying "no."

After the long list of grievances, the resolution that was to become the Declaration of Independence recited the effort to resolve them at the bargaining table:

"In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms." But "our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury."

AS FOR THE British government, an ocean away, it too had proved "deaf to the voice of justice."

The delegates didn't tamper much with Jefferson's eloquence when it came to proclaiming the inalienable rights of all people (that's how Jefferson wrote it; a misspelling in copying gave us the word "unalienable.")

No one was indifferent to the risks ahead, but the vote was unanimous, and the signers promised they would stick together.

"We mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

It was not mere rhetoric when they pledged their lives on that first Independence Day.

That's solidarity.

Who Gets What?

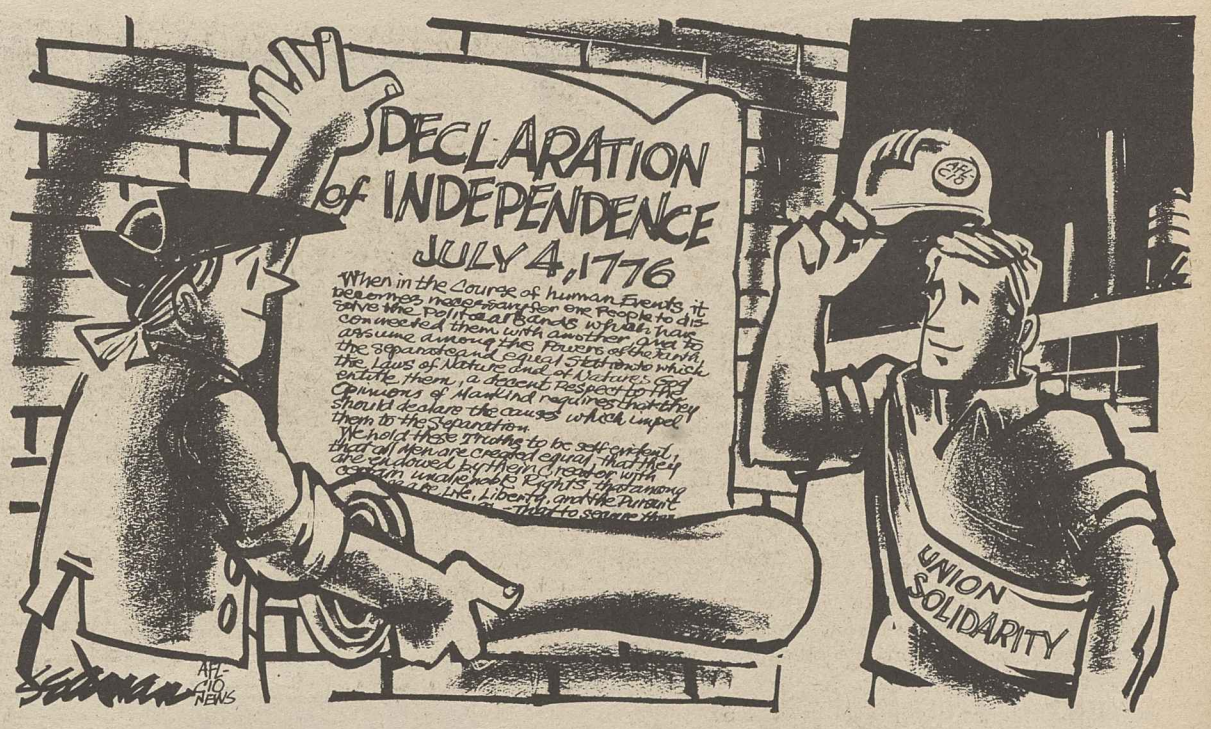
THE MOST palatable feature of President Reagan's tax reform proposal is that it would take at least a modest step toward restoring the corporate income tax as a significant source of revenue.

The proposed bite on business income would actually be very small and many firms would end up paying less taxes. But even so, some of the companies that have been able to avoid virtually all taxation are using their not inconsiderable influence to try to keep it that way.



Senators are coming under heavy pressure to tax consumers, not corporations. "Consumption tax," it seems, is the newest buzzword in the corridors of the Capitol.

According to the Wall Street Journal, "this pressure comes in large part from corporate lobbyists who hope to find a new source of revenue to fund the retention of business breaks that are threatened by the effort to overhaul the income tax system."

These lobbyists are pushing for a national sales tax, or some variation that achieves the same purpose.

THE INTENT clearly is not to raise additional revenue for the nation's needs or to reduce the federal deficit. The "reform plan" advanced by the Administration is designed to offset higher taxes for some with tax cuts for others.

The big question, of course, is who gets the cuts and who gets the higher taxes. If the politically powerful corporation lobby gets its way, business will retain its almost tax-exempt status. And the people who use their paychecks to provide for their family needs will end up carrying an even bigger burden.

Benefits COLA insulates the elderly from poverty

By Press Associates, Inc.

The nation's senior citizens are better off financially than they were less than a generation ago.

Thanks to social security, Medicare and other programs, poverty among the elderly was reduced from 35 percent in 1959 to 14 percent in 1983.

The economic progress of older Americans, unfortunately, is being used by some politicians and pundits as a reason to ask them to "sacrifice" their social security cost-of-living adjustment to help reduce the federal deficit.

As Congress decides the fate of next year's COLA, it has become politically opportune to portray the elderly as a prosperous special interest group, selfishly clinging to an unnecessary luxury at the expense of the public interest.

A report by the President's Council of Economic Advisers for the first time contained a section on the "economic status of the elderly," portraying seniors as no longer disadvantaged relative to the population as a whole. The report's main limits were that it looked at the elderly as a homogeneous group, without special financial problems and widely different income levels.

Faulty perception

The CEA report prompted the National Council of Senior Citizens to commission a study of its own. Titled "The Economic Status of the Elderly," the NCSC report warns: "The perception that the elderly are as well off as other groups could threaten the funding of programs vital to the elderly, with the result that many would fall into poverty.

The NCSC report also points out:

• The elderly are not a homogeneous group. Poverty remains at crisis levels for certain categories of older people—widows, minorities, those who are sick, and those in their 80s. For example, the median annual income of older women is $5,600.

• The CEA report claims that "the goods typically purchased by the elderly and the non-elderly have experienced similar price increases" and that consequently the elderly are not more susceptible to inflation than other groups. But this fails to take into account the burden of high health care inflation on the elderly, whose medical needs far exceed those of other age groups. Despite Medicare, the elderly's out-of-pocket medical costs will grow twice as fast as their income in the next four years.

• Contrary to the CEA's upbeat discussion of pension coverage, only about 10 percent of the elderly's retirement income comes from private pensions. Most elderly, especially women, don't receive pension income. Also, pensions rarely are indexed to inflation. In 1982, the average annual income from a private pension for an elderly male was $2,980; for an elderly female, it was $1,520.

• Improvements in the income status of the elderly are mainly attributable to the social security system. On average, it provides about 4 percent of retirement income, although 21 percent of the elderly rely on it for nearly all their income.

• About 63 percent of social security beneficiaries are women. Women typically receive lower benefits, either as surviving spouses or in their own right. In 1983, the average monthly benefit to a retired male worker was $497; to a retired female worker, $316. About 20 percent of unmarried older women rely on social security as their sole income.

• Older workers bore the brunt of the recent recession. Only 21 percent of displaced older workers found new jobs after being laid off during that period compared to 70 percent of young workers and 41 percent of middle-aged workers. Early, and often involuntary, retirement remains the rule for workers in their 50s and 60s. This means lost health coverage and reductions in pensions and social security.

The NCSC report said congressionally enacted social security benefit increases in the early 1970s and automatic cost-of-living adjustments after 1975 resulted in a sharp reduction in poverty among seniors. Freezing next year's COLA, it said, would push a half-million older Americans below the poverty line.

MEMO FROM COPE

Does Political Opportunism Pay Off With Votes?

The latest big or semi-big Democrat to decide his party has something more dreadful than ring around the collar and he'd best sever the relationship is Edward J. King, former governor of Massachusetts.

King bolted to the GOP and immediately began getting serious attention as a Republican candidate for governor of the Bay State. Should he go all the way, he'd earn a place in the Guinness Book of Records for serving one term as a Democrat and a second as a Republican.

Of course, he doesn't have the nomination yet, so it remains to be seen if party-jumping opportunism is its own reward or if it pulls votes.

King isn't alone as a convert anticipating the prize of high office. Three other recent Democrats-turned-Republican are expected to go after their new party's gubernatorial nomination: former Rep. Kent Hance (Texas); William Lucas, county executive of Wayne County (Detroit), Mich.; Bob Martinez, mayor of Tampa, Fla. (In fact, some observers believe they've been all-but assured major support for the nomination as a condition of transfer.)

These switchers are giving Republicans a field day of favorable publicity, almost suggesting that the time will soon come when the nation will be 100 percent GOP and elections won't even be necessary.

However, there are smart onlookers who make the case that all this is not an unmixed blessing for the GOP. One who sees it this way is Norman Ornstein of the American Enterprise Institute.

Writing in the New York Times, Ornstein says the eagerness of many Republicans to thrust their gubernatorial nominations in major states on such newcomers "suggests a serious weakness in party self-image, organization and candidate recruitment."

"A proud party," he says, "would insist on giving its major rewards to the deserving," that is to those who've served it well and long.

"The GOP's admission that it has few homegrown candidates who can measure up to Democrats further suggests a failure to develop a talent base (able) to make strong challenges for the governorship" or a "farm system of potential candidates to recruit into politics and office."

Ornstein also forecast that it could become "increasingly difficult to induce party workers and potential candidates for lower office to trust their party if they see it does not trust its own people" and turns to almost-strangers.

Then, too, the explanation the switchers all are giving is going to grow thin. King, in describing his shift, sounded much like those who went before. He said: "The truth is that the Democratic Party has ceased to be the party of the sensible center and has become dominated by professional liberals. Today, the Republican Party, rather than the Democratic Party will be the party of the sensible center."

Of course, that's pure hogwash. But if it were true, it would have been every bit as true 5-10-15 years ago. And if that's so, why was King so happy to run, win and serve as a Democratic governor? For that matter, why did the other party-bolters remain Democrats so long?

And just where is the "sensible center," anyway?

Is it at the $200 billion federal deficit level that Reagan and his policies—and his party—provide?

Is it at the seven percent-plus permanent unemployment level that seems to be the legacy of the Reagan-GOP recession?

Is the "sensible center" expressed by the GOP platform adopted last year, which has been accurately described as the most conservative by a major party in decades and which was proposed and written by some of the most right-wing of GOP officials and members?

Is the "sensible center" King etc. are rushing to occupy really represented by the likes of some of their new comrades-in-arms—Jesse Helms and Newt Gingrich for example?

Honest conversions, political or other, are usually respected. Self-serving ones are questioned and mistrusted. It will be interesting to see how the public perceives these when the converts actually wind up on the ballot for high office.

Long After Indiana...

All the attention to the six-month effort to settle that contested Indiana U.S. House race obscured challenges still going on in Idaho and on Guam.

In the former, defeated Rep. George Hansen (R) went before a House task force recently asking a "full and fair recount." Hansen's opponent, Democrat Richard Stallings, was certified the winner by 133 votes out of 202,399 votes cast. (Hansen had barely won GOP renomination after his conviction for falsifying financial disclosure statements.)

Hansen's attorneys now argue there were irregularities in vote counting and claim some who voted may not have been district residents.

Meanwhile, the defeated non-voting House member from Guam, Democrat Antonio Won Pat, is still vainly seeking a recount on the basis of what he claims were "substantial irregularities" in November voting—among which was a power outage that struck only one building on the entire island, Guam's election commission headquarters.

Maybe Party-Jumpers' Timing Is Awful

There's the possibility, of course, that the timing of recent party-jumpers might be just plain awful. The argument is heard more and more often that today's brand of conservatism and the GOP that reflects it have peaked—partly because the "new right" is losing some of its steam—it's been around a while, after all—and partly because the movement's and the party's most popular figure, President Reagan, is nearing the end of his political career.

There are abundant signs that the conservative-GOP wave has crested:

Some of its early movers and shakers are branching out. Richard Viguerie, for one, sought elective office. Terry Dolan, who made the National Conservative PAC the most effective and well-funded of rightist political operations, handed over its leadership and now puts out a political newsletter. Others have been absorbed by the Administration.

Another sign: One of the prophets who foretold the growth of conservative strength now predicts its decline. Kevin Phillips, who wrote of "The Emerging Republican Majority" long before it emerged (there's still legitimate question that it ever got here), sees a turn away from the Reagan-conservative notion that government is a bogeyman.

He judges that government might be forced to take action to help "America's jeopardized agriculture, eroded manufacturing competitiveness, rundown transportation infrastructure, shaky financial institutions, and troubled educational system. . . ."

Government initiatives are not the conservatives' cup of tea. But most Americans would support government activism to save or improve things they believe are important.

And writing in the Washington Post, columnist David Broder contends that "to the extent Reagan has identified conservatism with outright opposition to any governmental initiatives unrelated to national security, he has almost certainly limited its long-term tenure in power."

But if nothing else, Reagan is going out of politics swinging, just as he has for more than 20 years, at the federal government—even though he's been its chief since 1981.

There is another key sign to concern ultra-conservative leaders. The money gusher that fueled the "new right" shows evidence of depletion.

In fact, Richard Viguerie, who started the "new right" by building and exploiting huge mailing lists, had to retrench his vast direct mail operation recently.

He claims his volume has dropped off 40 percent since the 1984 elections, that he might have to sell his Falls Church, Va., headquarters building, and that he has had to lay off major and long-term staff.

Though there is still money to be made in direct mail operations by Viguerie and other ultra-conservative mail houses, they're all feeling a pinch. One says "it's the pits" for conservative fund-raisers now. One ascribes it to "a lethargic feeling out there (among rightist supporters). There are no enemies." This confesses how much the right wing relied for successful fund-raising on being out of power and having someone else to pin problems on.

The former director of the GOP Senate Campaign Committee blames "a sense of victory and completion among conservatives" for a mailing of 20 million fund-raising letters soon after the election that lost $3-$4 million.

Even the National Conservative PAC, the biggest political fund-raiser in the country, lost $3.3 million on a mailing last summer. (Though NCPAC collected almost $20 million in the 1983-84 election cycle, most of what it collected was spent to raise the funds.)

Another bit of evidence that the new right ultra-conservative movement has lost its youthful vigor is that it has reached or is near the limit on different fronts it can form to fight different battles.

Viguerie, for one, had to mothball a group called the Populist Conservative Tax Coalition that he formed and funded only last year. It didn't take off.

Finally, many of the ardent supporters of new right ultra-conservatism probably have grown very weary and have lost some stomach for the fight. They've been harangued by their leaders about 10 years now, milked mercilessly for contributions, and promised the universe—but after all the storm and fury, largely they are still fighting the same struggles as when they started out.

This is beginning to soak into their consciousness, and they can't help noticing that despite the fact their beau ideal is in the White House and Jesse Helms and many like him in the Senate and House and the state legislatures—despite all this, the nation and the world simply haven't been reshaped to their liking.

So—countless fund-raising letters and countless contributions and calls to action later, they're still mad, and a lot of them are saying forget it.

Now, Wait a Minute...

President Reagan's proposed tax program would eliminate the $1 taxpayer checkoff that finances presidential campaigns. All candidates in the last three presidential campaigns have relied on the public funds, and not one of the campaigns has been seriously skewed by money. The only unbalance is caused by "independent expenditures" in behalf of candidates by non-connected PACs.

This post-Watergate effort to end reliance on private contributions provided each of the major party candidates nearly $40 million in 1984 campaign funds.

Reagan's proposal also knocks out the tax credit of up to $50 for individuals, $100 for married couples, for contributions to political candidates and committees.

Back to Drawing Board

It's back to the drawing board for Richard Viguerie and his political ambitions. The chief figure in the birth and growth of the "new right" came in a distant third in his first serious try for public office. He sought the GOP nomination for lieutenant-governor of Virginia.

Ironically, the techniques that Viguerie used to help elect scores of ultra-conservative candidates in the past several election cycle either were inappropriate, or failed to do the job, in his own campaign.

GE accord posts major gains

Agency shop, job security mark 13-union settlement

New York—A 13-union coalition representing some 80,000 workers achieved major contract gains in negotiations with the General Electric Co., including a long-sought goal of union security protections.

An agency shop provision was one of several breakthroughs in a tentative, three-year agreement between the unions' Coordinated Bargaining Committee and the huge firm concluded here on June 30.

Under an agency shop, workers who refuse to join the union that represents them at the bargaining table are required to pay a fee for those services in lieu of union dues.

The unions have been trying for years to negotiate an agency shop at GE, President William H. Bywater of the Electronics Workers and IUE-GE Conference Board Chairman Joseph Egan observed.

"The agency shop will mean an additional 3,000 to 4,000 workers who will be paying for our services. It is the equivalent of organizing a new IUE shop of that many workers," Bywater and Egan said.

Another major breakthrough in the negotiations was improved job security, particularly provisions giving preferential hiring rights at other plants to those workers hurt by a plant closing.

"This is an outstanding agreement," Bywater and Egan declared. "It achieves the major goals of our union, and includes important breakthroughs.

"In addition, we successfully combatted concessionary bargaining in the midst of an extremely adverse climate."

Approval urged

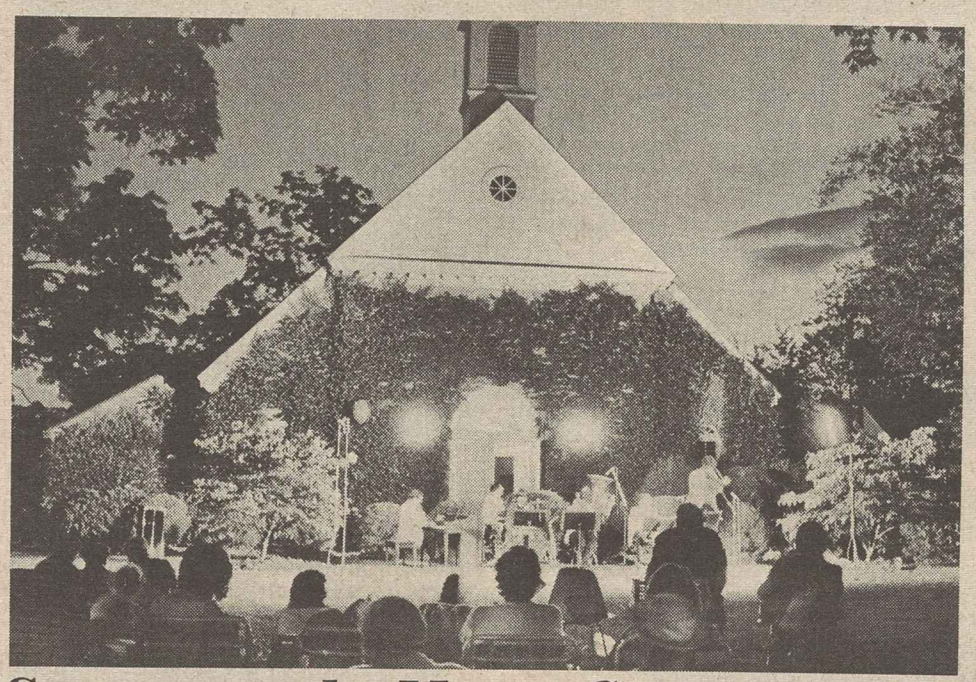
Both the CBC steering committee, which Bywater chairs, and the IUE-GE Conference Board have recommended approval of the new agreement. Rank-and-file members will vote on its ratification at membership meetings between now and July 9.

If the agreement is not ratified by then, workers would be free to strike the company at 12:01 a.m., July 11. Under the existing contract, both parties have the right to notify the other if they intend to terminate the contract in 10 days. The IUE, which represents the largest number of unionized employees at GE, some 50,000, gave its notice to the company June 30.

Other highlights of the agreement include:



• A 3-percent bonus based on a worker's earnings in the first year of the agreement, followed by a 3-percent wage or salary increase in each of the second and third years. The bonus will not be added to base rates, but the second- and third-year raises will.

• An improved cost-of-living adjustment formula. Under the current contract, workers' hourly pay rises one cent for each increase of .175 in the government's consumer price index. The new formula will grant a one-cent increase, starting in the final year of the contract, for each rise of .15 in the CPI.

• Improved early retirement. The regular pension supplement of $7 a month times a worker's years of service will rise immediately to $8 a month without a cap on years of service. The old contract had a cap of 25 years.

In addition, a new $200 monthly supplement will be offered workers with 25 years of service or more who are now 60 or will reach the age of 60 during the life of the con-

Summer at the Meany Center

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies begins its outdoor summer concert series as nearly 200 students, unionists and their families and neighbors gather on the lawn at the Silver Spring, Md., facility to hear the lively Peabody Ragtime Ensemble, a seven-piece union band from Baltimore, play songs by Eubie Blake and Duke Ellington.

Supreme Court 'defers' to NLRB's union curb

By David L. Perlman

A closely divided Supreme Court accepted a ruling adopted by President Reagan's appointees to the National Labor Relations Board which weakens a union's position during a strike.

The court split 5-4, with the majority taking the position that federal labor law is unclear on the responsibilities of union members during a strike and therefore the Supreme Court should "defer" to the judgment of the NLRB.

A stinging dissent, written by Justice Harry A. Blackmun, attacked the court majority for having "supinely" deferred to a policy the NLRB itself adopted by divided vote and which cannot be supported either by the language or the declared goals of the National Labor Relations Act.

In a comparable vein, the AFL-CIO's comment on the Supreme Court action was that "the Reagan labor board is not worthy of such trust by the courts." It said the present NLRB has shown a "fervent desire to restrict union self-government and to weaken the ability of unions to improve wages and working conditions through effective strikes."

The case at hand involved one of the AFL-CIO's smallest affiliates, the Pattern Makers' League. As in some other unions, its members voted to adopt a constitutional provision that banned resignations during or just before a strike.

That provision was brought into play during a strike against an employers' association in the Rockford, Ill., and Beloit, Wis., areas. During the course of the strike, 10 members broke ranks and returned to work after submitting resignations which the union refused to accept. After the strike was settled, the union fined the scabs an amount equal to their earnings as strikebreakers. The NLRB, with two holdover board members dissenting, ruled that the workers could not be barred from resigning during a strike and therefore could not be fined by the union.

The ruling is one of a series in which the NLRB has moved further and further to an anti-union position through the votes of Reagan appointees. Last June, when only one pre-Reagan member was left on the board, it adopted an even stronger curb on

Auto Workers ratify 1st pact at GM-Toyota plant

Fremont, Calif.—Unionized workers at New United Motor Manufacturing, Inc., (NUMMI), a joint venture of General Motors Corp. and the Toyota Corp., overwhelmingly ratified their first contract.

The three-year pact, which took effect July 1, was approved by 92 percent of those voting. NUMMI, which employs some 1,200 members of the Auto Workers, began production of Chevrolet Novas last December.

The agreement calls for pay rates that are in line with the rest of the auto industry. Workers will receive a 2.25-percent increase, effective July 1 and lump-sum payments equaling 2.5 percent of pay in the second year and 2.7 percent in the third year.

The first-year increase alone will raise the hourly rate for assemblers by 28 cents, to $13.28, and for skilled workers by 40 cents to $15.95.

Workers also will receive a $180 bonus for ratifying the agreement and will be paid for a half-hour lunch break.

Non-economic terms include a job security provision described by the union as "a virtual guarantee of no layoffs," as well as

U.S. trade deficit takes new leap

The nation's trading deficit with other countries widened by $12.7 billion in May, the second highest total on record, and threatened the economy with further job losses.

The Commerce Dept., in reporting the red ink, said imports rose in May to a near-record $30.1 billion while exports fell to their lowest level in 15 months.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said this year's deficit would easily surpass last year's record $123.3 billion deficit and could go as high as $150 billion.

Government and trade officials estimate that every $1 billion in trade represents about 30,000 jobs. On that basis, last year's deficit cost the country about 3.7-million jobs.

May exports declined by 2.1 percent over their April level to $17.4 billion. That was the smallest level since February 1984.

Baldrige told reporters that the nation's trade problems are tied to the continued overvaluation of the American dollar, which makes U.S. goods more expensive abroad and encourages imports by making them less expensive.

Much of the decline in exports was attributable to a 17-percent dip in U.S. farm shipments, mostly in soybeans, tobacco, and corn.

Rise in shipments

U.S. shipments of manufactured goods were up slightly to $21.2 billion in May, but not enough to offset the drop in farm exports.

The May trading deficit of $12.67 billion compared with a gap of $11.85 billion in April, and occurred even with a slight decline of 1.1 percent in petroleum imports.

Increased imports from western Europe accounted for a major part of the difference. The deficit with Europe widened to $2.77 billion in May from $1.66 billion in April. The U.S. trade gap with Japan was $4.24 billion, even though Japanese car imports fell 9.3 percent in May. In April, the deficit with Japan was $4.03 billion.

The nation's deficit with Mexico totaled $492 million in May, down sharply from $703 million in April. The gap with Taiwan widened to $1.21 billion from $1.13 billion.

Import increases were largest in clothing chemicals, and aircraft.

The flood of imports into the United States already has virtually destroyed such industries as color television, shoes, cameras, and farm equipment.

Organized labor has called for a national trade policy that would afford U.S. manufacturers protection against the unfair trading practices of other countries.

Guild convention calls for curbs on concentration of media power

Pittsburgh—Pointing to the recent "burst of ownership consolidation" in the mass communications industry, The Newspaper Guild's 52nd annual convention called for congressional action to limit the portion of the market "any single media company can control."

In doing so, the convention said, Congress should "take a fresh look" at the proposal raised a half-dozen years ago by the Guild and others. It would put a ceiling on the number of newspapers or the total amount of circulation that could be under the control of any one firm. To avoid infringement on the First Amendment, newspapers established—rather than purchased—by the company owning them would be excluded from the limits.

The convention acted after TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., warned in his opening address that while mergers and takeovers in the industry are serious in themselves, a new development makes action even more pressing.

"The growing threat of an industry dominated by bankers and big investors is troubling enough," Perlik said, "but an even more ominous threat, long implicit in media concentration, is now becoming explicit.

"That danger is the use of these unprecedented concentrations of media power for political propaganda purposes." He pointed to Sen. Jesse Helms's announced aim of seeing CBS turned into "the Conservative Broadcasting System," as Perlik put it, and Rev. Sun Myung Moon's efforts to use the financial resources of his Unification Church to turn the Washington Times into a national newspaper.

"Efforts to use the media in this way can be contained. . .as long as we are dealing with groups of limited size and influence," Perlik said, "but mix the Helms/Moon brand of political ambition with a newspaper chain grown to a third or more of the nation's circulation, mostly in one-newspaper markets, and you have an engine of enormous destructive potential to our democracy."

Change in venue

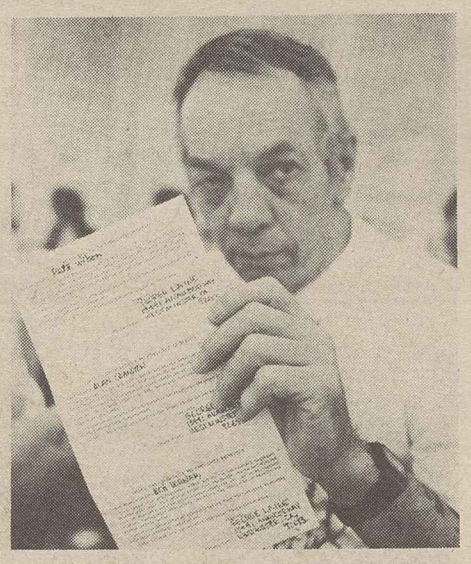
The convention met at the Hilton Hotel after earlier having been scheduled for the William Penn, part of the Westin chain, which is owned by the same corporation as United Airlines. The convention was moved at the end of May when there appeared to be no end in sight in the Air Line Pilots strike against United.

Delegates heard thanks and praise for the shift of convention sites in appearances by Air Line Pilots Sec. Charles J. Pierce and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

The 231 delegates and alternates representing 62 locals also re-elected the union's two top officers—Perlik to his ninth term as president and Charles Dale to his fourth as secretary-treasurer—and elected or re-elected 10 of 13 vice presidents. Contests for the other three will be resolved through membership referendum in September as will a contest between incumbent International Chairperson Harry S. Culver of Oklahoma City and challenger Lou Mleczko of Detroit.



In one of a series of actions on a multi-faceted finance program recommended by the union's executive board, the convention also increased the upper limit of the Guild's Defense Fund by $1 million, to $6 million, and approved a period of higher dues to build the fund beginning Aug. 1.

Delegates also endorsed and sent to membership referendum, to be held after Jan. 31, related proposals that would increase the union's strike benefits and its minimum dues schedule.

In other actions, the convention also:

- Condemned various proposals of Congress that would tax employee benefits, terming them "unwise, unfair and totally unwarranted."
- Declared the Guild's support for the Civil Rights Restoration Act of 1985, which would restore the scope and coverage of four civil rights acts weakened by the Supreme Court's Grove City decision.
- Warned against efforts to increase exemptions from the federal Freedom of Information Act contained in a pair of bills before Congress, one sponsored by Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) and the other by Sen. Jeremiah Denton (R-Ala.).
- Urged the Reagan Administration to "abandon all ideas" of trying to secure any form of "official secrets act" either through legislation or interpretation of existing laws.
- "The United States does not need an Official Secrets Act, which would penalize the disclosure of information involving neither espionage nor intent to damage the nation's interest," the convention said, pointing out that the Pentagon Papers case showed such a statute actually would suppress information of vital concern to the body politic.
- Called for press organizations and governments around the globe to condemn "in a voice so loud it will be heard even in Tehran" the repression of basic human rights and press freedom by Iran's Khomeini regime.
- Endorsed an anti-apartheid bill before Congress which would ban new investment in South Africa, prohibit U.S. bank loans to that nation's government, stop the sale of its gold coins in the U.S. and end export of computers to South Africa.

The bill also should call for the abolition of preventive detention laws used by the South African government to harass, intimidate and imprison union leaders there, the convention said.

George Laine, president of the Los Angeles Guild and one of its delegates to the TNG convention, displays his copies of postcards filled out by the delegates calling on their senators and representatives for defeat of proposals to tax the value of employer-paid health care and other benefits for workers.

American Motors contract set for ratification ballot

Milwaukee—The Auto Workers reached tentative agreement with American Motors Corp. on new three-year contracts covering some 5,800 workers at the firm's facilities here and in Kenosha, Wis.

The accord was hammered out June 28 and approved by the executive boards of UAW Locals 72 at Kenosha and 75 at Milwaukee. Membership ratification votes are scheduled July 6 and 7. A majority of workers at each plant must approve the contracts for them to go into effect.

AMC, the nation's No. 5 automobile maker, said that if the pacts are ratified it will drop plans to close the two plants. The ailing firm earlier had said it would close down car-making operations in Kenosha employing 5,500 hourly workers by next July and its small Milwaukee stamping plant employing 300 by September.

Under the new agreement, the typical assembly worker would earn 50 to 60 cents an hour less than under the old agreement. At about $13 an hour, the average wage would be slightly below pay levels at General Motors Corp., and Ford Motor Co.

The agreement also calls for elimination of several vacation days and some work rule changes that management had sought. In exchange for these concessions, AMC pledged to continue making its Alliance and Encore subcompacts at Kenosha, and to provide an $18-million job-security program that would prevent layoffs due to new technology, farming out of component production, or negotiated productivity improvements.

The union's existing contracts with the company expire Sept. 16. AMC had asked for early negotiations because of financial problems. The company lost $20 million in the first three months of this year.

Supreme Court backs ILA on container-loading rules

Container-handling rules negotiated by the Longshoremen in contracts covering Atlantic and Gulf Coast ports are lawful work preservation measures, not illegal secondary boycotts, the Supreme Court ruled in a 6-3 decision.

Under contracts negotiated—and renegotiated—by the ILA, the union's members have the right to load and unload consolidated container cargoes moving to and from points within 50 miles of a port.

The Supreme Court first dealt with the issue in 1980, after the National Labor Relations Board had held that the container loading requirement amounted to an illegal secondary boycott. The court reversed the NLRB, noting that preservation of work for union members is a lawful objective, and sent the case back to the labor board for further consideration.

The ILA won only a partial victory in the NLRB reconsideration, but its contract was upheld by the U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Now, the Supreme Court has backed the appellate court and confirmed the ILA's right to negotiate a container agreement.

The 6-3 decision by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., said the "relevant" fact is that the union's objective was to preserve work that had been done by its members and it had no unlawful motive.

Brennan noted that the rules being challenged were shaped through collective bargaining as "a negotiated compromise of a volatile problem bearing directly on the well-being of our national economy."

Justice William H. Rehnquist dissented, joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger and Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. Rehnquist argued that the ILA was illegally trying to usurp new work rather than merely trying to preserve existing work.

Meeting site changed for Tulsa conference

The site of the AFL-CIO regional conference in Tulsa, Okla., has been changed from the Sheraton Kensington Hotel to the Westin Hotel Williams Center.

The meeting date of July 13-14 remains the same, and all times for conference sessions remain unchanged.

Conference participants who had pre-registered for the meeting and who had sent in hotel registration cards to the Sheraton by July 1 will have their room reservations honored by the Westin Williams Center. Participants who had not made room reservations or who have not registered for the conference can make reservations through the AFL-CIO Facilities Management Dept. and should call that department directly.

'One-on-One' campaign set for three-state tryout

If the three-state pilot program in "One-on-One" training goes as well as the AFL-CIO thinks it will, "We have in our hands one of the vehicles for the resurgence of the American trade union movement," Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the newly formed national advisory committee for the program.

Donahue spoke June 28 to 25 representatives of unions with major membership in the One-on-One pilot states of Georgia, Missouri and Idaho. The advisory committee met at AFL-CIO headquarters, along with the AFL-CIO regional directors and state federation officers from the three states.

The meeting filled out details of a program announced by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at the May meeting of the federation's Executive Council as undertaking the "systematic training of several thousand local officers, stewards and activists to reach out to the membership in face-to-face conversations."

In a subsequent letter to all union presidents, Kirkland said the One-on-One program "goes to the heart of recommendations by the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work on membership participation."

Donahue said that, in addition to the national committee, an advisory committee is being formed in each of the three states from trade unionists nominated by their unions.

The program provides:

- Coordinators already hired by the three state AFL-CIOs and trained in a week-long session in Washington, D.C., in May. There will be three each for Georgia and Idaho and five coordinators for Missouri.
- Organizers to be chosen in consultation with the advisory committees and trained by the coordinators during the summer of 1985 in one-day meetings, usually on Saturdays.
- Canvassers recruited by the organizers in numbers sufficient to provide one canvasser for each 20 union members. Each organizer will be responsible for 10 canvassers, whose training requires about two hours. A local with 4,000 members thus would have 20 organizers and about 200 canvassers, but a unit of 100 might have only one organizer and five canvassers, since no one formula could be expected to fit all the different union membership patterns.

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to Kirkland, said the program will be adjusted to fit participating unions whose structure and membership location in the state might vary widely.

Dick Wilson, coordinator of the One-on-One program, told the advisory committee meeting that the program will begin with a survey of membership opinions and that subsequent surveys or training sessions would require two-hour meetings similar to the original canvasser training. Wilson said the program could anticipate three or four such sessions a year, depending on the urgency of state or national concerns that arise.

He said the AFL-CIO pilot project will draw on the experience of the Machinists nationwide and the Electrical Workers in Florida. He said the success of the IBEW in signing up non-members in Florida, a "right-to-work" state, was a major result of the union's One-on-One program.

Young said that four departments of the AFL-CIO—organizing, COPE, legislative and education—will have major roles in the program. Videotapes are in preparation to help with the training, and Larry Kirkman, executive director of the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, said issues discussion can also be aided by videotapes. He said sales figures on home video recorders indicate one-fourth of union households have them now and one-half will have them by 1990.

Ongoing assistance

Wilson and Edgar Czarnecki of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education said they will continue to assist the first training of organizers until that process can be turned over to the coordinators.

Training of organizers should be under way in Georgia and Missouri by late July. Jim Kerns, president of the Idaho AFL-CIO, said his state is ahead of that schedule because names and addresses were available for the 3,000 Idaho trade union activists who successfully circulated petitions to delay the effective date of the state legislature's "right-to-work" measure until the November 1986 ballot.

The Promise of the Wagner Act

By Henry C. Fleisher

THE FOURTH OF JULY weekend in 1935 was a scorcher, and in the torrid summer atmosphere of Washington in the era before air conditioning, even President Franklin D. Roosevelt couldn't round up an appropriate collection of dignitaries for a bill-signing ceremony.

So, on July 5, the president signed the Wagner Labor Relations Act into law in the privacy of his White House living quarters. He used two pens, the New York Times reported, and directed that one be given to Sen. Robert S. Wagner of New York, the father of the new labor-management relations law, and the other to President William Green of the AFL, the spearhead of the effort to get that bill enacted by Congress.

The bill as it became law was formally called the National Labor Relations Act. During its passage through the congressional process it had been known as the Wagner-Connery Labor Disputes bill, honoring both the veteran New York senator who sponsored a series of New Deal legislative measures, and Rep. William (Billy) Connery of Massachusetts, the chairman of the House Labor Committee.

The measure which they steered through Congress in less than six months in 1935 was drafted on the basis of two years of experience with a series of experiments in labor-management relations which formed an important part of Franklin Roosevelt's efforts to pull the nation out of the disastrous malaise of the Great Depression.

A Big Step Forward

What the Wagner Act provided—and what the American public today takes pretty much for granted—was regarded in 1935 by many employers, corporate lawyers and editorial observers as downright radical and dangerously revolutionary.

Nevertheless, the "time has come," the Senate Labor Committee had said in reporting out the Wagner bill in May 1935, for the government to make a "clean decision": either to withdraw the governmental support of collective bargaining contained in Section 7-A of the 1933 National Industrial Recovery Act, or else to "implement it by effective legislation."

That implementation, translated into the words of the Wagner Act, guaranteed the right of employees to "form, join or assist labor organizations"; it barred employers from various practices designed to coerce, intimidate or discourage employees from exercising their union rights; it outlawed company unions organized, financed or directed by employers; it made an unfair labor practice of an employer's refusal to bargain collectively with a union chosen by a majority of employees in the bargaining unit; and it gave official status to the National Labor Relations Board as the agency to administer and enforce the law. Furthermore, it gave the NLRB access to the U.S. courts to back up its decisions against law violators.

This is "Labor's Magna Charta," said an elated William Green of the AFL when the bill was signed by the President.

"Clearly unconstitutional" was the general reaction of the business community and its corporate lawyers.

"A better relationship between labor and management is the high purpose of this act," President Roosevelt said in his formal statement issued after he signed the bill into law on July 5. He added:

"By assuring the employees the right of collective bargaining, it fosters the development of the employment contract on a sound and equitable basis. By preventing practices which tend to destroy the independence of labor, it seeks, for every worker within its scope, that freedom of choice and action which is justly his."

A Half-Way Mark

The Wagner Act of 1935 was no test-tube baby. It was not produced in a laboratory isolated from the real world of the Depression and the surging conflicts of the Roosevelt New Deal. In fact, its passage by Congress was about the half-way mark in a process of giving status and clear-cut legality to the activities of American unions.

Twenty-eight months earlier, the New Deal had come into being on Mar. 4, 1933—Inauguration Day—when Franklin Roosevelt took the oath of office as chief executive of an economically paralyzed nation.

From July 1935, when the law went on the books, it took close to another two years before the Supreme Court—to the surprise and dismay of the opponents of labor and the Wagner Act—held that "Labor's Magna Charta" was indeed completely constitutional.

Prior to 1933 the amount of federal government concern with unions and the collective bargaining process was less than overwhelming. The Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1893 and the later Clayton Act both held that labor—the work of human beings—was not a "commodity," and that unions in the pursuit of bona fide collective bargaining could not be considered either a conspiracy or a monopolistic restraint of trade.

In 1916, and again in 1926, Congress provided legislative status for the railway brotherhoods by establishing ground rules for union representation and collective bargaining on the railroad network that was then America's pre-eminent transportation system. The Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act of 1932 barred federal judges from issuing injunctions against labor unions in labor disputes and thus curbed what had been perceived as a pro-employer bias in the federal judiciary. But there weren't many other federal labor laws.

The author, Henry C. Fleisher, was director of publicity for the CIO and director of publications for the merged AFL-CIO until 1958. He has since worked as a public relations representative and counsel to unions and non-profit organizations.

The big step forward came in 1933 with the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, designed to pull the nation's economy out of the slough of depression. Its goal was to end the cut-throat competition and sweatshop wage levels that had led to unemployment for millions of Americans and the impoverishment of most of those who had somehow managed still to have jobs.

How bad were those working conditions? Terrible. In 1935 the average wage in manufacturing was under $27 a week, which even at the price levels of the 1930s didn't produce much buying power. And in 1938—five years after FDR took office—the new minimum wage law provided for only a 25-cents-an-hour minimum rate, or $10 for a 40-hour week. In the Depression, hourly wages for many workers were measured in pennies.

The core of the 1933 National Industrial Recovery Act was a plan to revive the economy, to restore fair competition, and to eliminate the worst of the practices that had developed in the struggle for employer survival during the Depression. The law authorized employers in each industry to come together to create a code of fair practices under the umbrella of the government's National Recovery Administration. Envisioning labor unions as a partner in this process, Congress in Section 7-A of the National Recovery Act proclaimed labor's right to organize and bargain collectively through representatives of the workers' own choosing.

This was welcome and heady language for a union movement that had barely survived Depression unemployment and the anti-union crusade of big corporations that had started with the so-called American plan right after World War I. AFL President Green hailed Section 7-A as a "charter of industrial freedom" which was offered to the nation's workers "for the first time in their lives."

Unions that still had resources were able to take advantage of the new mood of the times. They made sensational headway in organizing and re-organizing workers in their industries. The United Mine Workers, led by John L. Lewis, used most of the remaining dollars in the union treasury to mount a whirlwind organizing drive in the mines. The same resurgence happened in the Ladies' Garment Workers, headed by David Dubinsky, and the men's Clothing Workers, under the leadership of Sidney Hillman. Similar if less spectacular growth patterns were created in other unions. Without question the NRA and its Section 7-A literally rescued the American trade union movement from the Depression's debilitation.

But the offsetting weakness in the language of Section 7-A soon became apparent. Its welcome words of encouragement for union organization and collective bargaining were balanced by a lack of enforcement power. In industries where the revived labor unions were strong, that weakness of 7-A was less pronounced than in industries where unions were new and struggling to survive, or lacked essential strength compared to their employers.

For instance, the code for the largely unorganized auto industry provided that auto companies could hire, keep and promote employees "on the basis of their individual merit"; management was in no mood to share this decision-making power with a union. That left labor-management relations, such as they were, heavily weighted in the employer's favor.

In the newspaper industry, a case involving one Dean Jennings of Hearst's San Francisco Call-Bulletin was, at FDR's order, removed from consideration by the National Labor Relations Board and turned over to the publisher-dominated Newspaper Code Authority. Heywood Broun, the newspaper columnist and founding president of the Newspaper Guild, commented angrily that Roosevelt had "surrendered. The publishers cracked down and FDR cracked up."

The Demise of the NRA

But both the good and the bad associated with the NRA's Section 7-A came to an abrupt halt in May 1935 when the Supreme Court ruled in the famous case of Schechter v. U.S. that the entire NRA was unconstitutional, lock, stock and barrel.

Fortunately, Sen. Wagner had drawn up a bill in 1934 designed to close some of the loopholes that were creating disillusion with Section 7-A on the part of many union officers. At FDR's request, he had withdrawn the bill, but in February 1935 he reintroduced it in a new version. On May 16, 1935, less than a fortnight before the Supreme Court handed down its Schechter decision, the Senate voted by a whopping 63-12 margin to approve the new labor-management relations bill.

At this point, President Roosevelt had not yet committed himself to any position on the Wagner bill. About a week later, the President met at the White House with AFL President Green, John L. Lewis of the Mine Workers, Sidney Hillman of the Clothing Workers, Sec. of Labor Frances Perkins and Donald Richberg, the rather controversial administrator of the NRA. When the meeting ended, FDR publicly announced his support for early passage of the measure by the Congress; that provided powerful momentum for the bill.

In less than a month, on June 20, Rep. Connery's companion labor-management relations bill moved through the House by a vote of 127-87. The House bill provided that the NLRB would function in the Dept. of Labor, rather than as the independent agency provided by the Senate bill. It also contained a provision that no union contract could be signed that covered employees of more than one employer. Both these proposals were defeated quickly in the joint Senate-House conference committee, and the completed bill went to President Roosevelt late on June 27.

The heavy margins for final passage of the two versions of the bill should not be regarded as indicating that the new labor-management relations act was passed as some sort of gift to the AFL. Far from it. The opposition from corporate America was both strident and sustained, and it was spiced with dire predictions of doom for America if the bill passed.

The AFL and its unions, however, worked steadily and determinedly to overcome this opposition and to win passage of an effective labor-management relations law. On Apr. 29, 1935, for example, the federation sponsored an unprecedented one-day meeting in Washington of representatives of its international unions and state and local central bodies. After a day of vigorous oratory, the conference adopted a resolution strongly calling for passage of the Wagner-Connery Labor Disputes Act. In addition, it offered a priority list of other bills: a 30-hour-week measure, which in greatly revised form in 1938 became the Fair Labor Standards Act; the Guffey Coal Stabilization Act, strongly supported by the Mine Workers, and a new National Recovery Act rewritten to get around the Supreme Court's objections to the earlier law. That did not pass.

Of the labor law, the AFL conference said that its experience in the previous two years showed it was "imperative" that the principles of union rights to organize and bargain collectively "must be definitely declared by Congress instead of being left to the constructions, interpretations and evasions which we have experienced under the administration of the NRA."

The bill signed into law by FDR on July 5, 1935, was designed to accomplish precisely that.

Intense Employer Resistance

Resistance to the labor law, criticism of its provisions and mournful predictions about its impact on American democracy became the order of the day. The National Association of Manufacturers took a leading role in the opposition. (Before the bill was passed, the NAM in desperation had proposed a $20 billion private fund to provide jobs in industry if Congress would only reject the Wagner bill; nobody took the "offer" very seriously.)

Alfred P. Sloan, the head of General Motors, offered his solemn view that the law was unconstitutional. A group of 53 corporation lawyers "took upon themselves," in the bitter words of Sen. Wagner, "the responsibility of usurping the functions of the Supreme Court" by deciding that in their opinion the new labor law was unconstitutional. Tom Girdler, the bitterly outspoken head of Republic Steel, said he'd quit his job and go back to the farm to pick apples if the law was found to be constitutional. (It was, and he didn't.)

So, in light of the record of the Supreme Court in knocking down a variety of New Deal legislative actions, it came as a shocking surprise to many Americans, legal experts and laymen alike, when on Apr. 12, 1937, the Supreme Court, in a series of decisions involving five separate cases, upheld the Wagner Act by 5-4 margins. Perhaps the most significant of these was the case involving Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., in which Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes wrote the majority decision approving the Wagner Act as falling under the constitutional provision that Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce.

Sen. Wagner, in what the New York Times described as "one of the happiest days in his public career," appealed to both labor and management to march together "toward a clearer atmosphere of mutual understanding and good will."

America's working people did benefit tremendously from the legislation, and the Wagner Act was without question an important factor in the growth of labor unions in the years that followed. But the instances of employer good-faith observance of the law were matched by challenges and evasions. By and large, and with only a few notable exceptions, corporate America did what it felt it had to do at the direction of the NLRB and the courts: appeal NLRB and court decisions, then reluctantly obey the law and do not much more.

LABOR LAW TURNED UPSIDE DOWN

By David M. Silberman

THIS YEAR marks the fiftieth anniversary of the enactment of the Wagner Act. Those of us who are engaged in the task of representing workers and their labor organizations cannot join in any celebration of this anniversary. For we know—and I say "we" because there is an extraordinary degree of consensus among union lawyers on this point—that, as the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations recently concluded, "labor law has failed." We agree with the subcommittee that "the evidence is clear that the law does not encourage collective bargaining. Rather it has become an impediment. It is equally clear that workers who favor unionization are not protected from retaliation and discrimination, but instead are subject to intimidation and unequal treatment...." Indeed, as the subcommittee observed, "perhaps the most striking evidence of the law's failure is that... unions, which exist to engage in collective bargaining, are calling for repeal of the law that is intended to encourage that process."

Part of the reason that the Wagner Act has failed is because of structural deficiencies in the Act—deficiencies that allow adjudicative proceedings to be unduly delayed and that provide inadequate remedies for violations of the Act. But an equally important explanation is that the current members of the Labor Board have proved themselves unwilling or unable to administer the Act in a fair and impartial manner.

David M. Silberman is associate general counsel of the AFL-CIO. This article is drawn from a speech he made to the Labor-Management Conference, Northern Kentucky University, May 22, 1985.

That is the only conclusion that can be fairly drawn from the record of the Labor Board under its current chairman, Donald Dotson.

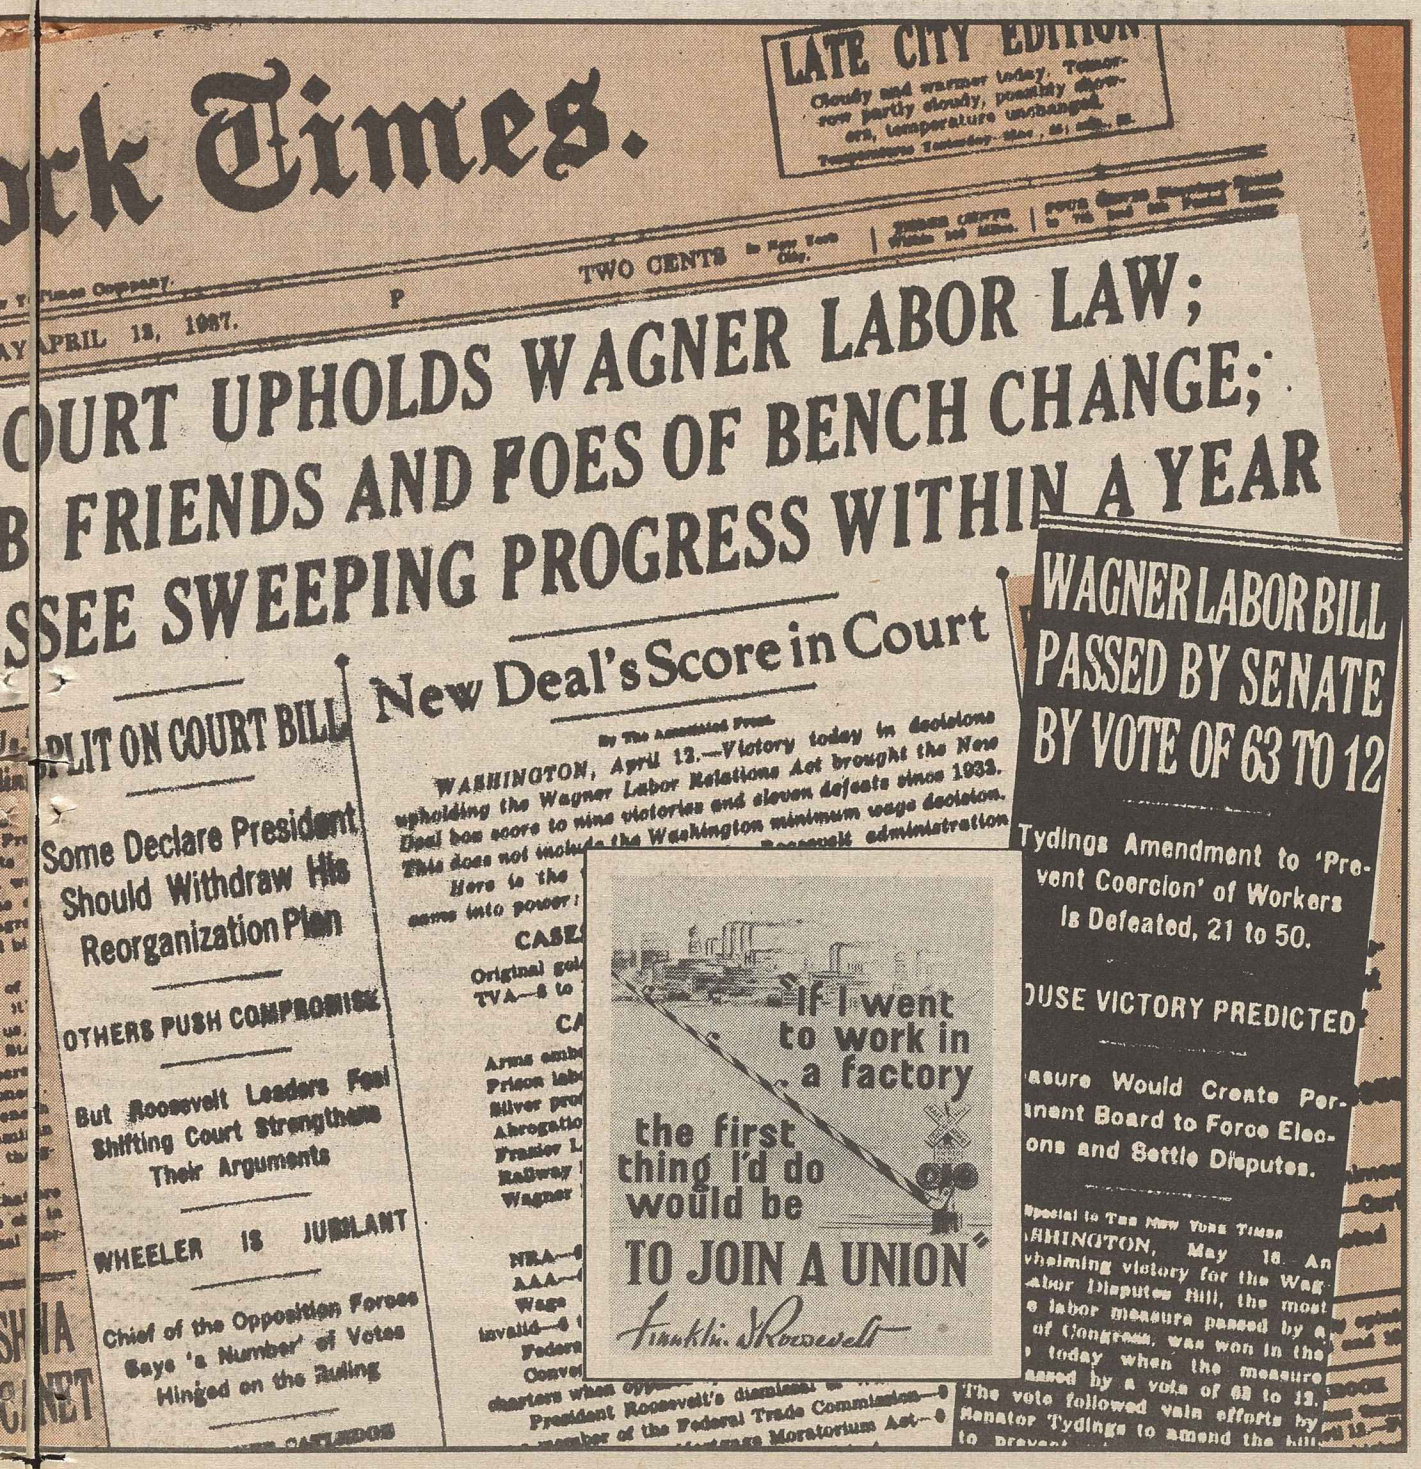
It is not surprising that a Labor Board chaired by Dotson has proved itself incapable of impartiality. Before obtaining his present position, Dotson expressed perceptions of labor relations which reveal how distorted are the lenses through which he sees the labor-management world. For example, in Dotson's world, "in both the public and private sectors, the strike has come to mean not merely a concerted withholding of labor but a concerted effort employing violence, intimidation and political intervention to prevent people who want to work from working." In other words, Dotson sees strike misconduct not simply as an occasional unfortunate occurrence but as what a strike "has come to mean."

Even more telling are the attitudes Dotson expressed about collective bargaining before being appointed to the NLRB. To Dotson collective bargaining "frequently means labor monopoly, the destruction of individual freedom and the destruction of the marketplace as the mechanism for determining the value of labor." Yet the very purpose of the National Labor Relations Act is, as the preamble states, to "encourage the practice and procedure of collective bargaining." Moreover, Congress sought to foster collective bargaining precisely because it concluded that the "marketplace"—that is, the balance between the number of workers and the number of jobs—should not determine whether workers would be paid a decent wage for their labor and because Congress recognized that a worker does not enjoy any "individual freedom" when attempting to negotiate individually with his employer. As Sen. Wagner explained, Congress viewed the right to bargain collectively as "a veritable charter of freedom of contract; without it there would be slavery by contract."

The short of the matter is that the principal responsibility for administering the Wagner Act has been entrusted to a man who is hostile both to the fundamental purposes of the Act and to labor organizations which seek to promote those aims. And under Dotson's leadership, the Labor Board has proceeded to systematically subvert the purposes of the law.

Most of the discussion of the Dotson board's record has focused on its decisions in the so-called lead cases—the cases in which the board has overruled past precedents and adopted new legal rules. As former board member Donald Zimmerman has observed: "never in the history of the Labor Board have so many major established principles been overruled as in 1984, when a new majority began its revisionist course." Indeed, in just six months the board issued 24 decisions in which precedents were overruled. In each instance, the rule that was overturned was one that facilitated collective activity; the rule that was adopted retarded such activity. For example, in its lead cases the Dotson board has made it easier for employers to chill organizing activity; easier for employers to avoid bargaining with the representative of their employees; more difficult for workers to support a strike in another bargaining unit; more difficult for unions to pool their strength through affiliations and mergers; and more difficult for unions to maintain unity during concerted activity. Prof. Charles Morris, the editor of the leading treatise on labor law, summarized the import of these decisions well when he stated: They "infringe upon the specific objectives which Congress wrote into the Act."

But while these lead cases are important, in my view the focus on the lead cases obscures the critical failing of the Dotson board. For the fact of the matter is that 50 years after the enactment of the Wagner Act, most of the important principles are so well-settled as to be beyond the reach of even this board. The major function of the Labor Board is to apply settled rules to the hundreds upon hundreds of run-of-the-mill cases that come before the board each year. The critical test of the board is whether it performs this task in an even-handed fashion. The Dotson board flunks the test dismally; its result orientation is so strong as to preclude impartial adjudication.



Perhaps the best evidence of this fact is statistical analyses we at the AFL-CIO have done comparing the performance of the Dotson board with the performance of past boards, Republican and Democratic alike. Those analyses demonstrate how radically pro-employer the current board is.

We first reviewed the more than 1,200 decisions issued by the Labor Board from September 1975-August 1976. That was the board that was in office at the end of eight years of Republican rule. All members of that board had been appointed by Presidents Nixon or Ford. And three members of that board—Chairman Betty Murphy and Members John Penello and Peter Walther—either came from or left to join management labor law firms.

What we found in reviewing the Murphy board's record is that in contested cases involving unfair labor practice claims against employers, the Murphy Board found the employer guilty of all or most of the violations alleged in the complaint in 84 percent of the cases. That is not especially surprising. After all, unfair labor practice complaints are issued only by the general counsel (and not by private litigants) and the general counsel does not act unless an investigation has found reasonable cause to believe a violation has occurred. Thus one would expect the general counsel—like any public prosecutor—to prevail in most cases he or she elects to bring. Indeed, when we examined the record of the Labor Board in 1979-1980—when, following four years of Democratic rule, most of the board's members had been appointed by President Carter—we found that the board, chaired by John Fanning, ruled for the general counsel in contested cases against employers with precisely the same frequency as had the Murphy board in 1975-1976.

The record of the Dotson board, on the other hand, is very different. From September 1983 to August 1984—a 12-month period in which persons appointed by President Reagan constituted a majority of the board—the general counsel substantially prevailed against an employer in only 51 percent of the contested cases. And from January to March 1985—the first three months after Member Zimmerman left the board, leaving it exclusively in the hands of Reagan appointees—the general counsel substantially prevailed against employers in only 43 percent of the contested cases. This means that in substance employers now win 57 percent of the contested cases, as compared to 16 percent in 1975-1976—a threefold increase in the percentage of cases decided favorably to employers.

Lest anyone think that these numbers somehow reflect a decline in the competency of the general counsel's office in prosecuting cases in the past year, it should be noted that in cases against unions, the general counsel's success rate has actually increased

Tracking U.S. Labor Law

The labor legislation of the 1930s sought to protect workers against predatory employers and hostile judges.

Before the Wagner Act, the Norris-LaGuardia Act in 1932 outlawed yellow-dog contracts—the infamous practice of requiring job applicants to sign a pledge not to join a union—and severely limited court injunctions against strikes and peaceful union activities.

But the political swing to the right that followed the New Deal era also tilted the balance on labor legislation. The most significant change was enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1947—over President Truman's veto—by the first Republican-controlled Congress since the early years of the Hoover Administration.

The new law was in the form of amendments to the National Labor Relations Act, but the emphasis was on giving new weapons to employers to resist unions. One of its provisions empowered states to outlaw union shop agreements through so-called right-to-work laws.

In 1959, Congress added new restrictions on unions through the Landrum-Griffin Act, which had begun its legislative life as a reform bill which sought to remove some of the inequities of the Taft-Hartley Act while assuring democratic procedures within unions. The final version eliminated some clearly unworkable provisions of Taft-Hartley but had the net effect of weakening unions at the bargaining table.

Twice since then bills to bring labor legislation closer to the goals of the original Wagner Act passed the House but were stopped by filibusters in the Senate. That's what happened with the bill to repeal the ''right-to-work'' provision of the Taft-Hartley Act in 1965 and the labor law reform bill in 1978. In 1974, Congress partially remedied the Taft-Hartley Act's exclusion of most hospital workers from coverage. The next year it passed a long-sought bill to remove picketing restrictions at construction sites. President Ford's veto of the measure led to the resignation of John T. Dunlop as Secretary of Labor.

since the days of the Murphy board. The Dotson board rules for the general counsel and against unions in 86 percent of the contested cases brought against unions. That means that the Dotson board finds substantial violations by unions at a rate exactly twice as great as the rate at which it finds violations by employers.

These statistics demonstrate that what we are witnessing from the current board is not, as some have suggested, a cyclical swing to the right following four years of Democratic rule. To the contrary, the current board is radically different from its predecessors, Republican and Democratic alike, in the anti-union bias it brings to even the run-of-the-mill cases. And as the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations stated in its report last year: ''These tendencies lead to results as devastating in their impact on the individual employees whose rights are at issue—and as potentially chilling in their effect on those employees' co-workers—as any of the more widely reported decisions overruling established board doctrines.''

One area in which the board's biases have been clearly manifest has been with respect to employer conduct during organizing campaigns. Perhaps no principle is more fundamental to the Act than the rule that an employer may not threaten union supporters with adverse consequences for supporting a union. The current board has not—indeed could not—openly overturn this rule. But instead the board all too often has made a mockery of that principle by donning blinders so thick, it cannot see even the most transparent of threats by an employer. For example, in the Dotson board's view, an employer's statement that while we live in America the employer ''was a Yugoslavian company and the employees would not have a union'' was merely a statement of the employer's ''opinion about the likelihood of employees opting for unionization'' and such a statement would ''not have a tendency to coerce employees.'' Similarly, to the Dotson board, a supervisor's statement the day after an organizing campaign began that the company president was photographing employees so he ''could remember the employees after they were fired for union activity'' was not coercive as it could not reasonably have been taken seriously. And a manager's statement that ''if we are required to negotiate wages and benefits with this union,'' the company ''will insist on'' lowering the wages at the plant was not a threat as the board could ''discern no basis to warrant a conclusion that the employer improperly warned employees of a decrease in wages and benefits.''

Not surprisingly, the board has had less difficulty finding statements to be theatening when the statements were made by union representatives. For example, in one recent case the board found that a business agent had issued a threat when, in response to a question at a union meeting, the business agent truthfully stated that if union members worked alongside non-journeymen the union members could be subject to a fine if charges were filed; the fact that the business agent also stated that neither he nor any union officer would proffer such charges was of no consequence to the board. Similarly, in another case the board found a union guilty of threatening conduct when it told the employer that the union would assess a wage penalty on the employer because the union believed the employer had allowed bargaining unit work to be done by non-union employees.

The Dotson board has demonstrated a similar double standard in adjudicating cases involving election-related promises. Again, the fundamental rule is well-settled: an employer may not institute or promise new benefits during an organizing campaign because of the implicit message that the hand that giveth can taketh away if the employees defy the employer's wishes. But while paying lip service to this rule, the Dotson board found no violation when, on the day a recognition petition was filed, an employer announced two new holidays and increases in the company Keogh plan. The board faulted the administrative law judge who had found a violation in that case because, in the board's words, ''the judge based his conclusion on purely circumstantial evidence.'' The Dotson board likewise found no violation when, two days before an election, the employer paid a Thanksgiving bonus to all employees and announced a new stock option plan. But the board had no difficulty in overturning an election which was won by a union where on election day the union representative gave 25 employees jackets with the union insignia. Apparently the Dotson board believes that those who would otherwise oppose a union would be inclined to switch their votes after being given a union jacket (worth $16), but those who would favor a union would be unaffected by receiving a bonus, a stock option, or an enhanced pension plan from the employer.

The significance of decisions of this sort cannot be overstated. One measure of that significance is the fact that in each of the past two years, the number of workers who were added to union ranks through NLRB-conducted elections was roughly half of what it was in the years 1977-1980. While there are, of course, many factors that contribute to the labor movement's rate of success in organizing, it would be naive to pretend that the precipitous drop over the past four years—a drop unparalleled in recent history—was not in good measure due to the decisions of the Dotson board.

Of course, the organizing area is not the only one in which the Dotson board has manifested its biases; rather, the board has demonstrated an equal inability to apply honestly the rules governing an employer's bargaining obligations where the employer's employees have elected a bargaining representative. For example, one established rule to which the board has purported to adhere is the rule requiring an employer to bargain to impasse before the employer may institute unilateral changes in the terms and conditions of employment. Yet in one recent case the board found that an impasse was reached after only four bargaining sessions, even though those sessions had yielded a tentative agreement that was subject to ratification. The board explained that in its Alice-in-Wonderland world, ''an impasse may exist simultaneously with a tentative agreement.''

A second rule that is equally well-established is the rule requiring an employer who wishes unilateral changes to first propose these changes to the union in collective bargaining. Again, the board purports to accept this rule. But in another recent decision the board found that the employer had acted lawfully in implementing a higher hourly wage rate and a higher minimum weekly guaranteed rate than the employer had proposed to the union; it was sufficient for the Dotson board that the employer also instituted a new incentive plan and that, with the benefit of hindsight, it turned out that strike-replacements who received this new package actually earned no more money than had the strikers prior to the strike. Whether this was because of the new bonus plan, the new employees, or the strike remains uncertain; what is certain is that the union never had the opportunity to accept or reject this package, and that the board permitted this to occur.

The board has followed much the same tack with respect to the employer's duty to furnish information to the bargaining representative. The Dotson board claims to accept the principle that an employer must furnish relevant information to the union, and the Dotson board purports to apply the ''liberal, discovery-type standard'' required by board precedent. Yet in one recent case the board managed to apply that standard to uphold an employer's refusal to furnish information concerning operations at its non-union plant where, following the failure of concession bargaining at the employer's unionized plant, the employer shut down the unionized plant, reduced wages at the non-union plant, and continued operations at that plant. The Dotson board found no ''objective basis for believing that unit work was being diverted.''

There is one final illustration that best reveals the Dotson board at work. The case is called Creasey Company and it involved a plant shutdown. The employer in that case made a final and definitive decision to close his plant in late September; the employer contacted potential buyers for the business in early October and reached an agreement to sell in mid-October. But the union was never notified of the closing by the employer, and the union did not learn of the closing until four days before the closing was scheduled to occur at which time customers of the employer, who had been notified of the closing, informed the employer's employees.

The general counsel issued a complaint alleging that the employer had failed to bargain in good faith with the union over the effects of the closing decision. The general counsel relied on a long line of NLRB precedents—approved by the Supreme Court—requiring employers to engage in effects bargaining at a ''meaningful time.'' The administrative law judge found that the employer had breached its duty under these cases by delaying bargaining until the eve of the closing, at which time the union had no bargaining leverage remaining. But the Dotson board reversed the ALJ's decision, finding that the employer had provided ''reasonable notice to the union'' in light of the employer's justified concern ''with the possible immediate loss of its customers'' if the employer gave earlier notice. Thus, without purporting to change the law in any respect, the Dotson board transformed the requirement of notice at a meaningful time into a requirement of notice at a reasonable time. And to determine whether the timing of the notice was reasonable the Dotson board looked not to the statutary purpose of promoting bargaining but instead looked to the board members' personal agenda of easing burdens on employers. To the Dotson board the notice was reasonable precisely because it enabled the employer to carry out his business without disruption until the employer was ready to close. In short, in the guise of applying settled law the board actually nullified that law in order to save the employer from the inconvenience of having to deal with its employees.

Perhaps the best summary of the Dotson board's record is one my colleague Larry Cohen, general counsel of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., offered in a speech to the labor law section of the Pennsylvania Bar Association. Larry recalled the student of comparative law who reached the following conclusions, after studying the legal systems in four European countries: in France, all activity is permitted, except that which is prohibited; in Germany, all is prohibited, except that which is permitted; in Russia, all is prohibited, especially that which is permitted; and in Italy, all is permitted, especially that which is prohibited.

And Larry suggested that in the view of this board, it seems that all employer activity is permitted, especially that which most of us had thought for many decades was prohibited by the Act; and all union activity is prohibited, especially that which had been considered permitted.

In the short run, the obvious losers from the Dotson board's approach to labor relations are unions and workers. But in the long run, I submit, this approach is dangerous to employers and the public as well. For if, as is increasingly occurring, workers and labor leaders lose confidence in the Labor Board and in the rule of law, their only recourse will be to resort to economic force; indeed, most union lawyers already are advising their clients that it is futile to seek the aid of the NLRB and that they are better served by seeking other means of redress. This is precisely what the Wagner Act was designed to prevent.

An 'Affront' to Workers

IT WAS almost worth the adverse 5-4 decision of the Supreme Court in a case involving a union's claim on the loyalty of its members during a strike to bring forward the strong and eloquent dissenting opinion written by Justice Harry A. Blackmun.

As Justice Blackmun sees it, the NLRB, whose dubious judgment the Supreme Court "supinely" accepted, has lost sight of the goal of the National Labor Relations Act.

The law was enacted, Justice Blackmun reminds us, because Congress had "determined that the individual worker standing alone lacked efficient bargaining power to achieve a fair agreement with his employer over the terms and conditions of his employment."

Its intent, he stresses, is to protect the right of workers "to join together and act collectively." In furtherance of that aim, Congress specified that nothing in the law shall "impede or diminish in any way the right to strike."

A decision to strike is not lightly made, Justice Blackmun notes. But it is sometimes necessary because, as he puts it, "the strike or the threat of strike is the workers' most effective means of pressuring employers."

Justice Blackmun chides the court majority for treating so lightly the commitment a union member makes to his fellow workers. A union member is not "a juvenile or incompetent whose promise may not be enforced against him because it is presumed not to have been made with awareness of the consequences."

The court majority's conclusion that "freedom under the National Labor Relations Act means freedom to break a freely made promise to one's fellow workers after they have relied on that promise," he writes, is both in conflict with federal labor law and "an affront to the autonomy of the American worker."

The court's decision is not quite as great a blow to effective unionism as the Chamber of Commerce proclaims, but that is only because the overwhelming majority of union members understand and practice the solidarity that is at the heart of the labor movement.

Progress at GE

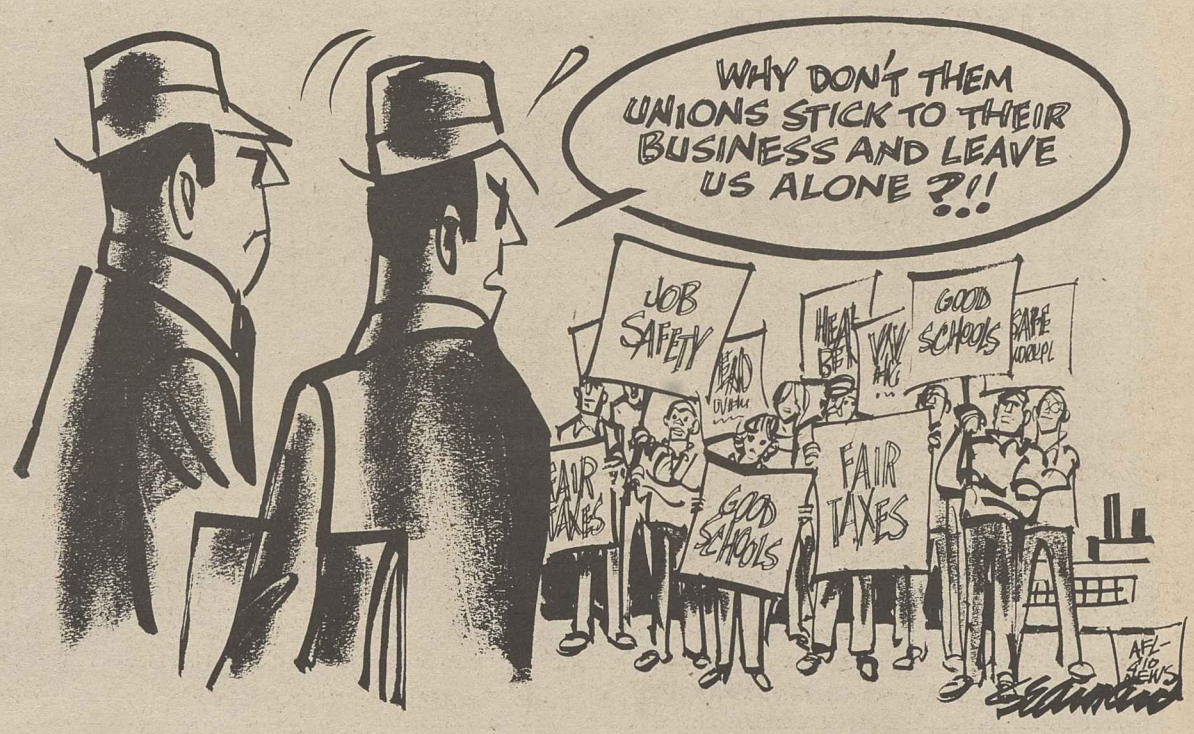
THERE IS a great deal to celebrate in the contract that a coalition of 13 unions has just negotiated with General Electric, and not just the improvements in pay, working conditions and union security.

For those with long memories, GE is the company that added the word Boulwarism to the labor relations dictionary. It is derived from the name of GE's industrial relations director a generation ago, who shaped a hard-nose strategy to deal with unions.

In a mockery of collective bargaining, GE would decide what concessions it was willing to give in its next contract and put that on the table with a take-it-or-leave-it ultimatum.

As part of its strategy, GE would seek to play union against union, taking advantage of the frequent competition among the diversity of unions at GE's many plants. Divide-and-rule was the name of the game.



Eventually, NLRB and court rulings made it necessary for GE to be less blatant in its disdain for the give-and-take of collective bargaining. But the turning point was the refusal of GE unions and union members to let management divide them.

When the multi-union Coordinated Bargaining Committee was established 20 years ago, GE fought it in every way possible. In the end, it took a 101-day strike in 1969-70 to bring GE to accept inter-union solidarity as a fact.

George Meany, as president of the AFL-CIO, served as chairman of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee, and Lane Kirkland holds that post today. It is a reminder that the entire labor movement is determined that Boulwarism will not be reborn.

The new contract, which includes long-sought agency shop security, signals a welcome acceptance by GE that unions and collective bargaining are here to stay. Clearly, there will continue to be union-management differences, often deep and difficult.

But at the bargaining table or on the picket line, solidarity is the trade union movement's most important product.

High jobless rates keep 10 states in recession pit

By Press Associates, Inc.

Another deep recession may be just around the corner, but 10 states have been stuck there for years.

The states that have never recovered from the 1980 and 1982 recessions are West Virginia, Louisiana, Oregon, Alabama, Mississippi, Alaska, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio and Idaho. The official unemployment rates in those states range between 9.5 percent and 13.4 percent. Counting the involuntary part-timers and the discouraged or dropouts their "real" jobless rates run from 17 percent to 24 percent.

The Full Employment Action Council, a coalition of labor, youth, church and civil rights groups, has been trying to focus national attention on the conditions and problems in those ten states.

• West Virginia. At 13.4 percent, this state has the highest jobless rate in the nation. Mining and steel, its major industries, were nearly wiped out in the last recession, devastating whole communities. Steel and coal imports and reduced demand for hard coal may force a change in the state's economy.

• Louisiana. Slack demand in the petroleum industry has given this state the nation's second highest jobless rate, at 11.7 percent. Oil refining boomed after the OPEC embargo, but has weakened since 1982.

• Oregon. Severe slumps in the timber industry and weakness in food and related industries combined to put the state in third place, with 11.1 percent jobless. A sharp rise in home foreclosures and demand for food banks has occurred.

• Alabama. Unemployment in March was 10.7 percent. Especially hard-hit are the steel industry in Birmingham and small factories in the northern area with ties to the auto and steel industries. In the southern area, textile mills and clothing manufacturers have shifted production overseas.

• Mississippi. The factory sector, especially in autos and furniture, has been depressed along with the timber industry. Farmworkers, making up a fourth of the labor force, are severely underemployed.

• Alaska. The jobless rate jumped after completion of the trans-Alaska pipeline. It moved down to 9 percent and is now up to 10.4 percent as factory jobs have steadily declined.

• Michigan. The nationwide erosion of the manufacturing sector has had a heavy impact on Michigan, where one of every three non-farm workers is a factory worker. Japanese auto imports have brought a decline in auto jobs and in supplier plants, tool and die and machine shops and in other factories. The jobless rate was 10.4 percent in March. Only one-third of the 459,000 officially jobless receive unemployment benefits. Soup kitchens are busy and a majority of Detroit's jobless lack health insurance.

• Indiana. The state's heavy concentration of goods-producing industries had little or no growth at the end of the 1970s and were hit hard by the recessions of the 1980s. The jobless rate was 9.7 percent in March, with 257,000 officially unemployed.

• Ohio. With 491,000 officially unemployed, the jobless rate was 9.7 percent in March. The erosion of the manufacturing sector and imports of finished goods from abroad hurt the state's industries. Exporting firms could not compete with low-wage nations while the dollar was overvalued.

• Idaho. Problems in mining and logging contributed to the state economy's decline since 1979. The jobless rate was 9.5 percent in March.

The Full Employment Action Council said the situation in these states calls for federal action.

The most encouraging recent happening is Labor Sec. William E. Brock's action in deciding to create a task force on plant closings and worker dislocation. There is hope for bipartisan support on Capitol Hill to help rejuvenate the fortunes of the worst-off states.

tract and choose to retire. The new supplement would be paid until they are 62 when they would come under social security coverage.

• Increased pension benefits for normal retirement. Minimum benefits will rise from the current range of $14 to $19.50 a month to a range of $16 to $22 a month at the end of the contract.

• Other contract improvements include a new vision care program, orthodontia coverage for workers' children under 19 years of age, and improved medical care coverage for retired workers.

Also agreeing to the settlement was the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers, which represents the second largest number of GE workers, about 8,600. The settlement will apply as well to the other unions on the Coordinated Bargaining Committee who will use its economic terms in arriving at local or national contracts.

The other unions are the Electrical Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Steelworkers, Auto Workers, Machinists, Industrial Workers, Carpenters, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Westinghouse talks

Meanwhile, in Pittsburgh, the CBC's talks with Westinghouse Electric Corp. covering some 34,000 workers were suspended one week until July 8. While Westinghouse generally follows the pattern set by GE, it has indicated that it wants to break from that tradition, a position the unions are resisting.

Contract talks between the unions and GE opened May 14. From the start, Bywater had said that job security, improvements in the cost-of-living formula, a general wage increase, and early retirement were the main issues.

The number of workers covered at both GE and Westinghouse is down sharply from levels three years ago when the parties last bargained. In 1982, the unions represented some 100,000 GE employees and 41,500 Westinghouse workers.

The Reagan Recession and heavy imports made deep inroads into the companies' work force. Most production at both companies now involves heavy industrial equipment or defense work.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney testifies at House hearings on the need for federal rules requiring removal of hazardous asbestos from schools.

Union lawsuit prods EPA to extend asbestos rules

The Environmental Protection Agency, in response to a suit by the Service Employees, has proposed extending federal asbestos safety rules to state and local public workers to protect them from the hazards of asbestos abatement work.

But the EPA's claim that its program for abating asbestos in schools is working is "tragically false," the SEIU testified before the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation & Tourism.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney said that false claim "only encourages those schools that have inspected or abated poorly to assume that the hazard was removed, when it not only may remain, but may have increased."

Sweeney cited the opinion of EPA's principal technical consultant, Dr. Robert Sawyer, that under the present conditions, the EPA program "will cause more adverse health effects, including malignancies, than it can ever prevent."

He quoted an internal EPA memo that said the violation rate for the agency's asbestos inspection program is "so high that public perception of EPA handling of asbestos in the schools may rival Love Canal," in reference to the agency's inadequate actions at a toxic waste dump in New York.

Subcommittee Chairman James J. Florio (D-N.J.) blasted the agency's reluctance to issue a federal cleanup rule as "an abdication of national responsibility."

An internal EPA document estimated that 75 percent of the school cleanup operations have been done improperly and that this could result in the deaths of 1,190 students, teachers, maintenance and abatement workers.

Florio asked John A. Moore, EPA assistant administrator for pesticides and toxic substances, what further evidence the agency needed to take action, if the cost of improper abatement is 1,190 additional cancer deaths. The congressman said he and other panel members will consider federal legislation to force EPA to act.

OMB role

Florio also quizzed Moore on the reported attempt of the White House's Office of Management & Budget to squelch EPA's efforts to require asbestos cleanup in schools and other public buildings. Moore denied OMB had influenced his reversal on the need for abatement regulations. Moore had earlier recommended the agency issue rules requiring removal of hazardous asbestos in schools and public buildings.

The union has battled for three years to get EPA to issue rules requiring removal of of hazardous asbestos from schools and to provide safeguards for workers, children and teachers during abatement work.

Current EPA regulations require only that a school district perform one-time inspection for friable, or flaking, asbestos and report the results to parents, teachers and employees. There are no rules requiring corrective action and until recently, no rules providing safeguards for workers performing the abatement activities.

Additionally, there is no requirement for reinspection and no certification program for contractors hired to carry out the asbestos cleanup.

The EPA has proposed extending federal safety rules on asbestos to state and local public employees to protect them from the potential hazards of abatement work. The agency made the rule effective immediately so that workers would be covered by summer when schools are closed and cleanup activities are increased.

OSHA is normally responsible for worker protection. However, it does not cover public employees at the state and local level. The proposed regulation will be effective in the 27 states that have not adopted rules for state and local government workers that are as strict as OSHA's worker protection standards.

The EPA regulation sets an exposure limit of 2 million fibers per cubic meter, equal to the current OSHA level. The health and safety agency has proposed reducing that limit to either 500,000 fibers or 200,000 fibers. EPA said it expects to revise its regulation when OSHA issues its revised standard.

The EPA rule also requires certain work practices, such as wetting of asbestos, use of personal protective equipment and special clothing, medical examinations, environmental monitoring and the posting of signs.

Court 'defers' to NLRB on union curbs

union self-government by a 3-1 vote. The board now is made up entirely of Reagan appointees.

Justice Blackmun's dissent was joined by Justices William J. Brennan, Jr., and Thurgood Marshall, with Justice John Paul Stevens agreeing with its conclusion.

The majority opinion was written by Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., who took the position that the NLRB's "special competence" in the field of labor law should be given "special deference."

In a concurring opinion, Justice Byron R. White put the position even more bluntly. He said the law could be interpreted as the union had urged. But since the NLRB's position was "reasonable," it was "necessary" for the court to accept its guidance.

Blackmun's dissent took strong exception. He chastised his colleagues for rubber-stamping a divided NLRB's conclusion "that a union commits an unfair labor practice when it enforces a worker's promise to his fellow workers not to resign from his union and return to work during a strike."

Workers' choice

He noted that the case involved workers who had "freely made the decision to join the union and freely made the promise not to resign at such a time" and that "union members democratically made the decision to strike in full awareness of that promise."

Giving the NLRB position "undeserved deference," Blackmun said, has resulted in "improperly" restricting a union's right "to make and enforce its own rules" and has worked contrary to the intent of federal labor policy "to preserve the balance of power between labor and management by guaranteeing workers an effective right to strike."

Blackmun noted that union strength is grounded in "unity, solidarity and mutual commitment," and that this concept is particularly important during a strike when members are dependent for its success on the commitment of fellow members.

But the court's majority opinion did draw cheers from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, whose spokesman hailed it as a vindication of the Reagan NLRB. The ruling "enhances the credibility of the Reagan appointees," the Chamber said, and "enhances the opportunity for an employer to continue operations during an economic strike."

The AFL-CIO statement said the decision will make it more difficult to conduct successful strikes. But "the board's ultimate objective—to cripple labor unions—will not be achieved."

Kirkland reaffirms alliance of federation with NAACP

Dallas—The sturdy alliance between the labor and civil rights movements remains a major counterforce against injustice, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a message to the NAACP's 76th annual convention here.

Kirkland pledged that the AFL-CIO will be working "side-by-side with the NAACP . . . in the fight to right the wrongs of the Reagan Administration and to restore fairness, equity and opportunity as our country's priorities."

It's time for those concerned with justice to "stand up and be counted," Kirkland suggested.

Under the Reagan Administration, he said, "government agencies and programs designed to guarantee civil rights have been placed in the hands of those who have no interest in administering or enforcing the laws that were won at great cost in the 1960s."

Anti-worker policies

In a parallel pattern, Kirkland noted, agencies and programs designed to protect lives, health and human rights in the workplace have been turned against workers and placed in the service of unfair employers.

The Administration, meanwhile, "piously pretends that equal employment opportunity will be assured through destroying affirmative action programs and cutting the minimum wage for young workers. It continues to ignore the plight of millions of Americans, especially minorities, who remain jobless," Kirkland charged.

Delegates heard from the chairmen of both the Democratic and Republican parties, among others.

Democratic Chairman Paul G. Kirk, Jr., welcomed the Senate's rejection of President Reagan's attempt to promote William Bradford Reynolds to associate attorney general. Reynolds has been sharply criticized by the NAACP for his role as head of the Justice Dept.'s civil rights division.

Republican Chairman Frank J. Fahrenkopf, Jr., drew boos by chastising black Americans for having "isolated themselves" in the 1984 elections by supporting a presidential ticket that was "repudiated" by most other voters.

About 1,000 delegates and guests attended the traditional labor luncheon, which included presentation of awards to union people who have helped the NAACP.

AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal and Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp are co-chairmen of the NAACP Ad Hoc Labor Committee, which sponsors the event. Rep. Esteban Torres (D-Calif.), a former UAW international representative and a White House aide in the Carter Administration, was the luncheon speaker.

Major presentations included the Roy Wilkins Award to Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts, honored as a steadfast supporter of the NAACP. The William E. Pollard Award, named for the AFL-CIO's civil rights director, went to Barbara Van Blake, civil rights director for the Teachers. The labor committee itself received an award—an expression of appreciation from the NAACP.

access to company data and decision-making.

UAW Region 6 Director Bruce Lee, who led the union bargaining team, said the job security provision is unprecedented. It calls for the company to reduce the salaries of officers and management employees, and return any subcontracted work to the bargaining unit before UAW-represented employees are laid off.

"We think this language goes beyond anything we have elsewhere in the industry to secure the jobs of our members and force management to plan alternatives to layoffs," Lee said.

For the first time in the domestic auto industry, the union won the right to join management in reviewing any unusual or mitigating circumstances in considering a potential discharge or suspension case. The joint review would take place prior to any final decision.

Other provisions include consideration of seniority in transfers, a union voice on the speed of work, establishment of a joint safety committee, and an educational leave provision.

Aerospace firm gets a lesson in union solidarity

Grand Prairie, Tex.—A union that grew stronger in adversity forced the Vought Aero Products Division of LTV Corp. back to the bargaining table and won restoration of benefits the company had unilaterally revoked when a previous contract expired more than 15 months ago.

Members of UAW Local 848 worked without a contract, under takeback conditions unilaterally imposed by management, until they were strong enough to meet the company on equal terms. The result was:

- Restoration of cost-of-living protection management had abolished when the previous contract expired.
- Replacement of the permanent two-tier pay system imposed by management with a gradual closing of the gap between new hires and older employees.
- Resotration of prescription drug coverage and other health benefit cutbacks imposed by management.
- Improvements in pensions and other employment benefits.
- Reinstatement with back pay of 65 union members fired on trumped-up charges and flimsy pretexts.

UAW Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus, who directs the union's Aerospace Dept., termed the new three-year agreement a tribute to the "solidarity and determination" of the workers at the Grand Prairie plant and of UAW members in other aerospace locals who helped sustain the battle.

Local 848 President Carroll Butler and UAW Assistant Regional Director Jerry Tucker gave an insight into the strategy that proved successful against an employer who had appeared determined to break the union —and strong enough to do so.

Previous contracts had all been negotiated without a strike, and in the "right-to-work" state of Texas, where a union shop is illegal, Local 848 was bargaining from weakness. Membership had slipped, as management well knew from the checkoff lists, and the company was well ahead of schedule on its work—primarily subcontracting for major aerospace companies such as Boeing.

With concurrence by the local leadership and the UAW district staff, the decision was made to stay on the job and build the union's strength through a solidarity campaign.

The company cancelled the checkoff—and the union hand-collected dues, gradually building paid membership from about 2,300 when the previous contract expired to more than 3,600, including the big majority of new hires.

Union members resisted overtime, and the company began to fall back on its production schedules.

Active union members were fired—for refusing to work overtime, for participating in union demonstrations, for being late to work or "trespassing." The National Labor Relations Board refused to issue an unfair

Labor urges clear stand on bill to ban sex bias

The AFL-CIO urged House members to close a loophole in civil rights legislation without clouding the issue with controversial new amendments dealing with abortions and exemptions for religious institutions.

Labor's position was expressed in a letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison to House members and at a Capitol Hill "speak-out" organized by a coalition of civil rights advocates.

Last year's Supreme Court decision in the Grove City College case so narrowly interpreted the ban on sex discrimination in colleges helped by federal funds that civil rights groups were unanimous in pressing for legislative changes to clarify the intent of Congress.

There was agreement, too, that the legislation should cover a range of civil rights laws that could be subject to the same interpretation the Supreme Court gave to the ban on sex discrimination in education. The remedial legislation, approved by both the House Judiciary and the Education & Labor Committees, would similarly amend the Civil Rights Act, the Rehabilitation Act ban on discrimination against disabled persons, and the Age Discrimination Act.

210 co-sponsors

But the consensus for the legislation was threatened when the Education & Labor Committee added to the bill an emotion-laden abortion amendment that civil rights strategists fear could doom the measure.

Denison's letter noted that the changes added by the Education & Labor Committee inject "unnecessary and divisive issues" in a measure that was introduced with 210 co-sponsors from both parties.

He asked adoption of the Judiciary Committee version and urged supporters of other changes to press their case in separate legislation and not "opportunistically" seek to achieve them through the Civil Rights Restoration Act.

A number of unions were among the dozens of organizations joining in the

7.3% jobless rate persists as brake on U.S. economy

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment stayed stuck at 7.3 per cent in June for the fifth month in a row, providing further evidence that the so-called recovery from the long Reagan Recession has run out of steam.

"There is clearly a slowdown in the growth of the economy," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"In spite of increasing signs of a downturn, however, the Reagan Administration is still whistling happy tunes, and hoping that Americans won't notice the record-high deficits and the worst trade deficits in the nation's history."

Oswald said it is "high time" for Congress to correct the Administration's misguided economic policies, restore fairness to the federal budget, put in place a realistic trade policy, and get the nation's industries back on track.

Once again, the manufacturing sector—hard hit by foreign competition—took it in the neck, losing 45,000 jobs in June over a wide spectrum of industries. That brought the total number of factory jobs lost since January to 220,000.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said in releasing the June figures that the largest factory job losses last month were in the machinery and electrical equipment industries.

Jobs in the service sector of the economy —the main engine of growth since the 1981-83 recession—rose by 136,000 in June, but that was a much slower rate than the increase of almost 300,000 in May.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood, discussing the employment restructuring that has been going on for some time in the nation, told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that the manufacturing sector has recovered only 58 percent of the total jobs lost during the Reagan Recession.

Norwood said five industries—steel, textiles, chemicals, petroleum and coal products, and leather goods—actually have lost jobs during the so-called recovery.

Service jobs

Over the past 12 months, the number of jobs in goods-producing industries has increased by 260,000 to 25 million. At the same time, jobs in service-producing industries rose by 2.9 million to 72.4 million—a rate 11 times faster than in the goods-producing sector.

Employment in the construction industry remained about the same in June, at about 4.5 million.

The BLS report showed an unusually large drop of 593,000 in both the total number of jobs and the size of the work force in June. Norwood told the congressional panel these declines may have something to do with technical difficulties in the BLS survey that computes them and subsequent seasonal adjustments that factor in the

Maine shipyard strikers battle takeaway demands

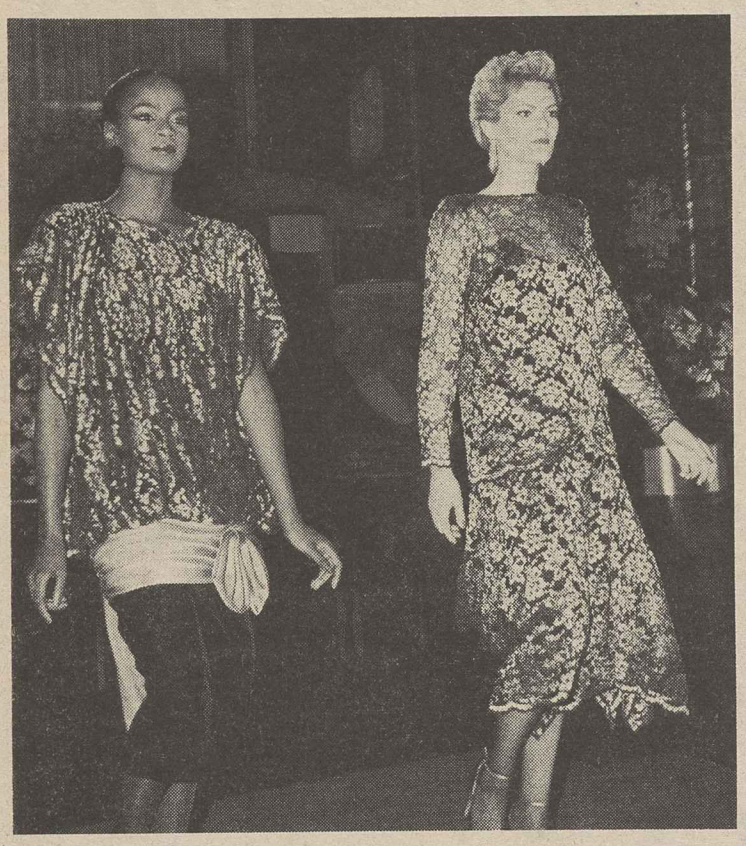
Bath, Me.—Some 4,500 members of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers Local 6 remain on strike against Bath Iron Works, one of the East Coast's largest shipyards, after rejecting the company's demands to slash contract benefits management unilaterally devalued to win a Navy contract.

The company's final contract offer contained a two-tier wage system that would lower the scale permanently for new hires by $3 per hour, freeze wages for three years and reduce health insurance from 100 percent coverage to 80 percent with a deductible and a cap of $1,500 per family. It also demanded provisions for "cross-trading," which would require employees to perform work outside their job classifications.

The rejection vote was 3,500 to 24. The strike began July 1. Strike coordinator Milt Dudley predicted it could be a long one.



Bath Iron Works, a subsidiary of the privately owned Congoleum Corp. of Portsmouth, N.H., tried to convince its workers that in order to get its latest Navy contract, which could result in billions of dollars of work for the shipyard, it had to base its bid on reduced wages for its workers.

"It's absolutely essential that the company negotiate a package that reflects what we bid," Bath Iron Works President William E. Haggett said.

Dudley charged that the company has refused to bargain in good faith and offered a proposal it knew would force the union to strike. The result has been to the company's advantage, he said.

Management of the firm prepared for the strike well in advance, Dudley said, noting

Court allows limit on U.S. charity drive

A divided Supreme Court ruled that the federal government can limit a once-a-year-charity drive among federal and postal workers to health and welfare agencies and organizations providing direct assistance to individuals and families.

But a ban on participation of so-called "advocacy groups" must be applied impartially, the high court held, and must not reflect political favoritism.

The Supreme Court action overruled a decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that a 1983 Executive Order by President Reagan infringed on the First Amendment.

But the Supreme Court sent the case back to a federal trial court for further hearings on whether the ban on advocacy groups is even-handed.

Most of the organizations traditionally taking part in the annual Combined Federal Campaign operate through the United Givers Fund or comparable local umbrella groups. However, employees may designate contributions for various other organizations that have been allowed to participate.

The NAACP Legal Defense & Educational Fund, one of the groups that challenged the Executive Order, won the right to seek designated contributions in a 1980 court case.

Thereafter, former Office of Personnel Management Director Donald Devine fueled a heated controversy by announcing the admittance of a group of right-wing organizations, including the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund, to the solicitation list.

Federal action

Unions of federal and postal workers were especially outraged at Devine's action, and legitimate charitable groups feared a decrease in employee participation. The result was government action to reassure workers that the anti-union fund would not share in any UGF allocation and that any money received by the "right-to-work" fund would have to be specifically earmarked by the contributor.

When the Executive Order was issued, there was widespread speculation that the inclusion of right-wing groups was a ploy by Devine to gain a consensus for eliminating all advocacy groups and thus purging the campaign of groups considered hostile to the Administration.

The Supreme Court majority decision, by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, said the government can limit participation "in order to minimize disruption to the federal workplace, to ensure the success of the fund-raising effort, or to avoid the appearance of political favoritism without regard to the viewpoint of the excluded groups."

Conrail bidder, rail union agree on job protections

Railroad unions representing workers on Conrail, the government-run freight line, reached agreement in principle with Morgan Stanley & Co. on labor protection provisions that would take effect when the carrier is turned over to the private sector.

In supporting the New York-based investment firm as the prospective purchaser of the line, the Railway Labor Executives Association's task force posed an alternative to the Transportation Dept.'s choice of Norfolk Southern Corp.

Legislation providing for the sale of the carrier to Morgan Stanley has been introduced in Congress, which must approve the transaction, and Rep. James Florio (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Energy & Commerce subcommittee on transportation, scheduled hearings on the proposed sale.

Morgan Stanley, which would still have to reach agreement with the 19 individual unions represented by RLEA, proposed paying $1.2 billion in cash for the railroad and then selling stock over a five-year period in the new company that would be formed.

The federal government owns 85 percent of Conrail, which was formed in 1976 out of the bankrupt Penn Central and other ailing Northeast carriers' assets. Conrail's 39,000 employees hold the remaining 15 percent in an employee stock ownership plan.

Norfolk Southern, a transportation company based in Norfolk, Va., has also offered the government $1.2 billion. It is still holding its own discussions with labor.

The unions oppose the government's choice of Norfolk Southern as buyer on grounds that its takeover of Conrail would result in a sharp reduction of jobs.

The Morgan Stanley agreement on labor protections, reached in Washington July 3, calls for negotiating and executing a definitive accord within 45 days. The RLEA said in a statement that the investment firm would maintain Conrail as an independent entity.

Public interest

"RLEA believes that an independent Conrail will best serve the public interest by preserving vigorous competition in the Northeast and Midwest," the task force said.

"Shippers and the public, as well as Conrail's employees, will benefit from the agreement."

Highlights of the labor protection plan, released by the Railway & Airline Clerks, include supplemental unemployment benefits for those laid off beyond those provided under the Railroad Unemployment Insurance Act, subsistence allowances, health and welfare coverage, new career training assistance, and moving expenses up to a maximum of $25,000, and purchase of Conrail stock held by employees for $48 a share.

John F. Schreier dies, retired AFL-CIO staffer

Hartland, Mich.—John F. Schreier, retired assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, died here July 3 after a long illness. He was 79.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in a telegram to his wife Elizabeth, recalled Schreier's many years of service to the labor movement.

"John made many significant contributions to working men and women. He represented the best of trade unionism," they said.

Schreier served in the assistant director post from 1956 to 1966 when he was appointed AFL-CIO regional director for Region XI, covering Michigan and Indiana.

He had belonged to the Carpenters and the Retail Clerks prior to becoming an organizing representative on the AFL staff in 1937. He later served as assistant regional organizing director in Detroit until being named the assistant director of the department.

Besides his wife, he is survived by three children and eight grandchildren.

Funeral services were held July 6 at St. John's Catholic Church in Hartland with burial at the church cemetery.

3 get 25 years in cyanide deaths

Chicago—Three former corporate officials, convicted of murder last month in the 1983 death of a worker exposed to cyanide on the job, were sentenced to 25 years in prison and fined $10,000 each.

Cook County Circuit Judge Ronald J.P. Banks levied the sentences, comparing the three officials of the defunct Film Recovery Systems, Inc. to someone who would leave a ticking time bomb on an airplane.

The company's nearly 30 workers, most of whom were illegal aliens who spoke no English, were daily exposed to 140 open vats of cyanide solution used in recovering silver from photographic film processes. In February 1983, Stefan Golab, a 61-year-old Polish immigrant, died after inhaling cyanide fumes at the Elk Grove plant, north of Chicago.

The company officials—former President Steven J. O'Neil, plant manager Charles Kirschbaum and foreman Daniel Rodriguez —will be eligible for parole in 12½ years under Illinois law. Each man was also sentenced to serve 364 days in jail on each of 14 counts of reckless conduct, to be served concurrently with the murder sentence.

The judge also fined Film Recovery Systems and Metallic Marketing Systems, which owned half of Film Recovery's stock, $10,000 each for involuntary manslaughter, and $1,000 for each of 14 counts of reckless conduct.

Jay Magnuson, head of the Cook County prosecution team, said he is reviewing a possible third effort to extradite Michael T. MacKay, president and part-owner of Film Recovery, from Utah.

Repeal bill veto saves Louisiana wage standards

Baton Rouge, La.—Louisiana's prevailing wage law for state construction projects remained on the statute books as the state Senate failed to override the veto of a labor-opposed repeal bill.

The measure, pushed by non-union contractors, had passed the Senate 20-16, and needed a two-thirds majority to override the veto. Instead, it lost support and the override attempt failed to muster even a simple majority.

The veto message of Gov. Edwin Edwards said prevailing wage laws such as the federal Davis-Bacon Act and its state counterparts are good for the economy and result in "quality workmanship" that "more than offsets the cost of higher wages."

RTW effort fails

Anti-union groups also were thwarted in their attempt to make Louisiana's "right-to-work" law banning union shop agreements a part of the state constitution.

Earlier in the session, the constitutional proposal had fallen one vote short of the two-thirds required. An attempt to revive the constitutional amendment on a reconsideration vote failed by the same margin shortly before the legislature adjourned, despite an intense campaign by the National Right to Work Committee, its Louisiana affiliate and allied employer groups.

Throughout the session, State AFL-CIO Legislative Director Carl Crowe commented, "labor played defense—successfully."

Edward F. Carlough dies, retired Sheet Metal leader

Alexandria, Va.—Edward F. Carlough, president emeritus of the Sheet Metal Workers and a pioneer in the establishment of health and welfare and pension programs in the construction industry, died at home on July 9. He was 81.

In letters of condolence to Carlough's wife Florence and a son, Edward J. Carlough, the current president of the Sheet Metal Workers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue noted that Carlough's "pioneering work in the fields of pensions, health and welfare benefits opened new dimensions of collective bargaining."

Carlough was elected president of the Sheet Metal Workers in June 1959 after having served eight years as secretary-treasurer. He was made president emeritus upon his retirement in 1970.

Carlough apprenticed as a sheet metal worker and in 1927 joined Local 28 in New York City. He was elected president and business manager of the local in 1941 and served in that position until he became secretary-treasurer of the international union in 1951. While serving as a local officer, he also was a vice president of the international.

He also served as a vice president of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

Under his leadership, Local 28 negotiated the first health and welfare plan in the construction industry in 1946. Four years later, he pioneered the negotiation of the first pension plan in the construction trades.

He was a member of the Wage Adjustment Board during the Korean War and was instrumental in opening the door for all unions to obtain welfare plans. His proposal to allow up to 7 ½ cents per hour to be used for welfare programs, despite a national wage freeze, was implemented by the board.

Joint board

Carlough also helped establish the National Joint Adjustment Board to improve labor-management relations in the sheet metal industry.

Hofstra University in New York City established a labor law chair in his name in 1981.

Survivors include his wife, three children, eight grandchildren and nine great grandchildren. Funeral services were held at Queen of Apostles Catholic Church in Alexandria with burial at National Memorial Park in Falls Church, Va.

Ultimatum rejected

Bath shipyard strike answer to takeaways

that heavy amounts of overtime were required last fall and winter to get well ahead on production.

Several weeks ago, the shipbuilder stopped laying off workers in anticipation of the strike.

The overall thrust of the company's efforts, Dudley said, is to make itself an attractive property for a takeover. He pointed out that Bath Iron Works was purchased in 1979 by Congoleum in a leveraged buyout. With its history of completing construction ahead of schedule, coupled to a contract that would severely hold down labor costs, the company would appear on paper to be ripe for a takeover, Dudley observed.

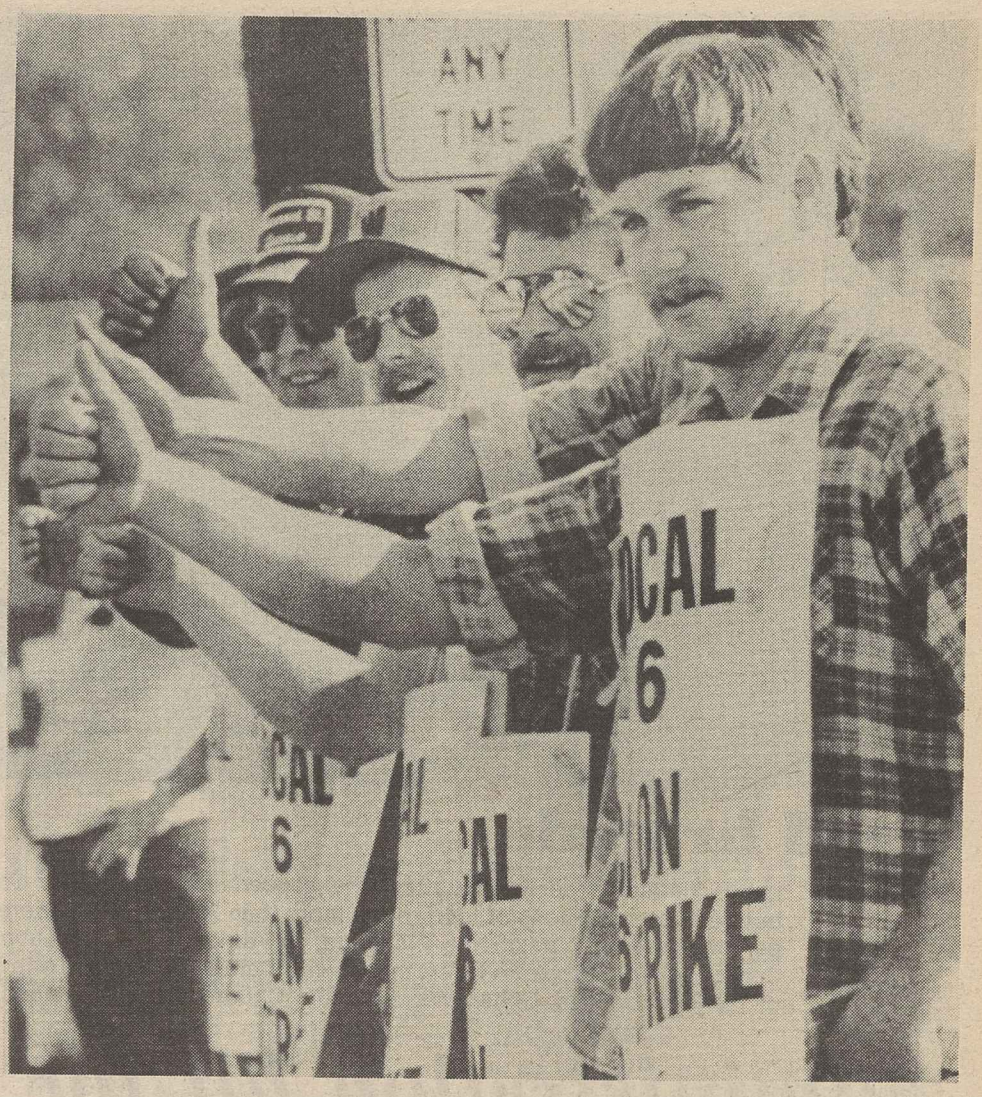
Management of the shipbuilding firm prepared for the strike by installing security cameras at its various facilities in Bath, Portland and Brunswick. It also installed a variety of electronic security gear and is protecting the homes of company negotiators with guards, Dudley reported.

"They've gone berserk," he said. They were expecting great things from us, but they won't get it. Our picket lines are peaceful."

The company ran a full-page ad in the Maine Sunday Telegram July 7 comparing pay scales at Bath with those at other East and Gulf Coast shipyards.

Dudley sought to follow the company's lead by presenting both sides of the conflict to the public, not just the company's side. But management rejected his offer to debate company officials on television.

The local has maintained round-the-clock picketing at five sites and has scheduled a solidarity parade in Bath for July 21.



Dudley said the company has steadfastly refused to show the union its books.

"We don't believe they need concessions. They've demonstrated in the past that they are not to be trusted," he said.

Last summer, the company urged the union to open negotiations early, offering to settle the economic questions. When the union agreed to bargain, management "went for the jugular" and tried to eliminate seniority from the contract, Dudley said.

Troubles at Bath Iron Works also involve Marine & Shipbuilding Workers Local 7 which has been on strike for 13 weeks. Its 375 members are clerical workers who are bargaining for a second contract.

Both locals have filed unfair labor practice charges against the company, but the National Labor Relations Board's response has been "lackadaisical, at best," Dudley said.

Members of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers Local 6 give a show of their solidarity during the union's walkout at the Bath Iron Works.

House bill curbs closing of federal field offices

The House passed by more than a two-thirds vote a labor-supported, Administration-opposed bill to require federal agencies to notify Congress at least 120 days before shutting down a field office or making other significant changes that would adversely affect federal employees.

Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.), its chief sponsor, said members of Congress have been frustrated and angered by the Administration's failure to keep them posted about planned changes in district offices. In some cases, she said, agencies have professed ignorance about plans for closings that obviously were well under way.

The bill, which has elements of plant-closing legislation proposed for the private sector, was taken up under a no-amendment procedure requiring a two-thirds majority and was passed by voice vote.

Office of Management & Budget Director David A. Stockman sent a letter stating that the Administration was "strongly opposed" to the bill.

Machinists kill 2-tier pay at General Dynamics plant

Pomona, Calif.—The Machinists, on the strength of coordinated bargaining, eliminated a two-tier wage system from its new three-year contract with General Dynamics Corp. plant here.

"The two-tier is now dead at GD/Pomona," IAM Vice President Justin Ostro said. "And at the end of the next round of aerospace bargaining, with an exciting new program of coordinated bargaining firmly in place, I am confident that our IAM negotiators will have exorcised the evil wage rate from any other aerospace contracts that have it in place."

The dual wage system was launched by the company in the last three-year contract and has created morale and production problems, the union reported.

The first aerospace company to initiate a two-tier pay system, Hughes Aircraft, was reprimanded by the U.S. Air Force for alleged "poor workmanship" as a result of the labor division caused by dual wages.

The firm has since dropped the worker-exploiting experiment, the IAM noted.

Covers 4,000

The new package at GD's Pomona facility covers more than 4,000 members of Local 1980. For the first time, the contract provides for checkoff of voluntary contributions to the Machinists Non-Partisan Political League, the IAM's political action group.

The new contract also eliminates a dual level cost of living adjustment that paid a smaller COLA to those in the lower grades.

The IAM members at GD/Pomona also won a 3 percent wage increase in the first year of the contract and two 4 percent, lump-sum payments in the second and third years.

Other provisions of the contract include:

- An increase in monthly pension benefits to $16 per year of service and to $18 in 1987. Those retiring now will also get the $18 benefit in 1987.
- Fully paid HMO medical plans.
- Reduction in the number of pay grades from 17 to 10.
- Improved dental insurance and free generic prescription drug plan.
- Creation of a joint union-management committee on new technology and protection from layoffs as a result of automation.

The contract was settled three days before the expiration of the previous agreement.

Texas aerospace firm gets lesson in union solidarity

labor practices complaint against the company, despite what the UAW considered blatant union-busting.

From Oklahoma City, editor Suzy Cox and co-editor Joe Hutchison of the UAW Local 1999 newsletter came to Grand Prairie to report on a sister local's battle.

"Morale is incredibly high," they reported. "Fired members, once dubbed the 'victims,' now sport shirts proclaiming they are the victors. The sense of community and solidarity is thick in the air."

Hutchison interviewed Loretta Black, fired after she had led workers in singing Solidarity Forever in a protest demonstration. At the time, she told him, "I didn't even know all the words to the song."

The labor editors reported that Black now knows all the words and proudly bangs out the tune on the old upright piano in the Local 848 hall. In another part of the hall, they found another "victim" working the local's personal computer that holds the dues information the company once provided under its union contract.

The UAW's Turner spoke of the Solidarity Fund that sustained the fired workers, supplementing the international union's own assistance program. UAW locals throughout the country, especially aerospace locals, made large contributions, he noted. There were donations from some other unions in the area, principally the Machinists and Steelworkers.

And the Vought workers themselves contributed substantially to their fired fellow-members, with weekly plant gate collections and a series of fund-raisers that included a '50s dance, flea markets and fish fries.

Back to the table

Getting the company back to serious bargaining didn't give the union all it had sought, and union negotiators were disappointed that the two-tier pay scales couldn't be more quickly phased out.

But the union was able to give management a vivid demonstration of the distance it had come since it had been forced to back off more than 15 months earlier. The UAW set a strike deadline, and when talks ran into the midnight shift, picket lines went up—and no one went through them. Three hours later, agreement was reached and later that day it was ratified. Vought Aerospace workers again had a union contract.

$15 million backpay accord preserves Jewel store rates

Chicago—Members of the Food & Commercial Workers have won a long and bitter battle with a giant retail chain to preserve their wage rates and working conditions.

UFCW Local 881 members employed at Jewel food stores in the Chicago metropolitan area took on the big chain when it unilaterally slashed their wages and vacation time. Sixteen months and a running court battle later, the employer agreed to pay back some $15 million in wages to about 18,000 workers.

"We're very happy with the settlement. It returns to our members all of the money that was taken from them, and that's what we've been fighting for ever since the wages were first cut," Local 881 President Ronald E. Powell said.

The settlement, ratified by a 6 to 1 margin, includes full retroactivity of all wages, including overtime and Sunday pay; reinstatement of vacations and personal leave that were cut, and reinstatement of all pay rates and length of service progressions, except in northwestern Indiana where wages remain at the rates Jewel put in force in February 1984.

The contract dispute goes back to December 1983, when Jewel demanded concessions from its workers. These included wage cuts of 20 cents to $1.75 an hour, elimination of certain personal leave days, and up to a week's vacation for some full-time employees.

When its proposals were rejected by the union and its members, the company imposed the cutbacks unilaterally.

All of this was in direct violation of the collective bargaining agreement Jewel had signed with the UFCW local a couple of months earlier as well as in clear violation of labor law.

Unfair practices

The union filed a $25-million lawsuit against Jewel in federal court and unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board.

Local 881 followed through with an informational campaign, special membership meetings, interviews in local newspapers and on television and radio stations, picketing of Jewel stores and a mass demonstration at Jewel's annual stockholders' meeting in June 1984.

The payoff came with a new contract to replace the one that expired on June 15. Jewel agreed to pay back the wages taken from employees since February 1984 and restore vacations and personal leave.

Acceptance of the pact, by a mail vote of 6,367 to 1,053, also included an agreement by the parties to drop all legal action against each other.

National Mediation Board elects Wallace chairman

Walter C. Wallace is the new chairman of the National Mediation Board, succeeding Helen Witt.

Wallace, who joined the board in October 1982, also served as chairman of the independent federal agency from July 1983 through June 1984.

By law, the board selects its own chairman for a year's term. The panel handles collective bargaining and representation disputes in the railroad and airline industries under the Railway Labor Act.

Wallace has been active in labor-management disputes for 30 years, in both industry and government.

A third position on the board remains to be filled.

Food brigade

Labor community service volunteers help speed distribution of some 35 tons of food to the more than 3,000 persons waiting outside the Wheeling, W.Va., Civic Center. Joining in the effort were unions, the state Dept. of Human Services, United Way, and the Children & Family Service Association. An estimated 1,800 persons were helped during the first hour of the quarterly distribution of surplus foods. West Virginia continues to have one of the nation's highest jobless rates, and has sustained severe economic hardships in recent years.

Administration hit for allowing imports produced by forced labor

The AFL-CIO scored the Reagan Administration for its continued nonenforcement of a 45-year-old law banning the importation of goods produced by forced labor, and proposed corrective measures.

"We cannot accept . . . failure to enforce a law that embodies a principle so fundamental to a humane society as to require no defense," Tom Kahn, an assistant to Federation President Lane Kirkland, told the Senate Finance subcommittee on international trade.

Other witnesses urged the Administration either to enforce the 1930 Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act, which bans imports produced by forced labor, or revoke it. The State Dept. says that some four million people in detention or prison camps in the Soviet Union alone are engaged in mining or producing goods.

In his testimony before the Senate panel, Kahn contended that "one might well argue that forced labor (in the USSR) is not confined to the four million workers in the camps."

In view of the Soviet Union's "parasitism" laws which require persons to work or be put to work for the state, its internal passport system, absence of a genuinely free trade union movement, and other restrictions on workers' rights, "practically everything we import from the Soviet Union is produced by forced labor," Kahn said.

Estimates of the value of Soviet slave-labor goods imported into the United States vary from as low as $10 million to more than $225 million.

What irks the AFL-CIO, Kahn said, is the claim by the Central Intelligence Agency that it is unable to obtain adequate evidence to enforce the 1930 law. Section 307 of the statute provides that the U.S. Customs Service must have information that "reasonably but conclusively" proves that products made by forced labor abroad are coming into the country.

CIA report

Customs Service Commissioner William von Raab testified that the CIA has informed him that its evidence on the importation of Soviet slave-labor goods is "fragmentary and not very specific."

Kahn said a way out of the morass would be to ban an entire product line on evidence that any product in that line was made with forced labor.

"Whether or not this proposal is adopted," he said, "American intelligence-gathering agencies should be directed to redouble their efforts to trace the flow of slave-labor goods into the United States."

Kahn suggested that the government or private human rights organizations conduct in-depth interviews of former Soviet citizens now living in the West who once were confined to slave-labor camps to get first-hand information.

Flight Attendants at United reach back-to-work accord

The Association of Flight Attendants reached a back-to-work agreement with United Airlines that provides for the return of all members to their jobs by Sept. 1 and ratifies other issues lingering from last month's pilots' strike against the carrier.

More than 90 percent of the AFA's 9,600 members at United stayed off the job during the Air Line Pilots' strike. But when ALPA settled its dispute with the airline, the company and the Flight Attendants were unable to agree on back-to-work terms.

The Flight Attendants returned to their jobs, but filed suit in U.S. District Court in Chicago to recover their seniority rights and benefits.

After prompting from Judge James Parsons, the two sides came to terms July 2. All attendants who honored the ALPA picket lines will be returned to work at their pre-strike domiciles according to a staggered schedule.

The sole exception is United's Miami base, which will close Aug. 31. The agreement calls for certain additional benefits for Miami-based attendants.

Charges dropped

Both parties also agreed to drop all litigation and disciplinary charges resulting from the strike.

"The fact we were able to come to terms proves that both sides wanted to leave the strike behind them," AFA's United Chairperson Patricia Friend said. "We hope that the agreement will pave the way for smoother negotiations in the future."

As of July 1, 826 flight attendants had not returned to work. The agreement calls for the immediate recall of 170, with another 114 returning to work in the next two or three weeks.

The carrier also agreed to special leave-of-absence programs to create vacancies for flight attendants, which could result in all of them being recalled before Sept. 1.

All attendants will resume accruing seniority as of June 29, the date of a court order reinstating seniority and benefits for those who stayed out of work. Seniority for the period of May 17, when the pilots' strike began, through June 28 will be arbitrated.

Separately, the AFA announced it had tentatively agreed on a new contract covering some 2,200 members employed by USAir. Details of the agreement were withheld pending a ratification vote by USAir members in August.

Official U.S. jobless rate remains stuck at 7.3%

influx of young workers during the summer will show a different pattern.

Even though the overall jobless rate remained unchanged last month, there were some significant ups and downs among certain labor groups. The unemployment rate for adult men went up from 6.1 to 6.5 percent over the month while the rate for teenagers went down from 18.9 to 18.3 percent, and the rate for blacks dropped from 15.6 to 14 percent. The rate for adult women fell two-tenths of 1 percent to 6.7 percent.

Also, there were declines in both the number of "discouraged" workers—those who have given up looking for work be cause they expect there is none—and the number of persons working part-time who would rather be working fulltime but can't find such employment.

Pilots set up fund to battle union-busting

The Air Line Pilots is setting up a $100 million contingency fund to counter management attacks on the union and provide financial aid to groups that lent support to the union during the recent United Airlines stike.

"This will be more than a strike fund," said ALPA president Henry Duffy. "It will give us the financial clout to further develop and pursue the innovative strategies used in the United strike as a deterrent to other airlines that might be considering a union-busting operation against ALPA. It will give us the resources to fight every assault on our profession, from every quarter, and it will give us the staying power to continue fighting until we win.

Tougher stand

"The ALPA is now prepared to take a much more aggressive stance against union-busting airline managements."

The ALPA's financial plan, which was authorized by a special meeting of the union's board of directors, will build the fund by raising its dues to 2.35 percent of a members' income, an increase from the present level of 1.35 percent. This increase will raise an additional $20 million each year. The plan is subject to the approval of the union's 34,000 members.

The fund will also be used to support flight attendants and pilot recruits who honored the ALPA's picket lines during the United strike and to continue monthly benefits of $2,400 for each striking Continental Airlines pilot.

The 570 pilots hired by United just before the strike who refused to cross the picket lines would receive monthly benefits of $1,800 "pending resolution of their employment rights."

The Association of Flight Attendants would receive a grant of $500,000 to help its members recover from the strike. The union also said it would establish a separate $600,000 hardship fund for individual attendants. A transfer of $5 million from the fund will pay ALPA's costs of the United strike.

"speak-out" at Capitol Hill sponsored by the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights and other concerned groups.

Postal Workers President Moe Biller said that in the absence of a strong White House commitment to civil rights, it is up to Congress to "take a stand" and show leadership.

Richard Womack, staff representative in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights, said the groups that fought for enactment of anti-discrimination laws must "insist that these laws are carried out." Gains that have been achieved must not be surrendered, he urged.

The "speak-out" program was held on the 21st anniversary of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Ask equal treatment

Musicians open drive for labor law change

Charleston, W.Va.—The Musicians convention launched a legislative effort to change federal labor law and establish collective bargaining rights for traveling musicians.

The 740 delegates meeting here for the AFM's 86th convention carried home post cards for the local union members to mail to Congress, urging that the Taft-Hartley Act be amended to reduce the time required to become a union member from 30 days to seven days, and to define as an employer any person who buys a musical performance, regardless of whether the performer is an individual or an independent contractor.

Under current law, most traveling musicians are treated as independent contractors and not employees of the persons who buy their music.

AFM President Victor Fuentealba reported to delegates that support in Congress is growing for bills aimed at correcting "the current discrimination against musicians."

"We don't have the rights that other workers have under the law," Fuentealba told delegates. "We are treated as independent contractors. We want to be treated as employees."

AFM member and singer Willie Nelson commented that musicians "are not on the same level" as other workers with respect to Taft-Hartley coverage. They should be, he declared.

"A musician is not a second-class citizen and should be able to get the same treatment a truck driver can get."

Nelson was honored by the union for his support of the AFM's political fund, Tempo, which is used to lobby on issues of concern to musicians. He also performed in the union's first series of public service radio announcements.

The country singer was given a gold membership card by Fuentealba during his concert at the Charleston Civic Center which was attended by the convention delegates.

Rep. Bob Wise (D-W.Va.) urged the delegates to write their senators and congressmen in support of the legislation to amend the Taft-Hartley Act.

Support sought

West Virginia AFL-CIO President Joseph W. Powell asked the delegates to offer their fraternal support to the unaffiliated Mine Workers who are on strike against the A.T. Massey Coal Co. Some 2,000 UMWA members have been on strike for 10 months against the firm owned by Royal Dutch Shell and the Fluor Corp. The delegates adopted a resolution pledging their full support to the strikers and their families.

Fuentealba was re-elected by acclamation after he was unopposed in the nominating process. Also re-elected were vice presidents Mark Tully Massagli of Las Vegas and J. Alan Wood of Toronto.

Kelly Castleberry, president of Charleston Local 136, was elected to replace retiring Sec.-Treas. J. Martin Emerson.

The delegates also adopted an amendment to the bylaws to relieve some of the financial burden of local unions to pay for the benefits of retirees and life members. Fuentealba told the delegates that the percentage of life members has grown from 12.6 percent in 1976 to 21.8 percent in 1985.

The bylaw change, adopted by a 122,144 to 96,472 weighted vote, limits lifetime memberships to those who have been members for 35 years or who have reached age 70.

The change, recommended by the union's executive board, would mean that beginning next January, honorary or life members would be required to pay the local periodic dues equal at least to the federation per capita, plus 25 percent of the dues and assessments in excess of the per capita, effective Jan. 1, 1986. That would be increased to 50 percent in 1987.

Country-western star Willie Nelson receives gold membership card from his union at the AFM convention. Greeting him are AFM President Victor Fuentealba, left, and the union's secretary-treasurer-elect, Kelly Castleberry.

ICFTU targets British firm in anti-apartheid campaign

Brussels—The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions accused a British-owned multinational company of paying starvation wages to its black employees in South Africa and launched a pressure campaign to halt the practice.

The ICFTU leveled the charge against the British Tire & Rubber Co. (BTR), saying that its South African subsidiary, SARMCOL, in Natal is paying wages that are "far below the minimum requirements" laid down by the European Economic Community's code of conduct for multinational firms investing in South Africa.

ICFTU Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken said the pitiful wage scale had generated starvation and poor health among the families of BTR's black workers.

Vanderveken cited medical reports made available to the ICFTU indicating that 20 percent of the children of workers at the company's facilities in Natal suffer from malnutrition and barely reach 80 percent of normal weight.

Honor standards

The ICFTU sent a demand to BTR either to respect international labor standards or cease operations in South Africa.

The labor organization, which represents 82-million workers in 99 countries, also called on its affiliates in countries with BTR subsidiaries to take action in support of the BTR workers in South Africa. These countries include the United States, Canada, West Germany, Australia, Italy, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, France, Switzerland, Belgium, Finland, and India.

The British Trades Union Congress already has responded to the ICFTU request, and has raised the matter with the British government.

BTR is the first multinational targeted by the internationally coordinated effort to do away with South Africa's racist policy of apartheid. The campaign was approved by the ICFTU's executive board at its April meeting in Washington.

Meanwhile, unrest and frustration over white rule of South Africa's black majority ended in new violence this week as police shot and killed seven blacks in the Johannesburg suburb of KwaThema.

Approximately 450 blacks have died as a result of police actions to quell uprisings in South African black townships since last September.

Federal worker unions challenge job rule changes

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger cleared the way for the Reagan Administration to put into effect controversial new regulations affecting the pay and job rights of federal workers, but government unions are continuing their challenge in both the courts and Congress.

The rules adopted by the Office of Personnel Management would replace the seniority-based system for pay increments and job retention with a performance-based rating. Government worker unions charge that the effect would be to open the way to both political and personal favoritism in the civil service.

A federal appellate court stayed the implementation of the new rules at the request of the Government Employees, pending a full hearing on the merits. But Burger's order lifted the stay, allowing the changes to take place while the court challenge is pending.

Meanwhile, a House-Senate conference committee is considering a supplemental appropriations bill that has a House-passed provision barring the implementation of the new rules during the current fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30. The AFGE is urging the Senate conferees to go along with the House on the issue.

Salvador courts condemned for army whitewash

The AFL-CIO registered its "complete disgust" with El Salvador's judicial system after a Salvadoran judge ruled there was insufficient evidence to indict an army captain implicated in the 1981 slayings of two staff members of the federation's American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) and the head of the country's land reform program.

"The court, by this action, has confirmed that army officers are still above the law in El Salvador, despite the efforts of President Jose Napoleon Duarte to reform the corrupt system," AIFLD said in a statement.

The two AIFLD representatives, Mark D. Pearlman and Michael P. Hammer, were gunned down with Jose Rodolfo Viera, the head of the Salvadoran Land Reform Institute, as they sat drinking coffee in a San Salvadoran hotel coffee shop.

Salvadoran Army Capt. Eduardo Avila was among three well placed Salvadorans charged with planning and ordering the murders, which were carried out by two army corporals.

Though the corporals confessed to the killings and involved Avila, under Salvadoran law their testimony is not enough for a conviction.

The case took on new life with the recent introduction of new evidence, including testimony from three witnesses who said Avila had confessed to his part in the deaths.

AIFLD noted that the three witnesses have been repeatedly threatened. In one instance, a relative residing in Washington, D.C., received a telephone threat.

"These Mafia-type actions by the Salvadoran oligarchy of which Avila is a part, their controls of their puppets in the judicial system, and the continuation of the supremacy of army officers over the law sets back the development of democracy in that already beleaguered country," AIFLD said.

The institute, which provides assistance to developing free trade unions in Central and South America, said it is "currently determining our next course of action," and that it might appeal the court decision.

The ruling is the third time that Salvadoran courts have found insufficient cause to jail suspects in the case.

AIFLD noted that Avila is a nephew of Supreme Court Justice Ricardo Avila Moreira.

Senate breaks off filibuster by Helms, nears action on South Africa sanctions

The Senate took up an Administration-opposed bill to levy economic sanctions on South Africa after invoking cloture to break a filibuster led by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.).

Despite the one-sided 88-8 vote to limit debate on the motion to take up the bill, delaying tactics were still available to foes of the measure.

The labor-backed concept of sanctions to pressure South Africa to abandon its racist apartheid policy has substantial bipartisan support, despite the Reagan Administration's expressed preference for achieving reforms through "friendly persuasion."

If the delaying tactics are overcome, the key issue will be whether the Senate strengthens the bill through floor amendments, as the AFL-CIO urged, or further weakens it. As it came out of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the South African sanctions bill was weaker than the version the House passed last month by a 295-127 vote.

Both bills would ban new U.S. bank loans to the South African government, halt exports of nuclear technology, and curb sales of computer products and technology that could be used in furtherance of racist practices.

But the House would immediately ban new investments by U.S. firms doing business with Africa—unless the President and Congress agreed that the South African government was making progress toward ending apartheid. The Senate would merely hold open the threat of tougher sanctions if South Africa continues on its present course. Also, the House bill would ban the importation of Krugerrand gold coins into the United States, while the Senate version would put off that decision for 18 months.

Strengthening urged

In letters to senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison urged approval of strengthening amendments to insert provisions of the House bill and asked rejection of an amendment that would pre-empt, and thus nullify, state and local government actions barring investments of public funds in corporations that invest in South Africa.

Denison noted the AFL-CIO's ties with black unions in South Africa and stressed their support of disinvestment as a weapon against apartheid.

He urged the Senate to vote bipartisan approval of the strongest possible bill.

The House, meanwhile, continued to work on a foreign aid bill. But off the floor of the House and Senate, negotiators were trying to hammer out a compromise budget resolution—with the White House as a third party to the negotiations.

A meeting of House and Senate leaders from both parties with President Reagan produced what was referred to as the "framework" for an agreement. The Administration and Senate Republicans were to drop their effort to deny social security recipients a cost-of-living adjustment, and the House would prevail on a freeze of military spending for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1. In return, Democrats would go most of the way with the Senate version in allowing higher military spending in future years.

But the big battles—still unsettled when the AFL-CIO News went to press—were over the further slashes in domestic programs demanded by President Reagan and the Senate leadership.

Labor Dept. sees new job frontiers for women

American women will make significant gains in the labor force and will move into traditionally male occupations and industries, but they will require greater education and job training to meet the demands of a changing labor market.

That's the conclusion of a report prepared by the Women's Bureau of the Labor Dept. for the upcoming UN conference on women.

The report, titled "The United Nations Decade for Women, 1976-85," reviews the job-related status of women over the past 10 years and projects women's participation in the labor force by industry and occupation. It also examines problems faced by both very young and older workers and predicts "further fine-tuning of employment-related laws that significantly affect women. The report also calls for the identification of "unlawful discrimination in job classification and wage setting" and increased attention to safety and health issues.

Cynthia McCaughan, AFL-CIO coordinator for women's activities said the report demonstrates that the labor movement must redouble its efforts to achieve pay equity, establish child care programs and organize women workers.

The Women's Bureau study estimates that by the end of the 1990s, more than 60 percent of all working age women and 80 percent of all women between ages 25 and 54 will be employed. Currently, about 54 percent of all women 16 and older and 70 percent of those 25-54 are in the labor force.

Need for women

The service sector will provide more than three-quarters of all new jobs during the next decade, and women are expected to fill the greater number of jobs in this area, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Industries such as medical care, business and professional services and recreation will provide almost a fourth of total employment by 1995 with the bulk of new jobs held by women, the BLS estimates.

However, those service occupations expected to provide the greatest number of new jobs—such as cashiers, building custodians, secretaries, nurses and teachers—already employ more women than men and are relatively low paying.

The Women's Bureau points out that women are not well represented at the higher levels in computer and data processing services and that women are still a minority of protective service workers, a higher paying occupation.

The report emphasizes that while women will gain from the continued growth of service jobs, they also "form substantial proportions of the workforce" in some declining industries, including textiles, apparel and electronics manufacturing.

The continued decline of these industries and increasing requirements for more complex skills make job retraining and education a critical issue, the report stresses. It cites estimates that between 50 and 80 percent of the present labor force will need retraining over the next few years because of changes in the structure of industry and the wide use of new methods and technologies.

The report points out that women clerical and office workers are especially vulnerable "to the changes resulting from the new office technology" but generally receive only minimal skill retraining in a field "targeted for the rapid introduction of new equipment."

More educated

The Women's Bureau predicts that "the labor force of the future will be even more highly educated than it is today," and "some occupations that formerly did not require college degrees increasingly will employ more highly educated workers."

The report recommends special training and counseling for older women joining the labor force and stresses that "employment and training policies and programs for youth who have not attained basic skills will be even more important with the skill requirements of new jobs."

Seattle residents flock to city's first "Health Fair for Workers," sponsored by the Washington State AFL-CIO. More than two dozen labor and health groups participated.

Unions spotlight job hazards at 'health fair for workers'

Seattle—Workers worried about health and safety hazards on the job had their questions answered during a three-day health fair, sponsored by the Washington State AFL-CIO.

"The Washington Health Fair for Workers" was billed as a way to promote good health for Washington's workers by making workers aware of potential workplace hazards and safety practices on the job.

Representatives of some two dozen labor and health groups staffed information booths and answered questions on asbestos hazards, wrist injuries, toxic substances and other safety and health problems.

The Service Employees district council exhibited a properly set-up video display terminal, while the Northwest Laborers Trust demonstrated the safest way to remove asbestos.

The Hanford Metal Trades Council displayed an elaborate exhibit on radiation safety measures, and an exhibit by Food & Commerical Workers Local 1105 featured a properly designed grocery checkout counter.

Area health care professionals offered free medical screenings including weight, vision, blood pressure, dental, oral and skin cancer checks. Also available were blood chemistry tests to indicate diabetes, kidney and liver disfunction, bone and joint disease or other infections, plus testing for coronary risk.

The screenings were provided as part of the National Health Screening Council's series of regional health fairs.

State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams said the fair demonstrated to the public that organized labor is concerned with the health and safety of all workers.

"It's great to see our unions exhibit in a busy, public space like this with such positive information," he added.

Members of the Firefighters, Machinists, Carpenters, Painters, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Hospital & Health Care Workers and Office Employees also were on hand to answer questions and offer suggestions for safer working conditions.

Extended jobless aid runs out in 48th state

Idaho, the last of the 48 continental states paying federal extended benefits to jobless workers, became ineligible to do so as of June 2.

That means only Alaska and Puerto Rico now pay the 13 weeks of additional unemployment compensation benefits for the jobless.

To be eligible to pay the extended benefits, a state must have an insured unemployment rate (IUR) of at least 5 percent no matter what its overall jobless rate might be. Idaho's overall unemployment rate as of April was 8.9 percent, considerably higher than the national rate of 7.3 percent.

Alaska's unemployment rate in April was 10 percent, Puerto Rico's 23 percent.

As of May, only 9.4 percent of some 1.3 million Americans out of work for 27 weeks or longer were receiving benefits under the unemployment compensation system.

Idaho unions approve funds to fight 'right-to-work' law

Boise, Idaho—The Idaho AFL-CIO convention moved to build a defense fund to finance the state federation's fight to over turn the "right-to-work" law passed by the 1985 state legislature.

The resolution passed by the convention's 120 delegates called on affiliated local unions to contribute at least $5 per member per month through November 1986 for the fund. It said the legal fees involved in battling the law in court and at the ballot box are more than the State AFL-CIO can absorb alone.

The law, enacted over the veto of Gov. John Evans (D), has so far been blocked by the state federation from taking effect. The Idaho legislature had sought to impose the law immediately after passage on the grounds that an emergency existed.

The 4th District Court delayed implementation of the law pending a vote on the issue on the November 1986 ballot. That action has been appealed to the state Supreme Court by the RTW supporters.

The delegates unanimously rejected a bid to address the convention by Terry McKnight, co-chairman of the Idaho Freedom to Work Committee and a former member of the Electrical Workers. State AFL-CIO President Jim Kerns called the RTW group "carpetbaggers and fear peddlers" and said the next 18 months will test the solidarity of Idaho union members.

Galvanizing effect

Sec.-Treas. Dennis Hall predicted the battle will serve to unify organized labor in the state to defeat "this ugly legislation. And in the process, we're going to thump down those legislators who rammed it down our throats."

Hall and Vice President Ed Johnson were re-elected to two-year terms as were five executive board members. Jerry Klemm of Paperworkers Local 712 in Lewiston and John Carlson of Machinists Local 1933 in Pocatello were elected to their first terms on the board.

The three-day annual convention also made passage of a public employee collective bargaining law a top priority, declaring that "Idaho should not be the Poland of the Northwest."

Among other resolutions were measures urging limits on lumber imports from Canada and reaffirming the state federation's fight against the export of logs rather than finished wood products.

Two workshops

A pair of workshops highlighted the activities of the delegates. One focused on organizing and the other previewed the national pilot "One-on-One" program beginning in Idaho, Georgia and Missouri to teach union activists to communicate better with rank-and-file workers.

Frank Drozak, president of the Seafarers and of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., told delegates there is a need for farmers and maritime unions to work together in pressing for a revitalized merchant marine fleet.

Among the other speakers were Washington State AFL-CIO President Marvin Williams, Region VI COPE Director Jane Adams, California AFL-CIO President Al Gruhn, AFL-CIO Region VI Assistant Director Ed Collins, National Rep. Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., Vice President Don Hofer of the Food & Commercial Workers Northwest division, and Field Rep. Grace Carroll of Rocky Mountain Labor School.

OSHA inspection practices denounced as 'inadequate'

The Occupational Safety & Health Adminstration's newly-released inspection data show the agency is continuing at the same "inadequate level of inspections" as it has for the past several years, the AFL-CIO said.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, pointed out that more than ll percent of OSHA's 35,336 inspections during the first half of fiscal 1985 were "records checks."

Under this system, OSHA inspectors merely examine a firm's health and safety records. If the data meets the agency's criteria for a "safe" workplace, no walk-around inspection is made.

Seminario noted that a Chicago worker died last year from a lethal dose of cyanide at a silver-recovery plant shortly after an OSHA records check. OSHA found the plant operating safely, even though more than two-thirds of its workers regularly experienced symptoms of cyanide poisoning.

Earlier this month, three executives of the firm were convicted of murder for the worker's death.

OSHA said it would conduct 71,000 inspections in fiscal 1985, about the same as last year. Of that number, some 8,000 would be records checks.

In the first half of fiscal 1985, the agency conducted 30,029 safety inspections and 5,307 health inspections. These figures include the records checks.

The construction industry—targeted by OSHA as a high-risk sector—accounted for 19,204 of the 35,336 inspections.

D.C. teachers sticking with AFT

Teachers in the nation's capital decisively voted to retain the American Federation of Teachers as their bargaining agent, handing the unaffiliated National Education Association its third major setback within the past year.

After a hard-fought campaign, Washington teachers voted to stay with the AFT by a 3 to 1 margin. The union has represented them since 1967.

The District of Columbia win follows on the heels of a June 25 AFT landslide in Detroit and a similar victory last November in Baltimore.

AFT also notched a win against the NEA in May, when teachers in Anderson, Calif., voted to drop the California Teachers Association as their collective bargaining representative and elected to go with the AFT instead.

A Festering Wound

TO MOST of the news media, the nation's unemployment toll is a predictable once-a-month story. For the fifth month in a row, the nation's civilian jobless rate as measured by the Bureau of Labor Statistics has been stuck at 7.3 percent.

The unemployed are people, however, and not statistics. There are more than 8,400,000 of them, even without counting all those who gave up a seemingly futile job search and those working part-time because there aren't enough full-time jobs.

Nor is the economic stagnation that has stranded such an army of unemployed just of five months' duration. There has been little measurable change for a year. The jobless rate was 7.1 percent in June of 1984. Since last fall, it has fluctuated narrowly between 7.2 and 7.4 percent.

The real cause for concern is that neither Congress nor the White House appears greatly concerned, even though the linkage to the nation's other economic problems is painfully obvious.

As just one example, some 750 jobs in Shreveport, La., will be wiped out by the decision of AT&T to move the production of residential telephones to Singapore.

The unmeasureable cost is the human suffering. But there are also costs that can be tallied.

INEVITABLY, job losses result in lower tax revenues for federal, state and local governments because people without jobs don't pay taxes on non-existent income or on purchases they can no longer afford to make.

At the same time, the demand for government assistance programs—whether in food stamps or Medicaid—will rise, adding to the cost of government.

But what if government policies and programs were designed to get people back to work and to prevent the destruction of jobs? Then we would have less drain on government resources and more revenue for the cost of government and to reduce deficits.

Sure, economic solutions aren't quite that simple and there is no single law or Executive Order that can assure full employment. But there are a host of actions that both Congress and the President should be taking to bring us closer to that goal.

The Line-Item Veto Ploy

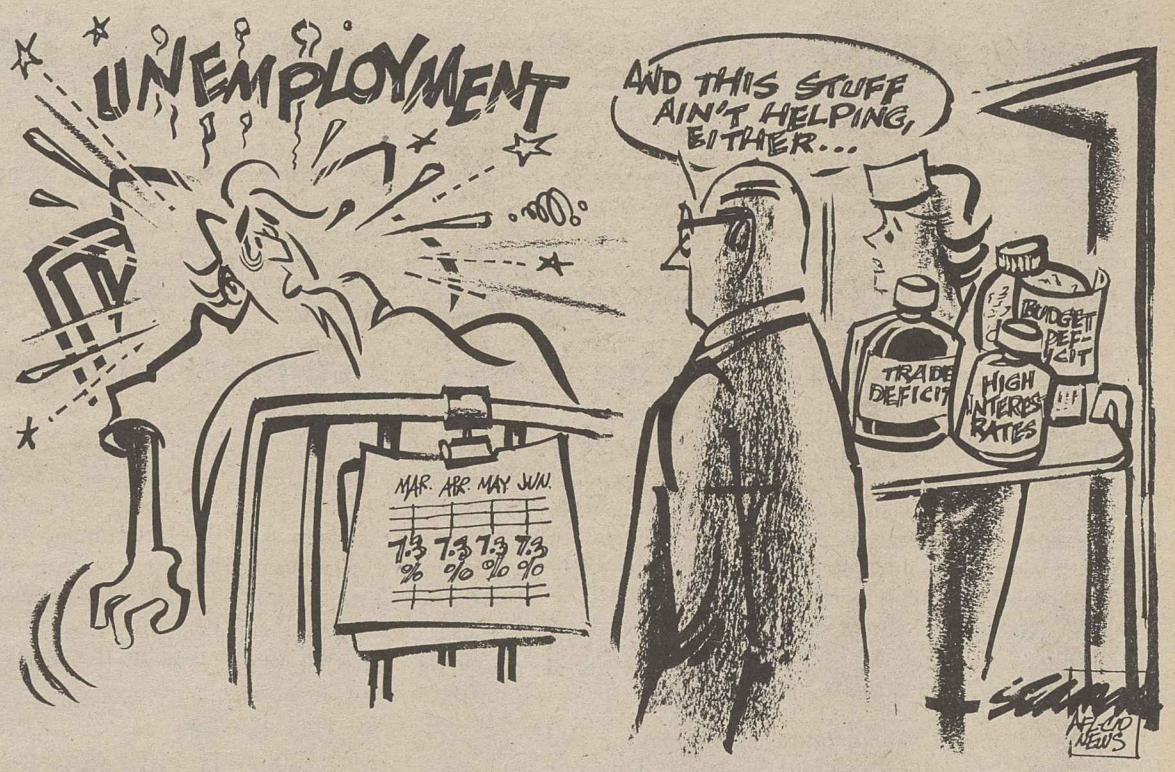
PRESIDENT Reagan's latest demonstration of buck-passing on responsibility for the federal budget deficit is his proposal that Congress give him line-item veto authority. That would allow him to veto sections of an appropriations bill while leaving other provisions intact.

So what's wrong with that? Plenty.

To start with, it would allow the President to dictate budget and spending priorities to Congress—even to the stage of eliminating entire programs. Present law allows the President to avoid spending part or all of an appropriation under a procedure requiring only simple majority approval from the House and Senate.



But the line-item veto bill the Senate will soon take up would enable the President to force his will on large segments of appropriations bills without vetoing the entire measure. Entire programs that a majority of Congress supports could be wiped out unless two-thirds of the House and two-thirds of the Senate voted to override the veto.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last May warned of the strong likelihood that the President, "particularly this incumbent," would use such selective veto power "as a weapon of political punishment" or to force an end to programs he considered "ideologically distasteful."

Is this an overstatement? Not according to the testimony of the departing director of the Office of Management & Budget.

At a recent conference sponsored by the conservative American Enterprise Institute, David Stockman was asked about the likely effect of line-item veto authority on the federal deficit.

Stockman, fully justifying his reputation for candor, responded, "Marginal, if at all." The line-item veto, he explained "is about political power and political control."

Asbestos risk in schools mounts with EPA delay

By Press Associates, Inc.

From the 1940s to the 1970s, asbestos was considered just about the greatest building material since the discovery of brick because of its fireproofing, electrical, thermal and acoustical insulating properties.

Asbestos cement was used for walls, ceilings and storm drainage pipes. Asbestos-containing materials were sprayed and plastered onto ceilings, walls, and structural supports. Asbestos jackets were wrapped around boilers, pipes and ducts.

Consequently, more than 30,000 schools housing 15 million students and over 1 million employees contain asbestos. Some 700,000 other public and commercial buildings contain asbestos that is now deteriorating.

All it takes to send a cascade of microscopic asbestos fibers through the air is a basketball hitting a gym wall, or a custodian moving ceiling panels during routine maintenance.

Maybe a child playing basketball in the school system gym will be lucky. Maybe he or she won't inhale a single asbestos fiber, because that's all it takes to cause lung or other cancers 20 to 40 years after the fiber lodges in the body.

But how many parents encourage their children to play Russian roulette?

For school and building custodians, the risk is even greater, their higher exposure levels not only increase the cancer risk for them, but also the risk of the lung disease asbestosis.

In 1979, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency promised to take action against hazards from flaking asbestos in schools.

Since then, the EPA has required schools to inspect for asbestos hazards and notify parents and employees of inspection results. But it has not required schools to get rid of asbestos hazards nor established required procedures for abatement.

Consequently, as the AFL-CIO Service Employees and the National Parent-Teacher Association recently told a House panel, improper asbestos abatement actions actually may be increasing risks.

A poll of regional EPA officials estimated that about 75 percent of asbestos abatement has been done improperly. Testimony from a New York PTA vice president demonstrated why.

Sheila Cohen said that her Baldwin school district made an early commitment to get rid of asbestos hazards and spent several hundred thousand dollars to clean it up. Private contractors were brought in to do the work so school employees were not at risk.

"The contractors had to be monitored, because the contractor arrived at one of the schools never having filed the necessary papers with the EPA. They were made to leave and file the papers; they said, 'nobody files,'" Cohen reported.

"Our people had an uphill fight; very little help from federal or state agencies. All the agencies seemed to be waiting for somebody else to write up some specific rule so they could say what schools ought to do: 'this is the minimum standard required of a school district' or 'this is the standard; this is an acceptable level of asbestos.'"

Small steps

During the last year, the EPA has taken some steps to provide technical assistance and develop model contractor certification programs for states.

These programs are praiseworthy, as is the EPA's decision to issue a protection rule for asbestos abatement workers not covered by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's asbestos exposure standard or by state OSHA plans.

An EPA official told the House panel that he changed his mind about issuing asbestos cleanup rules because he thought current programs would provide more immediate help to school districts.

But reports from parents, teachers and school employees nationwide during the EPA's hearings on asbestos last year, and continuing reports such as Cohen's, contradict this excuse. A federal standard on asbestos cleanup is urgently needed, and the EPA knows it.

MEMO FROM COPE

Nearly a whole page of ODDS 'N ENDS because that's just about all there is these days (it's summertime . . . big news takes a holiday)

REAGAN MEANS BIG BUCKS for Republicans running for U.S. Senate in 1986. President spoke at fund-raisers in four states for incumbent GOP senators in recent weeks. In each, the incumbent's treasury got a windfall. According to GOP sources, Sen. Jeremiah Denton benefitted by $578,000 in Alabama, Sen. Paula Hawkins (Fla.) by $925,000, Sen. Mack Mattingly (Ga.) by $550,000 and Sen. Don Nickles (Okla.) by $500,000.

ADD NEW NAME to long list of possible and actual candidates for President in 1988. This one seemingly off the wall. It's Rev. Pat Robertson, Virginia TV evangelist whose dad was U.S. Sen. Willis Robertson. His telecasts reach millions; he could get funding readily. Most important, some of the key right wing leaders view his potential seriously. Among them, Richard Viguerie, who commented Robertson "has an awful lot of support out there" and who claimed a serious candidacy by Robertson, either as GOP or independent nominee, would "do more to move the country to the right in a permanent way than anyone else on the political scene." Howard Phillips, head of Conservative Caucus, says he's encouraging Robertson and sees wide support for him. Robertson heads Christian Broadcasting Network which claims to reach almost 29 million homes. He conducts 700 Club TV program which reaches 12 million homes.

A LITTLE MUSCLE is what GOP applies to the corporate PAC world to dry up its contributions to Democrats. House GOP Policy Committee studies 25 races from 1984 won by Democrats with 52 percent or less of total vote, gets annoyed by evidence of business PAC funding for Dems, tells PACs in letter "we Republicans need to remind our friends in the PAC community that we are determined to become the majority party in the House of Representatives and that we do not look kindly on organizations that help the Democrats perpetuate their majority." What they'll do to these PACs on which they "do not look kindly" they don't say.

NOT ENOUGH newsworthy comments were expressed by horde of GOP 1988 presidential hopefuls who attended party's Midwest Leadership Conference recently to get press coverage of any consequence. One good line, however, emerged from it. Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (Kans.), one of 1988 GOP prospects, pointed out another, Vice President Bush, is trying to develop a "macho image" by spending time on President Reagan's ranch "chopping horses and riding wood."

PUBLIC CATCHING ON to fact that present trade arrangements cost a lot of American jobs and pose present and long-term threat to stability and strength of our economy. Polls show most Americans want a change, including restrictions on imports even if, according to New York Times survey, "it means less choice among products they can buy." Support for changes in trade policies even comes from rank-and-file GOP, at variance on this with Reagan Administration. On major trade issues like content law, import restrictions, tariffs, Republicans in only slightly smaller percentages than Democrats seek new paths to change lopsided trade relationships more in favor of U.S. and American workers.

HOLLY COORS, wife of union-busting brewer Joe Coors, says she's thinking about running for governor of Colorado in 1986. A GOP activist and close friend of President and Mrs. Reagan, her strength as a candidate would be instant name recognition. The family money wouldn't hurt, either. Of that, there's plenty, as Coors family huge contributions to right wing groups attest. U.S. Rep. Hank Brown had been considered front-runner for the GOP nomination next year, but decided to seek another House term.

INCOME REDISTRIBUTION (upward) strong under Reagan leadership. Study by U.S. House committee shows families in top 20 percent income boosted their share of total after-tax income in 1983 to 42 percent, compared to 40.6 percent in 1980. Lowest fifth of households went up, but not as much—from 4.7 percent to 4.9. Hardest hit were three groups in middle-class range, in effect the middle 60 percent which respectively dropped—from high to low grouping—from 25.1 to 24.8, 17.9 to 17.3, 11.6 to 11.1. The shift in income represents $3,320 in cash to families in the top five percent range.

CAMPAIGN SPENDING by state legislative candidates in California broke all records in 1984, state's political practices commission reports—despite fact there were few really competitive contests. Candidates for 80 Assembly and 20 State Senate seats spent more than $24.1 million. Not only that, in aggregate candidates had more than $6 million left unspent. Outlay on ballot issues was no small change, either. For property tax initiative, more than $10.4 million was shelled out.

DOES REAGAN BELIEVE what Reagan says he believes, asks 1984 retiree, former GOP Rep. Barber Conable, one of the nation's foremost tax experts after years on House Ways and Means. He takes Reagan tax program to task saying it "strikes a terrible blow" at ability of state and local governments to undertake and pay for programs themselves. It does this by ending deductibility of state and local taxes, making it politically more difficult for these sources to raise needed revenue. Conable points out Reagan has spent his political life telling everyone we've got to get the federal government out of the way (practically out of business) and let state and local governments solve the problems. Conable puts it bluntly: "The question is, do you really believe that state and local governments should do any problem-solving, or don't you? It takes money."

Same Song . . . 20 Years Later

"Have we the courage and the will to face up to the immorality and discrimination of the progressive surtax, and demand a return to traditional proportionate taxation?"

The question is a statement: It says that progressive taxation—that is, higher tax rates for higher incomes—is immoral and should be scrapped. It says instead, you and the Rockefellers and the Mellons and the Coors should be taxed at precisely the same rate.

Who said it? Who condemned the idea of progressive taxation? Who thinks it's immoral for a big earner to be taxed at a higher rate than a lower or moderate earner?

Ronald Reagan said it. He said it on national television Oct. 27, 1964, in a speech boosting Barry Goldwater's presidential candidacy.

That's more than 20 years ago. He's still at it. Today, Ronald Reagan is trying to inch the country closer to "proportionate" and further from "progressive" taxation. His new tax plan would shrink the top rate—that paid by the highest income groups—down to 35 percent from its current 50.

What isn't being mentioned in the selling of the Reagan plan is the fact he already slashed the top rate in the 1981 tax program from 70 percent for highest income groups.

So, if he succeeds now, he will have cut the top rate in half and changed the rate for middle-range families hardly at all.

This is the "fair" tax plan he's promoting—fair just like he wanted more than 20 years ago.

RIGHTIST PACS step up their activity in state-level issues and contests. For one thing, they have national organization of right-wing state legislators working to elect more of their own to office everywhere. It's the American Legislative Exchange Council (ALEC) which has formed its own PAC and earmarks $200,000 for 1986 state elections. On issues, right-wingers attempt to block state pension fund divestiture of investments in South Africa and raise hob over any move toward pay equity legislation. But ALEC agenda includes much more: tax revolt measures, balanced budget resolutions, zero government growth to prevent increase in number of state employees, curb on state-funded economic development. It also works with right-to-work-for-less committee and similar groups in opposing union protections and union-sponsored legislation like plant closing laws.

ABSOLUTELY NO TRUTH to rumor David Stockman resigned because he's got another interview coming out in Atlantic Monthly. No truth, either, that he told President in letter of resignation as budget director his "reputation can no longer tolerate close association with an administration that sets more records for deficits than Edwin Moses sets for high hurdles."

ALSO FALSE ARE REPORTS administration, in letter accepting Stockman resignation, accused him of "over-zealous budget-cutting worthy of a Jesse Helms or Newt Gingrich that simply does not reflect the deep and continuing concern this administration feels for the needy, the elderly and the afflicted."

Mail, Election Day Voter Sign-Up Urged

The AFL-CIO urged House members to cosponsor and actively support legislation that would make it easier for Americans to register to vote in federal elections.

Legislative Director Ray Denison said a pair of bills introduced by Rep. John Conyers, Jr. (D-Mich), would substantially reduce barriers to registration.

"Every election year, millions of citizens are unable to vote because they are not registered," Denison wrote House members.

One Conyers bill would establish a post card registration system for federal elections, so that persons could qualify to vote by mail, instead of having to come to a registration center during specified hours. Twenty-two states and the District of Columbia already have registration by mail, Denison noted.

A companion bill would allow registration at the polls on Election Day. Supporting this concept, Denison pointed out that interest in elections normally does not peak until the final days of a campaign, when registration books are closed in nearly all states.

But in the four states that do allow registration on Election Day, Denison stressed, voter participation in elections "has been significantly higher than the rest of the country without any evidence of fraud."

The AFL-CIO supports making voter registration easier, Denison said, "because the essence of democracy is the participation of the greatest number of citizens in the process of decision-making."

Economy continues to falter

Protesting safety cutbacks

Reagan Administration policies curbing job safety and health and environmental protections are protested during the OSHA/Environmental Network's third annual convention. Leading the march in front of the White House are Chemical Workers President Frank D. Martino, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers President Joseph M. Misbrener, Furniture Workers Sec.-Treas. Lowell Daily, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel, the former Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, Allied Industrial Workers President Dominick D'Ambrosio and United Rubber Workers President Milan Stone. (Story, Page 3.)

Labor welcomes new bill to tackle trade imbalance

Leading Democrats in Congress unveiled a new proposal aimed at reducing a trade deficit that has cost the United States millions of jobs and twisted the economy out of shape.

It would set targets and timetables for restoring balance between U.S. imports and exports, with tough tariff sanctions if other nations fail to comply. The targeted countries are those that have erected unfair trade barriers to keep out U.S. goods.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison welcomed the introduction of the proposed Trade Emergency Act as an acknowledgement by Congress of the gravity of the crisis.

If Congress really pursues the legislation, and doesn't just wave it as a threat, "it could be the beginning of a turnaround to America's badly mauled industrial base," Denison said.

House sponsors of the new bill include Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (Ill.) and Democratic Caucus Chairman Richard A. Gephardt (Mo.). The chief Senate sponsor is Lloyd Bentsen (Tex.), ranking Democrat on the International Trade subcommittee.

There are various trigger provisions in the bill. But if the legislation were now in effect, Japan, Brazil, Taiwan and South Korea would have to cut their trade surpluses with the United States by a minimum of 5 percent over the next year. Otherwise, they would face a 25 percent additional tariff on all products. For five years thereafter, the surplus would have to be lowered 10 percent a year to avoid the penalty.

In practice, the first-year reduction would have to be substantially more since the base level is the trade surplus for 1984. Japan's trade surplus was $37 million last year, but is expected to grow to nearly $50 million this year. Thus, a 5 percent reduction from 1984 levels would translate into nearly a 30 percent cut in this year's surplus.

The legislation is aimed at countries that use unfair trade practices to gain a balance-of-trade advantage with the United States and other countries.

Corrective steps

It would require the U.S. government to bring unfair trade practice charges against offending nations before international trade organizations and to seek remedies that would avoid the need for the tariff penalty.

At a Capitol Hill news conference, Rostenkowski termed the bill a last-ditch effort by "congressional moderates" to devise "a sensible, hard-hitting response to trading partners who have run up excessive surpluses."

Bentsen termed the bill a response to the "apparent paralysis of U.S. trade policy" in the face of a fast deteriorating situation.

The legislation doesn't directly deal with such endangered areas of American production as textiles, apparel, autos and steel, Denison noted, and the AFL-CIO continues to seek specific measures to help these industries. The federation will put forth its views in more detail when hearings are held on the bill. Rostenkowski, whose committee has jurisdiction over trade legislation, said he will schedule hearings after Congress returns from its summer recess in September.

Reagan Administration officials denounced the proposed legislation as "protectionism," but a number of Republicans in Congress were telling reporters they are hearing from their constituents that the time has come to stop the drain of U.S. dollars and jobs.

Emergency steps asked to remedy dollar distortion

The AFL-CIO renewed its call for emergency action by the President and Congress to bring about an international agreement that will let American goods compete in world markets and restore lost jobs.

The recent drop in the dollar's exchange value after a five-year rise should be welcomed, not deplored, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald stressed at House hearings. The exchange rate imbalance has contributed significantly to flooding the U.S. market with imports and making U.S. goods too expensive for other countries to buy, he said.

Oswald urged Congress to direct President Reagan to invoke his emergency powers under the Trade Act to stop the hemorrhage of jobs through a temporary curb on imports.

That should immediately be followed by negotiations with the major trading countries

Lag in growth adds to threat of recession

By James M. Shevis

New government figures showing a continued slowdown in the economy, with second-quarter growth only about half of what had been predicted, offer "little hope" for the nation's future well-being, the AFL-CIO warned.

"The threat of a recession hangs over the economy," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"Without changes in trade policy and without substantially lower interest rates, the economy will continue to founder."

Instead of its preliminary estimate of 3.1 percent a month ago, the Commerce Dept. reported the nation's inflation-adjusted, gross national product grew by only 1.7 percent during the April-June quarter.

Combined with the negligible three-tenths of 1 percent real GNP rise of the first quarter, the latest growth figure meant that economic activity for the entire first half of 1985 was a scant 1 percent.

When compared with the vigorous 8.6-percent GNP growth rate of last year's first half, the slowdown appears dramatic.

Separately, the Federal Reserve Board reported industrial production in June edged up a mere one-tenth of 1 percent, the same as in May and consistent with a year-long pattern of weakness in the manufacturing sector.

Trade deficit

In releasing the latest growth statistics, the Commerce Dept. placed much of the blame on America's worsening foreign trade deficit. At the same time exports were tapering off, imports were rising.

Exports were off at an annual rate of 12.5 percent in the second quarter, the third quarterly decline in a row. Imports, on the other hand, grew at an annual rate of 1.4 percent after rising at the gigantic rate of 32.3 percent in the first quarter.

The Reagan Administration had projected a 3.9-percent growth in the economy for all of 1985. To reach that goal, real GNP—the total output of all goods and services—would have to grow in the second half by 6.9 per-

All-time dismal record

The percentage of jobless workers receiving unemployment insurance benefits dropped to an all-time low of 26.9 percent last month, the Center on Budget & Policy Priorities reported.

Of the 8,753,000 Americans out of work and actively seeking jobs in June, only 2,355,000 were drawing unemployment benefits. That left nearly 6.4 million jobless not being helped—a larger number than at the height of the recession. In late 1982, when the jobless rate was 10.7 percent compared with the current 7.3 percent level, the number of unemployed not getting benefits was 400,000 fewer.

The center, which is a non-profit research organization, noted the phaseout of the Federal Supplemental Compensation program for long-term unemployed and the virtual elimination of the federal-state extended benefits program. In addition to those who have exhausted their benefits without finding jobs, the ranks of the unemployed include persons not eligible for benefits, such as those looking for a first job or re-entering the labor market.

Bureau of Labor Statistics data for June, which were available only for the 11 largest states, found the percentage of unemployed receiving benefits ranging from a low of about 15 percent in Texas and Florida to a high of 45.7 percent in Massachusetts, 39.3 percent in New Jersey and 37.3 percent in California.

Unions seek strengthening of pension insurance

Unions representing millions of workers covered by single-employer pension plans warned Congress that the federal pension plan insurance program will be jeopardized unless premiums are substantially raised.

The present $2.60-a-year premium per plan participant dates from 1974, when the pension insurance legislation went into effect. But past requests of the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. for a premium increase for single-employer plans have been sidetracked by Congress and the deficit has grown to more than $460 million.

A premium rise, preferably to $8.50 a year, should be the top legislative priority, Industrial Union Dept. Research Director Richard Prosten urged. Then, he said, Congress should follow through with needed reforms to prevent employers from evading their obligations and to better protect workers from loss of promised benefits.

Union-supported legislation to raise the premium and strengthen worker protections has been introduced by Chairman William L. Clay (D-Mo.) and ranking minority member Marge Roukema (R-N.J.) of the House Labor-Management Relations Subcommittee.

Testimony on behalf of Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams, presented by employee benefits counsel Howard Kline, cited the urgency of the problem.

"Employers do go out of business, underfunded pension programs do terminate, and retirees and their families stand to lose all or nearly all of their retirement benefits but for the protections afforded by the PBGC's single-employer program," the union stressed.

Threat to plan

The Steelworkers' testimony noted the threat to the program's solvency if even a few large employers go under. Just now, the union said, it is striving to avoid termination of pension plans of the Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., which has been under bankruptcy law protection since April. The plans cover 10,000 retirees and nearly 10,000 active employees.

"If we are unsuccessful," the union warned, "the unfunded benefits guaranteed by the PBGC would total nearly $350 million."

Auto Workers Associate General Counsel Alan V. Reuther cited International Harvester as another company in serious financial difficulties with "large unfunded pension liabilities."

Reuther noted that the PBGC has been seeking a premium increase for the past three years and he warned that failure to deal with the problem now will make a remedy much more difficult in the future. If the deficit is allowed to mount further, he warned, "there will inevitably be demands to cut back on the protections" for beneficiaries.

Two UAW members affected by pension terminations following partial shutdowns by corporations that were otherwise profitable testified to the limits on existing pension protections, even with the government insurance program.

Earlie Putnam, Jr., who took an early retirement in 1981 after 31 years with Federal Forge in Lansing, Mich., had his pension benefits cut back after the company terminated the plan to the level of the PBGC guarantee. In his case, that meant a reduction from $897 to $626. The benefit he is due after age 62, when he would be eligible for social security, will be reduced from $523 to $365.

Comparable reductions were cited by Mary Belcher, who worked for 32 years at the Lear Siegler Automotive Division plant in Detroit. Despite the pension terminations, she noted, the parent company remains highly profitable. One provision of the Clay-Roukema bill would require companies that terminate pension plans to earmark 5 percent of future profits over the next 10 years to pay promised pension benefits not covered by the PBGC guarantee.

From the Air Line Pilots, retirement and insurance director David Vance presented testimony by ALPA President Henry A. Duffy in support of strengthened pension protection. The ALPA said a union that has negotiated retirement benefits should be considered a party to proceedings before the Internal Revenue Service when an employer pleads financial distress and asks the IRS to waive pension funding requirements.

Seniors back proposal

National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman also strongly endorsed the premium increase and benefit protection bills, as did the American Association of Retired Persons.

The Administration has endorsed the PBGC request for a $7.50 premium level, effective this year, and Subcommittee Chairman Clay said the measures are close enough to make speedy action possible. He said his subcommittee hopes to mark up a bill before the August recess of Congress.

He pledged to do "everything possible" to get legislation enacted this year.

At House economic stabilization hearings, Subcommittee Chairman John J. LaFalce (D-N.Y.) and AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald.

Emergency action pressed to remedy dollar distortion

seeking a better balanced and more stable system of currency exchange, he proposed to the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization.

The Trade Act allows the President to restrict imports in order to deal with international payment problems. He may impose a surcharge of up to 15 percent on imported articles for 150 days and establish temporary quotas.

With that breathing spell, Oswald said, negotiations could seek an international remedy to the disruptive effects of currency speculation.

While the dollar has slipped from its 1985 high, Oswald noted that at the end of June, its value in relation to major foreign currencies was 10 percent above the level of a year ago. And it was about 70 percent more than its mid-1980 level.

Keeping pace with the rise in the dollar's exchange rate has been the nation's merchandise trade deficit—from about $25 billion in 1980 to a record $123 billion last year.

Labor's special concern is with the impact on America's workers, Oswald made clear. He said the trade imbalance has cost the United States between 2 million and 3 million jobs, thwarting the nation's recovery from recession.

Soaring dollar

Oswald linked last year's record trade deficit to the fact that the dollar's exchange rate had risen 58 percent above the average value for 10 other major currencies since 1980.

Just to keep the same competitive position American industry had in 1980, he noted, "American workers would need to either be 58 percent more productive or take a 58 percent wage cut."

Workers' pay didn't cause the big trade deficits and pay cuts aren't the solution, Oswald insisted. The big factor in the dollar's overvaluation has been the high interest rates that attracted foreign investment to this country, he said.

Realistically, Oswald stressed, the dollar's imbalance will not be cured overnight and the United States will continue for some time to be at a trade disadvantage. He pointed also to the host of other factors that have allowed imports to take over important sections of the domestic market. The United States cannot and should not have to compete in wages with countries that subsidize exports, lack labor standards and pay workers a tiny fraction of U.S. wages, he said.

Drain on wages

Trying to match such conditions in order to stay competitive "would require such low wages in the United States as to cause a significant reduction in the standard of living and a contraction of the U.S. economy," Oswald warned.

Without some form of import restrictions, unemployment will continue to grow, he stressed.

Oswald challenged the argument that any curb on imports will hurt consumers through higher prices.

In the marketplace, he noted, imports frequently are priced at the same level as domestic products. But merchandisers prefer them because of higher markups.

The pattern has been that "the foreign producers, exporters, importers and retailers each take as much advantage to increase their mark-up as the market will permit," he noted.

Until the wage gap can be narrowed, Oswald urged, "there should be fair import trade quotas for developing nations" that would allow them a share in the U.S. market but avoid the destruction of American industries.

Senate approves sanctions to fight South African racism

The Senate joined the House in voting to impose economic sanctions on South Africa, rejecting the Reagan Administration's contention that the United States should rely on "friendly persuasion" to change the racist apartheid system.

There are still important differences between the two bills, but both versions would ban bank loans to the South African government and prohibit the sale of computers for use in the enforcement of the racial segregation system.

But the House version, preferred by the AFL-CIO, would also prohibit new investments by U.S. firms in South Africa and halt the importation of Krugerrand gold coins. The Senate bill would hold open the threat of additional sanctions, but further congressional action would be required to put them into effect.

The Senate rejected all amendments to further weaken the sanctions and passed the bill, 80-12. It was supported by 44 Democrats and 36 Republicans, with 12 Republicans opposed.

A House-Senate conference to resolve differences would normally be the next step, but Senate leaders are trying to avoid a conference and get the House to adopt the milder version intact. Their concern is that a stronger bill would lead to a politically embarassing presidential veto.

The House and Senate appeared even further apart on a budget resolution as the latest round of negotiations broke up in deadlock.

The "framework" of an agreement reached at a White House meeting had appeared to assure that the social security cost-of-living adjustment would remain intact and that military spending would be allowed to rise closer to the Senate-approved level. But Senate Republicans, echoing the Administration position, insisted on cuts that would demolish important government programs and rejected alternatives proposed by the House side.

The House, meanwhile, passed the first of a series of appropriations bills, despite the lack of agreement on budget ceilings. It used the House-passed version of the budget resolution as a spending limit.

For the third year in a row, the House approved a bill to establish an American Conservation Corps to put unemployed teenagers to work rehabilitating public lands. A similar measure was pocket-vetoed by President Reagan after the 98th Congress adjourned. But with budget-cutting on the congressional front burner, the vote for passage was a slim 193-191 and Senate action is unlikely.

Auto Workers ratify AMC job security pact

Kenosha, Wis.—Members of the Auto Workers at American Motors Corp.'s big assembly and engine plant here and at its smaller parts plant in Milwaukee over whelmingly approved a new 38-month contract, averting a threatened shutdown of the two operations.

The agreement covers nearly 8,000 members of UAW Local 72 in Kenosha and Local 75 in Milwaukee.

The concessionary pact includes adjustments in wages and paid time off as well as changes in work rules. The partly French-owned automaker in return agreed to keep the plants open, and also strengthened job security and retirement programs.

Actors federation assails apartheid

The Actors & Artistes condemned South Africa's system of apartheid and urged its members to respect the cultural boycott of that country.

Delegates to the nine-union federation's annual meeting reaffirmed its "longstanding policy against the South African system of apartheid, with its legacy of racism, repression and injustice."

The resolution also took issue with "any organization which engages in the publication of a list of performers, the effect of which list would be to cause the named performers to become unemployable."

The United Nations Center Against Apartheid had published a "Register of Entertainers, Actors and Others Who Have Performed in Apartheid South Africa."

Union representatives have met with UN officials to negotiate an end to the publication of the list.

At the 4As biennial convention which preceded the meeting, President Frederick O'Neal, Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff and Treas. Harold M. Hoffman were re-elected to new two-year terms.

Also re-elected were Vice Presidents Ken Orsatti, Willard Swire, Gene Boucher and Rod McKuen. David Ross Miller was elected to his first full term as vice president. He had been appointed to that post earlier.

The nine unions that comprise the Actors & Artistes are: Actors' Equity, Musical Artists, Television & Radio Artists, Variety Artists, Screen Actors, Hebrew Actors, Italian Actors, Screen Extras and Puerto Rican Artists & Technicians.

Bahr succeeds Watts

CWA delegates pick new leadership team

San Francisco—The Communications Workers picked a new leadership team at the CWA's 47th annual convention.

Elected unanimously to special four-year terms were President Morton Bahr and Sec.-Treas. James B. Booe.

Retiring President Glenn E. Watts and Sec.-Treas. Louis B. Knecht, who stepped down the opening day of the convention with one-year to go on their three-year terms, had led the union since 1974.

The more than 2,000 delegates also elected Barbara J. Easterling as executive vice president, the post that Booe has held since 1980.

For the last 16 years, Bahr has been the CWA vice president heading the union's largest district, covering New York, New Jersey and the New England states and representing 120,000 workers.

In accepting the presidency, Bahr said he will give particular emphasis to:

- Collective bargaining. Negotiations next year with the divested elements of AT&T and the Bell system will be CWA's "most immediate concern," along with its contract covering 34,000 New Jersey state employees that expires next year.

- Organizing the telecommunications industry. Calling IBM "the J.P. Stevens of the international communications industry," Bahr proposed a worldwide, coordinated organizing campaign directed at the multinational conglomerate. "IBM is one of the most anti-union companies in the world, and the employees of MCI and Rolm must be having nightmares about being absorbed into the IBM culture," Bahr said.

Head-to-head fight

IBM's recently announced intent to acquire up to 30 percent of MCI (the nation's second largest long distance company) will put it in head-to-head competition with AT&T. Bahr said he will propose a conference of union representatives from all the countries where IBM has plants as soon as possible after 1986 bargaining is completed.

- Intensified political involvement. "The moral health of a nation is just as important as its economic health, but I fear our nation's political life is dominated by people who preach about principles rather than living up to them," Bahr said.

- Broader participation of members in the affairs of the CWA. Bahr pledged that the union will provide additional programs and services to encourage the involvement of all members and their families.

- Closing a communications gap between the union and its members. "We must aggressively reach out from every level of our union" to reach the members "on the shop floor, in the office and in their homes," Bahr said.

Bahr, 58, has been with the CWA since 1951 when he led his co-workers at Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co., now a part of ITT World Communications, into the union. He was a staff representive from 1957 to 1969 when he was elected district vice president. He played a major role in bringing 24,000 New York Telephone Co. plant department workers into CWA in 1957, some 5,000 New York City public workers into CWA in 1965, and 34,000 New Jersey state workers into the union in 1979.

Booe, also 58, has been a CWA member since 1945. From 1970 to 1976, he was CWA vice president for District 9 covering California, Washington, Oregon, Nevada, Hawaii and Alaska. He later served as an assistant to Watts before being elected executive vice president. In that post, he directed the union's political efforts and its COPE fund-raising campaigns.

Three-way race

Easterling, 53, an assistant to Watts since 1980, was elected to the executive vice presidency on the second ballot over Dina G. Beaumont and Gloria Shepperson.

Succeeding Bahr as vice president for CWA District 1 is his assistant, Jan D. Pierce, who ran without opposition.

Labor Sec. William E. Brock, in his first appearance before a union convention since he took office, expressed his commitment to "the free collective bargaining process" and pledged to "work to support the growing trend toward labor-management cooperation."

But Brock did not gain the support of the delegates in his endorsement of President Reagan's proposals for a lower minimum wage for teenagers, unfair tax reform and cutbacks in vital federal programs.

Bahr challenged Brock to put needed funds into the Labor Dept.'s OSHA programs, particularly in on-site safety inspections, which have been cut back sharply during the Reagan Administration.

Congress pressed to bolster toxic waste cleanup measure

Labor and environmental leaders urged Congress to strengthen the Superfund for the cleanup of toxic waste dumps and pass a new job disease bill to protect millions of workers from exposure to hazardous substances.

The challenge to Congress came at a news conference during the third annual convention of the OSHA/Environmental Network. Briefing the press were Machinists President William Winpisinger; Network Chair Gaylord Nelson, who also heads the Wilderness Society, and Network coordinators Howard D. Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Michael McCloskey, chairman of the Sierra Club.

In an address to the delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised the coalition for uniting previously separated forces toward a common goal. "All of us—workers and environmentalists," he said, "are well aware that many of the dangers communities face from unclean air, unclean water and unclean land have their origins in the workplace."

Donahue cited the example of the tragedy in the Union Carbide plant in Bhopal, India, where unsafe working conditions were ignored until they produced a cloud of methyl isocyanate gas which blanketed the town, killing 2,000 people and injuring thousands more.

"Most people have a short attention span, and they have already put Bhopal out of their minds," Donahue said. "They...wrote the whole thing off as though it were somehow unique to the developing countries around the globe. Unfortunately, that is not true.

"Had that particular chemical plant been located in the United States rather than India, none of the conditions which led to the disaster would have violated any specific standards which currently exist in this country.

"The point is, it can happen here," Donahue warned.

Donahue said that is why the coalition's work is of "such critical importance," by making the public "aware of the inevitable linkage between health and safety in the workplace and the health and safety in the community at large."

Call for action

Winpisinger said Congress must press "full speed ahead" legislation that would establish a federal identification, notification and research program for workers who are at high risk of contracting diseases related to toxic exposures in the workplace. The bill was introduced by representatives Joseph Gaydos (D-Pa.) and Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.)

Some 11 million workers are exposed to known cancer-causing substances and other toxics at work each day, and 100,000 workers die and one million are disabled every year from job disease caused by toxic exposures, Winpisinger said.

Yet, there is no system in place to help these workers know about the hazards and their health effects, Winpisinger said.

McCloskey said the coalition has a "first-class fight and challenge" to get an effective Superfund toxic waste cleanup reauthorization passed. The coalition backs a Superfund bill introduced by Rep. James Florio (D-N.J.), which provides a $10 billion toxic waste site cleanup fund and sets cleanup deadlines for the Environmental Protection Agency.

Bowing to Administration and conservative opposition, a House Energy & Commerce panel recently set aside Florio's bill for one which sets no deadlines for the EPA, which has cleaned up only six out of thousands of toxic waste dumps in five years.

In what McCloskey called an "extremely ominous sign that bodes ill for our entire network," the substitute bill would preempt state and community "right-to-know" laws on toxic substances—a network priority since its formation—with weaker federal rules.

Unions ask passage of strong federal law on workers' right to know of job risks

A strong federal law is needed to provide workers the fundamental right to know if they are at risk of contracting job-related diseases, union witnesses told Congress.

Rubber Workers President Milan Stone, testifying before the House Subcommittees on Health & Safety and Labor Standards, urged speedy passage of the High Risk Occupational Disease Notification & Prevention Act. The measure would require the government to tell workers when they have been identified as being at high risk of getting an occupational disease.

Currently, workers identified in scientific studies as potential victims of job-related diseases are not informed, and therefore, are unlikely to take preventive measures to possibly save their lives.

He was joined by Howard D. Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; Joseph M. Misbrener, president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Dr. Irving J. Selikoff, professor emeritus of the Mount Sinai School of Medicine, and Michael McCloskey, chairman of the Sierra Club.

Samuel told the subcommittees that passage of the high risk notification bill is "a long overdue commitment to simple fairness and justice."

Stone testified that there is a critical need for a national program for identifying, notifying, counseling, and medically monitoring worker populations at risk of occupational disease.

The development of such a program would aid in the prevention and early detection of occupational disease and could substantially reduce the staggering costs of medical treatment and care in the United States.

"Workers have a basic and fundamental right to know that they have been exposed to an occupational hazard and are at risk of contracting an occupational disease," Stone told the subcommittees.

Extent of problem

He outlined the extent of the occupational disease problem, listing the millions of workers affected by varius hazardous materials. These include:

- 3 million workers exposed to benzene with a risk of leukemia up to five times greater than normal.

- 2.5 million workers exposed to asbestos with a risk of lung cancer five times higher than normal.

- 1.4 million workers exposed to nickel, some with a risk factor of lung cancer 10 times normal.

- 1.5 million workers exposed to arsenic on the job, increasing the risk of lung cancer up to five times normal.

Misbrener pointed out in his testimony that the proposed legislation would expand federal research efforts and further identify worker groups at risk of disease due to on-the-job exposures to hazardous substances. The measure would also establish a program to notify workers who are considered at risk because of their occupation.

The House bill would require the Secretary of Health & Human Services to establish certified occupational and environmental health centers to provide medical monitoring examinations and related services to workers who are notified that they may be at high or increased risk of a job-related disease.

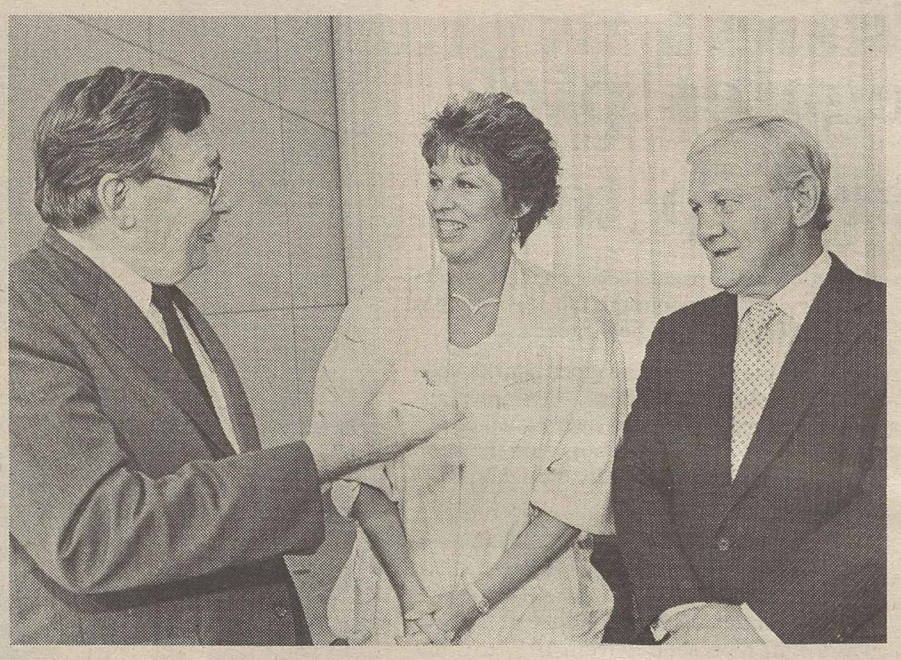
Dr. Selikoff, an expert on occupational illnesses, urged passage of the notification legislation. He stressed to the subcommittees that it has only been in this century that medical professionals have been able to concentrate on the prevention of disease.

He praised the bill for being "intensely practical" because it "asks us to try to prevent disease for those at greatest risk."

In pointing up the ethical questions surrounding the withholding of notification from potential occupational disease victims, Selikoff stressed that "whether we inform people of risks can ultimately be thought of as a decision that will determine, in many cases, whether people will live or die."

Considered the nation's top authority on asbestos-related diseases, Selikoff pointed out that 9,000 deaths annually are anticipated from this exposure.

He predicted 15 to 20 percent of these deaths could be prevented "if we were to apply what is currently known in properly conducted medical surveillance programs."



Selikoff added that a side benefit of surveillance of high risk groups would be the advantage of "forcing" advances in medical management and treatment.

Convention

The 16th Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO will take place in Anaheim, Calif., beginning Oct. 28, 1985.

The meetings of the convention will be in the Anaheim Hilton and Towers Hotel.

TV's Vicki Lawrence

'Mama' carries the UFCW message

"Listen to Mama." That's the message the Food & Commerical Workers is sending television viewers and radio listeners, with a little help from a feisty character.

Fans of television's Vicki Lawrence will instantly recognize the sharp tongue of "Mama," ruling matriarch of the TV series "Mama's Family." But Mama's latest messages are a bit different from her usual barbs directed at Carol Burnett's Eunice.

Lawrence and Mama have joined the UFCW media campaign urging support for the union's picket lines and boycotts against Georgia area food stores, Armour hot dogs and Marval turkey products.

UFCW President William H. Wynn said the union wanted to find new ways to communicate the problems of workers to the American people.

"Our economy—with plant shutdowns, unfair foreign competition, corporate mergers and dislocations—has not been kind to American workers or American unions. Through 'Mama,' we will present our complex message in a simple, easy-to-understand fashion—and most importantly, with humor," Wynn continued.

Campaign kickoff

The UFCW kicked off the campaign with a public reception and screening at AFL-CIO headquarters, where Lawrence met with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and rank-and-file union members.

The union's campaign features television, radio and newspaper ads with Lawrence's "Mama" giving advice on picket lines (don't cross them), foreign-owned stores (don't shop them) and even sexual harassment problems (call your union or the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission).

Lawrence said the advertising campaign is "a great opportunity to help the union communicate some difficult issues to the American public." A Republican, Lawrence doesn't believe unionism is a partisan issue.

"When the UFCW approached me, it was obvious to me that we weren't talking about Republican or Democratic issues—we were talking about American values."

"One of the issues we're tackling in this campaign is foreign-owned supermarket chains undercutting American workers' standard of living. That's something I feel very strongly about," she continued.

Mama's first target is the foreign-owned Food Lion grocery chain, as the UFCW campaign gets under way in Augusta, Ga. The union's message: "Listen to Mama. A union can help."

Westinghouse talks stalled, strike date set

Pittsburgh—Unions bargaining with the Westinghouse Electric Corp. set a strike deadline of midnight July 22 after the company persisted in its demands for massive takeaways.

The company finally presented its list of specific proposals—a four-inch thick stack—on July 15 as talks neared the July 21 expiration of the current pact. Rejecting the company's demands for concessions, the union coalition asked management to take them off the table.

Meanwhile, workers at General Electric Co. overwhelmingly approved a new three-year agreement reached June 30 that covers about 56,000 members of two unions, the Electronic Workers and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers. The agreement also serves as the model for contracts of other unions in the coalition with GE.

The GE agreement provides for a long-sought agency shop and improved job security as well as substantial wage and pension gains.

Break from tradition

While Westinghouse generally has followed GE's lead, it indicated this time that it wants to break from tradition. The unions that form the Coordinated Bargaining Committee have strongly resisted the company's strategy.

Besides the IUE and the UE, other unions involved in the Westinghouse talks are the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Carpenters, Machinists, and Steelworkers. The six unions represent a total of 34,000 employees.

Workers will receive an initial lump-sum payment equal to 3 percent of their annual pay, followed by 3-percent wage increases in the second and third years. The pact also provides an improved cost-of-living adjustment formula.

IUD backs bills for conversion of defense plants

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has called for national planning to convert military plants to civilian production in order to ease the impact of plant closings and layoffs in the unstable defense industry.

The IUD executive council endorsed two economic planning bills—H.R. 1066, introduced by Rep. Nick Mavroules (D-Mass.), and H.R. 229, introduced by Rep. Ted Weiss (D-N.Y.).

Defense plants, the IUD council said in a resolution, are "inherently unstable sources of employment. Their often highly specialized workforces face mass unemployment—by hundreds or thousands at one time—when a military production contract sooner or later comes to its conclusion."

"While the Defense Dept. can pay hundreds of millions of dollars to indemnify corporations when procurement contracts are cut off, there is no comparable program to assist workers whose livelihood is cut off."

Most aerospace and weapons plants are "well equipped to produce high quality, fully competetive products for private markets," it continued. Development of alternative production plans "can help minimize the human costs of this special type of plant closing and, at the same time, help to make sure that defense procurement decisions are made on the basis of proper concern for national defense and not on the basis that military spending creates employment which would not otherwise exist," the council said.

The broader economic consequences of today's military expenditures also should be addressed, the council said. Defense spending now exceeds $300 billion annually, or 8 percent of the gross national product, a larger share of the U.S. economy than even during the Vietnam war, it pointed out.

This high level of military spending "can place a burden on the competitiveness of American industry by concentrating some of the best scientific and highly skilled workers into non-commercial activities," it said.

Live union aid

Union members donated time and skills as well as money to the success of the "Live Aid" concerts that raised millions of dollars to help famine victims in Africa.

Members of the Television & Radio Artists, Musicians, and Theatrical Stage Employees were instrumental in saving an estimated $16 million in production costs.

AFTRA reported that its participating members in both Philadelphia and London waived their payments and also paid their own travel and accommodations expenses. One AFTRA group from the West Coast spent $12,000 in travel and performance-related expenses.

The fund-raising events raised more than $69 million for famine relief in Ethiopia, Chad, Mozambique, Angola and Sudan.

Public worker unions assail flaws in Reagan tax reform

Public worker unions pressed Congress to close corporate tax loopholes instead of putting a revenue squeeze on state and local governments.

One of the Reagan Administration's "tax reform" proposals being considered by the House Ways & Means Committee would end the federal income tax deduction for state and local taxes.

That's the opposite of tax reform, the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. protested in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee. It fails the test of fairness to taxpayers and it would seriously weaken the ability of cities and states to provide public services, the PED asserted.

There is a "simple and compelling" reason for the deduction, Al Bilik, executive director of the PED's state and local division, testified. "Income used to pay taxes to other levels of government should not be counted in determining an individual's ability to pay taxes at the federal level," he said.

Cities and states are already pressed to make up for federal budget cutbacks, Bilik testified. If the federal exemption were ended, he warned, the curtailment of tax resources would mean poorer schools, less health care, and inferior public services.

Charitable contributions would remain tax deductible under the Administration proposal, and Bilik wondered why a voluntary contribution to a private school would be allowed as a deduction while a property tax imposed to support public schools would be denied similar treatment.

As for the revenue factor, Bilik noted that President Reagan's proposed revision of business depreciation rules would, over four years, raise $175 billion less than the reform originally proposed by the Treasury Dept. That's substantially more than the revenue gain from ending the state and local tax deduction.

New York transit package provides gains for 36,000

New York—A new three-year agreement between the Transport Workers and the Metropolitan Transit Authority provides substantial wage and benefit improvements for some 36,000 workers.

The pact, which is subject to rank-and-file ratification, will raise the pay of city bus and subway workers by nearly 18 percent over the life of the agreement. It also is basically free of "givebacks," or concessions MTA has sought at the beginning of the negotiations.

"We're delighted that the union achieved the primary goals we set at the opening of talks," said TWU Local 100 President Sonny Hall.

The union's chief goals were job security and resisting management demands for givebacks.

The union's executive board unanimously voted approval of the agreement and recommended its ratification.

Members will vote on the pact by mail, and the tally will be announced Aug. 14.

Terms of the agreement were also accepted by Locals 726 and 1056 of the Amalgamated Transit Union, which represent a combined total of 2,100 bus drivers and mechanics in Queens and Staten Island.

Under the agreement, workers will receive 5-percent wage increases retroactive to Apr. 1. Additional 6-percent boosts will take effect on Apr. 1 in both 1986 and 1987. Compounded, the increases produce a total raise of about 17.9 percent over the life of the agreement.

Management also agreed to put up $42.7 million to maintain present health and welfare benefits for workers, a dramatic reversal of its position at the opening of talks when it proposed that workers pay 25 percent of the cost.

Also, the MTA agreed to put $12.2 million toward improving benefits, dental care, eyeglasses and prescription drugs.

The contract also extends coverage of the union's prescription plan for surviving spouses from 30 days to a year.

Retiree benefits

The optical and prescription plan improvements also will extend to retirees.

The new agreement, which replaces one that expired on Mar. 31, does contain some concessions to management, but nowhere near the dozens management asked for initially.

New transit workers will start at 70 percent of the full wage rate, reaching top pay in 36 months. Under the old agreement, new workers started at 75 percent of top pay and worked up to full scale in 31 to 48 months depending on their job.

In addition, weekend and night differential pay is frozen and several overtime pay rules were modified.

The new contract also improves and expedites the union grievance procedure.

Job decline continues

Apparel, textile unions push for import relief

Unions representing apparel and textile workers told the Senate's International Trade subcommittee that legislation is needed to curb job-destroying imports because a system of negotiated quotas isn't working.

The Multifiber Arrangement, known as MFA, is supposed to restrain textile and apparel imports so as to avoid serious damage to a major domestic industry. But the damage has nevetheless taken place, the unions testified.

Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin said American workers are still losing their jobs because "textile mills and garment shops in our country are curtailing production or closing down altogether" as a result of rising imports.

Clothing & Textile Workers Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman told the Senate panel that 100,000 textile and apparel jobs were lost in 1984, employment is down 250,000 since 1980, and "there are almost half a million fewer textile and apparel workers today than when the Multifiber Arrangement went into effect in 1974."

Bipartisan support

The union officials urged passage of a bipartisan bill that has been introduced by 53 senators and nearly two-thirds of the House, but is opposed by the Reagan Administration. It would expand the list of covered textile and apparel products and limit import growth to between 1 percent and 6 percent annually.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige acknowledged the rise in the import share of the U.S. market, but said the Administration is taking "vigorous steps under the existing structure" to keep the industry healthy.

The proposed legislation "is contrary to the free market principles of this Administration," he testified.

Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), one of the sponsors of the bill, challenged the Administration position and charged that it contradicted a pledge President Reagan made during the 1980 campaign and reiterated in a 1982 letter that he would work to hold imports to the same rate of growth as the domestic market.

Sheinkman said the labor-supported bill will provide the safeguards that the Multifiber Arrangement "promised but has not delivered."

Foreign countries have cheated on the existing quota system and suffered few penalties when caught, Sheinkman noted. "Too often," he testified, "the operation of the program takes a back seat to foreign policy objectives" and violations are not punished "for fear of irritating some foreign country."

Chaikin noted as an example of the government's too little and too late policy the rise in imports of cotton underwear from China, which in 1982 sent shipments totaling 144,000 dozen to the United States. The total climbed to 740,000 before the United States requested consultation with China in 1983 and established, pending a negotiated agreement, a limit of 740,000 dozen for 1984.

Just this past March, he noted, an agreement reached with China allowed the import level to rise to 1,254,000 dozen this year, with further increases in each of the next two years.

Chaikin reminded the senators that the job-losers from such an open-door import policy are low-wage workers, predominantly women. It is "no bargain for the American people," he said, when jobs are destroyed "for the sake of greater profits" to importers and retailers.

At Senate trade hearings, ILGWU's Sol Chaikin, left, and ACTWU's Jacob Sheinkman call on Congress for curbs on job-gutting imports.

White House scored on bid to 'privatize' data collection

The AFL-CIO reiterated its strong opposition to an Administration proposal to turn data collection over to private industry, branding the scheme as "crackpot, doctrinaire, free-market ideology gone wild."

"In essence, this proposal—which may become a directive—is telling federal agencies: 'Turn over to provate business all the information gathering and information distribution that you possibly can,' " Federation Economist Markley Roberts told a House Government Operations subcommittee.

"And for what you can't turn over to private business, impose full-cost user charges."

Roberts said the plan, proposed by the Office of Management & Budget in the Mar. 15 Federal Register, smacks of yet another pro-business, industry-protection move by the Reagan Administration.

"If the federal government does not collect key statistics for public policy decision-making, there won't be any reliable statistics," Roberts declared.

"In spite of previous OMB actions which have clearly indicated a pro-industry, pro-big business bias, the general public still generally views federal statistical agencies like the Census Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics as the only neutral, reliable, and authoritative sources of information on subjects of public debate and public policy decision-making."

Roberts charged that the OMB proposal reinforces the growing perception that the agency, "on behalf of business interests affected by government rulemaking and government policymaking, is trying to manipulate information or suppress information which affects the public interest in a number of areas."

OMB is too often charged with meeting secretly with industry representatives and acting as the tool of big business and industry greed rather than as the proponent of the public interest that it is supposed to be, Roberts said.

"It's just plain wrong and foolish to think that collection and processing and distribution of key statistics for public policymaking can be performed with any success or statistical reliability by private business efforts."

'Buy American Week' resolution endorsed

A congressman who asked the AFL-CIO's support for his resolution designating the first week in September as "National Buy American Week" got a quick and enthusiastic response.

"Your 'Buy American' resolution could not be more timely," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote Rep. Austin J. Murphy (D-Pa.).

The nation's trade imbalance has shown a "mega-increase" virtually every month, Denison said, making the Reagan Administration "the Babe Ruth of both national budget and trade deficits."

Flint Glass Workers press for update of trade policies

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The Flint Glass Workers' convention called on Congress to pass the Trade Law Modernization Act of 1985 to help prevent the further exportation of American jobs.

The convention's 306 delegates pointed out in a resolution on fair trade that the current state of the economy with historically high rates of unemployment and record trade deficits reflects U.S. corporations' perception of labor costs as burdensome and their attempts to boost profits by moving abroad.

The resolution added that the Reagan Administration seems bent on projecting a brand of free trade that "only adds to the number of displaced workers."

The union's members have seen imports devastate some key segments of the glass industry, especially tablewear—dishes and glasses.

Another resolution of special import to the Flint Glass Workers' members called for strengthening the industry by opposing measures to require deposits on glass containers at retail stores.

Workers' benefits

Among other resolutions adopted at the 12-day convention were measures expressing opposition to any changes in social security cost-of-living adjustments and to any Reagan Administration attempts to tax workers' life support benefits.

All top officers of the union were re-elected without opposition. President George M. Parker was returned for his 13th two-year term and Sec.-Treas. Ivan T. Uncapher will serve a seventh term. The vice presidents returned to office are Robert W. Newell, Eugene F. Bowling and Ben Johnson, Jr. Lawrence Bankowski was re-elected assistant secretary.

The Flint Glass Workers have one of the longest convention schedules, and the delegates directed a policy committee to study the impact of reducing the convention from two weeks to one week.

They also called on the international officers over the next two years to study the pros and cons of merger. Assistant Sec. Bankowski stressed that the union has no merger talks underway and no possible merger partners lined up.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told delegates of the challenges facing unions as the economy shifts from a manufacturing base to a service base. Donahue also denounced the Reagan Administration's efforts to tax worker benefits.

Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. stressed to the delegates the need for solidarity among unions and the changing pattern of labor-management relationships.

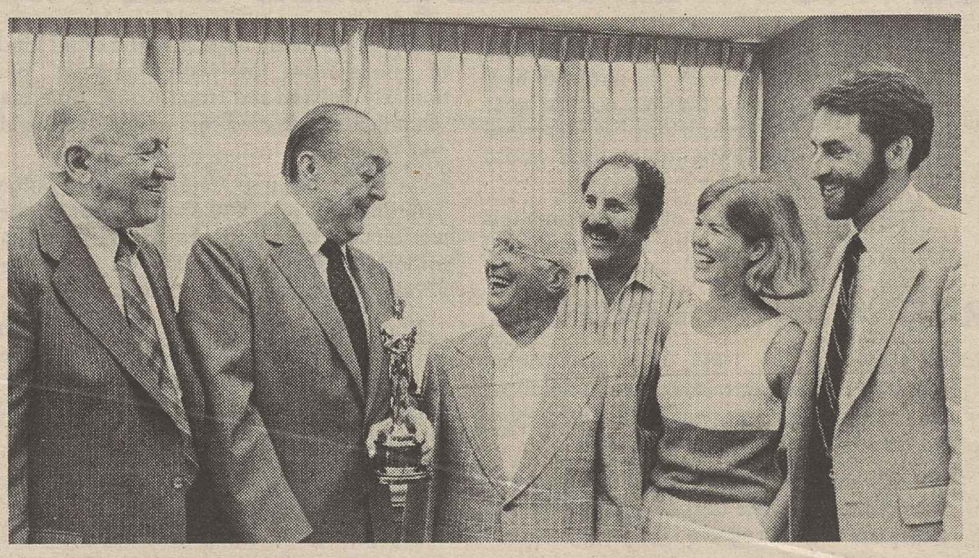
Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio) pointed to the need for trade unionists to become better trained and more active in investment affairs with particular emphasis on the allocation of pension funds.

Other key speakers included Executive Director Vernon McDougall of the Workers' Institute for Safety & Health, Hugh Layden of the National Council for Senior Citizens, and President Richard Ray of the Atlanta AFL-CIO, a member of the Flint Glass Workers.

Building Trades hail court ruling on safety net use

Boston—The Ironworkers and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. scored a victory for workers in the steel erection industry when a federal appeals court here ruled on the use of safety nets.

The 1st U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a citation by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration against the Daniel Marr & Son Co. for failing to protect its employees who work as "connectors" fastening together the steel beams during the erection of a building.



The Ironworkers and the BCTD had intervened in the case in support of OSHA, which had inspected the erection of the steel frame of a turbine generator building at the Seabrook, N.H., nuclear power plant at the request of Ironworkers Local 474.

High-level danger

The OSHA inspector in May 1982 observed four connectors working without nets 115 feet above the ground and 40 feet above the nearest inside floor.

He cited the company for not having safety nets inside and outside the structure. Marr Co. contested both citations, which were later upheld by an administrative law judge. The firm appealed the exterior net citation to the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission which overturned the law judge's ruling by a 2 to 1 vote.

In reversing the OSHRC decision, the three-judge appellate court panel said the Labor Secretary's interpretation of the department's safety regulations should be given deference if it is logical and reasonable.

Stone carvers on TV

The Stone Carvers, an Oscar-winning documentary film on the work of four Laborers' craftsmen, was televised nationally on the Public Broadcasting System on July 4, funded mainly by the union. From left, are LIU Sec.-Treas. Arthur E. Coia, President Angelo Fosco, carvers Roger Morigi and Vincent Palumbo, and film producers Marjorie Hunt and Paul Wagner.

Free Soviet Jewry

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue sign petition to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev demanding the USSR abide by terms of the 1975 Helsinki agreement, and permit Soviet Jews to emigrate. Bert Seidman, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, and Evelyn Dubrow, vice president and legislative director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, look on. Seidman is chairman of the Jewish Labor Committee in Washington. Dubrow is a national vice chairman. The JLC is sponsoring the petition drive for Soviet compliance.

Curb on transit bargaining costs Atlanta federal funds

A federal appeals court ruled that Atlanta's public transit system is ineligible to receive further federal funds because of a state law that restricts collective bargaining for its employees.

The decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia is a victory for the Amalgamated Transit Union, which represents the 2,000 workers of the Atlanta transit authority.

In its ruling, the court ordered the Secretary of Labor to cut off the funds because the Atlanta transit system does not comply with the intent of Congress. Under Section 13(c) of the 1964 Urban Mass Transportation Act, the Secretary of Labor is required to certify that the transit authority has satisfied labor protective standards for employees before funds may be granted.

The federal law was passed at a time when many private transit companies were in precarious financial condition. The measure was designed to allow local governments to step in and buy such companies so that communities would not be without transportation services.

The Georgia legislature created the Metropolitan Atlanta Rapid Transit Authority (MARTA) in 1965 to take over Atlanta's private bus system. The enabling statute allowed MARTA to recognize the ATU and to continue bargaining with the union as the workers' representative.

But in April 1982, the legislature enacted a law prohibiting MARTA from bargaining over five specific issues: the assignment of workers, discharge and termination of employees for cause, subcontracting of work, benefits for part-time workers, and assignment and calculation of overtime.

The law also provided that if the parties could not agree on wages, the matter could be submitted to arbitration only with the consent of both parties.

Union view

But the way the union saw it, the state law gives management the power unilaterally to set wages, and it filed suit against Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan, challenging his refusal to deny certification.

A federal district judge in Washington ruled against the union, but on appeal the circuit court ruled that the 1982 Georgia law is "completely antithetical to the concept of collective bargaining embodied in Section 13(c)."

ATU President James LaSala said he was "very gratified that the court is compelling the Secretary of Labor to comply with Section 13(c)'s provisions as intended by Congress."

Economic slowdown sharpens threat of recession

cent, and most economists see that possibility as highly unlikely.

"The very slow growth of the past year is also reflected in the continued high unemployment levels that we've seen in the past five months," Oswald said, noting the nation's jobless rate has remained stuck at 7.3 percent ever since last February.

Many analysts will view it a stroke of luck if the economy now finishes out the year with a 2-percent growth rate. If that were to happen, a rise in the jobless rate would be virtually inevitable.

The poor performance of the economy this year has been building for some time, and has its roots in the huge imports of all kinds of goods from low-wage countries, particularly Taiwan and Hong Kong. American manufacturers have been unable to compete and have been losing sales at home.

At the same time, failure of the Administration to do anything about exchange rates has kept the U.S. dollar overvalued, making imported goods cheaper and American goods more expensive abroad.

Imports this year so far have cost America some 200,000 manufacturing jobs, and the end is nowhere in sight.

Other indications of a soft economy abounded.

One clear sign that growth has subsided was seen in the Federal Reserve Board's decision to relax its tight-money policy. In a midyear report to Congress, the central bank also pointed to "the unevenness of this business expansion and the...basic structural imbalances in the economy."

The Fed noted that the manufacturing sector has particularly suffered since the long Reagan Recession of 1981-83.

Meanwhile, in other reports, the Commerce Dept. said:

Housing starts rose in June, but only by 1.9 percent, after declining 13.45 percent in May. The department said the slight June increase took the annual rate of starts to 1.7 million, or 7 percent below the year-earlier level.

Business inventories in May fell four-tenths of 1 percent, the biggest drop in over two years. The decline indicated caution on the part of businesses.

Retail sales in June were off by eight-tenths of 1 percent after declining by five-tenths of 1 percent in May.

On a brighter note, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board reported a sharp drop in mortgage interest rates in early June. Fixed rate mortgages averaged 12.86 percent, down from 13.49 percent in the same period in May. The decline was the steepest in more than two years.

Separately, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said a drop in energy prices kept wholesale prices virtually unchanged in May.

UTU, Conrail reach wage accord

The United Transportation Union reached agreement with Conrail, the government-owned freight line, on a new contract restoring wage parity with the rest of the rail road industry.

The agreement is similar in its terms to the pacts signed last February by 15 other unions with members employed by Conrail.

The new UTU accord is subject to ratification, and covers some 8,600 brakemen, conductors, yardmen and firemen on Conrail.

The pact provides for a 12-percent increase in pay—about $1.50 an hour—retroactive to July 1, 1984. Back pay for an average fulltime employee comes to about $4,000, including a special $565 lump-sum payment.

Only the Yardmasters have yet to reach agreement with the carrier. The union has reported some progress, but has no meetings scheduled.

In announcing its new settlement, UTU also said it supports a public offering of Conrail stock in preference to the Transportation Dept.'s decision to sell the line to Norfolk Southern Corp. The position is consistent with that of other Conrail rail unions.

Shoring Up Pensions

FOR 10 YEARS now, workers have had a federal guarantee that the pension rights they earned on the job won't be wiped out if their employer goes out of business, runs into financial difficulties, or simply stops putting money into a retirement fund.

The termination insurance program, operated by the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp., is far from perfect and there are holes in the safety net that should be repaired. But the imperfections are dwarfed by the achievements of the pension reform legislation that the labor movement fought for years to achieve.

On its enactment in 1974, the AFL-CIO exulted that American workers now had assurance "that they will actually receive, when they retire, the pensions they worked so long to achieve."

THE LEGISLATIVE achievement came none too soon. The next decade brought a massive volume of job-destroying imports and the deepest recession since the 1930s. Plant closings and corporate mergers wiped out pension plans as well as jobs. While multi-employer plans had a built-in safety factor, the only protection for workers covered by single-employer plans has been the government's pension insurance program.

For three years now, the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. has asked Congress to legislate an increase in the insurance premium for single-employer plans. The failure of Congress to act has allowed the deficit to accumulate to a hazardous level, and each delay has pushed up the estimate of the increase needed to keep the program solvent.

Even as a congressional committee concluded hearings on rate increase legislation, the once-giant Allis-Chalmers Corp. said it can no longer fund its pension plan, which pays benefits to 6,300 persons already retired, and asked the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. to take it over. Regardless of the validity of its claim of insolvency, this is the type of crisis that brought about the enactment of the law.

The longer Congress delays, the more difficult the solution.

Crocodile Tears

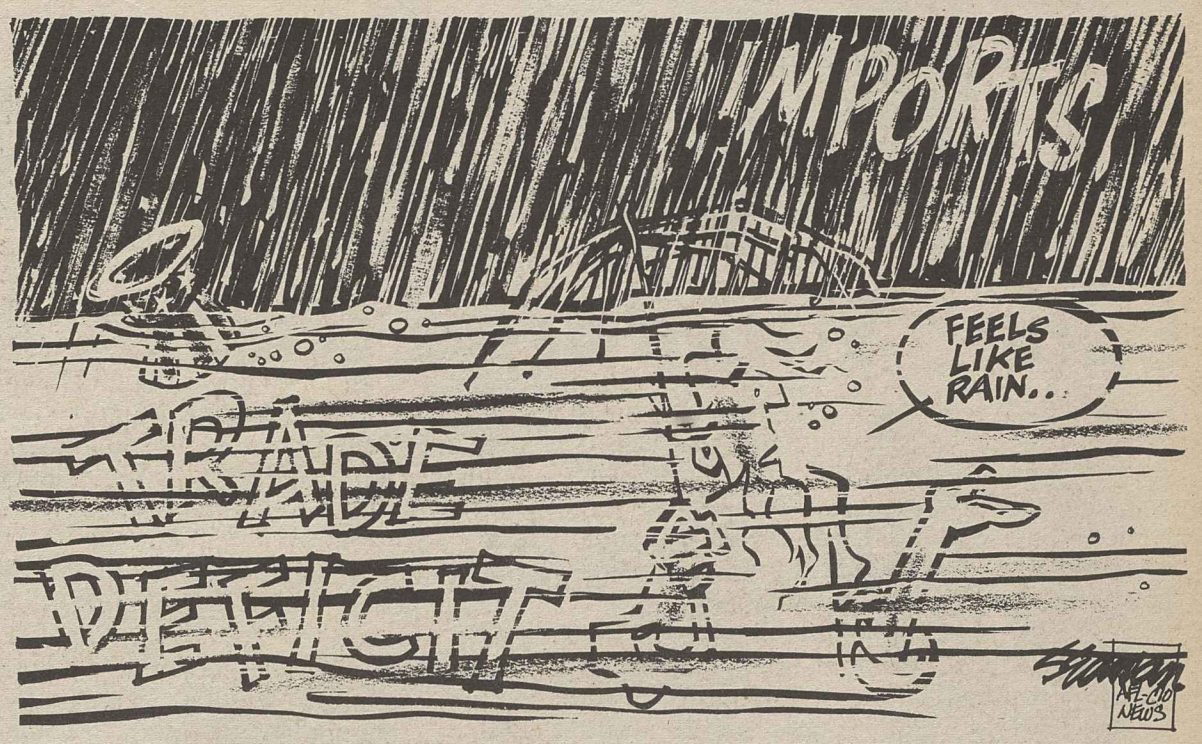
AS PUBLIC workers can testify, there isn't much difference between a private-sector boss and a government agency when push comes to shove.

So it's not too surprising that a number of city and state officials are pressuring Congress to repeal a section of the Fair Labor Standards Act that applies the wage-hour law to most public-sector workers.

With a somewhat suspect solicitude for their employees, the public officials have been telling Congress that workers would rather get time off than overtime pay. More realistically, they complain of the cost that compliance with the law entails.

Just the same argument, of course, was made when the Fair Labor Standards Act was adopted in 1938 to establish "a floor under wages, a ceiling over hours." Then it was made by private-sector employers, who also shed crocodile tears for the workers.



If there had been a prize for the wildest argument against a wage-hour law, it surely would have gone to the employer who warned that it would spell the doom of unions because there would be nothing left to negotiate.

It took Congress a long time to get around to including public employees under wage-hour protection, and the coverage was largely nullified by a 5-4 Supreme Court decision before it became fully effective. But in a rare reversal, the Supreme Court reconsidered and this year concluded that there is no constitutional objection to coverage.

The distinction the earlier court decision had sought to make between different categories of workers proved "unsound in principle and unworkable in practice," the present court held.

It would be ironic if Congress should now turn its back on this lesson and reverse its own sound decision that labor standards are for the protection of all workers, not just those in the private sector.

And it would be very wrong.

'Lie detector' use grows despite basic inaccuracy

By Press Associates, Inc.

When he was President, Richard Nixon had this to say about so-called lie detectors: "I don't know anything about polygraphs, and I don't know how accurate they are, but I do know they'll scare the hell out of people."

Indeed many who have been hooked up to a polygraph describe the experience as intimidating, and also degrading. Others who "failed" the lie detector text complain of lost employment and ruined reputations despite spotless job records.

Job applicants and service industry workers have become increasingly familiar with the polygraph in recent years. Today, an estimated one million polygraph examinations are administered each year to prospective and current employees, more than triple the number 15 years ago.

Employers who use polygraphs say they're needed to weed out dishonest job seekers, to uncover theft, and to keep their employees honest.

Unions, civil libertarians and many research experts oppose their use from several viewpoints. The Food & Commercial Workers and the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees back federal legislation that would ban them in private industry.

The truth about lie detectors, their opponents say, is that they lie. In 1983, the congressional Office of Technology Assessment, reviewing two decades of research, concluded, "There is very little scientific evidence to establish polygraph test validity in screening situations, whether they be pre-employment, pre-clearance, periodic, random, or dragnet."

Failure rate

The office's review of 24 published experiments revealed that the "false positive" rate—the percentage of innocent people accused of being deceptive—ranged as high as 50 percent in laboratory studies and 75 percent in field studies.

Further, the office estimated that at least 50,000 workers each year are wrongfully denied employment either because they refuse to submit to the polygraph or because of its inherent inaccuracy. Thousands more have their good names damaged and are fired or forced to resign, according to union critics.

No machine can accurately detect lies, critics say. What the polygraph measures, scientists say, is stress, or fear, which can result from many factors other than lying, including the "test" itself.

In the procedure, a rubber tube is wrapped around the subject's chest and a pneumatic pressure cuff encircles the arm to measure pulse rate and blood pressure while electrodes attached to the fingertips measure perspiration. Lines formed on a graph during the interrogation are interpreted by an "examiner."

Irrelevant questions

Any number of prying and irrelevant questions may be asked by the polygraph examiner. Subjects often are asked about their sex lives, their past use of drugs and medications, and even their political and union sympathies.

The Privacy Protection Commission, established by Congress after Watergate in 1974, said in 1977 that the use of polygraphs and other "truth verification" devices such as the "voice stress analyzer" constituted an "unreasonable invasion of privacy that should be summarily proscribed."

The late Sen. Sam Ervin (D-N.C.) called polygraph tests "20th Century witchcraft" and said they violated basic constitutional rights against self-incrimination and the presumption of innocence until proven guilty.

Over the past 10 years, 35 bills have been introduced in Congress to restrict or outlaw the polygraph nationwide, but none has become law.

This year Rep. Pat Williams (D-Mont.) introduced H.R. 1524, the Polygraph Protection Act, to prohibit the use of the polygraph or other "truth verification" devices by private employers.

As Williams told his House colleagues, "The time has come for outright prohibition of these inaccurate and intrusive devices in the workplace. It is time we prevent innocent employees from being 'convicted' and deprived of their livelihoods."

ALERT!

Labor Standards Under Assault...

Important labor protections are currently under assault in Congressional committees, underscoring the need for rank and file American workers to let Congress know that standards which have benefited the nation for several generations should not now be threatened.

In the House-Senate Conference on the defense funding bill for fiscal 1986, an amendment to the bill by Senator Phil Gramm (R-TX) would cripple or eliminate wage protections and overtime wage safeguards embodied in the Davis-Bacon and Walsh-Healey Acts, and would curb prevailing wage levels at remote federal installations.

House conferees are holding firm against the Gramm amendment, and the entire $325 billion bill is being held up because of the dispute. These conferees need your support. Call or send a telegram to members of the House-Senate Conference on the Defense Authorization Bill, S. 1160, and tell them that you are opposed to the Gramm amendment.

The House Conferees are: Chairman Les Aspin (D-WI), (Democrats) Price (IL), Bennett (FL), Stratton (NY), Nichols (AL), Daniel (VA), Montgomery (MS), Dellums (CA), Schroeder (CO), Byron (MD), Mavroules (MA), Hutto (FL), Hamilton (IN), Stokes (OH), Hawkins (CA), Ford (MI), Kildee (MI), Murphy (PA), Clay (MO), Williams (MT); (Republicans) Dickinson (AL), Whitehurst (VA), Spence (SC), Holt (MD), Hillis (IN), Badham (CA), Stump (AR), Courter (NJ), Cheney (WY), Jeffords (VT), Goodling (PA), Petri (WI), Bartlett (TX); (Senate Democrats) Nunn (GA), Stennis (MS), Hart (CO), Exon (NE), Levin (MI), Kennedy (MA), Bingaman (NM), Dixon (IL), Glenn (OH); (Senate Republicans) Thurmond (SC), Warner (VA), Humphrey (NH), Cohen (ME), Quayle (IN), East (NC), Wilson (CA), Denton (AL), Gramm (TX).

The Senate Labor Committee has passed by voice vote S. 1105, sponsored by Senator William Armstrong (R-CO), which endangers the eight-hour workday standard now protected by the Walsh-Healey Act. This law has been a safeguard for employees of federal contractors from the burdens and hazards associated with working excessively long hours.

Its companion bill in the House is H.R. 1893, now being considered by the House Eduction and Labor Committee and sponsored by Rep. Thomas Kindness (R-OH).

The House-Senate budget Conference also faces action on Walsh-Healey protections. Unless the conferees take contrary action, the House Education and Labor Committee will be required to revise the 8-hour day provision of Walsh-Healey as part of "reconciliation" instructions.

Still another attack on Walsh-Healey is H.R. 277, sponsored by Rep. James Quillen (R-TN) and pending in the House Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Government Relations of the Judiciary Committee.

Both of these House measures could be given fresh impetus by the action on the Armstrong bill in the Senate.

Contact the chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA), and the chairman of the Administrative Law Subcommittee, Rep. Dan Glickman (D-KS), and tell them that you want to keep your wage and hour safeguards intact.

Line-Item Veto

The Senate is now debating S.43, a bill that would give the President a so-called "line-item" veto authority. The bill would shift budget-making decisions to the Executive Branch.

Senators Charles Mathias (R-MD), Mark Hatfield (R-OR), and Robert Byrd (D-WV) are leading the fight against it. A cloture motion to prevent further debate was defeated last week by a three vote margin, giving the bill's opponents more time to lobby their fellow senators. Further procedural votes are expected before the bill is disposed of.

The AFL-CIO has been in the forefront of the fight against this measure because it represents a constitutional end-run that will have little meaningful effect on federal budgetary deficits. Giving the President veto authority will surrender to the Executive Branch fiscal powers that rightly belong to Congress.

Balanced Budget

Two constitutional balanced budget amendments have been approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee. One version would also limits Congress' power to raise taxes.

The AFL-CIO strongly opposes both versions. Studies have shown that a balanced budget amendment would cripple Congressional fiscal powers to fight recessions and inflation. At the same time it would result in the dismantling of 50 years of labor-backed, progressive programs designed to achieve some measure of economic and social justice for all citizens.

What you can do: Contact your Senators in care of U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C. 20515. Urge them to reject these proposed constitutional amendments that would wreak havoc on the nation's economy.

Steelworkers solid in stand on contract

By Arlee C. Green

Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp.'s court-backed abrogation of its contract with the Steelworkers has forced 8,600 USWA members to form the front line of defense against further devastating wage and benefits concessions in the troubled basic steel industry.

Solidarity among the workers at W-P's nine mills in the Ohio and Monongahela Valleys is as strong as the steel they've produced. These workers know that the wages and working conditions they finally thrash out will be targeted by management in next year's round of bargaining.

Picket lines went up July 21 at mills in Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia in the first major steel walkout since 1959. USWA President Lynn R. Williams and his wife joined the pickets in the pre-dawn hours.

The union stressed that it does not view its action as a strike. It insists that management has engaged in a "lockout" through its unilateral imposition of sharp cutbacks in pay and conditions spelled out in the USWA contract.

Wheeling-Pittsburgh, the nation's seventh largest steel producer, caused the work stoppage when it slashed the wage and benefit package by $5.85 per hour on July 21. A day later, the company suspended the workers' major medical, sickness and accident, life and accidental death and dismemberment insurance coverage.

Hard bargaining

The union has bargained for nine months over concessions the company insists it needs to pay off its debts, which now total more than $514 million.

Wheeling-Pittsburgh has been operating under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code since last April. Its court-granted request for the right to abrogate its contracts is the first since the federal bankruptcy laws were amended in 1984 to make it harder for companies to end their union contracts simply by filing for bankruptcy.

Bankruptcy Judge Warren W. Bentz's ruling granting W-P the right to cancel its union contract has been appealed to the U.S. District Court in Pittsburgh which has expedited the hearing of the case.

Some 300 USWA local officers and representatives unanimously approved the work stoppage with the full support of the USWA Basic Steel Conference.

Fairness is the main issue as the Steelworkers are demanding that W-P's creditors and stockholders also make concessions to keep the firm afloat.

Reagan tax proposal challenged as 'unfair'

Federation President Lane Kirkland testifies for fairness in tax reform at Senate hearings. At right, Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor.

Tilt to rich denounced by Kirkland

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland challenged the fairness of the Reagan Administration's tax proposal and called on Congress to reshape it significantly.

Kirkland told the Senate Finance Committee that America's workers are willing to pay their fair share of taxes. But President Reagan's version of tax reform, he protested, would hit workers with additional taxes while slashing the tax rates of the very wealthy—those who pocketed the most from earlier rounds of tax cuts.

Under the Administration plan, the maximum tax bracket for wealthy individuals would drop from 50 to 35 percent.

Finance Committee Chairman Bob Packwood (R-Ore.) asked Kirkland what he would consider a "fair" tax rate.

Taxation must take account of both the nation's revenue needs and economic conditions, Kirkland responded.

An obligation

While no one relishes taxes, he said, the burden of taxation is an "obligation of citizenship." And those who have profited the most "ought to be prepared to bear a large share of the load."

Kirkland said the nation's needs and the size of the federal deficit justify an additional tax rate, above the proposed 35 percent maximum, for the top income bracket.

If any group in society should get special consideration in the allocation of taxes,

Labor-backed bills gain, line-item veto bottled up

Three union-supported bills advanced in the House, and the Senate sidetracked a labor-opposed measure that would have tilted power over appropriations from Congress to President Reagan.

The House Education & Labor Committee approved both a plant-closing bill strongly supported by industrial unions and legislation backed by building trades unions aimed at curbing double-breasted tactics of construction contractors.

Both were high on the AFL-CIO's legislative priority list. Committee approval clears the way for action by the full House, probably after Congress returns from its August recess.

The third labor-supported bill, approved by the Post Office & Civil Service Committee on an 18-4 vote, would set up a pay equity study for the federal service. Its sponsor, Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), said it is needed to determine whether lower-paid jobs filled primarily by women are fairly graded.

Senate pressed

A similar bill passed the House in the last Congress but never came to a vote in the Senate. As the House committee was acting, union witnesses were urging a Senate subcommittee to approve a companion measure.

The construction bill is aimed at contractors who sign standard pre-hire union agreements but then set up non-union subsidiaries that pay lower wages, provide inferior benefits and disregard labor standards.

Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), a principal sponsor, said it would strike "a reasonable balance" between the rights of workers and management and "restore stability" to construction industry labor relations.

The bill clarifies the definition of a single employer in the Taft-Hartley Act and specifies that a pre-hire union agreement will be binding on all of an employer's operations unless workers vote to decertify a union. It was approved by voice vote.

Employers would have to give at least a

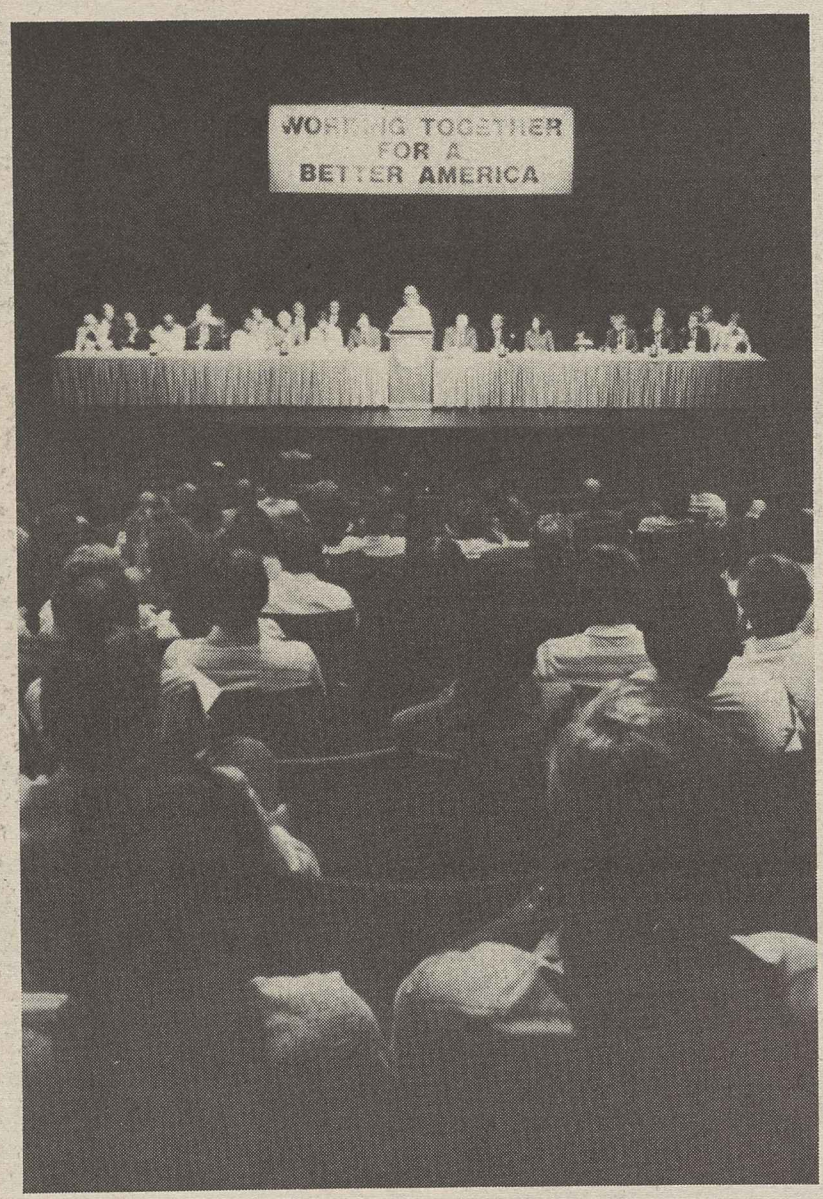
Westinghouse accord boosts job security, benefits, wages

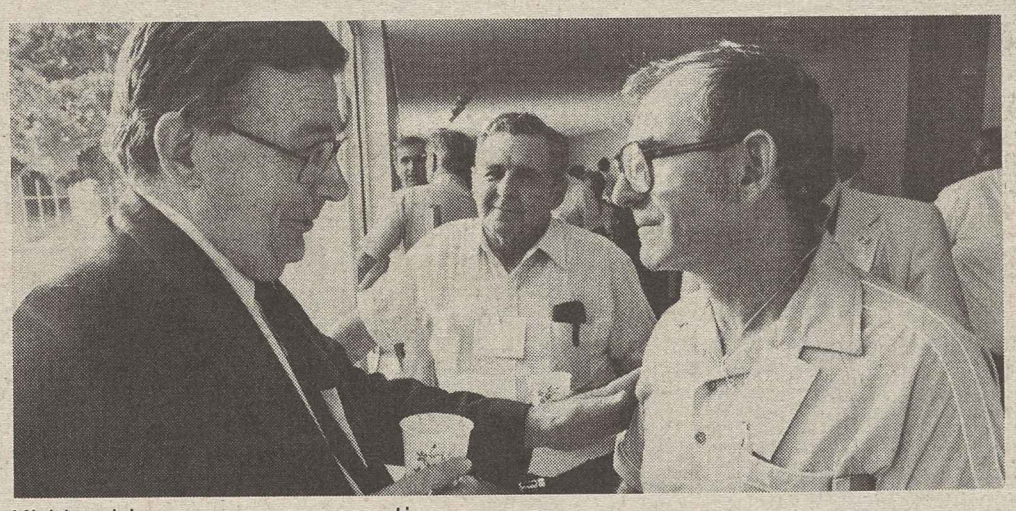
Pittsburgh—Unions representing 28,500 employees of the Westinghouse Electric reached a tentative agreement with the giant electrical equipment manufacturer on a new three-year contract providing improved pay, benefits and job security.

The settlement is similar to one negotiated three weeks earlier with General Electric Co. and contains none of the long list of takeaways demanded by Westinghouse. It was unanimously approved by the Coordinated Bargaining Committee representing six unions.



The ratification vote by members of the Electronic Workers is scheduled to be completed by July 28. The International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers are expected to complete their ratification procedures by Aug. 4.

Three other unions with representatives on the CBC bargain locally with the firm, but the master agreement reached here just hours before a July 22 strike deadline will serve as a pattern. The three unions are the Carpenters, Machinists and Steelworkers.



The new 37-month contract, like the GE

Regional sessions message: 'We're in for keeps'

By Candice Johnson

"Labor is the only force in American life whose mission is to make sure that those who don't have enough power are not kicked around by those who have too much. So to those who would drive us out, we say: 'Forget it. We're in the game for keeps and we're getting better at it all the time.'" That was the message AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland gave union members attending the federation's final 1985 regional conference in Tulsa, Okla.

Kirkland outlined the challenges facing the labor movement in politics, organizing and the economy, noting that the federation had met and overcome similar obstacles throughout its history.

"To prevail and prosper, we must summon up, from every level of our movement, that spirit of solidarity and sense of common purpose that is our natural and only basic strength," Kirkland stressed.

The 1985 conference series brought union members, local leaders and the federation's top officers and staff together for an exchange of ideas on current issues. Kirkland said the regional conferences were intended to make the labor movement more effective "and to involve our members more actively in the trade union mission."

Kirkland and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue attended all seven regional sessions, joining union members and local officers in six additional satellite meetings at local central bodies during each conference.

Workshops

Participants to the two-day sessions attended workshops led by AFL-CIO staff on health care costs, legislative goals and political action, budget and trade issues, organizing and community services and civil rights.

Kirkland and Donahue fielded questions on a number of topics, with the AFL-CIO's Executive Council report on the Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions mentioned frequently.

The federation's top officers also outlined some new approaches to supplement traditional organizing techniques, such as low-cost benefits packages for "union associates" and a fine-tuning of the corporate campaign against employers.

Participants at all seven conferences expressed concern over the Reagan Administration's so-called tax reform and attempts to tax workers' job-related benefits. Kirkland said the AFL-CIO would welcome tax provisions which would remove most poor people from the tax rolls, but "as a package for total reform, the President's plan is a failure."

Kirkland called the attempt to tax workers' health insurance "a betrayal by the federal government," noting that the government made a conscious decision to use tax policy to support private insurance, instead of adopting the national health insurance programs other industrialized countries put in place and the U.S. labor movement advocated.

A common theme throughout the conference series was labor's media image and steps the federation could take to improve its public standing and Kirkland noted that a recent Gallup poll showed an increase in public support for unions for the first time since 1965.

Donahue outlined the federation's one-on-one program, calling the project "one of the vehicles for the resurgence of the American trade union movement."

The one-on-one campaign is underway in Georgia, Idaho and Missouri, with coordinators, organizers and canvassers trained to reach out to union members "in face-to-face conversations."

Political process

Kirkland answered questions on labor's political program and said the AFL-CIO would continue to participate in the political process.

"The process by which candidates are selected is a critical one, and we intend to be a part of it," he said.

Other issues raised during the conference schedule included the termination of unemployment benefits and trade adjustment assistance, and AFL-CIO support of black trade unions in South Africa.

Questions posed to Donahue reflect workers' concerns

"And another problem is that the state building inspectors will sign the OK in the rat contractor's office without even going on the job, but they niggle our union job to death with inspections and complaints and on and on."

That comment from an IBEW member came in Springfield, Mo., during the last session of 24 meetings AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue had with trade unionists of all sizes, ages and descriptions during the 1985 regional conferences.

It was the only time such a problem was voiced. But it was typical of the opportunity trade unionists in some of America's middle-sized cities had to see and hear AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Donahue and discuss any topic anyone wanted. Most of the sessions ran 90 minutes and Donahue reported he was stirred by the concerns participants voiced:

"Is there any hope for foreign trade legislation before they turn out the last light in the last plant in this state?"

"Are we going to keep the same system of a presidential endorsement before the primaries in 1988?"

"What can be done to increase affiliation with local central bodies?"

"Do we stand a good chance of stopping the subminimum wage again this time?"

Unfolding events

The time frame of the meetings—from Portland, Eugene and Coos Bay in March to Tulsa, Joplin and Springfield in mid-July—changed some of the content of the discussion as President Reagan unveiled his tax package, William Brock became Secretary of Labor and more and more trade unionists had already received and mailed postcards to their representatives against taxing employer-paid benefits.

The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions, the report released by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in February was a prime topic since Donahue chairs the council committee which drafted it.

"It's a kind of pretty printing job, with nice colors and that's all it ever will be unless you read it and discuss it," Donahue said. "If it drives the discussion, if you apply it to the particular circumstances of your union and your local, then it will do its job—because that's where change, and a better labor movement, will come from."

Widely discussed

Like the fringe benefit postcards, the study was better known in Donahue's later rounds and the discussion expanded accordingly. But nowhere as much as in Syracuse, N.Y., where Donahue encountered a busload of trade unionists from Rochester who obviously had been studying the report on the way over.

Along the way, Donahue visited a picket line in Carbondale, Pa., a retirement home operated by the AFL-CIO in Dayton, a new museum on textile mill history in Lowell, Mass., and had one stop happily cancelled when a UFCW strike ended with a new agreement before Donahue got to Richmond, Ind.

In Idaho, the issue was inevitably the state's November 1986 "right-to-work" referendum and in Chattanooga, Brock's hometown, Labor Dept. policies dominated the discussion.

A newly unemployed steelworker in Scranton, Pa., told Donahue the poignant story of the government office which explained Trade Adjustment Assistance in great detail and why he qualified. "But there's no more money for TAA since the Reagan budget cuts and you're out of luck."

Running itinerary

A total of 44 cities in 21 states were visited as AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland made 20 stops and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue toured 17 cities in addition to the seven regional conference sites where both appeared. The itinerary:

From Portland, Kirkland went to Longview, Tacoma and Seattle, Wash., while Donahue went to Eugene and Coos Bay, Ore. From Providence, R.I., Kirkland went to Manchester and Portsmouth, N.H., and Augusta, Me., while Donahue went to Lowell and Springfield, Mass.

From Salt Lake City, Kirkland went to Ogden, Webber and Orem, Utah, while Donahue flew to Pocatello and Boise, Idaho.

From Cherry Hill, N.J., Kirkland went to Wilmington, Del. and Harrisburg and Johnstown, Pa., while Donahue went to Allentown, Carbondale and Scranton, Pa. and Syracuse, N.Y.

From Indianapolis, Kirkland went to Danville, Decatur and Peoria, Ill., while Donahue went to Richmond, Ind., and Dayton and Columbus, Ohio. From Nashville, Kirkland went to Muscle Shoals, Ala., and Memphis, Tenn., while Donahue went to Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tenn.

From Tulsa, Okla., Kirkland went to Wichita, Kan., Oklahoma City and Dallas-Fort Worth while Donahue went to Joplin and Springfield, Mo.

Union members in 27 cities share views with Kirkland

A long series of give-and-take sessions with members of affiliated unions ended for AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a noon meeting in Arlington, Tex.

Starting on Mar. 22, in Portland, Ore., and ending on July 15, mid-way between Dallas and Fort Worth, Kirkland met with union members in 27 cities during the 1985 regional conferences and satellite meetings.

The agenda for the 1985 meetings was unique. In addition to addressing participants at seven regional conferences, and answering their questions in both formal and informal meetings, Kirkland visited other union groups in 20 cities.

In each of the satellite meetings, Kirkland devoted his time to answering questions, fielding comments and recording suggestions from the members who attended.

"These meetings have proven very helpful to us," Kirkland told the Dallas audience. "They have given us a chance to talk with brothers and sisters who are on the front lines and who are feeling the pinch of the policies coming out of official Washington.

"Some of the ideas and suggestions that we have taken back from these meetings to the Executive Council and the convention have led to new initiatives and directions."

Recurring topic

At each meeting, Kirkland discussed the recently issued report from the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work, the Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions.

The questions at the meetings covered such vital issues as the crisis of foreign imports destroying American jobs, so-called tax reform proposals and the soaring federal deficit, federal job training bills, the limits on political activity for federal workers and the federation's national political program.

"Throughout out history, most of what we do—and the best of what we do—has grown out of the views expressed and the activities undertaken at the grassroots of our movement," Kirkland told them.

"You are the people who make the labor movement a living presence in the workplace and in your communities."

Workshops focus on national issues

Participants in each of the seven regional conferences attended a series of six workshops keyed to the two main themes of the conference, the implications of the federal budget and taxes and health care.

Each session, conducted by directors or staff of AFL-CIO departments, included a discussion of the two theme issues and a question-and-answer period.

Information in the workshops was supplemented by written materials in a loose-leaf binder distributed to all conference participants.

Following the plenary session on the first night of each meeting, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Information and the Labor Institute of Public Affairs opened the workshops with a seminar on improving the labor movement's access to and performance in the media.

The discussion was followed by a video presentation of television and radio advertising spots produced by a wide range of AFL-CIO national and international unions and state and local central labor bodies.

The ads, both paid and public service spots, illustrated uses of advertising to explain labors positions on important issues as well as its role in society.

On the second day of the conference, participants, grouped by states, attended five 50-minute workshops concentrating on different aspects of the budget, tax and health care themes.

State of the economy

A session by the Departments of Economic Research and Occupational, Safety, Health & Social Security discussed the current state of the U. S. economy, the budget deficit and current tax laws as well as climbing costs of health care and methods of containing them.

The current status in Congress of federal legislation on tax reform and on a new federal budget was detailed in a workshop by the Dept. of Legislation. A state-by-state break down of political action was conducted by AFL-CIO COPE.

The workshop of the Dept. of Civil Rights examined the impact of the Reagan Administration's current and proposed budget cuts on minorities and women, and the Dept. of Community Services discussed programs for helping workers and their families cope with the effects of these cuts in their communities, where Reagonomics is most keenly felt.

A discussion led by the Departments of Education and Organization & Field Services focused on the recommendations of the new report of the Committee on the Evolution of Work. Participants were encouraged to suggest methods for putting many of the recommendations to work in their own unions as well as in state and local central bodies.

While AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue conducted "satellite" meetings at neighboring central labor councils in each region, a question and answer workshop open to discussion of all issues of concern to participants was held by Kenneth Young, executive assistant to Kirkland.

Building Trades, contractors move to revitalize union sector of industry

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., as part of its national cooperative program to revitalize the unionized segment of the building industry, has published a guidebook mapping the way for labor-management committees to recapture business lost to non-union contractors.

The publication, titled Market Recovery Guidebook for Union Construction, stresses the need for a "new relationship between labor organizations and contractors." The booklet was produced by the National Market Recovery Committee, which represents the BCTD and the National Construction Employers Council. The employers' group comprises 13 construction-related associations.

The guidebook notes that the national joint committee has visited 27 local areas since the two sides agreed to the cooperative effort. "The time is now," declares the pamphlet's introduction, for labor-management cooperation.

Harsh realities of the current construction industry make-up are cited. The committee said the union share of the construction market has declined and a threat to the future benefits of union members exists now in a number of areas. Union contractors have faced a reduced volume of work and "some have even resorted to establishing non-union operations," the committee said.

The national committee pointed out that its efforts have been misunderstood and that it has been "unfairly characterized" as "an organization for cutting wages." It reported that its experience has been that union contractors seeking to recapture their market do not always include wages in their list of adjustments.

The committee said that it has found that once a market has deteriorated to where union construction no longer dominates the local market, it has been much more difficult to mount a recovery. "Under such conditions, local unions, to survive, have been forced to give away significant portions of previously negotiated wage rates, as well as working conditions."

Cost of waiting

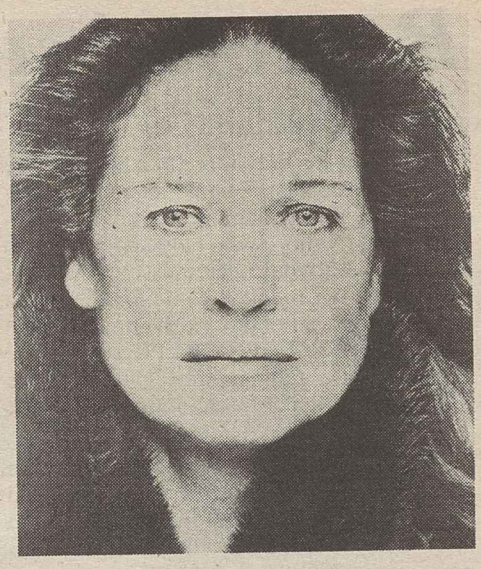
It emphasized the immediate need for the cooperative efforts, saying that "the longer you wait to begin your program, the more that program is going to cost."

Those local unions that do participate in such programs, however, should not be looking for immediate results. "The curse of the Market Recovery Program is impatience," the committee warned.

Market recovery must be considered a long-term program, it said, because the decline of the unionized segment of the industry has taken years. The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported recently that 30 percent of the blue-collar workers in construction are union.

The key to reversing the decline is cooperation, the committee declared. "To compete effectively and survive, the construction industry must reform its practices and launch cooperative labor-management programs."



Some local areas already have joint programs and the success of their efforts varies widely. Simple public relations operations have limited effectiveness, the guidebook says, noting that groups that have directly addressed the work practice and productivity issues have enjoyed a larger market turnaround.

The overview of the program calls for the establishment of local labor-management committees to:

- Measure the growth of the open shop in an area.
- Identify non-productive practices and work rules.
- Improve collective bargaining.
- Implement a public relations campaign aimed at building owners and the public.

"The alternative to such a cooperative effort is grim," the committee said. "For trade unions, it may mean the decline of a great tradition with its accompanying benefits. For some contractors, it has already meant a reduced volume of work, and even a threat to their survival as union contractors."

The guidebook includes a sample agreement for local joint committees and a variety of sample tables, charts and graphs that can be used to measure construction employment, wages and benefits.

Equity president

Colleen Dewhurst has been elected president of Actors' Equity to succeed Ellen Burstyn, who did not seek re-election. Dewhurst served on the union's governing council since 1983.

Buying power of U.S. workers stays below '84

The buying power of American workers in June was down 1.3 percent from the level of a year earlier despite a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent for the month, the government reported.

That meant real, or inflation-adjusted, earnings of production and nonsupervisory workers in the private sector were below 1984 levels in each of the first six months of the year.

The average factory worker grossed $301.66 a week in June, but in constant 1977 dollars that came to $172.08, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. A year earlier, the inflation-adjusted average was $174.30.

Separately, BLS said retail prices, as measured by both its Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W) and Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U), rose a slight two-tenths of 1 percent in June, the same as in May.

Rising price index

CPI-W, which the government uses to calculate social security and other increases and unions and employers use to figure cost-of-living raises, was 4.1-percent higher than a year earlier.

Food prices edged up one-tenth of 1 percent in June, the first increase since February, and transportation charges fell two-tenths of 1 percent. Grocery store food prices were down for the fourth month in a row, but restaurant meals and snacks were up six-tenths of 1 percent.

Electricity charges last month rose sharply, 1.3 percent, but heating oil costs declined by 1.4 percent.

Gasoline prices continued to rise, but at a slower rate than in the past two months.

New car prices rose two-tenths of 1 percent, while used car prices plunged 1.6 percent. Public transportation fares were up two-tenths of 1 percent.

Auto industry bosses put a dent in profits

The auto industry's 170 top executives celebrated 1984's record profits by hauling home an average pay boost of 15 percent or more than $74,000.

A survey of automotive and supplier companies by Automotive News showed the average executive salary and bonus for 1984 was $579,928—up from a total of $505,814 a year earlier. In 1982, the top auto executives averaged just $400,000.

Philip Caldwell, who retired as Ford Motor Co. chairman last year, hauled home the highest combined compensation—$1.58 million. Chrysler Corp. Chairman Lee Iacocca pocketed a 151-percent pay boost which put his compensation at $1.19 million, enough to oust General Motors Corp. Chairman Roger B. Smith from the No. 4 spot.

Combined salaries and bonuses for the 170 executives came to nearly $100 million.

ITU members begin mail vote on Teamster bid

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Typographical Union members are voting on merger with the unaffiliated Teamsters in a mail ballot being conducted by the American Arbitration Association.

AAA Denver regional director Mark E. Appel said the mailing of the ballots on July 8 "took place without a hitch, and we don't anticipate any major problems."

The ITU executive council retained the AAA to conduct the vote. The ballots will be counted shortly after the return deadline of Aug. 21, Appel said.

The council had ordered the referendum after efforts to merge with the Graphic Communications Union ended earlier this year. A suit by the Teamster-backed Coalition for Merger to block the vote was dismissed by a federal court judge in May.

Meanwhile, ITU members and Teamsters were on opposite sides of the picketlines at the Chicago Tribune where 650 members of ITU Printers Local 16 and Mailers Local 2 were on strike along with 300 members of GCIU Pressmen's Local 7.

While several other AFL-CIO unions are honoring the picket lines, the delivery drivers were directed by the Teamsters leadership to continue working.

ITU Local 16 has been without a contract for two-and-a-half years, Local 2 has been without an agreement since July 1984 and GCIU Local 7's contract expired in April 1985.

Under the proposed merger plan, the ITU would become a division of the Teamsters. Prior to the mailing of the ballots, the ITU held five regional meetings to allow members to question the executive council on the scheme. Meetings in Toronto, Winnipeg, New York, St. Louis and San Francisco drew about 750 members.

Flight Attendants land Air Wisconsin unit

Appleton, Wis.—The 135 flight attendants at Air Wisconsin, Inc., voted unanimously to join the Association of Flight Attendants.

The AFL-CIO affiliate was certified as bargaining agent following a July 8 ballot count in Washington, D.C., by the National Mediation Board, the federal agency that oversees labor-management relations in the airline industry.

The Appleton-based regional carrier serves 30 cities in nine states following its recent merger with Mississippi Valley Airlines.

agreement, calls for average annual wage increases of 3 percent, cost-of-living adjustments, pension improvements, and some job security guarantees. It also contains an agency shop provision requiring nonunion workers to pay the equivalent of union dues for services provided by the union as bargaining agent.

IUE President William H. Bywater, who assumed leadership of the CBC bargaining group as talks neared the strike deadline, had high praise for the "unprecedented solidarity" of the six unions, adding:

"Westinghouse realized we were serious. We definitely would have struck, no question about it."

Bywater and IUE-Westinghouse Conference Board Chairman Richard Jellette said the contract contains "no concessions and no takeaways."

Following the pattern

Earlier, Westinghouse had said it intended to break from tradition and not necessarily follow the GE pattern. Instead of a national agreement, the company sought to negotiate separate pacts for each of its 25 business units.

Bywater and Jellette attributed the firm's decision to back off from its "localization" and takeaway demands to the unions' solidarity and determination to resist givebacks.

The IBEW's chief negotiator, Tom Hickman, stressed that the settlement maintains the industry pattern established in the GE negotiations. Westinghouse officials expressed satisfaction with the new pact.

The IUE represents about 6,000 Westinghouse workers, IBEW 8,000, and the four other unions the remainder.

Other highlights of the agreement include:

- Pay rate retention of 39 weeks, up from 26 weeks, for workers threatened with job loss because of transfer of work or introduction of automation, and a $5,000 termination bonus for employees 60 or older who are threatened with such job loss.
- Improved pension benefits, with benefits going from a range of $15 to $21 per month times years of service to a range of $16 to $22 in 1987.
- An improvement not included in the GE pact gives a $100 per month supplement to those who retire at age 58 with 30 years of service.
- Life insurance improvements.
- Insurance improvements for retirees.
- New vision coverage, improvements in dental benefits, and increased sickness and accident benefits.

Reagan's 'tax reform' termed good for rich but bad for workers

Kirkland suggested, it should be those who are working hard to put food on their table, provide shelter for their families and send children to schools.

Some of the President's proposals have merit, and the AFL-CIO strongly supports features that will relieve most poor Americans of their tax burden, Kirkland testified.

But "as a package," he said, the Administration plan "does not add up to the major overhaul needed to establish fairness and end the preferential treatment given wealthy individuals, stock and real estate speculators, oil and gas developers, and corporations."

Working men and women pay most of the nation's taxes and meet their obligations in full "every payday," Kirkland stressed. He said the key test for tax reform "is the extent to which it diminishes unfairness toward people who work for their money and eliminates favoritism toward people whose money works for them."

By that standard, Kirkland testified, "much of the President's program falls short."

Kirkland reiterated the AFL-CIO's opposition to the taxation of health insurance or any other employee benefits.

Misguided proposal

The proposal to end the deductibility of state and local taxes would "most severely hurt those states and localities that most conscientiously live up to their public responsibilities," he protested.

He said that ending the second-earner tax deduction, as Reagan proposes, "recreates the marriage penalty." Along with the proposed elimination of the child care tax deduction, Kirkland noted, it targets young working families who are already struggling under the burden of high interest rates and inflated housing costs.

Kirkland listed the AFL-CIO's specific proposals for raising additional revenues by ensuring that corporations pay a fair share of taxes and by closing the many loopholes which have encouraged the export of U.S. jobs as well as depriving the nation of tax revenue.

To expressions of agreement from many of the committee members present, Kirkland reminded the senators of labor's position when Reagan in 1981 proposed both a huge increase in defense spending and a big, revenue-losing tax cut.

The combination didn't make sense, Kirkland said. The AFL-CIO proposed instead a tax surcharge, with no exemptions, to pay for whatever increase in military spending Congress deemed necessary for the nation's security.

"If we had done this," he suggested, "we wouldn't have the deficit problem today."

Two panels of union witnesses also testified at the Senate hearings. These were some of the points made:

- Postal Workers President Moe Biller said Congress will have "a very tough job to make tax reform fair" if it follows the Administration blueprint. A better approach, he suggested would be to select out some of the "good features" as the framework for a different bill.

The "most promising feature" of the Administration plan is proposed tax relief for the lowest-income groups, he said.

- Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough said the losers under the Reagan plan are middle-income workers who already have been hit by higher social security taxes.

The burden, he protested, falls disproportionately "on the segment of the population that is the hardest working and greatest provider of federal tax revenues."

- Teachers President Albert Shanker said ending deductibility of state and local taxes would create "a massive inequity."

Donations to private charities would remain deductible, as they should, Shanker said. But the taxes to support the primary public services would no longer be deductible.

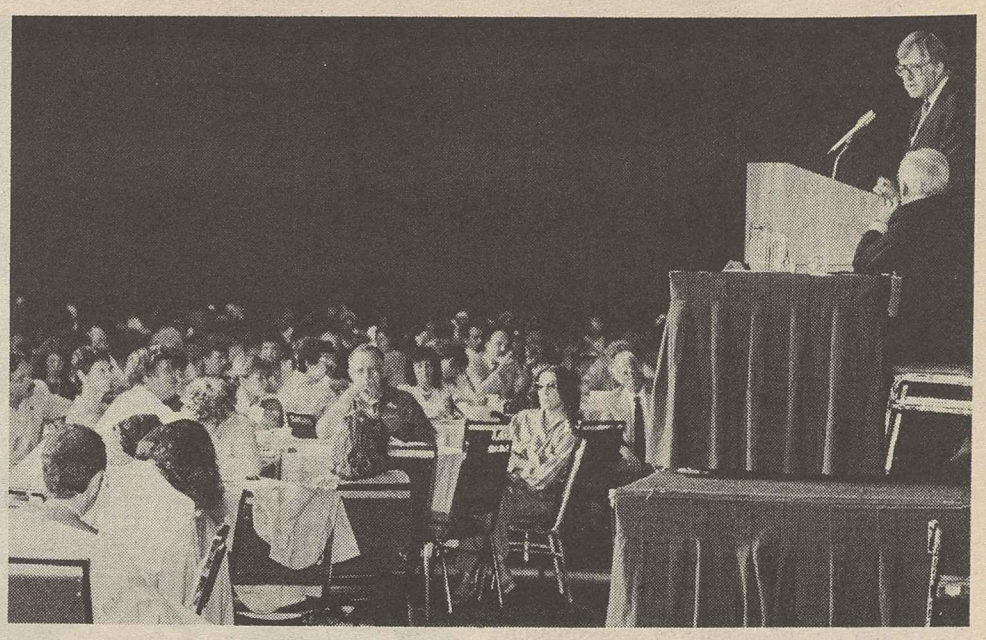
- State, County & Municipal Employees Sec.-Treas. William Lucy charged that Reagan is using the claim of tax reform to further "his ideological views."

Lucy termed the proposal for ending state and local tax deductions an extension of Reagan's policy of "tax and budget cuts for federal, state and local governments."

- Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden expressed concern that the Administration plan would add to the federal deficit, and said it "falls far short" of restoring the corporate tax base.

He said the UAW sees "no justification for providing further tax benefits to the wealthy."

- Fire Fighters Governmental Affairs Director Harold A. Schaitberger cited features of the Administration plan that would impose an additional 20 percent tax on pensions of many fire fighters and police officers.



He warned also that eroding the local and state tax base would force a cutback of vital public services.

William Foley dies, textile union official

North Andover, Mass.—William J. Foley, secretary-treasurer of the United Textile Workers since 1978, died after a heart attack July 1. He was 61.

Foley was appointed an international representative in 1952, elected a vice president in 1954 and made Ontario area director a year later. In 1964, Foley became Canadian co-director, serving in that post until being named Canadian director in 1971. He was appointed assistant to the UTW president in 1974 and four years later selected to fill out an unexpired term as secretary-treasurer. He was elected to full four-year terms in 1980 and 1984.

Foley is survived by his wife Elizabeth and five sons. Funeral services were held July 5 at St. Margaret Mary Catholic Church in Hamilton, Ont.

AFT President Albert Shanker spells out plan for "specialty-certified" teachers for 1,500 union members at three-day conference.

Shanker asks 'certification' for outstanding teachers

Teachers should be certified by professional boards and paid for achieving superior status, just as doctors or accountants are certified in specialty areas, Teachers President Albert Shanker proposed.

Shanker outlined the certification plan during the union's conference on "New Visions of Teaching and Schooling," a three-day meeting of 1,500 classroom teachers in the nation's capital to discuss education issues and programs.

Independent review boards of professionals from such specialized fields as math, science, and languages would set standards and requirements for certification of outstanding teachers. Those teachers earning the extra credentials would be paid at higher salaries than non-certified teachers.

Shanker said the voluntary program would eliminate the arbitrariness of current merit-pay plans, under which school boards and administrators decide which teachers receive higher pay. The certification system would end the "competition and demoralization among teachers that have been hazards of merit pay plans up to now," he said.

An optional goal

All teachers would be eligible to work for board certification, and Shanker estimated that 20 percent of the nation's teachers would become board-certified.

"Most people in this country believe hard work and better work ought to be rewarded," Shanker observed, "and opposing this makes us look like we are not interested in quality. So we ought to think about ways of handling the issue while avoiding the pitfalls."

Shanker credited the concept of teacher board certification to Myron Lieberman, currently a visiting professor at Ohio University, who originally proposed the plan in 1959.

On teacher testing, Shanker said the union is opposed to the idea of testing experienced classroom teachers, but will continue to study the issue. He suggested all professionals should be retested periodically, but said the union would not support singling out teachers for such review.

"We should admit that this is not an issue in which either side is absolutely right," he said. "It is a tragic situation where no matter what is done, there will be some wrong."

Shanker pointed out that the Arkansas practice of testing experienced teachers raises some difficult questions, such as whether to fire someone who has been teaching for 15 years with satisfactory ratings but who fails the state test or to permit that teacher "to be imposed on children for another 15 years." Shanker said he was sympathetic to both views, adding that if the teacher was fired, the supervisor who hired and kept the teacher on "should be out, too."

Shanker called for an end to "out-of-license teaching," where teachers are often called on to teach subjects other than those they have specialized in. He pointed out that hundreds of thousands of teachers are involved in the practice, working in areas other than those they are certified to teach. He questioned whether a school district could assign a teacher to another subject and then fairly evaluate or test that teacher's abilities.

"The whole emphasis on quality of education will be lost, and efforts to make teaching a genuine profession will be destroyed unless the practice of out-of-license teaching is prohibited," Shanker concluded.

Maritime unions seek legislation on bilateral pacts

Legislation is needed to create bilateral shipping agreements between the United States and Japan to help resolve America's worsening trade imbalance, maritime unions told Congress.

Implementation of such agreements would be a "forceful" way of convincing Japan that the U.S. is serious about correcting the imbalance, President Frank Drozak of the federation's Maritime Trades Dept. testified.

There now are no bilateral shipping agreements between the two nations.

Drozak told the Senate Subcommittee on East Asian Pacific Affairs orderly agreements also would keep Japan from taking retaliatory actions of its own.

Drozak, who is also president of the Seafarers, said that "our trade with Japan is seriously out of balance," that things have become so serious that the economic relationship between the two countries is "beginning to resemble a developing country's relation with the developed world."

The U.S. trade deficit with Japan—larger than that with any other country—is expected to hit $50 billion this year.

Japan systematically deprives American companies of any meaningful way of competing in its markets, Drozak observed. At the same time, it protects and subsidizes its merchant marine.

Meanwhile, Drozak said, the U.S.-flag fleet is expected to operate and survive on a commercial basis, even though it is faced with competition that is supported "with all the resources at the disposal of a national government."

Labor, Urban League renew alliance

Despite the Reagan Administration's best efforts to thwart the long-time goals of the civil rights movement, the fight for justice and equality for the nation's blacks will go on, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in an address to the National Urban League's 75th anniversary conference.

"And long after the errors and aberrations of the last five years have faded from memory, there will still be an Urban League and a labor movement summoning the nation to its highest ideals," Kirkland said.

"Together, we shall overcome again. In your 75 years, as in labor's 104, we have seen administrations come and go. We have seen the political pendulum swing from compassion to indifference, from progress to reaction, from tolerance to meanspiritedness—and then back again.

"Democracy contains the mechanisms of self-correction."

Ever since its founding, Kirkland observed, the Urban League has had an ally in organized labor. That's because the goals of the two organizations have been, and remain similar, he said.

"The American labor movement, after all, stands for workers...and the Urban League has always recognized that jobs are the great imperative in the struggle to achieve civil rights. Without jobs, all of the other promises of equality are hollow.

Unequal opportunity

"If you cannot afford to send your kids to school—or if they cannot find jobs when they graduate—then the concept of equal educational opportunities is a sham.

"If you cannot afford to buy a home, then the promise of equal housing opportunities remains unrealized.

"If you cannot afford to eat in a restaurant, sleep in a motel, go to the movies or enjoy any of the other simple pleasures of life, then the right of equal access to public accommodations is an abstraction."

Following the legislative victories on civil rights in the 1960s, the AFL-CIO and the Urban League teamed up to achieve many important goals for black workers, Kirkland noted. And for 20 years, the two organizations had another partner in the U.S. government, he recalled, as the Labor Department funded numerous projects supported by both the Urban League and the AFL-CIO.

For the past five years, Kirkland observed, "the Reagan Administration has worked systematically to thwart the long-time goals of the Urban League and reverse generations of progress toward fairness in daily life.

"We know we have our work cut out for us, and we will not shrink from it."

South Africa crackdown stirs outrage

The AFL-CIO joined other free world labor organizations in condemning the South African government's imposition of a state of emergency, warning that such action can only serve to provoke further violence.

"The unleashing of what amounts to a state of martial law is the most extreme violation of all basic rights of the black people since the tragic days of the Sharpesville massacre of 1960," Federation President Lane Kirkland declared.

"The arrests and detention of hundreds of blacks and the unleashing of assassination and violence by the police forces are a great setback to all those who are seeking to attain reform and change through peaceful, nonviolent means."

The regime of Prime Minister Pieter W. Botha imposed emergency rule July 20 after months of unrest in the black urban townships, where the racist policy of apartheid has been particularly oppressive in depriving blacks of their basic human rights. Some 500 people have died during outbreaks of violence in the past 10 months.

More than 650 persons were detained without charge in the first four days of the state of emergency, while at least 60 others were charged with criminal offenses.

Sketchy information

The Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, with which the AFL-CIO is affiliated, has been in contact with black trade union leaders in South Africa, and said some leaders of the Motor Assembly Components Workers Union were among those arrested, but provided no further details.

In his statement, Kirkland called on the Reagan Administration to seek global action to bring about an immediate dialogue between the Botha regime and peaceful forces in South Africa who want to "end the cruel, unjust and violent system of apartheid."

The ICFTU urged all its affiliates to apply renewed efforts to implement its action program to end apartheid adopted at the ICFTU executive board meeting in Washington in April.

The ICFTU program calls for economic sanctions, including disinvestment in South Africa, if the regime keeps on with its racist policies.

Jack Werff dies at 57, AFL-CIO organizer

Covington, Ky.—Jack G. Werff, the AFL-CIO representative for Kentucky, died July 21 at his home. He had been hospitalized recently for a heart condition.

Werff, who was 57, had been on the federation's organizing staff for 18 years. Earlier, he served as president of Brewery Workers Local 12. Werff also was one of the first coordinators of the AFL-CIO's grassroots Legislative Action Committee.

Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue expressed their deep regrets in a message to Werff's family. "He served his fellow workers and the entire labor movement with dedication and distinction," Kirkland and Donahue said.

Werff is survived by his wife Betty, two children and two grandchildren. Services are to be held July 27 at St. John's Church in Covington.

Delegates caucus at the Communications Workers convention.

CWA urges more research by government on VDT risks

San Francisco—Delegates to the Communications Workers convention voiced deep concerns about unsafe working conditions in the "high tech" industry and took major steps to further restructure the union.

Underscoring the safety issues, newly elected President Morton Bahr called on the federal government to conduct more detailed research on the health effects of video display terminals (VDTs).

The CWA immediately filed a request for a VDT investigation with the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health.

Bahr noted that a study of some 1,000 VDT users in North Carolina detected an "alarming new finding" that large numbers of VDT users complained of chest pains. The study was conducted by several CWA locals and the N.C. Occupational Safety & Health Project among CWA members in the telecommunications industry.

A convention resolution called for strong federal standards to inform workers of job hazards and adequate funding to maintain healthy workplaces.

Right-to-know

"CWA will commit itself to educate its members and their communities on the deadly waste of the 'high tech' industry and the Reagan Administration's refusal to take responsible action to protect our future. In addition, we encourage CWA leaders at all levels of our membership to become involved and to actively participate in the initiation and successful completion of worker and community 'right-to-know' laws."

In another action, delegates reduced the number of CWA geographical districts from 13 to eight, more closely tailored to the seven regional operating companies of the former Bell System; eliminated five non-voting national director positions, and created two new vice president positions. All the changes are to be implemented at CWA's 1986 convention next April in Washington.

Elections for national officers, except Bahr, Sec.-Treas. James B. Booe and Executive Vice President Barbara J. Easterling, will be conducted at next year's convention. Bahr, Booe and Easterling were elected to four-year terms, running into 1989.

The new positions are for a telecommunications vice president, replacing the union's independent telephone national director, and a public workers vice president, replacing a national director in charge of public workers. Other national director titles being eliminated are Western Electric sales, Western Electric installation and Western Electric manufacturing. The work of Western Electric, a remnant of the pre-divestiture Bell System, has been absorbed by AT&T Technologies.

Companies in flight

Bahr called a recent AT&T decision to produce residential telephones in Singapore "symptomatic of the national problem caused by so many U.S.-based companies that are trying to cut their production costs by going overseas."

He said that "negotiating stronger employment security arrangements will become an even higher priority in bargaining with AT&T" in 1986 as a result of the company's decision.

In other resolutions, delegates:

- Designated Glenn E. Watts president emeritus and Louis B. Knecht secretary-treasurer emeritus. Watts and Knecht stepped down at the convention.
- Called for stiff sanctions against South Africa to end apartheid.
- Urged CWA locals to organize "Stop Hunger Days" on behalf of persons starving in Africa and the United States.

Labor-backed bills advance, line veto stalls

90-day advance warning of a plant closing or major permanent layoff under the closing bill approved by the committee.

If workers were represented by a union, the firm would have to provide information relevant to the decision to close the plant and discuss options for keeping it open.

The committee approved the bill, 20-12, after rejecting weakening amendments.

Committee Republicans sought in vain to defer action pending a study of plant closings Labor Sec. William E. Brock has said he will initiate.

Rep. William Ford (D-Mich.) said in response to the delaying proposal that he first introduced a plant closing bill in 1974 and "I don't think we are rushing to judgment" on the issue.

In the Senate battle over President Reagan's request for line-item veto power, a Republican-led filibuster kept the bill from being called up. Three attempts to muster the 60 votes needed to invoke cloture fell short, despite phone calls from Reagan.

Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole (R-Kan.) then set the bill aside. Appropriations Committee Chairman Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.), who had led the filibuster, said the bill was "one of the most dangerous proposals to come before the Senate, in terms of the constitutional balance between Congress and the President."

It would have allowed the President to veto portions of an appropriations bill, while allowing other provisions to become law.

ILO delegates elect France's Oechslin

Geneva—French employer delegate Jean-Jacques Oechslin has been elected to chair the International Labor Organization's Governing Body for the next 12 months.

Oechslin becomes the first employer delegate to head the Governing Body since it was founded in 1919. Traditionally, the post has gone to a government delegate. Canadian worker delegate Joe Morris was the only previous non-government chairman when he headed the Governing Body in 1977.

"The appointment of Oechslin underlines the essential triparite character of the ILO," a spokesman said.

Connecticut labor registers key gains in state legislation

Hartford, Conn.—The Connecticut AFL-CIO won a number of legislative gains during the 1985 session of the state General Assembly while thwarting the anti-worker intent of a slew of regressive bills.

The state federation aided in the passage of a bill to increase from 90 to 120 days the term of company-paid health and medical insurance coverage for workers affected by plant closings or relocation.

Betty Tianti, the State AFL-CIO lobbyist, noted that the measure also provides for an $8-million trust fund to help subsidize the interest payments on loans for employee or union purchase of plants about to be closed or relocated.

Another bill passed by the General Assembly calls for establishment of a "Fund for Excellence" to help local school systems raise teachers' salaries. Job sharing for teachers will be permitted under a new law that allows more flexibility for teachers without losing benefits, pensions or tenure.

A key health and safety measure is an asbestos removal law that requires identification and safe removal of asbestos from public schools to reduce the risk to students, teachers and other employees. The state will pay an average 60 percent of the removal costs.

Although there was an increase in the threshold value for contracts covered by the state's little Davis-Bacon law to $200,000 for new construction and $50,000 for renovations, the enforcement staff will be expanded by the addition of two officers, Tianti said.

The state AFL-CIO also lobbied for the new program that will pay half the cost of prescription drugs for the elderly with annual incomes under $12,000 for couples and $9,000 for single persons. The only requirment is payment of a $15 annual registration fee.

The anti-worker bills that were sidetracked due in part to the efforts of the State AFL-CIO were measures to repeal binding arbitration for municipal employees, cut the prevailing wage rates on public construction, outlaw union shop contracts, exclude more state workers from collective bargaining, and repeal heart and hypertension benefits for fire fighters and police.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer five institutes and workshops during August and September. The schedule:

Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation, Aug. 4-9—An institute on the presentation of grievance cases. The exercises, including mock cases to be heard by professional arbitrators, will be videotaped.

Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications, Aug. 11-16—A workshop for editors and would-be editors on the basics of producing union publications; cosponsored by the International Labor Communications Association.

Standards of Discipline & Discharge in Arbitration, Aug. 25-29—Participants will hear from arbitrators on standards of proof and the concept of "just cause" and will examine case studies on alcohol and drug-related misconduct and off-duty misconduct.

Television: The Cool Medium, Sept. 3-6—A three-day coaching session for union officers on working with TV reporters before video cameras.

Organizing Techniques, Sept. 22-27—A short course covering the main steps in organizing drives: selecting targets, picking in-plant committees, making house calls, identifying winning issues, and countering employer opposition.

AFL-CIO affiliates using the center's facilities for their own staff training programs are the Communications Workers, Aug. 4-9, 11-16, 11-30 and 18-23; Railway & Airline Clerks, Aug. 9, and Carpenters, Aug. 18-23.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will bring 40 trade union leaders from Central and South America to the campus Aug. 18 for five weeks to study political theories and advanced labor organizing techniques.

More information on these and other labor studies programs is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Tel. 301/431-6400.

Time for Action

CONGRESS IS showing welcome signs of recognizing that a stronger remedy than finger-wagging is needed to make foreign trade once again a two-way street.

The awakening comes none too soon. The real test, however, will be whether it leads to effective legislative action.

Predatory trade practices and the exaggerated exchange value of the dollar have taken a heavy toll on the U.S. economy. Entire industries have been decimated. An unemployment rate that has stayed above 7 percent throughout a period of economic recovery testifies to the permanence of the job loss.

Last spring, Congress responded to the out-of-control trade deficit with tough talk, but no stick.

The Senate passed, 92-0, a non-binding resolution urging President Reagan to impose tariffs and quotas if the Japanese did not offset their increased auto shipments to the United States by buying more U.S. goods.

Not to be outdone, the House voted 394-19 for its own non-binding resolution. It asked the President to ''take all appropriate action'' to get Japan to end unfair trade practices.

Since then, of course, the trade imbalance has worsened.

THE NATIONS that have taken advantage of America's naive free market policy long ago learned they have nothing to fear from periodic lecturing by Congress, or from the Reagan Administration's ''quiet diplomacy.''

So it's good news that leading Democrats in the House and Senate have introduced legislation to require, not just request, the President to curb imports from countries whose policies helped cause our trade deficit. It would be even better news if a significant number of Republicans signed on as co-sponsors.

Likewise, it is good news that Senate Republicans are bringing up legislation that would put some teeth in the non-binding resolution adopted in March. Democrats should support it with the same unanimity given to the earlier measure.

Neither of these measures should be used as an excuse to delay pending legislation to deal with specific trade problems—such as the widely acknowledged need to strengthen the Multifiber Arrangement limiting imports of apparel and textiles. When something doesn't work, it should be fixed. By co-sponsoring the bill, a majority of the Senate and nearly two-thirds of the House have attested to the need for repair.

Nor should Congress delay legislation to continue the trade adjustment program the White House wants to end. Retraining assistance for workers whose jobs have been wiped out by imports is needed as much as ever.

If Congress succeeds in turning around America's trade deficit, it will be less needed. But you don't jettison the lifejackets while the ship is sinking.

More Than Words

SOUTH AFRICA has again resorted to prisons and bullets to perpetuate the evil system of apartheid, and the democratic world must this time respond with more than words of rebuke.

Nearly two months ago, the House of Representatives voted to ban U.S. business investment in South Africa and impose other economic sanctions that would be lifted when the dismantling of racial oppression takes place.

The Senate adopted a milder version, merely holding out the prospect of future sanctions. But even that was a step beyond the ''quiet'' but clearly ineffective diplomacy the Administration prefers.

To its credit, France has taken the lead by imposing meaningful economic sanctions on South Africa, comparable to those voted by the House. It has also brought the issue before the UN Security Council, and here the United States government should and must declare its support.

It is up to the civilized nations of the world to bring effective pressure on South Africa's ruling minority to negotiate with—not imprison—those democratic forces that are seeking a peaceful route to freedom.

When it comes to human rights, the United States should be in the forefront, not bringing up the rear.

Right to know of risks a true life or death issue

By Press Associates, Inc.

Last fall, it was disclosed that the federal government had identified 249 plants and mines in 42 states where some 250,000 workers face increased risks of cancer, heart disease, reproductive damage and other illnesses because of their exposure to hazardous substances on the job.

Revealed through a Freedom of Information Act request made by the Public Citizen Health Research Group, the information had been collected by the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health, part of the Centers for Disease Control, over the past 15 years.

Internal agency documents showed that the CDC concluded in 1983 that NIOSH had no legal obligation to inform those workers of the health risks, but ''NIOSH does have an ethical obligation'' to notify them. However, a NIOSH request for funds for a notification program was denied by the Reagan Administration.

The cruelty of this decision is demonstrated by a 1981 pilot notification project involving the Augusta Chemical Co. in Georgia and exposure of workers to betanaphthylamine (BNA), which is known to cause bladder cancer.

NIOSH used social security and Internal Revenue Service records to locate most of the plant's workers and conducted a health screening. Thirteen out of 586 workers tested were found to have bladder cancer, and the tests of 26 other workers were highly suggestive of precancerous conditions. These rates were far above normal.

Workers unaware

A published study of the project also showed that 42 percent of the workers who were notified had never heard of BNA, and 74 percent were unaware that BNA is harmful. Of the 26 percent who did know that BNA is harmful, most learned about it only after they developed symptoms of cancer, such as blood in their urine.

Because of the Reagan Administration's refusal to act, Representatives Joseph Gaydos (D-Pa.) and Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.) introduced legislation that would establish a federal identification, notification, medical screening and research program for workers at high disease risk from toxic exposures on the job.

Testifying before a joint hearing on the bill held by the House Subcommittees on Health & Safety and Labor Standards, Rubber Workers President Milan Stone cited examples of the huge worker populations potentially exposed to cancer-causing and other disease-producing substances:

- 3 million workers exposed to benzene with a risk of leukemia up to five times greater than normal.
- 2.5 million workers exposed to asbestos, many with a risk of lung cancer five times greater than normal.
- 1.5 million workers exposed to arsenic, many with a lung cancer risk two to five times greater than normal.
- 1.4 million workers exposed to nickel, some with a risk of cancer five to 10 times greater than normal.
- 1 million women of childbearing age exposed to chemicals that cause miscarriage and birth defects.

Such exposures ''take a terrible toll on American workers,'' Stone said, with an estimated 100,000 deaths and 1 million disabilities each year from occupational disease.

Stone and others testifying before the panel—Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers President Joseph Misbrener, Sierra Club Chairman Michael McCloskey, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel and job disease expert Dr. Irving Selikoff of Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York—stressed that workers have a fundamental right to know that they are at high risk of disease from occupational exposure to toxics.

The Gaydos-Hawkins bill is not a panacea for the ever-growing problem of occupational disease, but it is a moral step in the right direction.

As Dr. Selikoff told the House panel, ''whether we inform people of risks can ultimately be thought of as a decision that will determine, in many cases, whether people will live or die.''

Unemployed shoeworker Jeanne Hebert describes dire impact of imports at Washington vigil.

Import-clobbered shoeworkers press Reagan on needed remedy

By James M. Shevis

America's shoeworkers appealed to President Reagan to save their jobs by imposing quotas to cut back footwear imports that are destroying the domestic industry.

From around the country, their representatives gathered at a "Shoeworkers' Vigil" in Lafayette Park just across from the White House in an attempt to convince Reagan that a strong remedy is needed to prevent yet another American industry from going down the tube.

Shoeworkers from 38 footwear-producing states—some still employed, others laid off—read the names of over 100,000 workers who had signed petitions to the President asking him to approve the International Trade Commission's June recommendation for quotas on shoe imports.

The petitions were collected from shoe manufacturers and suppliers and their workers during the past year. They filled 15 U.S mail sacks, and took two days to read.

At a press conference, Legislative Director Arnold Mayer of the Food & Commercial Workers stressed that, "The facts are clear in this case. Imports have hurt the industry. Thousands of workers have been put out of jobs, their communities suffer.

"The ITC has said what needs to be done. The answers are clear. We appeal to the President to do what needs to be done. It will prevent further misery."

'Give us a chance'

Jeanne Hebert, an unemployed shoeworker from Livermore, Me., who testified earlier at ITC hearings on the industry, asked the President to "put a halt to this flood of imports and give us a chance to survive."

Hebert said that in Maine, where the shoe industry is second only to paper, 16 shoe factories have closed since 1980, four this year already. The closings have put 57,000 people out of work, and created modern-day ghost towns, she said.

Quenten Youngblood, a shoeworker from Brockton, Mass., said that the industry is down but not out in Massachusetts, which once was a leader in shoemaking.

"We're not the Titanic. We're more like the Queen Mary that's been turned into a museum," he said. "We don't want the shoe industry to be a museum."

After reading the cards with the names of the petitioners, the workers dropped them into a giant shoe box to be delivered to the President.

Joseph Huighe, who heads the shoe division of the Clothing & Textile Workers, warned that American shoeworkers are fighting for their survival.

"There are no new jobs to be had in most cases and the factory closings hurt the whole community as jobs are lost because other shops and businesses also close," he said.

In May, the ITC unanimously ruled that the domestic footwear industry and its workers have been seriously injured by imported footwear. In June, the agency recommended that the President impose five years of quotas on the imports to allow time to install needed new technology to compete with the low priced foreign footwear.

Reagan has until Sept. 1 to accept, modify or reject the ITC's recommendation. If approved, it would take effect in 15 days.

Increased imports have caused the domestic footwear industry problems since 1968, but the situation has considerably worsened in the past four years.

In 1981, imports controlled 51 percent of the U.S. market. The Footwear Industries of America estimates the share today is almost 80 percent.

The ITC's remedy would limit imported nonrubber footwear with a customs value of $2.50 or more to 474-million pairs a year for the next two years. The ceiling would be lifted by 3-percent increments over the next three years so that total imports would be no more than 564-million pairs in early 1990.

George Langstaff, president of the Footwear Industries of America, estimated the quotas would create 60,000 jobs in the first three years.

Dotson ally Robert Hunter plans to leave Labor Board

Robert P. Hunter, the senior member of the National Labor Relations Board, announced he will retire when his term expires Aug. 27.

Hunter, who has been a close ally of conservative NLRB Chairman Donald L. Dotson, figured in nearly all of the major board decisions reversing longstanding policies protecting workers and their unions over the past 22 months.

Hunter said he will join the Washington office of the New York law firm of Proskauer, Rose, Goetz & Mendelsohn. He came to the board in 1981 after serving as a key aide to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) on the staff of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

Hunter's departure leaves two Republicans and two Democrats on the board. Those of the GOP stripe are Dotson and newcomer Wilford W. Johansen, a career NLRB attorney who was sworn in as a member on May 28. Democratic members are Patricia Diaz Dennis and another new arrival, Marshall Babson, who was sworn in July 1.

The latter two, along with Dotson, were management labor relations attorneys before coming to the board.

Since late 1983, when the Reagan-appointed majority took hold of the agency, the board has assumed what organized labor sees as a strong pro-management tilt. Also, the board amassed a record backlog of cases involving unfair labor practices, a situation that has lessened somewhat in recent months.

For long periods over the past two years, the board had only three or four members because of White House delays in filling vacancies, and this contributed to the backlog.

Georgine hits proposals for tax on benefits

Proposals to tax worker health benefits don't make sense either as social policy or in terms of budget reduction, Robert A. Georgine charged at House and Senate hearings on the Administration's tax proposals.

Georgine, who is president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., testified in opposition to a tax on benefits as chairman of the National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Plans. More than 8 million workers are covered by pension and welfare plans funded by a number of employers.

His criticism was aimed at both the Treasury Dept.'s original proposal to make workers pay taxes on the value of any health insurance coverage provided by their employer in excess of a specified amount, and the revised "tax reform" plan that President Reagan sent to Congress. The plan Reagan embraced would tax all workers on the first $25-a-month that an employer pays for family health insurance (the first $10-a-month for single-individual coverage) but allow higher amounts go untaxed.

Georgine's testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee urged rejection of both the "cap" and the "floor" concepts.

Divisive proposal

However framed, he said, a health benefits tax amounts to an additional tax on workers. It would weaken the concept of health insurance by discouraging participation of younger and healthier workers, pitting their concerns against those of workers with families and older workers or retirees.

Lower-income workers would suffer under both a cap and a floor, Georgine noted. A cap on benefits would discourage comprehensive coverage such as dental care, preventive checkups, eye care and prescription drug programs. And taxing everyone on the same dollar amount of benefits would amount to a larger proportionate burden on persons with the least adequate insurance plans, many of whom are in low-wage industries.

Health benefits serve important social purposes, Georgine stressed.

"Without them," he testified, "there would be increased pressure for new and expanded government programs which would cost far more than the revenue collected through the taxation of private sector benefits."

Provide incentive

Tax laws should encourage the private sector to provide such benefits, Georgine urged. Any attempt to tax benefits would be recognized by workers as a revenue-raising measure at their expense that is neither "fair" for a tax "reform," Georgine testified.

Congress recognized the importance of employee benefit programs to society by encouraging their development through favorable tax treatment, Georgine stressed.

Now, 80 percent of all workers are covered by employer-provided health insurance and term life insurance coverage is "nearly universal," Georgine said. American workers and their families rely on these benefits, he pointed out.

Tearup of contract forces Steelworkers to picket line

In the last three rounds of bargaining, USWA members granted concessions to Wheeling-Pittsburgh totaling more than $120 million. The union estimates that the company's new package of concessions would cost the workers about $75 million a year more in lost wages and benefits.

Besides that, new working conditions sought by the company would cut vacations by two weeks, trim one holiday, allow contracting out of work, eliminate seniority, end the grievance procedure, slash incentive and premium pay, and boost the cost of medical insurance deductibles and premiums to as much as $4,000 per worker.

Paul M. Rusen, the union's chief negotiator, told a crowd of 3,500 cheering union family members in a packed Steubenville, Ohio, arena, "We are ready for this war. . . . I look for a long work stoppage."

Wages and benefits at W-P totaled $21.40 per hour under the USWA contract which was not due to expire until July 31, 1986. The company claims it is cutting the package to $17.50 per hour. The USWA, however, says the true figure is $15.55 per hour and that the minimum pay rate will be about $7 per hour.

The company has repeatedly rejected efforts by the union to reach an equitable settlement of the dispute, including an offer of a $2 per hour cut in wages and benefits. W-P insisted that was not enough.

Trade deficit continues surge

Support for Farm Workers

On Capitol Hill, Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez gets signatures of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Edward R. Roybal (D-Calif.), left, on pledge to boycott non-union California grapes until Gov. George Deukmejian enforces California's law guaranteeing collective bargaining rights for agricultural workers.

Labor urges 'strong steps' to defend U.S. industry, jobs

By David L. Perlman

America's job-destroying trade deficit continued its sharp rise and the AFL-CIO warned of "tragic consequences" for the nation if the trend is not reversed.

The trade figures for June—showing imports exceeding exports by $13.4 billion—sent shock waves through Capitol Hill and built pressure for legislative relief. June's deficit was the second highest ever recorded.

Most of the merchandise trade deficit stems from the flood of manufactured imports that have swamped U.S. markets with the help of an overvalued dollar. The dollar exchange rate, still higher than a year ago despite its recent drop, makes U.S. exports more costly and makes imports cheaper.

The trade deficit for manufactured goods during the first half of 1985 was 27 percent above the 1984 pace, and is expected to end the year at close to $110 billion.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald linked the manufacturing sector deficit to the decline of 220,000 U.S. manufacturing jobs during the first six months of this year. Despite a growth in population and in the number of people seeking jobs, manufacturing employment is less than when President Reagan took office. In 1980, the United States sold more manufactured goods to other countries than it imported.

The imbalance with Japan remained the largest single element in the overall U.S. trade deficit. It amounted to $4.7 billion in June, a pace substantially higher than the 1984 total. Total imports from Japan have risen 83 percent since 1980.

Repeat performance

Against this backdrop, there was little applause and considerable cynicism in Congress at Japan's announcement of a new three-year "action program" to open up that country's markets to foreign producers.

It is the sixth time since 1981 that Japan has announced steps to reduce its huge trade surplus with other countries, but the imbalance has continued to grow.

When Congress returns from its recess in September, House hearings are likely on the trade bill introduced by leading Democrats, including Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (Ill.). It would set timetables for nations that have been flooding the U.S. market to reduce their trade surplus or face a 25 percent tariff penalty. And the Senate is expected to take up a measure to impose import restrictions if the Japanese don't offset increased auto sales to the U.S. with a corresponding rise in goods purchased from this country.

Also ready for congressional action is bipartisan legislation to tighten existing limitations on imports of apparels and textiles.

Oswald's comments on the trade deficit stressed the need for government action, which the White House has continued to resist.

"The unwillingness of the Reagan Administration to take strong steps to defend U.S. industry and workers has had tragic consequences for the domestic economy," Oswald said.

He warned of the "serious threat to future economic growth and social progress," and

Bhopal chemical deaths preventable, study finds

By Arlee C. Green

The Bhopal chemical plant disaster that killed some 2,600 persons and injured nearly 200,000 last Dec. 3 was preventable and could be repeated elsewhere in the world, including the United States, a 12-member international trade union commission determined.

The commission's 20-page Trade Union Report on Bhopal, released simultaneously in Geneva, New Delhi and Washington, charged that unsafe plant design, dangerous operating procedures, lack of proper maintenance, faulty equipment and deep cuts in personnel levels contributed to the release of the cloud of deadly methyl isocyanate (MIC) over the neighborhoods near the plant.

Not unique

The report stressed that the causes of the Bhopal accident are not unique to Union Carbide Corp.'s Bhopal plant, but rather are "common to many chemical manufacturing and industrial processes."

The lesson that Americans should learn from that tragic event in India, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said, is that "none of the conditions which led to the disaster would have been violations of specific standards or regulations of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration or the Environmental Protection Agency."

The report "is the most accurate and detailed analysis we are likely to have of what happened in the Bhopal plant and how it came about," Kirkland said.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security and a member of the commission, told a press briefing on July 30, that U.S. trade unionists must intensify their drive for legislation to force OSHA and EPA to develop regulations aimed at preventing future Bhopals.

The commission made recommendations for governments, chemical manufacturers and importers to follow in order to lessen the possibility of major chemical accidents.

Union Carbide Corp. shortly after Dec. 3 suggested that the Bhopal disaster could have been sabotage and that the union workers were to blame for leaving their workstations.

The commission, sponsored by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Chemical, Energy & General Workers' Unions, ruled out sabotage and found that the workers had acted properly and followed the company's emergency guidelines.

"Our responsibility to our trade union brothers and sisters in India was to find out the causes," Seminario said. "Union Carbide still has not adequately backed off its accusation that the workers are at fault."

There were five chemical accidents at the

Auto union okays innovative pact for Saturn plant

Chicago—The Auto Workers executive board approved an agreement with General Motors' new subsidiary, Saturn Corp., that includes unprecedented provisions for a salaried workforce with permanent job security and joint union-management decision-making.

The unionized workers will be a "full partner" in the operation of the company, UAW President Owen Bieber declared at a press conference that followed the executive board's 24-1 vote.

"No decision can be made, no action can be taken without agreement by the workers. That is a degree of co-determination never before achieved in U.S. collective bargaining," Bieber said.

The Saturn Corp., which will build a $3.5 billion facility in Spring Hill, Tenn., agreed to operate the plant to mirror in large part the labor-management relationships successfully used in Japan. The plant will be just 35 miles from Nissan Motor Co.'s manufacturing complex in Smyrna, Tenn., where the UAW has been trying to organize 2,000 production workers.

Conferees agree on sanctions to fight South African racism

A House-Senate conference committee agreed on legislation to impose economic sanctions on South Africa, rejecting President Reagan's contention that the United States should rely on quiet diplomacy to bring an end to apartheid.

The compromise bill wasn't as strong as the labor-backed measure the House passed last June. But it reflected a bipartisan consensus that world economic pressure is needed to dismantle government-enforced racial discrimination.

In the United Nations Security Council, the United States had abstained on a resolution urging governments to halt new investments in South Africa. The UN resolution also demanded that South Africa lift its emergency decree and release its political prisoners and detainees.

The House-Senate agreement sent a message that the United States was not abstaining from an international effort to bring economic pressure on South Africa.

The legislation would impose limited sanctions initially—a ban on sale of Krugerrand gold coins in the United States, a curb on bank loans to the South African government, and some sales restrictions. If the Pretoria government failed to make progress toward ending apartheid during the coming year, President Reagan would be required to recommend further sanctions to Congress, including a ban on new private investment by U.S. companies and denial of most-favored-nation trade status.

The AFL-CIO, in a letter from Legislative Director Ray Denison to members of the conference committee, had urged the strongest possible sanctions to register the nation's "outrage" over the wave of arrests and detentions.

Summer fun for city kids

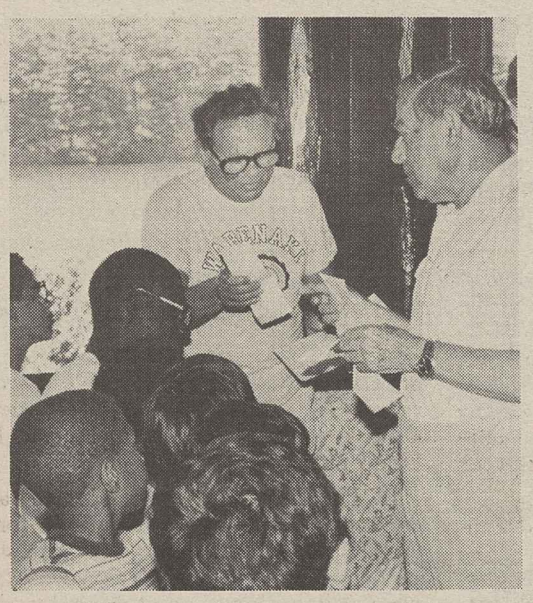
Thanks to the New York City AFL-CIO, some 1,400 children escaped the city heat to enjoy three weeks of summer fun at Camp Wabenaki and Camp Sebago in upstate New York.

The central labor council's summer camp project has been sending kids to camp for 25 years, with donations from affiliated unions offsetting the costs. Three weeks at the Catskills-area camps usually runs $400, but the union program reduced the cost to less than $200 per camper. Families are charged based on their ability to pay.



This year, the city federation raised funds to help give a record number of young campers from lower-income families the chance to go swimming and hiking while improving their skills —at computers or at baseball.

Earlier this year, one of the camps was renovated to be accessible to handicapped children.

The camps opened in late June, and a special visitation day was held July 17, when union representatives met with campers and received a tour of the grounds. According to project coordinator Sid Lew, "visitation day really sells the program."

17 unions back Morgan Stanley bid for Conrail

Seventeen unions belonging to the Railway Labor Executives' Association have endorsed a plan to sell Conrail to a group of investors assembled by Morgan Stanley & Co., an investment banking firm.

At a news conference announcing the RLEA vote, Railway & Airline Clerks President Richard I. Kilroy said the Morgan Stanley purchase plan has "all the ingredients to accomplish our ends" to maintain the federal freight railroad as a separate, whole entity that will not be sold in pieces or merged.

Kilroy, who is executive secretary-treasurer of the RLEA, said that after "exhaustive studies, careful evaluations and extensive negotiations," most of the RLEA's member unions agreed that the Morgan Stanley plan was in the "best interest of everyone concerned"—shippers, communities, the rail industry and the government.

Not signing the agreement in principle with Morgan Stanley were the United Transportation Union and the Yardmasters. The Yardmasters asked for more time to study the agreement, Kilroy said. The UTU is on record as favoring a public offering of Conrail stock, which the Morgan Stanley plan proposes, but has not specifically endorsed any sale plan.

Under the Morgan Stanley plan, a majority interest of Conrail stock would be resold through public offerings within five years. The group would then own more than 40 percent of the company and no single investor would be permitted to own more than 10 percent.

Both Morgan Stanley and the Norfolk Southern Corp., which is the Reagan Administration's preferred bidder, have offered about $1.2 billion for the Government's 85-percent share of Conrail.

Government deal

Under an agreement reached with the Transportation Dept., Norfolk Southern would completely liquidate the Employee Stock Ownership Plan at a reported price of about $17 a share compared with the $48 a share for the government's stock.

The agreement reached between the rail unions, Conrail management and Morgan Stanley would provide a financial package to union employees valued at $412 million. This includes $200 million in cash benefits and $212 million for the employees' 15-percent share of Conrail stock at about $48 a share.

Morgan Stanley also offered rail labor two seats on the board of directors and provisions under which employees may continue to own at least 15 percent of Conrail.

Kilroy said Morgan Stanley's labor protection provisions made a "significant difference" for Conrail employees.

Taxpayers have invested more than $7 billion in upgrading the freight system salvaged by Congress in 1973 from the ruins of the then-bankrupt Penn Central and other collapsed northeastern railroads.

Conrail Chairman Stanley Crane, who has strongly opposed a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger, said he is "absolutely delighted" with the RLEA's position. He said the Morgan Stanley plan offers a "practical way" of making a public stock sale.

A major issue for railroad labor is the question of potential job loss if Conrail is merged with Norfolk Southern. Kilroy said the the unions estimated that the adverse effects on Conrail competitors created by such a merger would result in the loss of 10,000 jobs.

Kilroy said the rail unions' agreement should carry "considerable influence" on Capitol Hill, where Congress will have the last word on the sale.

A bipartisan group of legislators has introduced bills in the House and Senate to authorize a Conrail sale to Morgan Stanley's group of 32 investors, which include investment companies, pension funds and universities. The Senate Commerce Committee already has approved a bill to authorize a sale to Norfolk Southern.

Unions urge ban on 'lie' detectors

The use of polygraphs—so-called lie detectors—should be prohibited in private employment, union witnesses urged at House hearings.

Sec.-Treas. Andrew J. Lutty of the Food & Commercial Workers challenged the scientific reliability of lie detectors and said they are increasingly being used as a means of intimidation.

The point was made also by President Robert F. Harbrant of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. He said the polygraph is "a psychological rubber hose, which has no place in today's workplace."

Their testimony, before the Subcommittee on Employment Opportunities, disputed employer claims that polygraph testing is needed to curb worker theft.

Lutty cited studies showing high error rates in polygraph tests and pointed to the increasing use of the polygraph to ferret out information not related to personal honesty.

He quoted the conclusion of a Privacy Protection Study Commission established by Congress that the use of lie detector devices was an "unreasonable invasion of privacy" that should be banned.

Legislative efforts

Lutty welcomed the introduction of anti-polygraph legislation by Representatives Patrick Williams (D-Mont.) and Stewart B. McKinney (R-Conn.) and said the UFCW supports the measures "in the strongest possible terms." More than 150 House members have co-sponsored anti-polygraph bills.

Harbrant noted that corporate fraud costs business more than three times the losses claimed from employee pilferage. But "needless to say, you don't find many polygraph examinations being conducted in the corporate boardroom."

Despite the claims of their advocates, Harbrant said, polygraph machines are clearly unreliable. But as a result of their use, "hundreds of thousands of workers are denied employment" and branded as "liars."

He noted that questions asked in polygraph tests have covered such matters as sexual activity and union beliefs.

As a result of "sheer intimidation," Harbrant said, some polygraph tests undoubtedly result in admissions of theft. "But so would the rack, and so would thumb screws," he observed.

The polygraph should be relegated to an "exhibition of medieval horrors" and workers assured of "dignity and self-respect," in their employment, he said.

Labor assails export of jobs under OPIC

Labor is opposed to extending the life of the Overseas Private Investment Corp. because the program has been a failure, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald testified at Senate hearings.

OPIC provides insurance for U.S. multinational companies and banks that invest in various "less developed" nations. Its intended purpose, Oswald noted, is to promote economic and social development abroad while furthering U.S. employment objectives at home.

Instead, he protested, OPIC guarantees have subsidized "the export of jobs, technology and capital."

Since Congress last renewed OPIC's authority, the U.S. merchandise trade deficit has tripled, Oswald stressed. Its further renewal, he warned, will only worsen the nation's economic problems.

Bar anti-union nations

Oswald expressed the AFL-CIO's concern that many of the countries helped by OPIC guarantees "severely restrict the rights of workers to organize into unions and bargain collectively." He urged the committee to bar such nations from participation if the OPIC program is continued.

A House subcommittee recently approved a bill reauthorizing OPIC, adding what the AFL-CIO considers an overly weak provision dealing with worker rights. It would limit OPIC assistance to countries that are "taking steps to implement labor rights." The AFL-CIO had sought stronger language.

Oswald took sharp exception to one of the bills under consideration by the Senate Foreign Relations subcommittee dealing with OPIC. It would extend insurance coverage to "loss due to business interruption."

Such language could well be interpreted as strike insurance, Oswald protested.

Upholsterers to vote on merger proposal

Philadelphia—Members of the Upholsterers will vote in September on merger with the Steelworkers.

Although details of the referendum are still being worked out, UIU President John Serembus said the ballots will be cast at either local union halls or at workplaces and will be counted during the week of Oct. 7. Merger would be effective on certification of a majority vote in favor the proposal.

Support for the merger was voted 77-0 on July 15 by the UIU Council of Delegates. A day later, the Steelworkers' executive board also voted unanimous support.

Under the terms of the merger document, the 30,000-member UIU would become the Upholstery & Allied Industries division of the Steelworkers and maintain its headquarters in Philadelphia. The UIU president will become the director of the new division and a member of the USWA executive board.

Nevada's new anti-union law severely restricting picketing is challenged by union members attending the Rocky Mountain Labor School in Reno. They turned out in supposedly "excessive" numbers to help a strike by food store workers protesting management's takeaway pension demands. Police made no arrests but Nevada unions are mounting a court test of the law. State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Blackie Evans is at left.

Conferees agree on sanctions to fight South African racism

It was uncertain whether Congress would complete action on the legislation before starting its month-long summer recess. There was no doubt of the votes to pass the measure. But Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) was threatening a filibuster, and the White House was clearly anxious for a delay. Reagan's press aide, Larry Speakes, said the Administration has "a number of complaints" about the legislation.

It also appeared touch-and-go whether a House-Senate budget agreement would be reached and put to a vote before the recess.

Earlier, a compromise proposed by Senate Republicans in an attempt to break an impasse was shot down by President Reagan because it included a tax on oil imports as part of a deficit-reduction plan.

Reagan's message to Congress was that the only form of deficit reduction acceptable to the White House would be the demolition of more government programs.

Despite the inability to agree on budget targets, both the House and Senate moved ahead with authorization and appropriations bills that were generally in line with the budget resolutions passed by each of the branches of Congress.

A House-Senate conference agreement on a $302.5 billion Defense Dept. authorization bill came at least temporarily unstuck, however.

Vote delayed

It provided a defense increase closer to the the Senate figure and substantially higher than the House-passed budget resolution would have allowed. Sharp protests expressed at a House Democratic caucus led to a decision by House leaders to put off the vote on final passage until Congress returns in September.

One of the issues in the conference was Senate-approved provisions that would have eliminated about 95 percent of military construction contracts from Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage requirements. It would have exempted all contracts under $1 million and written into law the union-opposed regulatory changes the Labor Dept. made in the program.

The Davis-Bacon amendment was dropped by the conferees, but the final version retained a Senate provision repealing the eight-hour day protection of the Walsh-Healey Act, which sets labor standards for government contracts. If it is enacted, contractors would not have to pay overtime rates after eight hours in a day. Their only limitation would be the 40-hour workweek under the wage-hour law.

Scheduled for House action—and anticipated approval—before the start of the recess was a labor-backed bill providing for a pay equity study of the federal workforce to determine whether pay grades are influenced by a predominance of women in certain job categories.

Craft unions win ruling on Davis-Bacon

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. hailed a ruling by the Labor Dept.'s Wage Appeals Board that the protections of the Davis-Bacon Act apply to construction of military housing units built off-base by private developers.

The ruling overturned a decision by Wage-Hour Deputy Administrator Herbert J. Cohen that work on 1,400 military housing units to be built near Fort Drum, N.Y., would not be covered by the federal prevailing wage law.

The housing facilities at Fort Drum are to be built under a pilot program authorized by Congress last year under which the Defense Dept. may contract with private developers to build family housing units for armed forces personnel on or near military bases, with private financing. The housing units would be leased to the government for up to 20 years, and if the developer subsequently wished to sell the project, the Defense Dept. would have the right of first refusal.

Last February, the BCTD sought a ruling on the application of Davis-Bacon provisions to work on the pilot housing projects authorized under Section 801(g) of the Military Construction Authorization Act of 1984. Cohen ruled that the prevailing wage law would apply on housing facilities built on the military bases, but not on construction of units off the base. He maintained that the off-base housing units could not be considered "public buildings."

Ruling reversed

The Wage Appeals Board rejected this argument, pointing out that the housing units would be built to Defense Dept. specifications, would be leased exclusively to the government for up to 20 years, and would not otherwise be built. It directed Cohen to issue a wage determination for the Fort Drum project.

BCTD President Robert Georgine called the decision "an important victory" for the building trades. In a letter to presidents of the department's affiliated unions, Georgine noted that the leasing scheme is being viewed in the Defense Dept. as a way to finance other non-housing military construction projects.

CWA slates 'day of protest' on 'mess' from Bell breakup

The Communications Workers scheduled a national day of protest Aug. 29 against the export and contracting out of union jobs.

CWA President Morton Bahr said local leaders and members throughout the country will be encouraged to participate in the protests, "to alert public opinion to the sorry mess" that has resulted from the breakup of AT&T.

CWA's public worker locals will be urged to focus their protests on contracting-out issues in the public sector on that day, Bahr told reporters at a Washington news conference.

"Those responsible for the divestiture (of the phone company), gave not one moment of thought to what happens the day after," Bahr observed.

He said the protests will be aimed at the seven regional phone companies spun off from the Bell System, as well as at AT&T.

Regional Bell operating companies, Bahr said, are laying off experienced workers and hiring less expensive, less experienced workers to take their place. In other instances, work previously done by employees is being performed by outside contractors.

Bahr said the only "winners" from the breakup of AT&T and the Bell System are lawyers, stockbrokers and "those who want to penetrate the market from overseas." He said the "losers" have included America's telephone users as well as workers represented by CWA and other unions.

Looking back on the way divestiture came about, Bahr said "there is no evidence" that this most massive breakup in the nation "was ever discussed at a Cabinet meeting or with the President."

CWA local activities planned for Aug. 29 will include rallies, informational picketing, and a range of other events to focus public attention on the issue. The day of protest grew out of a resolution adopted at CWA's convention in San Francisco in mid-July.

The convention resolution noted that "the telecommunications industry restructure has afforded our employers the opportunity to establish myriad subsidiaries which often provide virtually the same services as existing operations. Yet these subsidiaries to a great degree remain unorganized.

"Similarly, a great deal of work increasingly is contracted out to non-union, independent providers. This practice also undermines the quality of service that ratepayers expect to receive and that CWA members are proud to provide."

Bahr has also noted that AT&T recently announced plans to close down a manufacturing facility in Shreveport, La., where 1,000 workers are represented by the Electrical Workers. AT&T has said this work will be shipped to Singapore.

Second thoughts at midyear

The Reagan Administration conceded that it had been overly optimistic in its economic growth assumptions, but insisted that the economy will pick up substantially during the second half of this year.

Beryl W. Sprinkel, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, issued a statement revising an April estimate of a 3.9 percent growth rate for 1985, dropping the prediction to 3 percent. But to achieve even that rate after the sluggish 1 percent pace of the first six months would require a 5 percent growth for the second half of the year.

The Commerce Dept.'s index of leading indicators, used to forecast future economic activity, gave some credence to the Administration's optimism when it showed a 1 percent rise for June, the biggest increase since January. But most economists still view the Administration's growth projection for this year as unrealistically high.

The Administration also forecast a steady drop in the unemployment rate for the remainder of 1985. It has been stuck at 7.3 percent in recent months.

Both the slow economic growth and the continued high unemployment in the first half of the year have been linked to the rise in imports and a corresponding drop in U.S. manufacturing output.

Governor's veto kills Oregon VDT measure

Salem, Ore.—Republican Gov. Victor Atiyeh's veto of the nation's first state law covering the use of video display terminals will not be overridden, State AFL-CIO President Irvin Fletcher predicted.

The bill passed the Senate 24-1, but only cleared the House by a 31-29 margin.

He said a similar bill would be introduced in the next regular legislative session in 1987. Atiyeh's second term expires in January 1987 and he is prohibited by state law from running for a third term.

Fair-tax petitions are delivered by Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto at House Ways & Means Committee hearings.

Petition drive shows public backs effective corporate tax

Corporations should pay taxes on their income "just like working people," Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto urged in testimony before the House Ways & Means Committee.

Sombrotto brought to the hearings fair-tax petitions from 100,000 taxpayers calling on Congress to repeal special-interest loopholes and restore the corporate tax as a significant source of federal revenue.

The petitions were collected by members of the NALC as part of a campaign by a coalition of unions and public-interest groups. The petitions are being circulated by the member organizations of Citizens Organized to Restore an Effective Corporate Tax, in a campaign coordinated in the trade union sector by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.

Sombrotto told the House committee that signatures on the petition were "easy to collect" since Americans are outraged by the fact that profitable corporations can escape virtually all taxation.

Fair share

In the words of the petition, Sombrotto said, people who pay their taxes in full are saying, "It's time for our largest and most profitable corporations to pay their fair share, too."

Since 1960, Sombrotto noted, the corporate share of taxes has shrunk from 25 percent to 8 percent. He pointed out also that the companies that received the most tax breaks, supposedly to encourage new investment, actually reduced their capital spending on new equipment.

As for the need for special corporate tax breaks to keep U.S. companies competitive, Sombrotto noted that Japan's corporations provide more than 25 percent of that nation's revenue and pay an effective rate of close to 50 percent.

The demand for tax fairness, Sombrotto testified, comes from "all across the country" including "big cities, farm areas and retirement communities."

U.S. plant for Toyota praised as 'first-step'

Detroit—The Auto Workers called the decision of Japanese firm Toyota to locate production facilities in the U.S. and Canada "a step in the right direction." But UAW President Owen Bieber said the Japanese auto maker should do more given its prominence in the North American market.

"We hope this will be only a first step toward even greater U.S. production in the future," Bieber said. "Toyota owes it to this nation to do more to support American workers and communities with jobs and taxes."

The Japanese firm's projected U.S. sales total for 1985 is nearly 900,000 units. The company announced it would manufacture 200,000 vehicles at a new facility to be built somewhere in the U.S.

Bieber said the UAW has had no formal talks with Toyota regarding representation of the workers at the proposed plant, but it expects the company will be cooperative.

"Our experience with Toyota—which manages the New United Motor Manufacturing, Inc., plant in Fremont, Calif.—and with Mazda provide the basis for a positive and productive relationship in the best interests of the workers, the employer and consumers," Bieber said.

Employers seek repeal

Public sector unions defend wage standard

Unions representing public-sector workers charged at Senate hearings that cities and states are exaggerating the cost of compliance with the federal wage-hour law in an attempt to persuade Congress to repeal an extension of coverage it enacted more than 10 years ago.

Congress brought all public workers under the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1974, but the Supreme Court initially upheld a constitutional challenge brought by the National League of Cities and ruled that Congress couldn't regulate wages of workers employed in "traditional" government functions.

But this year, in a case argued by the AFL-CIO, the Supreme Court reversed itself and the extension of coverage finally went into effect in April.

Having lost in the courts, city and state governments that are not in compliance with federal wage-hour standards have been lobbying for repeal of the 1974 extension of coverage.

Their special target is the requirement for time-and-one-half payment for overtime work. And their principal argument has been the financial burden of complying with the law.

Bills to repeal or weaken the 1974 extension of coverage have been introduced in both the House and Senate, and the chairman of the Senate Labor subcommittee holding hearings on the issue, Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), said he intends to sponsor such a bill also.

At hearings before the Nickles subcommittee, the claim of cities and states for a special exemption from wage-hour standards was sharply challenged by a panel of union witnesses representing the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., the Service Employees and the Fire Fighters.

Public employers who claim compliance with the law would bankrupt cities and states are just crying wolf, they charged.

Al Bilik, executive director of the PED's state-local division, said complaints of the cost of public-sector coverage are the same that private employers made when Congress adopted the Fair Labor Standards Act in 1938.

False fears

He noted that private employers then, like state and local employers today, protested to Congress that a floor under wages and a ceiling on hours would cause "insurmountable economic hardships" and compel layoffs.

Any city or state that has higher costs because of the wage-hour law "has in fact been exploiting its workers," Bilik charged, and should "at long last" be required to comply with the law. "Better late than never," he suggested.

The Fire Fighters reminded the Senate panel that the cost of compliance had been thoroughly explored by Congress when it enacted the 1974 FLSA amendments by big majorities in both the House and Senate.

Harold Schaitberger, the union's governmental affairs director, noted that one of the compromises made in the 1974 legislation was the provision that overtime rates would not apply to fire fighters until they had worked more than 212 hours in a four-week period. That limited form of coverage, which many cities now want to abolish entirely, "adequately took into account the financial concerns of local government officials," he testified.

Exaggerated claims

The Service Employees also took strong exception to cost estimates of compliance with the law.

Peggy Connerton, the SEIU's chief economist, noted that "even before the ink was dry" on the Supreme Court's policy reversal, state and local public officials were raising the specter of "billions of dollars" in extra taxes, layoffs of workers and cutbacks in service. But she cited gross inconsistencies in the cost claims. Under scrutiny, she testified, much of the cost data turns out to bear no resemblance to reality.

Connerton cited an SEIU study showing that the cost of compliance in most jurisdictions would be less than 1 percent of the wage bill. "The only public employers who may face significant costs are those who pay no premium now for overtime work," she testified.

Wisconsin allots $9 million in pay equity increases

Madison, Wis—The State, County & Municipal Employees won another round in its state-by-state drive for pay equity.

Wisconsin Governor Tony S. Earl (D) approved a $9.1-million appropriation passed by the state legislature and backed by AFSCME, awarding pay equity adjustments to 10,000 workers in female-dominated jobs. The salary adjustments became effective July 1, the start of Wisconsin's fiscal year.

The Wisconsin pay equity action is part of the union's national campaign to end sex-based wage discrimination in the public sector, AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said.

The union also announced these:

- A $20-million pay equity adjustment for 6,000 workers in Iowa, part of a collective bargaining agreement reached with the state earlier this year.
- A $5.6-million equity adjustment for 9,000 workers in Connecticut, also part of a collective bargaining agreement.
- An $11.8-million appropriation in Minnesota for the final segment of a four-year pay equity plan for 9,000 workers.

Earlier, AFSCME won pay readjustments for predominantly female workers in Los Angeles and New York state.

Auto Workers okay Saturn pact

The plant, which will make GM's new Saturn car, will be in operation by 1990 and use the latest computerized machinery. GM will house under a 150-acre roof an assembly and paint plant, stamping plant, engine and transaxle plant, a forging operation and a component manufacturing plant, the company said.

The primary source of Saturn's initial 6,000-person workforce will be the UAW members employed by General Motors, both active and inactive. The recruitment, selection and orientation procedures will be jointly determined.

Those workers initially hired will be given permanent job security. "No worker can be laid off except in the case of 'unforeseen or catastrophic events or severe economic conditions,' and union representatives must concur in that judgment," Bieber said.

As the workforce grows, new workers will gain permanent job security based on seniority, and at least 80 percent of the workforce will be covered at all times. Once permanent job security is gained by a worker, it is maintained regardless of fluctuations in the size of the workforce, the union said.

The agreement also provides for the elimination of "artificial" distinctions between labor and management, such as methods of pay, options to purchase GM products, separate cafeterias and parking areas, separate entrances and identification.

The union will be represented at all levels of the organization—work unit, work unit module, business unit, manufacturing complex and corporation—and will participate in all decisions at all levels, the UAW said, and either side can block a decision.

Limited classifications

Departing sharply from standard industry procedure, there will be only one production classification and three to five skilled classifications. Basic starting rates will be $13.45 per hour for production workers and $15.49 for skilled trades during an initial "bridging period" of one year after production of the first car for sale.

The base rate then will be lowered to 80 percent of competitive base rates plus cost-of-living adjustments at other UAW-represented auto manufacturers. Additional compensation will be related to performance objectives, product quality and profit sharing with the goal of providing an overall wage "equivalent to that earned by comparable employees in GM," the UAW said.

During the second year of production, there will be a minimum additional COLA payment of 60 cents per hour, and negotiations will begin for a successor agreement.

The Saturn workers will receive hospital, medical, surgical, drug, dental, vision and hearing benefits along with life insurance and coverage under the sickness and accident and long-term disability programs.

The contract provides for a retirement plan that will be a defined contribution, individual account type, except that workers with 10 or more years' credited service under the GM pension plan will receive benefits for credited service at the time of transfer to the Saturn plant.

The UAW statement said, "The Saturn agreement is understood to be a living document that either party may seek to modify, and negotiations to that end may be initiated at any time."

Trade deficit builds as import tide rises

called on Congress to assert leadership with legislation to bring down the trade deficit.

"The Administration must not be allowed to mortgage America's future," Oswald insisted.

The June deficit in manufactured products reflected substantial increases in imports of cars, steel, inorganic chemicals and footwear.

Car imports rose $700 million from May to a total of $3.4 billion, about half from Japan. Steel imports rose to $1 billion for the month, taking 27.9 percent of the U.S. market. It was a gain of 400,000 tons from May.

Textile imports for the first six months of 1985 were 10 percent above a year earlier, and oil imports continued to rise.

THE TAX REFORM THAT WENT WRONG

The AFL-CIO has a long tradition of support for a fair tax system. An unfair tax system can all too easily take away hard won improvements achieved at the collective bargaining table in wages, pensions, health care and other benefits, and of course, to the extent others avoid paying their fair share, workers pay more.

Worker concern with the tax system also stems from a deep commitment to a fairer society and an adequately financed public sector. Taxes can help or hinder social and economic justice. Taxes also support important investments in education, training, health, safety, crime prevention, parks, roads, water systems and the like, which are a fundamental part of the quality of life in America.

A fair tax system must be based on ability to pay

A fair tax structure must be based on the principle of ability to pay. Income is the most sensible measure of this ability. People and companies with more money can afford to pay more taxes than those with less, and a fair tax code will require them to do so. A dollar lost or gained means much more to someone with a lower income than to someone at the other end of the ladder.

Other forms of taxation are not as fair as the income tax because they aren't related to ability to pay. Consumption, for example, is an inferior alternative to income as a base on which to apply taxes. Under a consumption tax, such as a sales tax, spending would be taxed, but money set aside for saving and investment would not. This would create a very unfair spread of tax payments among people at different income levels and those earning low and moderate incomes would pay a much higher percentage in taxes. The poor have to spend all their income just to buy the basic necessities of life. Middle income wage earners also typically spend a greater part of their income than those with high incomes. Since the affluent can afford to save larger portions of their income, a consumption tax means a large portion of their income escapes taxation.

In recent years, more and more loopholes have been added in an attempt to encourage savings and investment. The result is an increasingly unfair tax system.

The expanded capital gains exclusion, excessive depreciation writeoffs and numerous opportunities to exclude savings and investment income have contributed to capital's increasing escape from taxation. The investment tax credit, the gimmicks available to U.S. international corporations and the huge rise in depreciation allowances engineered by the Reagan Administration in 1981 have removed a large part of business income from the tax base. These and other loopholes, preferences, shelters, and gimmicks have led to expanded tax favors for business and the affluent, and a further departure from the goal of a tax system based on ability to pay.

The tax system must raise revenue

The current tax system, with its many preferences for business and the rich, doesn't raise the revenues that the United States needs to carry out the functions of government and meet the needs of its people. One need only look at this Administration's federal budget deficit, now heading for uncharted territory beyond the $200 billion annual level, to get a sense of the tax code's inability to provide adequate money.

The tax cuts that the Reagan Administration pushed through Congress in 1981 are the biggest single source of the deficit. More than threefourths of the 1986 deficit will come from the 1981 law, even after factoring in the tax increases legislated since 1981.

These deficits kept interest rates abnormally high for years, and caused foreign capital inflows, an expensive overvalued dollar, a huge trade imbalance and a fragile, uncertain economy. In addition, the tax shortfall added huge sums to the federal government's outstanding debt. By 1986 the Reagan Administration will have more than doubled the national debt since it took office, adding one trillion dollars in just six years.

Because of the steep rise in both public and private borrowing from abroad, the U.S. is now a net debtor to the rest of the world for the first time since 1914. Thus, the 1981 tax cut has placed a heavy burden on U.S. citizens in future years, because these borrowings will have to be repaid through lower living standards and higher taxes in the future.

The President's tax reform plan will cause higher deficits

The President's tax reform proposal, however, would do nothing to raise more money or lower the deficit. Quite the contrary. Some loopholes are closed but any additional money is diverted to pay for other cuts in tax for individuals and business which generally favor the wealthy.

The President's proposal, despite the claim of revenue neutrality, will actually lose revenue and widen the already horrendous budget deficits. A quick examination of the Administration's own numbers reveals that revenues are going to decline when the proposed changes are fully effective. The Administration estimates that individual tax receipts will be 7 percent lower and corporate tax collections will be 9 percent higher when the tax plan is completely in place. But total corporate revenues are just one-fifth the size of individual tax receipts. This means that the Administration's tax proposal will cause a 4 percent drop in revenues from the woefully inadequate levels the current tax law will raise.

Recent estimates by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) indicate that the proposal will lose far more revenues than the Administration claims. The CBO projects lower economic growth, higher inflation, and a different mix between investment in plant and equipment. It concludes that revenues will be $35 billion lower on a cumulative basis than under current tax law during the 1986-1990 period, and as much as $19 billion lower annually beyond 1990.

Key features of the President's tax proposal

In November 1984, the Treasury issued a set of recommendations that included many of the measures needed to achieve a fair and comprehensive tax structure. Six months later, the Admininistration endorsed a proposal that represented a substantial amount of backsliding from the original Treasury plan —particularly in the business tax area. And even the critically important proposal to help the working poor is done in a fashion that provides windfall tax breaks to the wealthy.

The Administration would increase the personal exemption to $2,000 per person. A rise in the personal exemption, however, provides larger tax reductions to the well-to-do because the value of the exemption rises with the individual's marginal tax rate. To an affluent household in the 35 percent bracket, the increase in the exemption from $1,080 to $2,000 provides a $322 reduction in taxes. This is because 35 cents in taxes would have been paid on each dollar of the $920 increase in the exemption.

A high-income couple in this bracket would thus get a $644 tax cut. In contrast, a person in the bottom 15 percent bracket gets only 15 cents for each dollar of the increased exemption, or $138. A low-income couple in the 15 percent bracket would receive only $276—less than half as much as the high-income couple. This is an unfair and costly diversion of federal revenue.

The rich get more under Reagan's plan

The President's 1985 tax proposal continues this Administration's tradition of giving special treatment to the people at the pinnacle of wealth and power. The cut in the top rate from 50 percent to 35 percent gives individuals with high incomes huge tax reductions compared to those with moderate incomes. Similarly, income from wealth is taxed lightly by the Reagan plan. The handling of capital gains typifies the Administration's approach. A capital gain is basically the profit on the sale of an investment asset and under current law 60 percent of such profits are completely exempt from income tax. The Administration would change the exclusion to 50 percent but at the same time, by reducing the top tax rate to 35 percent, the effective tax on capital gains would be reduced from 20 percent to 17.5 percent.

The capital gains provision is one of the most unfair in the tax code because it showers money on the wealthy. The richest 5 percent get 60 percent of its benefits and the key to many tax shelter operations and avoidance schemes is to convert fully taxable ''ordinary income'' into preferentially taxed capital gains.

The President's proposal gives a shockingly disproportionate drop in taxes to the rich. There are fewer than 500,000 taxpayers with incomes of $200,000 and up, and they represent only onehalf of one percent of all taxpayers. But this group gets more than $4 billion or 25 percent of the $18 billion cut in individual taxes in Reagan's proposal. The average cut in this income range is $10,000, while families in the moderate to middle income groups from $20,000 to $50,000 get only $150 to $190 dollars on average. (See Table 1.)

Broad averages don't tell the whole story of the unfair pattern of effects on individuals. The lack of fairness in the plan can be traced to a number of the President's proposals to change the way individuals are taxed. Those that are especially objectionable include the sharp drop in individual tax rates, the proposal to change the child care credit to a deduction; the inclusion of employer health contributions in taxable income; the taxation of workers compensation, unemployment insurance, and black lung payments; the termination of state and local tax deductions, and the extra burden placed on working spouses by the removal of the second earner deduction.

The President's plan will hurt many low- and middle-income families

The Administration proposes to make many changes in the way individuals are taxed. These proposals don't add up to a net improvement. The goals of tax reform include fairness and simplicity. Equals should be treated equally, and the privileged status of certain forms of income, like capital gains, should be eliminated. The President's plan does not consistently move toward any of these goals. Instead, the proposal arbitrarily picks and chooses from many different provisions in current tax law and rearranges tax burdens with no apparent purpose except to cut marginal rates for the wealthy.

Ironically, while the President has characterized his tax proposal as ''pro-family,'' many families will be forced to pay higher taxes. The Administration's concept of the ''typical'' family as a husband, a wife at home and two children is no longer the norm. In fact, two out of three ''median income'' families have two earners and many of these will have to pay more if the President's plan is enacted.

Under the President's plan, two earner families would lose the marriage deduction. This provision currently provides such families with a deduction equal to 10 percent of the income of the spouse with lower earnings, with a maximum deduction of $3,000. Before this deduction was available, a two-earner married couple in many cases paid higher taxes than two single individuals with the same total income. The Administration's proposal would re-establish the ''marriage-penalty'' that was formerly in the tax system and directly affects working people.

Several other features of the Administration proposal also would hurt working families. The President plans to end deductions for state and local tax payments and change the child care credit to a deduction. These proposals hit at many middle-income working families, and their effects compound. Two-earner families who bought a house in the recent years of high interest rates and inflated housing costs will be hit especially hard by Reagan's proposals. For example, a twoearner married couple with one child and earning the moderate annual income of $35,000 very likely will have to pay at least 25 percent more in taxes if the Administration's plan goes into effect. Under Reagan's proposal, two-earner families and single parent families typically will suffer tax increases throughout the broad middle-income range.

These people are not taking advantage of abusive tax shelters nor are they unfairly or dishonestly evading taxes. Rather, they have been paying their fair share according to the law, and now they are being unfairly singled out for higher taxes in Reagan's tax overhaul.

The proposal to change the child care credit to a deduction is another proposal that violates any notion of fairness. Under current law, the credit is targeted to favor lower income workers. A change to a deduction would unfairly favor those with higher incomes. For the same $1,000 spent on child care, for example, a deduction will provide someone in the 35 percent bracket with a $350 tax saving, while those in the 15 percent bracket will receive only $150 in tax reductions. The President's proposal estimates that 40 percent of these child care deductions will be claimed by families with incomes above $50,000. This group accounts for just 18 percent of all taxpayers.

The situation of a single-earner head of household with two children shows how this proposal hurts specific families. Under current law, if such a taxpayer earns $15,000 and spends $4,800 on child care for two children, no federal taxes would be owed after subtracting a child care credit of $1,296. Under President Reagan's plan, however, this taxpayer will have to pay $135 in federal taxes. This example shows that moderate income families can be hurt by the President's proposal. Changing the child care credit to a deduction favors the affluent and penalizes many average and lower income families. It violates basic concepts of fairness.

Worker benefits targeted by the Administration

The proposal would also tax employer paid fringe benefits. Those with health insurance coverage would be taxed on the first $10 of the employer's monthly payment for individual coverage, and the first $25 of employer-paid family health insurance premiums.

Most other advanced nations recognize that health insurance is fundamental to a fair and compassionate society and publicly finance health care with general revenues. The United States has chosen, to date, to avoid a national health program, and to provide health care through a system of tax deductions for employers and tax exemptions for the employees. To qualify for tax exemptions the benefit plans must comply with stringent rules and prohibit discrimination in favor of higher income employees and owners of the company and generally ensure that the intent of the law is served. Thus, this is not a tax gimmick that benefits only an elite few or a narrow "special interest" group. There are 140 million people who now have job-related health care.

The proposals to tax unemployment insurance benefits, workers' compensation and black lung benefits simply heap further hardship on those suffering the loss of employment and the pain of work-related injury, disease, and even death.

Unemployment insurance benefits are already taxed if income exceeds $18,000 for married taxpayers and $12,000 for singles. These benefits average only $119 per week across the nation, and at most replace half of lost wages while many states provide for less. Taxing the meager benefits provided by these programs would add injustice to the hardship their recipients already must bear.

Anti-government campaign extended to states and localities

The President's proposal to end the deduction for state and local income, sales and property taxes has nothing to do with fairness, neutrality, or simplification. Instead, it is a measure with far-reaching harmful implications. Those states and localities that choose to do the most to live up to their social and economic responsibilities would be penalized by the President's proposal to subject state and local tax payments to federal taxation. These include those with large numbers of poor people, high public capital stock requirements, dense populations, high proportions of school age children, and crime.

Eliminating the deductibility of state and local taxes will initially affect middle- and upper-income itemizers. But over time all would suffer as support for essential programs diminishes and it becomes increasingly difficult to raise funds for public improvements.

Federal deductibility also helps to blunt some of the adverse effects of interstate and intrastate tax differences and destructive tax-cut competition to attract or keep businesses. This competition shifts jobs and business activity around, but generates no net rise in jobs or productive economic activity. It does, however, diminish the ability of states and localities to pay for social and economic programs. The important role of public investment in education, social needs, and in such capital facilities as roads, bridges and water systems is too often completely ignored. These public investments play a central role in economic growth, and their reduction will limit productivity and hinder economic advancement.

The Administration is relying on the termination of deductibility for the revenues to help pay for tax rate cuts, for backtracking from the Treasury's fall proposals on depreciation, capital gains, oil and gas loopholes, and for retaining other preferences. Cutting back depreciation allowances less than Treasury proposed to do last November will lose $60 billion in federal revenues. Taking away deductions for state and local taxes will generate $40 billion in 1990.

Above all, ending state and local tax deductibility would substantially undermine the ability of the states and localities to raise revenues at a time when the federal government's financial policies are forcing terminations and cutbacks in aid programs. For five years this Administration has promoted the concept of "new federalism" to shift responsibilities to the states. Those states that have done the most to meet their responsibilities would be punished and their tax revenues eroded under the President's proposal.

One of the most divisive notions is that people in low-tax states subsidize those in high-tax states. This ignores that the United States is one nation. Flows of people, problems, tax receipts, and government funds cannot each be viewed separately. Ultimately this divisive rhetoric risks tearing apart the federal system.

Tax shelter opportunities remain

While many families with moderate incomes would pay higher taxes under the Administration's plan, the highest income individuals again would receive preferential treatment. Since 1981, this Administration has cut the top rate from 70 percent down to 50 percent and now to a proposed 35 percent. The top capital gains rate would be only 17.5 percent, compared to 20 percent under current law and 28 percent before 1981. Profits from sales of capital assets should be taxed no differently than workers' earnings. The capital gains exclusion is one of the most unfair preferences in the tax code and should be eliminated, not expanded.

In addition, the Administration's plan is not as hard on tax shelters as the Treasury's fall proposal. While the Administration does try to curtail tax shelters, large partnerships established to shelter income will still be allowed. The Treasury had proposed to clamp down on such shelter operations by taxing them as corporations. This would have ended the abuse of using limited partnerships as a device to pass through tax benefits to investors trying to shelter income.

The excessive allowances for depreciation and the special and highly costly treatment provided to the oil and gas industry are just two of the numerous vehicles for tax avoidance which the Administration would keep as part of the tax code.

Loopholes have reduced business tax receipts

On the corporate side, the Administration's proposal candidly acknowledges the need to scale back some of the excesses of the 1981 corporate tax cuts. But it doesn't go far enough.

The business tax share has been on a steep downward trend since the mid-1950's when corporate income taxes represented one-fourth of federal receipts. Last year, when profits were booming, corporations paid only 8.5 percent of total receipts.

The law requires corporations to pay a tax of 46 percent on nearly all of their income. Because of the corporate preferences in the tax law, however, many big corporations such as General Electric, Boeing, and Dow Chemical pay no taxes. In an analysis of annual reports and Securities & Exchange Commission filings, the Citizens for Tax Justice found that, in the 1981-1983 period, 250 of the nation's largest corporations paid an overall federal income tax rate of only 14.1 percent on domestic profits totalling $291.4 billion. Of these companies, 17 paid no federal income taxes whatsoever during these three years, 65 companies paid an average of zero or less over the three years, and 128 paid zero or less in taxes in at least one of the three years (The Failure of Corporate Tax Incentives, Citizens for Tax Justice, Washington, D.C., 1984).

The oil and gas industry receives particularly lucrative concessions from the tax code, and in 1984 had an average tax rate of only 8.4 percent. Many other industries reduced their effective tax rates far below the 46 percent statutory rate. In 1984, for example, the chemicals and plastics industry paid 6.7 percent, nonelectrical machinery paid 5.4 percent, and the telecommunication industry averaged a negative tax rate of –12.0 percent. The vast majority of industries, 24 out of 31, had effective tax rates below one-half of the statutory rate (Business Week, June 10, 1985, pp. 96-99).

Reagan proposes to end Investment Tax Credit

The huge gaps between statutory and effective tax rates have been opened up by the many deductions, exemptions and credits that have been inserted in the law over the years. Among the numerous tax preferences available to corporations, the two that lose the most revenues are the Investment Tax Credit and the Accelerated Cost Recovery System. The 1981 tax law established the ACRS system and made the ITC even more generous.

In the year they acquire machinery or equipment, the investment tax credit allows companies a onetime deduction from the taxes they owe. For most equipment, the credit is 10 percent. This is equivalent to the federal government paying for 10 percent of the cost of the company's equipment. The ITC will give corporations $20 billion in such subsidies in fiscal year 1987, and $57 billion in 1990. The President has properly slated the ITC for elimination.

Depreciation still excessive in Administration plan

The Accelerated Cost Recovery System is the other huge tax subsidy available to corporations. The ACRS was enacted as part of the Economic Recovery Tax Act of 1981. It established excessively generous provisions for depreciating the cost of business machinery, equipment, and structures. The excessive revenue loss caused by ACRS in combination with the investment tax credit is compounded by the current provision permitting corporations to take the tax credit and also deduct one-half of it as depreciation allowances. This doubledipping is unfair, has no economic justification, and generates further leakage from corporate tax receipts.

Before 1981, depreciation periods were based generally on the number of years that an asset was actually useful in producing income—its "useful life." One reason for the ACRS was as a response to the contention that depreciation allowances based on actual cost provided inadequate funds for replacement during periods of inflation. This argument ignores, however, the gains of business as a result of inflation's driving down the burden of business debt, which offset the effect of price increases on depreciation allowances. Ironically, under ACRS depreciation allowances were not related either to the actual useful life of capital or to the rate of inflation. In 1990 ACRS will cost the federal Treasury $60 billion more than if the system were based on economic depreciation with indexing for inflation.

Unfortunately, the Administration's plan doesn't reduce the overly rapid writeoffs for depreciation or close corporate tax loopholes. Writeoff periods are longer than those in the current Accelerated Cost Recovery System, but remain shorter than the period over which the plant or equipment can actually be used. In addition, the President proposes to index capital for inflation, and when this raises depreciation allowances in future years the plan will be even more lucrative for corporations than the current ACRS provisions.

Tax cuts don't boost investment

These corporate tax concessions were sold to the Congress and the public as so-called investment incentives. In 1981, the AFL-CIO pointed out that such loopholes reward firms for investment they would undertake anyway. Most of the tax largesse showered on corporations has not been used for net increases in U.S. investment, but for mergers, takeovers, speculation, overseas investment, managerial compensation, and dividends.

In reality, investment had not fallen off during the 1970s. For example, the ratio of business investment to GNP averaged 10.5 percent in the 1970s, while this ratio averaged 9.8 percent during the 1960s.

After the enactment of the 1981 tax law with its huge gifts of public funds to corporations, real business investment dropped for two years. It rebounded as the economy came out of the deep Reagan recession. But by the first quarter of this year, the growth rate dropped below zero again. So there has been no long-lasting boost to business investment, despite the $65 billion the ACRS and ITC will cost the public this year.

Historically, tax cuts have not led to increased investment. For example, the ratio of investment to GNP has not fluctuated when effective tax rates on business investment changed. Rather, investment activity has corresponded to the swings in general economic activity. When the economy was strong, investment typically was also strong.

From the perspective of individual company, the decision to buy new machinery or build additional plant is influenced by sales prospects and the need for capacity, not by the availability of tax largesse. In The Failure of Corporate Tax Incentives, the Citizens for Tax Justice demonstrated that those companies which received greater tax benefits from the ACRS and ITC provisions actually invested less than firms that paid higher taxes. Similarly, Robert Eisner, a well known specialist in public finance at Northwestern University, in a study using several large-scale models of the U.S. economy on behalf of the Treasury Department, found that each dollar of depreciation deductions would produce only about 40 cents in added investment.

Thus, the link between tax policy and investment is very weak. Further, the contribution of business investment to the ultimate goal of raising productivity—and thus improving the nation's living standards—is also very small. Three major efforts at accounting for the sources of productivity growth all conclude that the productivity slowdown of the 1970s had little to do with business investment. The most detailed comprehensive study concluded that private business investment accounts for about 0.15 percent of each 1 percent of economic growth. (Edward F. Denison, Accounting for Slower Economic Growth: The United States in the 1970s, Washington, D.C.: The Brookings Institution, 1979.) Similarly, another recent study demonstrated that of the 2.1 percent drop in labor productivity growth between the 1948-1967 and the 1973-1980 period, only 0.1 to 0.2 percent stemmed from shifts in the ratio of capital to labor. (Barry Bosworth, Tax Incentives and Economic Growth, Washington, D.C., the Brookings Institution, 1984.) A third examination, conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which focused on trends in productivity beginning in 1948, revealed that the capital-labor ratio explained only 0.2 percent of the 1.9 percent decline in business sector productivity growth between the 1948-1973 and 1973-1981 sub-periods. (U.S. Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics, Trends in Multifactor Productivity, 1948-81, Bulletin 2178, Washington, D.C., U.S. Government Printing Office.)

These studies demonstrate that business investment in plant, machinery and equipment has only a slight influence on economic growth. They point out that tax policy not only has weak effects on investment, but that such investment has a minimal role in economic growth. In contrast, investments in education, training, and health and in such public capital facilities as highways, bridges, and water systems, account for a significant part of economic growth.

There is no justification for all the tax benefits given to corporations. Such tax gimmicks haven't raised the nation's growth potential, and should be eliminated. Instead, the corporate tax should be used to raise needed revenues and to make the tax structure more fair.

Corporate rate cuts and indexing will lose revenues

The President's plan includes revenue estimates that show a gain of $21 billion in 1990 from depreciation changes. But these estimates don't show what happens after 1990 when the effect of indexing capital investment really begins to add up. Further, a large part of the revenue gain through 1990 comes from a separate recapture provision. This provision would tax a portion of the unanticipated gain that those corporations which have made investments since 1981 get from the proposed drop in corporate tax rates. Tax payments on those investments were deferred by writing off much of the costs in the early years of their lives, as provided by the ACRS. The drop in the corporate tax rate will result in deferred taxes being paid at an unexpectedly low rate. The President's plan would recapture this windfall, but the recapture phases out by 1990. After that, the depreciation proposal's indexing features will give companies huge tax benefits.

The Administration would reduce the corporate tax rate from 46 percent to 33 percent. Corporations already are not paying their fair share, and this would cause the further erosion of business tax receipts. After a few years, the Administration's proposal to index capital for inflation will reduce the corporate tax base, and the lower tax rate would apply to the reduced base. Each one percent drop in the corporate rate will lose $2 to $3 billion in federal revenues.

The Administration proposes to reduce the corporate tax base even further by permitting companies to deduct 10 percent of their dividend payments. The corporate tax base should be increased, not reduced, in order to raise revenues and make the overall pattern of federal taxation more fair. Taxation of dividends has made the spread of tax burdens somewhat more fair because most dividends flow to higher income groups. The Administration's proposal would diminish corporate tax receipts and merely make it cheaper for businesses to make dividend payouts that they would have made anyway.

Reagan preserves tax breaks for moving jobs abroad

The tax code currently includes costly provisions that encourage companies to locate facilities overseas rather than in the United States. These provisions cost the nation jobs and billions in lost tax receipts. One of these provisions is the deferral privilege which allows multinational corporations to postpone U.S. income tax payments on the earnings of their foreign subsidiaries until such profits are brought home. Frequently, these profits are never returned. About $400 million in revenues will be lost in 1986 through this provision. The Administration has no plans to curtail deferral.

The foreign tax credit is a second tax provision that induces U.S. companies to move abroad. It gives a multinational company a dollar-for-dollar credit for foreign tax payments against its U.S. tax liabilities. In contrast, state taxes and other costs of business can only be deducted from corporate income. Replacing the credit with a deduction could raise as much as $10 billion a year in additional revenues. The Administration proposes merely a partial solution in the form of a per country limit. The amount of tax paid to a country that can be credited against U.S. taxes will be limited to the U.S. tax on income from that country. Instead of such a per country limit, the foreign credit should be terminated and replaced with a deduction, thereby raising additional federal revenues and removing this incentive to locate production and jobs overseas.

Oil and gas industry still favored

Most other wasteful corporate tax preferences would be left largely intact by the Administration. The oil and gas industry has been the recipient of some of the largest tax giveaways. Under current law, the industry is singled out for advantageous treatment by two terribly wasteful provisions. The first is known as percentage depletion. This is a method of deducting the cost of investment in oil, gas and other mineral properties. Unlike ordinary depreciation methods, percentage depletion allows a deduction based on a percentage of the income (i.e., sales) from the property and permits a taxpayer to continue claiming these deductions indefinitely. As a result, the deductions are typically greater than the taxpayer's actual investment. Percentage depletion is, therefore, properly viewed as a subsidy rather than a cost recovery method. Under current law, independent producers and royalty owners can claim percentage depletion on production up to 1,000 barrels of crude a day. The Administration proposes to restrict the availability of percentage depletion to "stripper" wells producing less than 10 barrels per day owned by independent producers.

The second major oil and gas related tax loophole applies to the immediate writeoff of intangible drilling costs. These costs include amounts paid for labor, fuel, materials, technical services, site preparation costs, and transportation costs. Current law allows oil and gas firms a choice of deducting these costs over time or writing them off immediately. The purchase of the labor, materials and services associated with developing an asset that will be used for many years should be deducted over the life of the asset. The option to expense these costs gives the oil and gas industry excessive and unwarranted special treatment that doesn't apply to other firms and industries.

In a major reversal from the Treasury's initial position last fall, the Administration now plans to retain the option to expense intangible drilling costs.

Reforming the President's tax reform proposal

The President's tax reform proposal does not add up to the major overhaul necessary to achieve tax justice, nor does it improve the ability of the nation's tax system to raise revenue which was damaged terribly by the 1981 tax law. The legacy of the 1981 tax cut is a huge federal deficit, diminished equity, a weaker economy, and the government's inability to advance the nation's well-being.

Under this Administration's initiatives, the tax code has fallen further short of the standard of fairness based on ability to pay. The rich and businesses have consistently received preferential tax treatment from President Reagan's tax initiatives. The President's new tax proposal continues this pattern, and will make the tax system more unfair. Again, those at the highest income levels will get bigger cuts, while many moderate income families will actually have to pay higher taxes. Similarly, corporations will continue to pay less than their fair share under this plan.

In contrast to much of the Administration's tax plan, the AFL-CIO's proposals are aimed at achieving a fundamentally fair tax system. Adequate revenue is an urgent national priority and reform efforts must produce a tax code that is more equitable than the President's proposal and capable of producing adequate revenue.

Kirkland Asks Real Tax Reform

By Lane Kirkland

We believe Americans have a special interest in a fair tax structure and that our citizens deserve—and seek—both tax reform and tax simplification. Unfortunately, most Americans are convinced that tax legislation is crafted by special interests other than their own and that avoidance and evasion is the name of the game.

This committee has the opportunity to develop a more simple, understandable and equitable tax code. The AFL-CIO will fully support such an effort.

The President's tax proposal claims to meet these objectives and a number of its features have merit. The AFL-CIO emphatically endorses, for example, the provisions taking most poor Americans off the tax rolls.

As a package, however, the President's proposal does not add up to the major overhaul needed to establish fairness and end the preferential treatment given wealthy individuals, stock and real estate speculators, oil and gas developers, and corporations.

We believe knowledge of these flaws and weaknesses has become widespread and we hope the Congress will act decisively to improve the package along the lines that we will set forth in order to assure real tax reform.

Today, the federal income tax structure rests on a double standard that unfairly discriminates against one form of income—wages and salaries—in favor of unearned income, which can be sheltered through phantom deductions, capital-gains exemptions, phony losses and overseas investments. By contrast, working men and women, who pay the lion's share of taxes, meet their income tax obligations in full every payday.

In our view the key test of a tax-reform proposal is the extent to which it diminishes unfairness toward people who work for their money and eliminates favoritism toward people whose money works for them.

By that test, much of the President's program falls short.

A tax structure founded on the principle of ability to pay should never have been allowed to add to the burdens of people living on the edge of impoverishment. While the President's tax proposals are helpful to poor people in the main, many are left out and some would face tax increases. For example, a working mother earning $15,000 per year with two children requiring child care has zero tax liability under present law. Under the President's proposal she could bear a tax burden of $135.

The impact would fall unevenly on middle-income Americans with tax cuts going primarily to non-itemizers while those with deductible expenses will face tax increases. Although this legislation has been offered as a tax cut for most of the people, millions of middle-income Americans will pay higher taxes while the vast majority of wealthy Americans will pay less.

We are pleased that the Administration candidly acknowledges the need to correct some of the excesses of the 1981 corporate tax cuts and recognizes that corporations have been less than forthcoming in funding even a modest share of the nation's public needs.

The corporate tax share has been spiraling down since the mid-1950s, when business taxes financed a full fourth of the federal budget. Last year, when profits were booming, the corporate sector provided only 8.5 percent of federal tax revenues. It's hard to think of anything that does more to undermine taxpayer morale and confidence in government than the knowledge that dozens of giant, profitable corporations pay less in taxes than the lowest-paid employee who punches the timeclock.

So it is unfortunate that the Administration has backed away from some of the more equitable of its earlier recommendations and retained some of its worst.

As this committee knows, the AFL-CIO strongly objects to taxing certain employer-paid benefits. We are pleased that the Administration's proposal continues the current law provisions applying to employer-paid legal, education, group life insurance and child care plans. However, we remain firm in the conviction that employer-funded health insurance should not be considered income subject to tax.

Most other industrial nations recognize health care as fundamental to a progressive, compassionate society and have chosen to fund such programs publicly through the direct support of general revenues. The U.S. has chosen, to date, to avoid a national health program and has chosen instead to meet its health care needs through a tightly administered system of tax deduction for the employer and tax exemption for the employee. Since 140 million people now have job-related health care, this is not a tax gimmick that benefits only an elite few or a narrow "special interest" group. We strongly fear that to tax these benefits is to begin the erosion of an established social policy without consideration of any alternative.

As for the taxation of unemployment benefits, worker compensation and black lung benefits, such a proposal would simply heap further burdens on those suffering the loss of employment and the pain of work-related injury, disease, and even death.

Unemployment insurance benefits, which average only $119 per week across the nation, are already subject to taxation if income exceeds $18,000 for married taxpayers and $12,000 for singles. At most, unemployment compensation replaces half of lost wages while many states provide far less.

Taxing the meager benefits provided under these programs adds injustice to hardship and indignity.

One feature of the Administration's proposal is especially perplexing and objectionable: the attempt to do away with the deduction for state and local income, sales, and property taxes. This proposal has nothing to do with fairness, tax neutrality, or tax simplification. Rather it is a measure which will have far-reaching detrimental effects on many communities. The most severely hurt will be those states and localities that most conscientiously live up to their public responsibilities or that have populations larger, older, poorer or more disadvantaged than the average.

Federal deductibility also serves as a device which blunts interstate and intrastate tax differences. Doing away with this deduction would make economic competition within and among states more severe.

Above all, this proposal would substantially undermine the ability of the states and localities to raise revenues at a time when the federal government's financial policies are forcing terminations and cutbacks in programs of aid. For five years this Administration has built upon the concept of "new federalism" to shift responsibilities to the states. The states that have tried hardest to meet these responsibilities would be penalized and their tax base eroded under the Reagan proposal.

The recommendation to end the second-earner deduction is another anti-worker proposal that is in direct conflict with the President's avowed pro-family sentiments.

Eliminating this deduction recreates the marriage penalty and targets a particular group—working families—for tax increases. Moreover, in conjunction with other proposals in the President's package, this move would result in substantial tax increases for many young, small working families who have been particularly affected by high interest rates and inflated housing costs.

The proposal ignores the changing nature of American families. The Administration's concept of the "traditional" American family no longer applies. Two-earner families are rapidly becoming the national norm. In 46 percent of the families with children under age six, both parents are working; 67 percent of the mothers of preschool children are members of the labor force. Under the President's plan, two-earner families would lose the marriage deduction and they, and single-parent families, would lose the child care credit and the deduction for taxes on their home. A working couple with one child, buying a home on a $35,000 income, could expect a tax increase of more than 20 percent.

The steps that are needed to create an equitable tax measure cannot be taken within the confines of the three parameters established by the Administration in this bill: revenue neutrality, drastic cuts in tax rates on the wealthy, and a small shift in the distribution of tax burdens between corporations and individuals. To achieve true tax fairness this package of constraints must be rejected.

The Administration originally projected a five-year revenue loss totalling less than $12 billion under its program. Since then, however, the Treasury, Congressional Budget Office and several private analysts have predicted far greater costs. The budget cuts that the citizens of the United States have had to endure in the past few years and the continued high deficits do not permit any further revenue leakage through the tax code. It would be the height of irony if the tax cut for those with $200,000 incomes were paid for by a cut in retirees' social security COLA.

The AFL-CIO would like to suggest ways in which the committee can shape a tax reform package that will move more decisively toward tax justice without the revenue loss of the President's proposal and without increasing the taxes of the vast majority of Americans. To bring true fairness in the overall package, we recommend changes on both the corporate and individual sides of the ledger.

A fundamental factor in constructing a balanced and equitable tax system is to ensure that corporations pay their share of the tax burden. The 1981 corporate tax cuts generated enormous revenue losses, created a new industry around the buying, selling and leasing of tax writeoffs and opened gaping inequities among companies and industries and between individuals and corporations.

The President's tax proposal picks and chooses from a vast array of preferences, keeping some business subsidies and eliminating others. The result is not tax neutrality, but a continued distortion of economic and business decision-making. This action invites the kind of manipulations that have brought the current system into disrepute.

Moreover, although the Administration claims corporate tax revenue will increase over the next five years, a Congressional Budget Office study concluded: "...the general corporate provisions included in the President's tax plan (depreciation rule changes, the Investment Tax Credits, the corporate rate cut, and the partial dividend deduction) will probably reduce the tax burden on income earned in the corporate sector in the long run."

We urge the committee to take the following steps:

• Reject the deep cut in the corporate tax rate. There is no justification for slashing corporate tax rates by nearly one-third. Each percentage-point cut in the corporate rate from the present 46 percent to the proposed 33 percent costs the Treasury $2 to 3 billion yearly in revenue.

• Strengthen the corporate minimum tax. After many years of open scandal over the fact that major corporations whose profits total billions of dollars pay little or no taxes, bills have been introduced in both houses of Congress calling for a corporate minimum tax. Such a tax could raise as much as $23 billion in revenues over the next two years, while the President's proposal raises less than one billion dollars.

• Curb tax privileges of the oil and gas industry. The Treasury's November recommendation would have trimmed many unnecessary special preferences for the oil and gas industry increasing revenues by nearly $10 billion per year. The President's proposal trims oil tax reform to one-tenth of that amount.

• Establish a depreciation system that realistically reflects the costs and useful life of capital assets. The original Treasury proposal would have scrapped the 1981 accelerated cost recovery system (ACRS). The current proposal stretches out depreciation timetables to a lesser degree than the November proposal and includes basically a one-shot effort to prevent windfall tax benefits that would result from the combination of drastic rate reductions and previous depreciation schedules. The November Treasury proposal would raise $81 billion through depreciation reform in 1990 while the current proposal would raise only $21 billion.

• Change the foreign tax credit. While we support the President's proposal to restrict this subsidy to offshore production, we believe that additional measures are appropriate. According to IRS figures, in 1982 U.S. corporations claimed foreign tax credits in excess of $19 billion. We believe there is no reason to subsidize U.S. firms to invest and produce overseas. Foreign taxes should be considered as a cost of doing business exactly like state and local taxes and should, therefore, take the form of deductions, not dollar-for-dollar credits. Shifting from a credit to a deduction could recover as much as $10 billion a year in taxes.

• Reject the Administration's proposal for a 10 percent deduction for corporate dividends. This provision would merely provide this nation's corporations with roughly a $6 billion windfall tax break for doing something that they would do in any event: distribute dividends to their shareholders.

• Use this opportunity to end the tax incentives for hostile takeovers and mergers. The current wave of corporate takeovers does serious injury to workers, customers and the community in which the target company is located. Workers and their communities too often finance the costs of the raid by job losses or pay cuts that cripple or destroy Main Street. The tax code in many cases abets this travesty, and the committee should remove all corporate takeover tax incentives.

We urge the committee also to take these steps with regard to individuals.

• Scale back the sharp reduction in rates for highest income individuals. This Administration's tax proposals have consistently favored the wealthy. Since it took office the top rate has dropped from 70 percent down to 50 percent and now to a proposed 35 percent with a top capital gains tax rate of only 17.5 percent. The President's own figures show that individuals with incomes of $200,000 and up—a group representing one-half of one percent of the nation's taypayers —will receive over $4 billion of the tax savings. He proposes that this group receive 25 percent of the tax reduction, or an average of $10,000 each. This is another unfair reward to the wealthy. The 1981 tax bill gave large cuts to wealthy individuals. We urge the committee to establish additional brackets to redress this inequity.

• Consider paring the advantage given to high-income individuals through the proposal to increase the personal exemption. The President's plan relies heavily on increases in the personal exemption to remove the poor from the tax rolls and offset the removal of many middle class deductions and exclusions. The value of the personal exemption, however, is considerably higher for wealthy individuals. A fairer system would ensure that the personal exemption is worth the same to all individuals regardless of income.

While the Administration plan makes some attempts to reduce the availability of tax shelters, it leaves many shelter opportunities intact. For example, it drops the provision in the earlier proposal to tax large partnerships (those with more than 35 partners) as the corporations they are in all but name. Instead, the current proposal preserves the main device of tax shelter promoters—use of limited partnerships to pass through tax benefits to tax-motivated investors. This provision means that if there is a tax abuse to be enjoyed—and the over-generous rules for depreciation, oil and capital gains insure that there will be—there will be a way clever promoters can market and exploit it.

• Establish an effective individual minimum tax. In order to ensure fairness, the imposition of a minimum individual tax is necessary. Bills have been introduced to create such a tax that could raise $12 billion in 1986 and 1987 alone. The Administration's proposal on the other hand would raise only one-thirtieth of that amount over the same time period.

• End the preferential treatment for capital gains. The capital gains preferences are the most complicating features of the tax code and contribute most to the double standard which exists between earned and unearned income. Even though the President has proposed a modest reduction in the amount of capital gains that can be excluded from taxation (from 60 percent to 50 percent) the effective tax rate on capital gains would actually be reduced for the wealthy taxpayers because of the tax rate reductions. We believe this is in direct contradiction to the concept of tax fairness. Ending this exclusion and taxing capital gains in the same manner as earned income could raise over $10 billion each year, even with the President's proposed slashing of the top tax rate.

• Reenact the 1982 provision to require tax withholding on interest and dividends.

• Reject the President's attempt to reduce employee job-related deductions. The imposition of a threshold on employee work-related expenses and other miscellaneous deductions will force individuals to add up a host of minor and major expenses to see if they meet the test for deductibility. This is hardly tax simplification; it complicates the tax filing process and directly burdens working people. It would eliminate such deductions as protective clothing, tools and union dues for many workers.

• Carefully review the pension provisions. In general it appears that the Administration's proposals go in the direction of appropriate restrictions in order to prevent misuse and excessive benefits to higher paid employees. However, some of the rules concerning lump-sum distributions and early retirement pensions—income averaging and excise taxes—could adversely affect working people. We also believe the abuses of present law in the employee leasing area must be corrected.

In addition, we believe that the committee must not turn its back on the federal financing of Presidential elections, as the President proposes under the guise of simplification. This proposal has no revenue effect and involves only one line on the tax form. The suggested repeal represents nothing more than an Administration attempt to impose its ideology without the hearings and debate that preceded Congressional enactment of the federal financing law. We also oppose the elimination of the tax credit for political contributions.

Over the years, the American labor movement has given a great deal of thought and study to the establishment of a fair, balanced and equitable tax system. We believe that such a system can be achieved in this 99th Congress.

We are well aware that there remains much work to be done. The suggestions I have made today are by no means definitive.

In the coming months, as you continue your review of the entire issue of tax reform and tax simplification, the AFL-CIO stands ready to participate in every way we can toward the development of a truly fair and equitable tax plan. We look forward to this effort, and we offer our wholehearted cooperation.

MEDIA, MERGER, MANIA

A 'MODEST PROPOSAL'

By Charles A. Perlik, Jr.

The news industry has always been a business, run by businessmen—and an occasional businesswoman. Today it is in danger of being run—and overrun—by financiers.

To cry alarm over this development does not require us to cast a false glow of nostalgia over either the past or the publishers who inhabited it. Some were notable buccaneers, many were petty tyrants, and most were at least as concerned with the bottom line as the headline. But, for the most part, they had an interest in news, as Henry Ford had an interest in cars, and if someone like William Randolph Hearst appeared, to build a chain and send it down an overtly ideological path, there was no lack of competition to combat it and restrain its influence. That world of yesterday was anything but a perfect news world. But it had its countervailing forces.

Today we face the topography of a far different industry.

Two-thirds of the 1,700-odd daily U.S. newspapers are owned by chains. Even more significant, they control almost 80 percent of daily circulation.

Gannett alone becomes the owner of 88 with its purchase of the Des Moines Register, and Thomson has an equal number. In Canada, concentration is even more dense. Two chains, Southam and Thomson, own almost half of the nation's dailies and control some 60 percent of circulation between them.

That is the background against which the recent wave of industry acquisitions must be assessed.

What is significant here is not just the continued accumulation of newspaper control in a small number of powerful chains, or even the continued concentration of newspaper control in a small number of powerful chains. It is the maturation of a long-growing trend toward cross-media conglomerates—mammoth corporations grinding out newspapers, television and radio broadcasts, and now even films. And with it, inevitably, the entry of the financial wheeler-dealers, prepared to compete with the big chains themselves in takeover attempts, hostile or otherwise, of all these tempting media properties.

What is fueling this unprecedented takeover activity is not just newspapers' immense profitability—that's among the highest of U.S. industries. We've known about that for some time, and so have investors and their analysts. What's new, according to the Morton Research Newsletter, is the discovery that newspapers' ability to generate cash, fueled principally by their local monopoly, gives them a value far exceeding their stock prices. That value is so high that even after a 30-percent increase in newspaper stock prices early this year, they are still considered at least 30 percent undervalued on the stock market.

Teamed with that other fabulous money-generator, television, they are tempting financial packages indeed. So we see Capital Cities paying $3.5 billion for the American Broadcasting Cos. We see Rupert Murdoch joining in a $2-billion purchase of seven Metromedia television stations after buying a $162-million half interest in 20th Century Fox. We see an $825-million price tag placed on the shares of Multimedia Inc. in the course of an outside takeover attempt and an inside leveraged buyout offer.

We see the Tribune Co. paying an incredible $510-million for a single television station, KTLA in Los Angeles, giving it the nation's fourth largest TV broadcast network in terms of revenue. And we see Gannett shelling out $200 million for the Des Moines Register plus a small Tennessee daily and two weeklies.

Where is all of this taking us? There is no better answer than the one given by the staid National Center for Business & Economic Communication at American University. A recent issue of the center's newsletter, noting that the current merger wave is "creating not just newspaper or broadcast chains, but media conglomerates which own major newspapers and broadcast properties and magazines and book publishers and even movie studios," warned:

"Traditional control of journalistic enterprises by journalists, or anyway by former journalists, appears to be slipping away to Wall Street investors and bankers."

The big chains themselves are alarmed and are raising their drawbridges. In the last few months, Gannett, Dow Jones, Knight-Ridder, Belo and the Tribune Co. have all taken extraordinary measures designed to repeal hostile boarders. These measures, which have become known in the industry as "shark repellents," include such steps as the creation of two different levels of voting stock, a requirement of 80-percent shareholder approval of any takeover, and staggered terms for directors.

The Center for Business & Economic Communication is worried that some of these steps violate principles of "corporate democracy." I'm worried that, in the last analysis, they won't work.

The growing threat of an industry dominated by bankers and big investors is troubling enough. But an even more ominous threat, long implicit in media concentration, is now becoming explicit. That danger is the use of these unprecedented concentrations of media power for political propaganda purposes.

We, almost alone, called attention to that danger a half-dozen years ago, when there seemed to be only one small cloud on the horizon—Publisher John McGoff, who it was charged had received a subsidy from the South African government to make his newspapers a South African political instrument.

Now we are witnessing a far more threatening development, the move by Sen. Jesse Helms, North Carolina's political mastodon, to take over CBS and turn it into a sounding board for the far-out right.

Its significance is underlined, again, by the Business & Economic Communication Center, which observes that with the Helms campaign, "the merger mania has brought to light a different kind of First Amendment implication."

"The press is supposed to be politically objective," it notes, "and government regulation requires television and radio to be fair. But the rumors surrounding a possible attempt to take over CBS are politically charged."

Helms has for the moment stepped into the background, while Ted Turner, a notable conservative himself, mounts his own attempt to take over CBS. The degree of Helms's involvement in Turner's foray is still not clear, but it seems certain that if it fails, Helms will be back in full cry with his attempt to transform CBS into the Conservative Broadcasting System.

There are other threats. Rev. Sun Myung Moon's News World Communications has thus far been content to establish newspapers rather than buy them, but its Washington Times is striving for a national audience, and the vast financial resources of the Unification Church are available for more ambitious ventures. This is how News World's president, Bo Hi Pack, described its purpose in a 1984 San Francisco radio interview:

"The media organization we are setting up wants to be utilized as an instrument, an instrument of our cause. . . . The battlefield of the human mind, this is where the battle is fought. So in this war, the entire thing will be mobilized: political means, social means, economical means—and propaganda means. Basically, trying to take over the other person's mind."

Efforts to use the media in this way can be contained, are perhaps even tolerable as long as we are dealing with groups of limited size and influence. But mix the Helms/Moon brand of political ambition with a newspaper chain grown to a third or more of the nation's circulation, mostly in one-newspaper markets, and you have an engine of enormous destructive potential to our democracy.

We already have chains of that size in Canada, and in the United States the two largest chains—Gannett and Knight-Ridder—control close to 14 percent of circulation between them. In an era when chains are acquiring chains, the day of superconcentration may not be as distant as it seems.

As the Business & Economic Communication Center, once again, observed:

"The media do not constitute a concentrated industry yet, but if in years to come communication in this country is concentrated in but a few hands, then the mania will have profound First Amendment implications."

There is still time to act.

Six years ago we urged Congress to fashion a remedy, advanced originally by press analyst Ben Bagdikian: Put a limit on the number of newspapers or the aggregate circulation a single media owner can control.

The U.S. Congress, after an initial flurry of concern over industry concentration, failed to act on this or any other proposal. In Canada, the proposal was taken up by the Kent Commission and, in a modified form, by the Trudeau Government in the proposed Canada Daily Newspaper Act. But it was swamped by a storm of publisher protest, bordering on the hysterical, and withdrawn without being put to a Parliamentary test.

We think that the recent wave of "merger mania" makes it time to revive it, at least in the United States, and among the resolutions before you is a painstakingly crafted one doing just that. If you adopt it, as I hope you will, we will undertake a serious effort to put this issue on the congressional agenda. (The resolution was adopted.)

Monopoly has become the name of the local newspaper game in all but a handful of cities. We had damn well better not let it become a national pastime.

Western Union strikers fight giveback demands

Hollywood, Fla.—Negotiations are continuing between Western Union and the unions representing the company's 7,100 employees who were forced on strike by management's demands for extreme concessions.

Some 6,500 Telegraph Workers struck the company on July 28, shortly after the contracts expired. They were joined on the picket line on July 31 by 600 members of Communications Workers Local 1177, which represents Western Union employees in New York and New Jersey.

UTW President Richard Brockert said shortly before the AFL-CIO News' press-time that negotiations are continuing, "but if we don't reach a settlement by the end of the week, we'll probably pack it up and go home."

Brockert added that a long strike could ruin the company. "That's a real concern and I hope they share it. I think they would lose customers and not get them back. The competition is very keen."

He had high praise for his members. "We got a tremendous strike vote and very few crossed the lines when the company asked them to come back. The members know what shape the company is in and what they are asking for. It's incredibly tough to bargain" these giveback demands.

Job security and severance pay are the key issues in the strike. Management wants to lay off 1,500 to 2,000 workers in the next two years and to cut severence benefits in half. Since 1983, the company has laid off 2,800 workers.

Western Union proposed a two-year contract with a wage freeze and only a 3-percent bonus at the end of the second year. It wants the right to hire part-time workers for a maximum of 1,000 hours per year at $6 an hour, to contract out work and to combine job classifications.

More cutbacks

The company also proposed to raise the workers' health insurance deductibles to $1,500 per year for single coverage and to $3,000 for families. Reduced vacations and a 40-hour workweek for those now working 35 are also being sought as cost-cutting measures.

Workers at Western Union agreed last December to a six-month, 10-percent pay cut to help the company save $10 million. That 10-percent cut has been restored.

Western Union lost $58.4 million in 1984 and $9.7 million in the first quarter of 1985.

Company Chairman Robert S. Leventhal said the company is prepared to let the strike continue "indefinitely" and will do "whatever is necessary to continue operations." The firm has $70 million in cash, which Leventhal said is "adequate" to last out a strike.

The company's 85 offices and three central telephone order centers are being staffed by 2,000 management and temporary workers.

Brockert said a limited staff could not meet the customer demand. "I think they're kidding themselves if they think they can serve the customers with management and any strikebreakers they hire. I don't think they have the expertise."

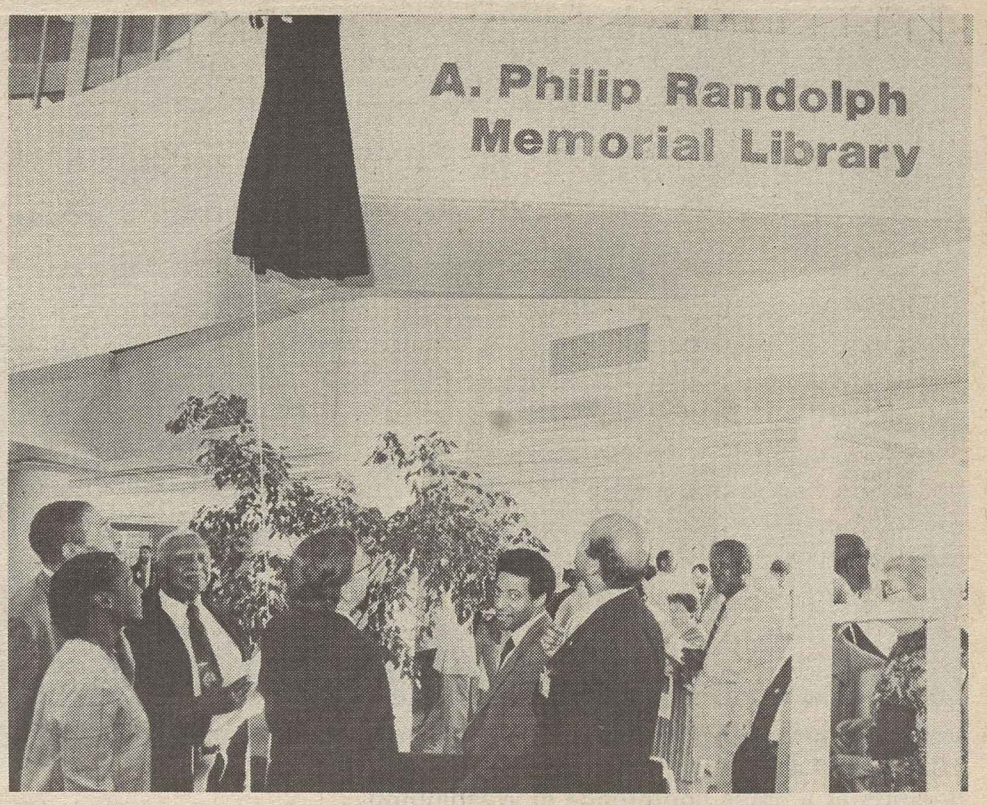
The strikers, who average about $23,000 a year in wages, are clerks, operators and technicians.

CWA President Morton Bahr, in announcing the strike by the 600 members of Local 1177, said the union had continued the contract on a day-to-day basis in an effort to "develop an innovative way to resolve this dispute."

Bahr said CWA had a "realistic" proposal that would have given the company needed concessions, but Western Union insisted on "changes in the contract language that have no bearing on their financial ability."

House panel asks renewal of funds for Job Corps

The Job Corps has been "highly successful" and should be continued, the House Government Operations Committee declared.



It adopted, with bipartisan support, the findings of a subcommittee that the benefits of the program outweight its costs. It termed the Reagan Administration's proposal for abolishing the Job Corps "short sighted and ill-advised."

The Job Corps was established 20 years ago as part of President Johnson's war on poverty and has helped more than one million disadvantaged young people, primarily in residential training centers.

Subcommittee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) said every study of its operations has found the Job Corps to be both cost-effective and successful.

Although it is more costly than non-residential training programs, "no one has proposed a viable alternative," the committee noted. It recommended funding of the program at least at the current level.

The 39-member committee adopted the report with only four of the 16 Republican members dissenting.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland officiates at Manhattan Community College library dedication honoring A. Philip Randolph's achievements.

Scholarship, college library dedicated to Phil Randolph

New York—The Borough of Manhattan Community College dedicated its library July 17 to the memory of labor and civil rights leader A. Philip Randolph.

The college will also establish an annual scholarship in Randolph's name and develop a collection of books on the civil rights movement. A lecture series will focus on labor and the civil rights movement.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who was honored with the college's Distinguished Service medal, gave the dedication speech.

No better way

He told the audience of 200 that "an institution dedicated to the service and betterment of the human race could express its purpose in no better way than to bear the name of A. Philip Randolph."

As the first president of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters, Randolph found in the trade union movement "a vehicle to fight racism, poverty and ignorance," Kirkland said.

Randolph "knew that his country could not achieve freedom or greatness with fear and prejudice, poverty and ignorance in its midst, so he preached solidarity and brotherhood," Kirkland recalled.

He pointed out that Randolph led the fight to prevent communists from taking over the National Negro Congress in the 1930s, led the March on Washington in 1941 which moved President Roosevelt to ban discrimination in the defense industries and the government, and later headed the campaign that resulted in President Truman's desegration of the armed forces.

In 1963, he led the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom that pressured Congress to enact the landmark civil rights legislation of the 1960s.

Randolph in 1957 became the first black AFL-CIO vice president and three years later formed the American Negro Labor Council to fight discrimination within the labor movement.

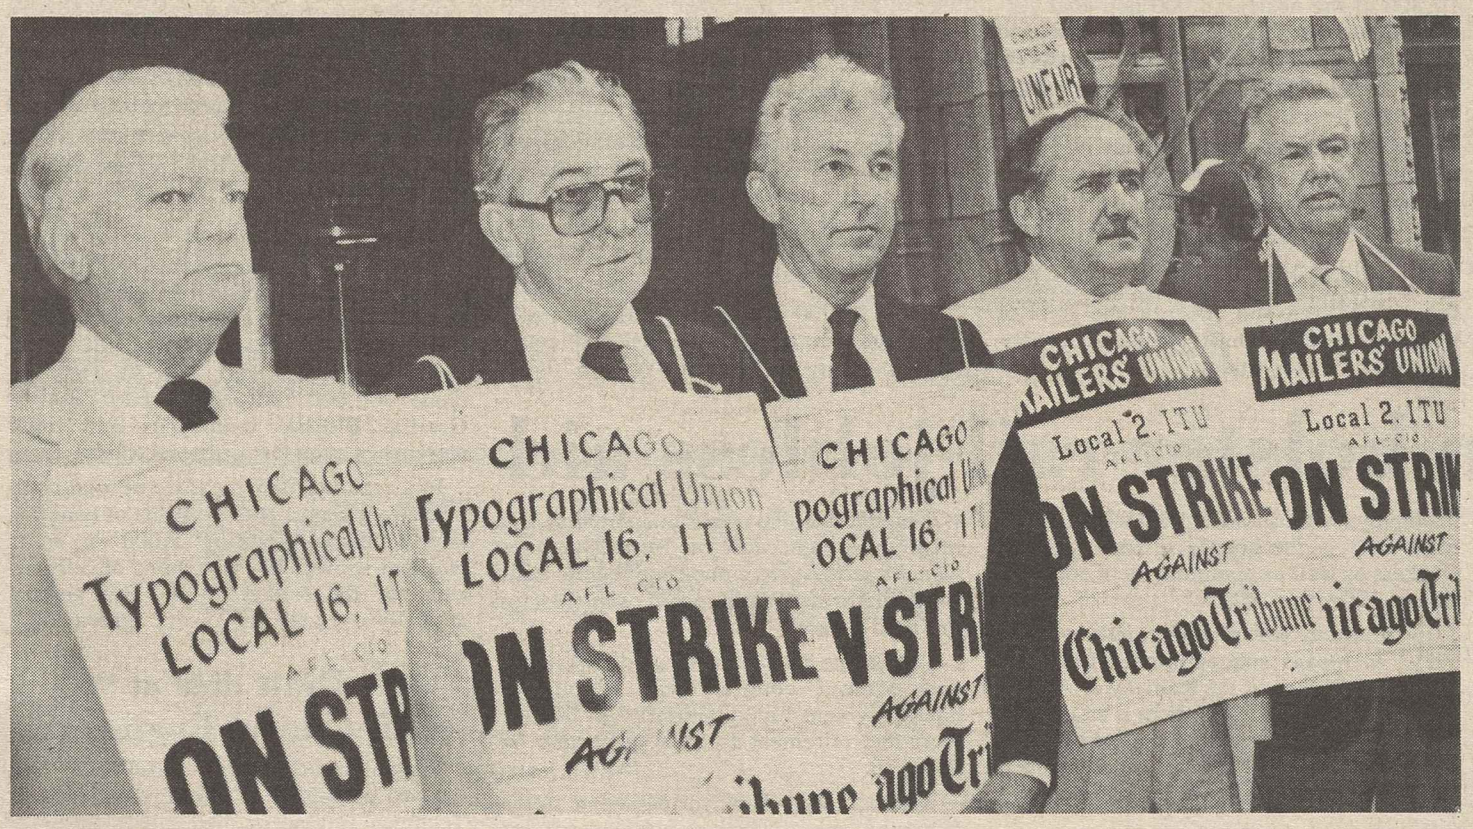
Until his death in 1979 at age 90, Randolph firmly believed that through unions and solidarity, social injustices could be conquered.

The library serves 11,000 students at BMCC's lower Manhattan campus. Eighty-four percent are from economically disadvantaged or minority groups.

Building trades win safety net, hard hat rulings

Philadelphia—The Ironworkers and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. scored a legal victory over an adverse decision by the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission on the use of safety nets and hard hats on construction jobs. A similar ruling was handed down by an appellate court last month.

BCTD President Robert A. Georgine had urged the Labor Dept. to seek a court review of the OSHRC decision in a case where Adams Steel Erection, Inc., was cited for two safety violations and fined $50.



The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here overturned OSHRC's decision to void the safety violations, which involved the lack of exterior safety nets on perimeter walls and the lack of hard hats for workers.

Arbitrary action

The Ironworkers and the BCTD were allowed by the appellate court to intervene in the case in support of the Labor Dept. The court ruled that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's general standards on safety nets are not preempted by specific steel industry regulations. The three-judge panel said OSHRC "acted arbitrarily" in overturning the established precedent regarding safety nets.

The appeals court also overturned OSHRC's requirement that workers actually be exposed to the danger of a head injury before an employer can be held to have violated the requirements for hard hats. The court held "proof of access" by a worker to a zone of danger is sufficient for OSHA to act.

The U.S. Circuit Court for the District of Columbia in June made a similar ruling concerning the use of exterior safety nets.

plant between 1981 and 1984. The two unions representing the Bhopal workers had complained numerous times about the conditions at the plant, but their pleas went unheeded by the company and India's government, the report said.

The delegation's weeklong visit to India included meetings with government officials in New Delhi and Bhopal, representatives of the two trade unions at the plant and former workers of Union Carbide India Ltd. (UCIL), a subsidiary of UCC.

Management officials of UCC and UCIL declined to meet with the international delegation.

The commission concluded that the operating and maintenance errors that led to the MIC release were made by the management of the plant.

"Responsibility for the disaster also rests with UCIL's parent multinational, the U.S.-based Union Carbide Corp," the report said.

UCC had insisted on a process design requiring large MIC storage tanks, over the objections of its Indian engineers. Management-ordered design changes greatly added to the risk of a major disaster, the report said.

Michael Wright, the Steelworkers' health and safety director and also a member of the commission, explained to reporters that storage of large amounts of MIC, which is an intermediary in the production of the pesticide Sevin, was not necessary.

Three of the plant's four safety systems were inoperable at the time of the accident, the commission found. The refrigeration system, the vent gas scrubber, and the flare tower had been inoperative for between six weeks and six months.

Only the water spray system was working, but it was unable to reach the top of the 100-foot flare tower where the fumes were released.

The commission said the most likely cause of the accident was the seepage of water into the MIC tank during a pipe cleaning operation. Leaky valves and the lack of a "slip blind"—a device to prevent water from entering a pipe beyond a certain point—evidently allowed water to enter the MIC tank, it said.

Management reductions in personnel to unsafe levels and requiring workers to perform tasks for which they were not trained also contributed to the tragedy, the commission found.

Jobs eliminated

Just one week before the accident, the second and third shift maintenance supervisor positions were eliminated. It was the responsibility of the maintenance supervisor to order installation of a slip blind.

In 1982, a UCC safety team cited 10 major concerns about safety at the Bhopal plant. It concluded, however, that there was "no situation involving imminent danger or requiring immediate correction." Several of these deficiencies contributed to the December 1984 accident, the commission said.

Adding to the severity of the accident, the report said, was the failure of UCIL and UCC to inform the public about MIC hazards and to instruct medical authorities about the proper treatment for persons exposed to MIC.

Plant siting, lack of disaster planning and inadequate action by government authorities also contributed to the magnitude of the tragedy, the commission said.

MSHA inspectors bypass non-union surface mines

The failure of the Mine Safety & Health Administration for the past three years to conduct nearly 40 percent of the non-coal surface mine inspections it is mandated to make has its greatest impact on non-union workers.

The General Accounting Office, in a 112-page "briefing" paper, reported that the reduction in the number of MSHA inspectors by nearly one-third since 1980 has resulted in only 60 percent of the mandatory non-coal surface mine inspections being made.

GAO project director Bernard Unger, who is conducting the Labor Dept. review, said the data collected from MSHA field offices indicates that a number of mines have not been inspected at all during the past few years. The mine safety agency is required to inspect non-coal surface mines at least twice a year.

Unionized mining operations have been receiving at least the mandatory number of yearly inspections, reported Harry Tuggle, a mine health and safety specialist for the Steelworkers. Tuggle said MSHA field offices send him copies of the reports the inspectors file.

"Most all union operations are being inspected," he said. "The majority of those not being inspected—the other 40 percent—are where the workers don't having a mining representative, a union official to demand it."

Out in the cold

Tuggle said, "MSHA is aware that we're watching. It's the unorganized miners that are left out in the cold. Many of those mines may have been seen only once in the last few years."

The GAO stumbled onto the mine safety agency's failure to meet its mandate. "We had no indication of the shortfall initially," Unger said.

Under the Reagan Administration, the MSHA set up a priority inspection system, similar to the high-hazard inspection targeting used by the Occupational Safety & Health Administraton. The problem was the agency lowered its sights, aiming only to complete as many inspections as its staff could make.

Each year since 1981, the agency reduced the number of inspectors and consequently reduced its goals, Unger said. The number of inspectors was reduced at a much higher rate than other types of field personnel, he noted.

While the agency was completing only 10,800 of the nearly 18,000 non-coal surface mine inspections it is mandated to make, it was telling Congress that it was effectively and efficiently meeting its legal requirements.

The MSHA is currently purging its inventory list of mines that have been shut down, so that it can better determine exactly how many mines it should be inspecting, Unger said.

There still remain differences of opinion between MSHA and GAO on the level of resources needed to make the mandatory inspections, Unger said.

Baroody named to fill policy post at Labor

Michael E. Baroody, a White House aide with ties to Labor Sec. William E. Brock, has been nominated by President Reagan to be Assistant Secretary of Labor for Policy.

Baroody, 38, served in various posts at the Republican National Committee from 1977 to 1981, the period that Brock was the GOP national chairman. When Brock was appointed U.S. Trade Representative at the start of the Reagan Administration, Baroody came along as his executive assistant but then shifted to his present White House post.

The assistant secretary post he will fill, subject to confirmation by the Senate, has been vacant for more than two years. Its acting head is Everson Hull, who has the title of deputy assistant secretary.

First-half wage settlements up slightly from '84 average

Major collective bargaining settlements reached in the first half of 1985 provided average first-year wage increases of 2.8 percent, up slightly from last year's gain of 2.4 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The government's report on collective bargaining found that pay gains in major contracts—those covering 1,000 or more workers—provided increases averaging 2.9 percent a year when measured over the life of the contract, compared to 2.4 percent for the same period in 1984.

The wage gains were slightly lower than those won two or three years ago when the same parties negotiated their previous agreements.

Of the 850,000 workers covered by January-June 1985 settlements, more than 600,000 won wage increases averaging 4.4 percent in the first year and 3.8 percent a year overall. Nearly 200,000 had their pay frozen in the first contract year, but negotiated wage gains in the second and third contract years.

About 34,000 workers agreed to first year wage cuts averaging 10.4 percent and reductions totalling 5.8 percent over the life of the agreements. These settlements primarily were in construction, metal industries, transportation equipment and food stores.

Wage increases were negotiated in a number of industries, including public utilities, service, retail trade and trucking. First-year pay raises for non-manufacturing workers averaged 4 percent, with overall wage increases averaging 3.7 percent a year. Pay gains were 1.3 percent for the first year and 1.9 percent a year measured over the contract term for the 187,000 manufacturing workers covered by the first-half settlements. Construction workers won increases averaging 1.3 percent in the first year and 2 percent a year overall.

BLS noted that longer contracts generally provided higher wage boosts. Settlements for terms longer than three years averaged 4.3 percent for the first year against 3 percent for three-year contracts and 1.8 percent for contracts of one year or less.

Not included

BLS pointed out that the first-half statistics do not reflect contract settlements for nearly a million workers under agreements that expired or were reopened during the period but were not resolved by June 30. These include 400,000 railroad workers, 80,000 General Electric employees and other workers in manufacturing and construction.

In a separate BLS measure of total compensation, wages plus the value of benefits, key contracts covering 5,000 or more workers showed average gains of 3.7 percent for the first year and 3.4 percent annually over the life of the agreement.

Panel acts to bolster rail jobless aid

Railroad unions won an important first-round victory in a campaign to continue a separate railroad unemployment insurance system that the Reagan Administration is trying to abolish.

The Administration has cited the deficit the railroad fund incurred in recent years in proposing that the separate system be abolished and rail workers put under regular state unemployment insurance programs.

Instead, the House Ways & Means Committee approved legislation to deal with the deficit through a rise in employer payments and renewed authority for temporary borrowing from the railroad retirement fund to the unemployment account.

This was generally in line with recommendations of a committee of union, management and public members established by Congress to consider changes in the railroad unemployment insurance program. The railroad fund is the source of sick pay for workers as well as unemployment compensation.

In testimony earlier this month before a Ways & Means subcommittee, President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks stressed that the system is essentially sound. It worked well from its establishment in 1939 until it was hit by an unprecedented drop in railroad employment, he stressed.

Employment drop

Between July 1, 1981, and Jan. 1, 1983, the number of railroad employees tumbled from 514,000 to 388,000, a drop of 25 percent in 18 months. "No system of unemployment compensation could have withstood that strain," Kilroy contended.

The increase in management payments was higher than the tripartite committee had recommended because the House panel rejected a request for a one-time federal contribution through forgiveness of interest on the fund's debt.

The Senate has not yet acted on the issue, and without congressional action the unemployment fund's authority to borrow from the retirement account will expire on Sept. 30.

The increased employer payments in the House bill are estimated as sufficient to wipe out the unemployment fund's debt by the year 1990.

While the House committee action does not preclude a shift to the state unemployment compensation system, restoring the present system to solvency would nullify the principal argument for a change. The railroad program provides uniform benefits.

Roots of the Deficit

THE HUGE RISE in the federal deficit under President Reagan was deliberately engineered to compel a radical shrinking of the non-military functions of government.

Few in the White House establishment that shaped a strategy of slashing taxes and raising military expenditures simultaneously took seriously the voodoo economics that projected increased revenues from this devil's mixture. But without the pressure of a budget crisis, the Administration strategists rationalized, Congress was unlikely to find the political courage to abolish entire programs and reverse the course of government.

There was never much of a secret about the intent. The Reagan Administration was still in its first year when David Stockman's frank disclosure of doctoring budget computers to obtain optimistic projections found its way into print. Stockman was chastised by the President for talking so frankly, but no one at the White House contradicted what he said.

Only the most naive were surprised when the growth in the budget deficit demonstrated that the so-called supply side economic theory had not repealed the laws of simple arithmetic. But when the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, Martin Feldstein, suggested that a tax increase was necessary before the deficit got out of control, he was publicly rebuked by the White House staff and eventually resigned.

The economic gospel, as expounded by President Reagan during the last election campaign, was that there was no link between taxes and a balanced budget.

JUST A few days ago, Senate Republican leaders were sternly rebuked by the President for proposing an oil import tax to offset some of the rise in military spending in this year's budget.

One of the Republican budget conferees responded angrily that "the President has sold us down the river."

But for those who had ears to hear and eyes to see, today's budget crisis was clearly predictable—and authoritatively predicted—when an earlier Congress so rashly rubber-stamped a deficit-breeding budget policy.

The AFL-CIO was almost a voice in the wilderness in proposing revenue-raising tax reforms—which still could resolve the budget dilemma—and in suggesting a temporary tax surcharge to pay for whatever higher level of defense spending Congress might deem necessary.

This much is clear. Whatever the past congressional sins of omission, the Reagan Administration must not be rewarded for its deceptions by gaining the objective of dismantling the legitimate and necessary functions of a federal government.

The Trade Realities

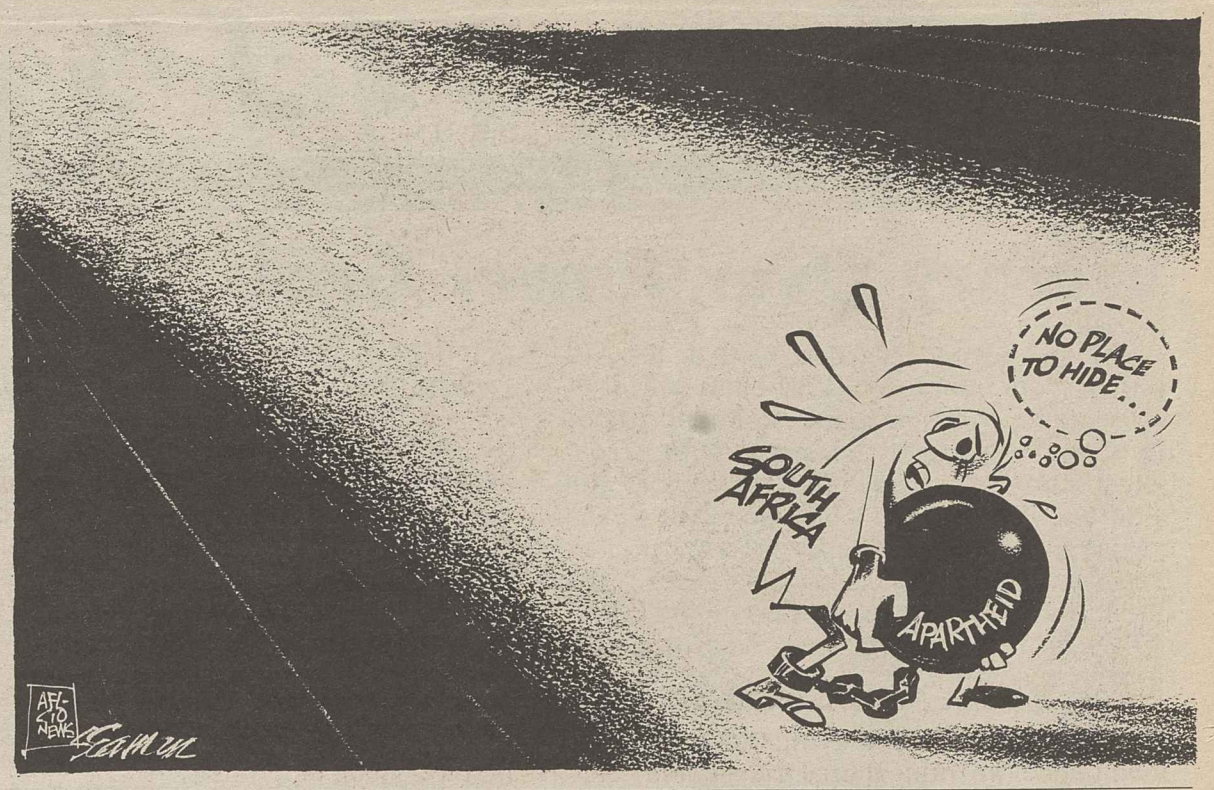
WHENEVER Congress starts showing serious signs of concern at the growth in the nation's trade deficit, the Japanese government announces with great fanfare a new program to open up its markets to a greater influx of American goods.

The Administration applauds. Congress is appeased. And nothing much changes.



This time, finally, there appears to be a healthy skepticism on Capitol Hill, and even the White House is restraining its cheers.

After all, how excited can one get over a promise that legislation will be introduced in the next session of Japan's parliament to enable foreign lawyers to practice in Japan. Meanwhile, of course, the exports of Japanese autos continue to set new records.

Some steps that Japan has promised could contribute a little to easing the trade imbalance if they are in fact carried out. But considering the huge overpricing of the dollar and the myriad complex trade barriers, no one realistically expects an easing of Japanese domestic restrictions to turn around the deficit.

The hard reality is that the United States is continuing to lose jobs and industries. As long as the dollar is seriously out of alignment with other currencies, and other countries operate by one-way trade rules, the balance of trade will run against us.

Congressional action is overdue. This is the message that members of Congress must get from their constituents.

'Enterprise zones' skirt complex urban problems

By Norman Hill

New York—President Reagan's only idea about how to help America's depressed urban and rural areas is to endorse the creation of "enterprise zones," as set forth in a 1983 bill co-authored by Representatives Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.) and Robert Garcia (D-N.Y.) and to be introduced again in Congress.

The advocates of the zones are of two kinds: those who see them as a new idea for urban revitalization that breaks from the government "giveaways" of the 1960s Model Cities program, and those who accept the fact that urban and community development grants will be cut, and they might as well jump in and try for the only form of federal aid going. Into the latter category falls the U.S. Conference of Mayors, which is on record as supporting the plan, with the provision that the number of designated zones (now set at 75) be expanded to 300.

Under the plan, the federal government would offer tax cuts: new companies in a zone would be exempted from all capital-gains taxes and 75 percent of corporate income taxes. Their workers would also receive individual income tax credits.

The impulse behind the enterprise zone is good: to create attractive opportunities for businesses to open and create jobs in areas where they wouldn't normally want to operate.

Expensive effort

The problems with the plan are several. First, the plan would mainly encourage already existing companies—those large enough to see a real advantage in the tax cut—simply to relocate, probably bringing their employees with them. It wouldn't encourage new businesses, or create new jobs, or help out the businesses and workers already in the neighborhood.

The president of the National Federation of Independent Business, John Sloan, says that the NFIB surveyed small business owners in 85 cities and "found taxes to be among the least of the problems for urban entrepreneurs. Far more important, especially for the labor-intensive retail and land service concerns that zones must attract if they are to cut unemployment significantly, are access to capital and a qualified labor pool, immediate market viability, adequate police protection, and affordable insurance."

During hearings in 1982 on proposed zones in Boston, Boyce Slayman, a businessman from the poverty area of Roxbury, spoke for a task force of black-owned small businesses when he said the proposed tax incentives would do little for young, struggling businesses and even displace local housing stock.

Plan problems

Another problem is that there are a great many more than 75, or 300, depressed urban and rural areas. Cities and states already see the need to compete with each other for the "advantage" of not seeing businesses move out; eventually they would be clamoring for more zones to be created. The U.S. Treasury and the Senate Finance Committee estimated that the 75-zone plan would cost $1.3 billion over the projected experiment period. With more and more zones, the costs would go up accordingly—hardly a cheap or painless road to renewal, especially if it doesn't work.

Enterprise zones already put in by states and cities have a poor record. A 1983 study by the Sabre Foundation, which is a strong advocate of the idea, tries to put the best light on it, but even its own figures show that the "average" zone saw 1.9 businesses start up—and 29 percent of the new companies found in the study are located in one building!

Problems of unemployment and urban blight are complex—and the sooner we all realize that there is no quick fix, the soooner we'll be able to carry out the mix of sensible public and private initiatives—job training, job creation, tenant owned housing, education, church leadership, low interest loans for new businesses—necessary to fight poverty in our cities and towns.

ALERT!

Victory Over Power Grab Protects Programs

Labor-backed programs won an important victory on July 18 when a bill that would give the President so-called "line-item" veto authority was prevented from being considered on the floor of the Senate. The bill, S. 43, would allow an unwarranted and perhaps unconstitutional transfer of power from Congress to the President. Congress would be giving up its ability to make up its own mind in appropriations matters.

It would allow the President, for example, to single out and eliminate such programs as Amtrak, mass transit aid economic development administration funding, among others, after Congress had already appropriated the funds for these programs as part of an overall funding program that had been passed by the House and Senate.

If the President had the line-item veto authority, he would no longer feel obligated to bargain with Congress on appropriations measures.

The AFL-CIO has been in the forefront of the fight against this measure because it represents a constitutional end-run that will have little meaningful effect on federal budgetary deficits, while surrendering to the Executive Branch fiscal powers that rightly belong to Congress.

The issue is not dead, however, as Sen. Mattingly has indicated that he may attempt to attach the language of his bill to an appropriations measure in September. Sen. Hatfield, though, has said that he will oppose any such maneuver.

The opposition to S. 43, sponsored by Senator Mack Mattingly (R-GA), was bipartisan. Senators Wendell Ford (D-KY) and Charles Mathias (R-MD) helped set the stage for successful opposition to the bill by reporting it out of committee unfavorably. And Senators Mark Hatfield (R-OR) and Robert Byrd (D-WV) led the successful filibuster against the measure on the floor of the Senate.

What You Can Do: Write or call those Senators who opposed cloture and prevented S. 43 from coming to a vote and thank them for their support on this vital issue. Also urge those who support cloture this time around to reject the line-item veto bill in future votes.

Following are those Senators who supported the AFL-CIO's position on the first vote against the Senate's consideration of S. 43, line-item veto bill. Victory on this vote set the stage for success on the two cloture votes that followed. Those Senators who supported labor's position against the line-item veto voted against the motion to close debate. Sixty votes were needed to close debate, and the line-item veto supporters were able to garner only 57.

New Job Disease Bill

A bill strongly backed by the AFL-CIO that would provide a fair and adequate compensation system for victims of occupational disease has been introduced in the House of Representatives.

H.R. 3090, sponsored by Rep. Pat Williams (D-MT), responds to the mounting crisis whereby 100,000 American workers die each year from occupational diseases.

- The bill creates a new Federal Occupational Disease Program.
- Asbestos victims would receive immediate coverage based upon a series of medical presumptions regarding this unique disease.
- Workers retain their rights to sue third parties; however, there would a dollar-for-dollar offset against the total court award.
- Coverage of additional diseases could occur through a trigger and rule-making procedure mandated to the Secretary of Labor.
- Finally, the bill creates a compensation insurance fund whereby covered employers must buy liability insurance, thus funding the program.

What You Can Do: Urge your Representative to cosponsor H.R. 3090, the Federal Occupational Disease Act of 1985.

Rosty Threatens Hike In Benefits Tax

If you think that the proposed tax on employee benefits is in full retreat -- 'taint so. Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski in a speech to the National Press Club said that not only was his tax-writing Committee ready to sit down and begin work on a bill in September, but that he would be looking for new revenue sources in such places as employee benefits.

So are other members of the Ways and Means Committee, according to Rostenkowski. "A number of my colleagues are privately suggesting a return to some of the options contained in the first treasury proposal for both equity and revenue," he added.

The message is clear -- contact your Congressmen during the recess and state your unqualified opposition to any tax on fringe benefits.

Did You Know?

- UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE
- BLACK LUNG BENEFITS

You* can help stop these unfair taxes. Write, call, or see your Congressmen today and tell them no to any taxes on your crucial life-support benefits.

Social security at 50—its legacy and challenge

By Gene Zack

President Franklin Delano Roosevelt was in high spirits as he sat in the Cabinet Room of the White House that sultry Aug. 14, 1935, his leonine head cocked to one side, an infectious grin splitting his patrician face.

Arrayed behind him were Labor Sec. Frances Perkins, Sen. Robert F. Wagner (D-N.Y.) and members of the House Ways & Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee.

''Today a hope of many years' standing is in large part fulfilled,'' Roosevelt said as, with a flourish, he signed the Social Security Act into law.

His jubilation was justified. Just six weeks earlier, FDR had signed the National Labor Relations Act, opening a new era for organized labor. Now he was moving the nation into a vast new arena, putting a floor of economic security under Americans demoralized and left destitute by the Great Depression.

The new law, Roosevelt said, ''gives at least some protection to...our citizens who will reap direct benefits through unemployment compensation, through old-age pensions and through increased services for the protection of children and the prevention of ill health.

''We can never insure 100 percent of the population against 100 percent of the hazards and vicissitudes of life,'' the President went on, ''but we have tried to frame a law which will give some measure of protection to the average citizen and to his family against the loss of a job and against poverty-ridden old age.''

Thus, with a stroke of his pen, Roosevelt set in motion a mechanism to deal with the manifold problems which people faced—and still face as America marks the 50th anniversary of this landmark legislation.

''The only thing we have to fear is fear itself,'' FDR had said on that raw March morning in 1933 when

Budget resolution avoids harsh cuts sought by Reagan

By David L. Perlman

Congress agreed on a budget resolution after two months of hard negotiations between the House and Senate, but President Reagan said it won't stop him from trying to kill off programs that Congress wants continued.

Reagan served notice that his veto pen will be ''hovering'' over every appropriations bill that comes across his desk. ''We're going to continue trying to eliminate programs,'' the President said at a news conference.

The budget resolution, which is not subject to veto, sets a ceiling on spending for various functions of government. The House-Senate budget compromise, agreed to before Congress began a five-week recess, takes a modest step toward deficit reduction without penalizing the elderly or the poor.

Despite Reagan's fulminations over the level of government spending, the congressional budget provides less spending authority and projects a smaller deficit than the budget the President submitted last winter. Congress refused to go along with the huge rise in defense spending Reagan proposed.

Mixed blessing

The budget resolution was endorsed by the AFL-CIO despite labor's disagreement with some of its provisions.

House Budget Committee Chairman William H. Gray III and his fellow negotiators were praised by AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison for ''a successful defense of social security'' and for shielding programs that help the unemployed and low-income households from funding slashes.

Nearly all of the cuts in labor-supported functions were less damaging than the wipeout of programs originally proposed by Reagan or the slightly less drastic version shaped by Senate Republican leaders in consultation with the White House.

Nevertheless, Denison noted, deep cutbacks in Amtrak funds, mass transit assistance and the Economic Development Administration will put severe stress on needed programs.

Denison's letter to House members also expressed the AFL-CIO's regret that the congressional budget failed to provide additional tax revenue to fund the cost of government and hold down deficits. ''This

Court vindicates Pilots on United strike issues

Chicago—A federal district court judge here upheld the stand of the Air Line Pilots and ordered United Airlines to reinstate immediately more than 500 newly hired pilots who had refused to cross picket lines during ALPA's recent 29-day strike.

The court also ordered the company to end its system of ''superseniority,'' which allowed scab pilots first preference on new jobs or routes.

''We've been vindicated,'' ALPA President Henry A. Duffy declared. ''We are extremely satisfied with the outcome. The rights of striking airline workers under the Railway Labor Act have been upheld.''

United President James J. Hartigan said the court order would be implemented in a timely manner, pending a decision on whether to appeal.

During the strike, the ALPA characterized the airline's actions as ''union-busting'' and said the company wanted to get ''a pound of flesh'' by seeking unreasonable back-to-work demands after the economic settlement was reached.

Hartigan tried to smooth over the company's attitude and actions toward its workers by saying in essence, ''That's the way the game is played.''

He said in a statement, ''The matters decided in court were technical issues. Everyone should understand this was a matter of principle and not personal in any way.

Unemployment rate stagnating at 7.3 percent

By James M. Shevis

The nation's civilian jobless rate remained unchanged at 7.3 percent in July as the size of both the labor force and total employment grew at the same pace.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported an increase of 494,000 jobs as measured by its household survey. The labor force grew by 530,000, resulting in a near-wash.

By BLS's count, that left 8.5 million Americans without jobs. But the count does not include the 1.1 million so-called discouraged workers or the 5.6-million workers employed only part-time because of the unavailability of full-time jobs.

Pay equity study clears house test

The House failed to complete action on a pay equity study of federal jobs, but a test vote strongly indicated that the labor-backed bill will be approved when Congress returns from its recess after Labor Day.

It would establish an 11-member commission, including union representatives, to oversee a study of the government's pay and job classification system. The study would seek to determine whether discrimination is a cause of pay differences within the federal civil service. While the focus would be on pay differences between jobs held primarily by men and by women, it would also explore job concentrations affecting racial and ethnic minorities.

A similar bill, also sponsored by Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), passed the House by a nearly unanimous vote in the last Congress. But this time around, conservative Republicans dug in their heels and are fighting the measure. One of their arguments against the bill is that any pay realignment recommended by such a study would be likely to cost the government money.

Temporary setback

The legislation was set aside to allow the House to take final action on the budget resolution before the start of the recess. But before doing so, the House cleared the way for consideration of the pay equity bill by a 292-133 procedural vote.

On that roll call, 239 Democrats and 53 Republicans voted to call up the bill. Six Democrats and 127 Republicans were opposed. Among women House members, all 11 Democrats and eight of 11 Republicans voted to take up the legislation.

A Senate Government Affairs subcommittee is considering a companion pay equity study bill, and AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara B. Hutchinson expressed labor's strong support. The measure is cosponsored by Senators Daniel J. Evans (R-Wash.) and Alan Cranston (D-Calif.).

Hutchinson, who is women's department director of the Government Employees, said there is ''compelling evidence that sex-based wage discrimination exists on a massive scale.''

She rejected as simplistic the conservative

Building trades delegates hear Robert Georgine's keynote.

Chicago convention

Solidarity the keynote for Building Trades

Chicago—Union solidarity is needed more than ever on construction sites, in the legislative arena and on the organizing front, Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine told delegates to the department's 63rd biennial convention here.

Georgine and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed in their opening-day addresses the trade union movement's battle to protect hard-won labor standards and to make unions more valuable to the workers they represent.

"We have to carry the trade union message to every man and woman who works for a living," Kirkland urged, "and we have to involve all of our rank-and-file members in the trade union mission."

Georgine said the building crafts, like other workers, have not recovered from the battering of the Reagan Recession—either in jobs or in wages.

"Thousands of our brothers and sisters are still out of work, or living on odd jobs," he reminded the delegates.

High price

The Administration's boast of bringing down inflation, Georgine suggested, "was achieved at the expense of working people, union and non-union alike."

Convention delegates represented 4.1 million building trades workers in the department's 15 affiliated unions, and Georgine stressed the importance of unity in the face of "divide-and-conquer" tactics by some employers.

"We see contractors trying to play one trade against another, offering special deals that give one union work outside of its jurisdiction if they will do it at a lower rate," Georgine said.

"Our message must be clear and unmistakable," he said. "No deal." The same unity should govern relationships among the local building trades councils, he urged.

Georgine also called for:

- New organizing approaches to reach out to younger workers, and use of union financial resources to help create jobs for building trades members.
- Increased membership involvement, especially in politics and lobbying. Members "must know the problems confronting the construction trades so that they can become part of the solution."
- A market recovery program, in cooperation with fair employers, to retain and expand union construction jobs.

Kirkland welcomed the "front-line" commitment of construction unions "on the organizing front, the economic front and the political front."

Such union solidarity is especially needed, he said, when "many of the laws and instruments of government that were created to prevent the worst excesses of unfair employers have been subverted and placed in the hands of people who have no intention of administering or enforcing them."

Kirkland spoke of labor's campaign against the taxation of health insurance and other job-related protections and called on union members to let their congressmen and senators know that "this is an issue on which there can be no compromise."

It's an issue the trade union movement will remember "when the next election rolls around," he said.

Pilots upheld on key issues in United Airlines dispute

The pilot applicants are all competent airmen who we are sure will serve the airline well."

Federal District Judge Nicholas J. Bua ruled in favor of ALPA on two of the three key issues involved in the "back-to-work" dispute between United and the union.

The judge's 61-page ruling determined that United's decision to bar 556 of its pilot trainees from future jobs violated the Railway Labor Act. The company's attempt to require the trainees "to cross a picket line as a condition of employment is unlawful under the RLA," the judge said.

He issued an injunction ordering United to rehire the pilot trainees, placing those who have finished the training in line for pilot service immediately. Those still in training must be allowed to finish without discrimination, the judge said.

Scab pilots were allowed by the company to rebid for better positions and given "superseniority." The court struck down the rebid and ordered United not to discriminate against the striking pilots when better paying positions become available.

On a third issue, the court held that United did not violate the Railway Labor Act in agreeing to give premium pay to strike-breaking pilots hired during the job action. While these pilots will continue to receive premium pay, they generally will be placed at the bottom of the seniority list, below the pilot trainees.

The strike by the Pilots was extended to 29 days when the company attempted to impose back to work conditions as part of the agreement with the union.

"This shows we were completely justified in settling the strike when we did and relying on the court to uphold our rights under the law," Duffy said. The strike ended June 14 with an agreement on economic issues, but with the back to work dispute unresolved.

The company and ALPA tentatively settled the economic issues a week into the strike.

"The company then escalated the strike from an economic dispute to a battle for union survival," Duffy said. "It attempted to punish striking pilots and their supporters by trying to impose a punitive back-to-work agreement. This was a blatant attack on ALPA and an attempt to break it at United."

The Pilots' strike was strongly supported by the Association of Flight Attendants. ALPA members decided to stay on the picket line until the company reached an equitable back-to-work settlement with the AFA. That accord soon followed.

ALPA sues to block drain of pension funds

Chicago—The Air Line Pilots filed suit against United Airlines charging that the carrier's attempt to withdraw $511 million from employee pension funds violates the Railway Labor Act and the Employee Retirement Income Security Act.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois, also names the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. and three members of United's pension committee as defendants.

The airline had announced in June it intended to recover nearly $1 billion by terminating its six pension plans and buying annuities to cover accrued benefits of eligible active workers and retirees.

The ALPA contract forbids reversion of pension funds until all pilot benefits are paid, the union said.

Appeals court slaps NLRB, overturns 'successor' policy

A federal appeals court overturned a 1984 National Labor Relations Board ruling involving an Iowa meatpacking firm's successorship obligations—giving its workers "a tremendous victory," as President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers put it.

The decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which was highly critical of the NLRB's handling of the case, clears the way for 420 UFCW members at the Spencer Foods, Inc., plant to receive backpay awards that could total as much as $30 million.

"Our members have been waiting six years for justice in this case," Wynn said. "The court's reversal of the NLRB's finding regarding the company's refusal to bargain is yet another instance in which appeals courts have had to reverse board decisions that have gone too far in their rulings against unions.

"This is further evidence that the Reagan board is tilted against workers, as we have said repeatedly."

The Spencer plant closed in late 1977 after expiration of UFCW Local 152's collective bargaining agreement. It reopened 20 months later under Land O'Lakes management with a new board of directors. Refurbished with new equipment, it switched exclusively to a kosher operation.

The company reduced the workforce to about 240 employees and refused to recognize or bargain with Local 152. As a non-union operation, it paid workers significantly less than workers were paid under the union contract.

The Reagan-dominated NLRB finally ruled in March 1984, after lengthy litigation, that the new employer was not a successor employer as the union maintained and was therefore not required to bargain with Local 152.

Deliberate move

The appeals court rejected the board's finding and noted that "(Spencer Foods and Land O'Lakes) deliberately structured the transaction between them . . . so as to retain and continue Spencer Foods' pre-existing corporate identity."

The court agreed with an NLRB administrative law judge's finding, which had been overturned by the full board, that the "same work continued . . . at the same place, with the same or substantially similar procedures, processes, and machinery" and should be construed as a successor employer.

The court remanded the case to the NLRB for review and to reconsider the administrative law judge's recommendations that the laid-off union members be recalled and awarded backpay.

Although the Spencer plant currently is not operating, the court's ruling requiring recognition of the union is binding on any future management, and the backpay owed the former workers must be paid regardless of whether the plant is operating.

Budget resolution avoids harsh cuts

decision will eventually have to be reconsidered as deficits continue to grow," Denison predicted.

The budget resolution establishes spending ceilings for various government functions and sets a Sept. 27 deadline for congressional committees to propose any changes in existing law needed to achieve those goals. In Reagan's first term, he used the budget process to put through most of his economic program soon after taking office. That combination of sharply increased defense spending and big tax cuts caused the huge deficits of recent years.

Largely because of past budget decisions, defense spending will rise by $15.1 billion in the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, 1985, and new spending authority will increase to offset inflation. Reagan had asked for an after-inflation rise of 5.9 percent. The other big dollar increase is the interest on the national debt, which is projected to rise by $11 billion.

Outlays for nondefense programs would decline by $12.3 billion. And if social security payments are excluded, the domestic spending decline comes to $30.25 billion.

Domestic programs serving low-income people would in most cases receive full funding based on anticipated caseload, including an allowance for inflation. These include Aid to Families with Dependent Children, child nutrition, and education programs for the disadvantaged or handicapped.

Savings in both Medicaid for the poor and Medicare for the elderly would be achieved through insurance collections and cost controls, not through cutbacks in coverage.

Federal retirees would continue to get their cost-of-living adjustment, as would social security beneficiaries. But the budget assumes a one-year pay freeze for civilian federal employees. Reagan's budget had called for a 5 percent pay cut.

Rate increase

Postal subsidies, which are essential to many non-profit publications, would be reduced but not abolished as the Senate had sought. The anticipated effect is that a rate increase for non-profit publications, scheduled for July 1, 1986, under present law, will take effect six months earlier.

Amtrak subsidies, which the Administration wanted to end entirely, and mass transit funding, which it proposed to severely restrict, would be cut 15 percent.

Community and regional development programs the Reagan Administration wants to abolish would be continued, but with a 20 percent funding cut.

General revenue-sharing to states and cities would be fully funded next year but then abolished.

As he has in the past, President Reagan ignored his own role in proposing deficit-breeding budgets and chided Congress for "overspending." He renewed his call for a balanced budget constitutional amendment to prohibit Congress from spending more than the revenue that comes in from taxes. And he made clear his continued resistance to any form of tax increase.

The President's intransigence on taxes and his waffling on the social security cost-of-living adjustment brought open criticism from the Senate's Republican majority. Reagan had embraced a cutback in the social security COLA when the Senate narrowly adopted it as a budget deficit-reducer. But he switched and opposed its inclusion in the final version.

At his news conference, Reagan also renewed his request for line-item veto authority, which would allow him to kill specific programs unless Congress could muster a two-thirds vote to override. But legislation to allow this has been blocked in the Senate and is unlikely to pass the House.

AFTRA sets proposals for negotiations

Miami—Framing proposals for forthcoming national negotiations with the broadcast industry absorbed much of the 48th annual convention of Television & Radio Artists.

In addition, delegates adopted a number of resolutions and elected officers.

At a plenary session of AFTRA's national board, Executive Sec. Sanford I. (Bud) Wolff submitted his resignation after 16 years in his position. The board named his assistant, John C. Hall, Jr., to succeed him.

Wolff, who will remain a consultant to the union, plans to practice law in New York. He said that his decision to leave the union's top administrative post was made with "great reluctance."

The board accepted his resignation "with regret, commendation, and great gratitude" for his service to the union.

Union career

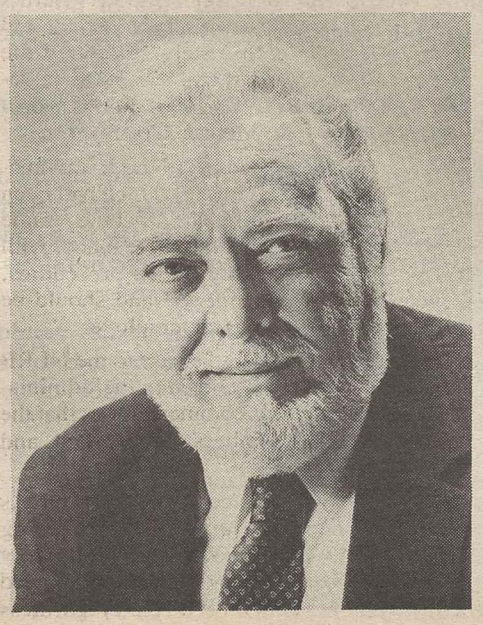
Hall recently was elevated to the position of associate national executive secretary after having served as assistant national executive secretary since 1977.

Before he joined AFTRA, Hall was assistant to the president of the Musicians and from 1966 to 1975 served as assistant to the president of the Theatrical Stage Employees.

The new executive secretary also has represented entertainment unions abroad and in international labor forums.

AFTRA President Frank Maxwell, who was re-elected to his second term, commended Wolff for his long leadership and expressed gratitude that he was staying on as a consultant.

New York Local President Ann Loring was re-elected national first vice president, and Kenneth Roberts of New York was elected treasurer. Elected recording secretary was Mike Botula of Los Angeles.



Other national officers elected were Vice Presidents K. T. Stevens of Los Angeles, Peter Hackes, Washington-Baltimore; Belva Davis, San Francisco; Shelby Scott, Boston; Kenneth Barry, Dallas; Chris Ward, Fresno, Calif., and Lee Lawson of New York.

Key resolutions

Most of the resolutions passed at the convention dealt with internal matters. Others called for:

- A study by the union's pension and health fund trustees into the possibility of divesting holdings in companies operating in South Africa in support of the apartheid regime.
- Additional procedures for monitoring progress on equal rights in employment practices.
- Authorizing the national board to hire additional staff members to step up organizing.
- Development of procedures to deal with sexual harassment on the job.
- Intensifying the use of new technology to monitor TV broadcasts to insure payment of residual fees to members.

AFTRA's Gold Card Award, the union's highest honor, went this year to Dan Mallinger, longtime executive secretary of the AFTRA local in Pittsburgh. The award is for distinguished service to AFTRA and its members.

Labor songwriters and performers "roll the union on."

Labor Day songfest on TV

"Singing for the Union," the first program in this season's "America Works" television series, will be broadcast nationwide over the Labor Day weekend.

The half-hour show features the Great Labor Song Exchange, an annual sing-in sponsored by the Labor Heritage Foundation and held at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The program, to be aired on more than 110 local public broadcasting stations, spotlights the new breed of labor troubadours who are writing songs about contemporary workplace issues, such as safety, health, technology and women workers.

"Singing for the Union" is an upbeat show that offers inspiration and insight into the role of contemporary union music in the labor movement.

Workers from many unions use music to communicate the message of solidarity. Their songs are often humorous or satirical, but they are always to the point.

The Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO's television unit, produced the show which includes brief reflections on the significance of music in the labor movement by Joe Glazer, a prolific labor songwriter and historian. Other union songwriters and performers tell how to use words and music to voice workers' concerns.

Individual local stations make their own decisions about whether and when to air the show. Local station schedules should be checked for the air time of the program.

South Africa's mine workers issue strike call

The crisis in South Africa generated by black opposition to white minority rule deepened as the country's principal black mine workers union announced plans for a strike over pay.

The National Union of Mine Workers, which represents 230,000 black workers in South Africa's gold, diamond and coal mines, set the strike date for Aug. 25.

Announcement of the planned walkout came two weeks after the Pretoria government implemented a crackdown on black protesters.

The emergency declaration amounted to virtual martial law. Police have detained more than 1,400 people, mostly blacks, under the decree, holding them without charge in most cases. Twenty persons have been killed.

The AFL-CIO has condemned the emergency declaration, calling it the most extreme violation of blacks' basic rights since the 1960 Sharpesville massacre.

The International Labor Organization urged the South African government to release 24 trade union officials and shop stewards detained in the police roundup, and to seek a solution to the cause of unrest through a democratic dialogue with the black majority.

Texas AFL-CIO convention adopts 'New Directions' plan

Austin, Tex.—A "New Directions" program that includes establishing an associate membership category, a worker benefit trust, and a labor-management task force was adopted by the delegates to the Texas AFL-CIO convention held here.

The convention delegates used the AFL-CIO's new report, The Changing Situations of Workers and Their Unions, and the keynote address of Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue as guidelines for many of the new proposals made by the convention's 16 committees.

A permanent labor-management task force will be set up to encourage develop of labor-management committees by local unions to help improve the quality of work life and create new jobs.

A worker benefit trust committee will be formed to explore and negotiate for benefit packages that can provide the highest level of benefits for the dollars spent.

Organizing aid

In authorizing a new associate membership category, the delegates envisioned it as an aid to increasing union membership and as an organizing tool in identifying pro-union workers in non-union shops.

The New Directions program was proposed by State AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard, who was re-elected without opposition to his seventh two-year term. Sec.-Treas. Joe D. Gunn also was re-elected. Hubbard is a member of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Gunn is a member of the Communications Workers.

Hubbard told the delegates the New Directions program will include an internal polling system "so we'll know what our members think, not what someone else tells us they think." The federation installed a computer system two years ago which could be used for a polling operation and for "a more sophisticated union member voter contact program," Hubbard said.

The convention's 604 delegates heard Gov. Mark White call for a $5-a-barrel import tax on refined oil products. Texas refineries have laid off thousands of workers, blaming imports of refined gasoline and fuel oil for the mounting layoffs.

White warned that on its present course the nation risks doing "to ourselves what would have won World War II for the Germans—destroy our own oil refineries."

National Democratic Party Chairman Paul Kirk brought delegates to their feet in applause by saying, "We want some changes in the Democratic Party, but we don't need two Republican parties."

Kirk told the delegates that the party is building a new technological expertise to assist Democratic candidates at all levels.

In a resolution, the delegates called on Congress to approve legislation to provide stiff penalties for employers who hire illegal aliens, limit the number of temporary workers allowed in the United States, and provide amnesty for those illegal aliens already working in America.

In other resolutions, the convention supported legislation to prevent companies from cashing in on worker pension funds, to raise the state's agricultural minimum wage from $1.40 per hour to $3.35 per hour, and to block further concentration of the media in the hands of a few giant corporations.

Among the other guest speakers were Postal Workers President Moe Biller, former State AFL-CIO President Hank Brown, Lt. Gov. Bill Hobby, Agricultural Commissioner Jim Hightower, and Wilbert Williams, administrator of AFL-CIO Region IV.

argument that supply and demand determines the value of jobs in the labor market.

"Labor markets are a mixture of supply and demand, bargaining power, expectations of career commitments, historical understandings of 'fair' wages, and individual prejudices," she maintained. "There are numerous opportunities for discriminatory wage-setting practices to becomes established and ingrained."

Earlier, at House hearings on the Oakar bill, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. stressed "the fundamental principle of pay equity" that "there should be no wage discrimination based on sex or race."

Brian Turner, the IUD's director of legislation and economic policy, said the federal government "should embody the principles of fairness and equity" in its role as an employer.

The legacy and the challenge

he took the oath of office as the 32nd President of the United States.

But people had much to fear—dependency, old age, illness, family tragedies, unemployment, helplessness.

It was a period of great anguish for the American family. More than 15 million breadwinners were jobless; many had lost their homes and farms; the few who had been able to set aside some savings, however meager, had stood by helplessly as the fruits of a lifetime of work were wiped out by bank failures.

Even without the Depression, the America of half a century ago was a grim and frightening place for old people. Pensions were practically unheard of. Workers dreaded the day when, as a union song puts it, they would become "too old to work and too young to die."

Some were fortunate enough to have children who took them into their homes; the rest saw nothing at the end of life's road but the poorhouse. Squalid and mean, tucked away out of sight on the outskirts of town, the poorhouse loomed large in people's minds. It was here that thousands of the elderly were forced to live out their days when their productive years came to an involuntary close.

The concept of protecting workers against the loss of income due to unemployment or old age was hardly a new one. Such insurance plans, in one form or another, had existed in the industrialized nations of Europe for several decades

But it took a long time for the idea to catch hold in this country.

First step

In 1912, the Progressive Party was the first to go on record in favor of old-age pensions, but in the years which followed, what little action there was on this front took place on the state level. In the Twenties, eight states enacted some form of pension law, but they were optional, and largely ineffective. By 1933, fewer than half the states had such laws, with payments based strictly on a demeaning "means" test, and with coverage varying tremendously from state to state.

As for unemployment compensation, the record was even more dismal. Only one state—Wisconsin—had a jobless benefit law, which required each firm to set up its own unemployment reserves to take care of its own employees. There was no pooling of resources, and this proved disastrous during the Depression when it became obvious that mass unemployment resulted from conditions beyond the control of a single firm or a single industry.

The Democratic Party platform of 1932 advocated "unemployment and old-age insurance under state laws." But it was apparent to FDR and his advisers that the states, alone, could not handle the problem. If unemployment was national in scope, so were the problems of the aged; dealing with them effectively would require federal involvement.

The author, Gene Zack, is a former staff director of the Save Our Security coalition and a former assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News.

But first things first.

Swept into office with a broad mandate to do whatever was necessary to set the national house in order, the Roosevelt Administration focused its first attention on putting America back to work—establishing the Works Progress Administration and the Public Works Administration to give the jobless the dignity of work instead of handouts, passing the National Recovery Act to rehabilitate industry and improve working conditions, and creating a host of other programs to fuel the economic engine.

Then, the emergency measures well in place, the Administration turned to longer-range goals.

In a message to Congress on June 8, 1934, FDR spoke of the "task of reconstruction," declaring that "among our objectives, I place the security of the men, women and children of the nation first."

People, he said, "want some safeguard against misfortunes which cannot be wholly eliminated in this man-made world of ours," adding that it was vital "to employ the active interest of the nation as a whole through government in order to encourage greater security for each individual.

"Fear and worry based on unknown danger contribute to social unrest and economic demoralization. If, as our Constitution tells us, our federal government was established among other things 'to promote the general welfare,' it is our plain duty to provide for that security upon which welfare depends. I am looking for a sound means which I can recommend to provide at once security against several of the great disturbing factors in life—especially those which relate to unemployment and old age."

Three weeks later, on June 29, Roosevelt signed Executive Order No. 6757, establishing a Committee on Economic Security, charged with dealing with these complex, interrelated issues.

Blue-ribbon panel

This was no ordinary commission. It was a blue-ribbon panel composed of the principal officers of government. Chairing the committee was Labor Sec. Frances Perkins, the first woman Cabinet member in history. The other members were Treasury Sec. Henry Morgenthau, Attorney Gen. Homer Cummings, Agriculture Sec. Henry Wallace and Federal Emergency Relief Administrator Harry Hopkins.

The Committee labored for seven months to come up with recommendations which were breathtaking in scope—calling for creation of a national mechanism to assure the dignity and independence of the individual, the integrity of the family, and the stability and purchasing power of the community.

This fundamental charter of social policy called for a federal system of retirement benefits, a federal-state unemployment insurance program, aid to dependent children, federal assistance for the disabled and handicapped, maternal and child health programs, child welfare services, and an expanded vocational rehabilitation program.

Emphasizing the fact that "there is insecurity in every stage of life," the committee said:

"When earnings cease, dependency is not far off for a large percentage of our people. The one almost all-embracing measure of security is an assured income. A program of economic security, as we vision it, must have as its primary aim the assurance of an adequate income to each human being in childhood, youth, middle age, or old age—in sickness or in health. It must provide safeguards against all of the hazards leading to destitution and dependency."

Addressing itself, at some length, to the issue of national health insurance, the committee spoke of the need for helping "self-supporting families of small and moderate means to budget against the loss of wages on account of illness and against the costs of medical services. . . .

"Insurance against the costs of sickness is neither new nor novel. In the United States we have had a long experience with sickness insurance both on a non-profit and commercial basis. Both forms have been inadequate in respect to the protection they furnish and...commercial insurance has in addition been too expensive for people of small means. . . .

"In contrast, other countries of the world have had experience with compulsory health...insurance applied to over a hundred million persons and running over a period of more than 50 years. Nearly every large and industrial country of the world except the United States has applied the principle of insurance to the economic risks of illness."

While commending a system of national health insurance in principle, the committee chose not to recommend immediate enactment. The medical lobby, FDR had told them candidly, was too powerful; it would surely defeat the entire program if national health insurance were included.

Two days after receiving the report, Roosevelt sent it to Congress with his plea for swift enactment.

"The establishment of sound means toward a greater future economic security of the American people is dictated by a prudent consideration of the hazards involved in our national life," he told Congress. "No one can guarantee this country against the dangers of future depressions but we can reduce these dangers. We can eliminate many of the factors that cause economic depressions, and we can provide the means of mitigating their results. This plan for economic security is at once a measure of prevention and a method of alleviation.

"We pay for the dreadful consequence of economic insecurity—and dearly. This plan presents a more equitable and infinitely less expensive means of meeting these costs. We cannot afford to neglect the plain duty before us."

Voices of alarm

No sooner had the message reached Capitol Hill than a drumfire of criticism came from the business community.

"Unemployment insurance cannot be placed on a sound financial basis," said the National Industrial Conference Board.

The legislation would lead to "ultimate socialistic control of life and industry," said the National Association of Manufacturers.

Organized labor weighed in on Roosevelt's side. Said AFL President William Green:

"Congress...must make substantial provisions for those emergencies which have always been with us. Since they are beyond the ability of the individual to prevent or to provide for responsibility rests on society."

Taking a stand which would guide labor's approach to social security down through the decades, Green made it clear that workers were willing to pay their fair share to make the program fiscally sound. "It is very much better to have contributions as a fixed charge on earnings and industries than to meet unexpected tax rises," he said, adding an ominous warning:

"So much has been promised in the way of jobs and social security, that delay in determining a program increases the number who turn to radical movements and dangerous leaders."

In the nation's press, FDR was vilified for what was labeled a socialistic "cradle-to-the-grave" scheme.

Unruffled, Roosevelt confided to Frances Perkins: "There is no reason why everybody in the United States should not be covered. I see no reason why every child, from the day he is born, shouldn't be a member of the social security system."

On Capitol Hill, the measure was put on a fast track, with legislators taking the unusual step of holding simultaneous public hearings in both the House and Senate.

In the House, opposition was led by the seven Republicans on the Ways & Means Committee.

"The federal government," they said in their minority views, "has no power to impose this system upon private industry...they would not in any way contribute to the relief of present economic conditions, and might in fact retard economic recovery."

The bill's provisions, the Republicans said, would "impose a crushing burden upon industry and upon labor. They establish a bureaucracy in the field of insurance in competition with private business. They destroy old-age retirement systems set up by private industries, which in most instances provide more liberal benefits. . . ."

The notion that private pension plans would be undercut was patently absurd. In 1935, only 15 percent of those employed held jobs covered by any sort of retirement system; only a tiny handful—perhaps 100,000 to 200,000—actually were drawing pensions.

On the House floor, the Republicans continued their assault, led by three New York congressmen.

"Never in the history of the world," said Rep. John Taber, "has any measure been brought in here so insidiously designed as to prevent business recovery, to enslave workers, and to prevent any possibility of the employer providing work for the people."

"The lash of the dictator will be felt," insisted Rep. Daniel Reed, "and 25 million free American citizens will for the first time submit themselves to a fingerprint test."

"This bill," said Rep. James W. Wadsworth, "opens the door and invites the entrance into the political field of a power so vast, so powerful as to threaten the integrity of our institutions and to pull the pillars of the temple down upon the heads of our descendants."

On a crucial test vote, all but one of the House Republicans voted to recommit the bill. When that failed, the opposition collapsed. On Apr. 19, 1935, the House passed the measure by a vote of 371 to 33.

The Republicans in the Senate made a last desperate stab at derailing the bill, with Sen. Daniel O. Hastings of Delaware predicting darkly that it would "end the progress of a great country and bring its people to the level of the average European."

Twelve of the Senate's 19 Republicans supported a move by Hastings to strike out old-age insurance; when it failed, the fight was over. On June 19, by a vote of 76 to 6, the bill passed.

House and Senate conferees bickered over the measure for seven weeks, then sent the bill to the President.

In the historic White House signing ceremony on Aug. 14, Roosevelt made it clear that the bill was only the beginning of a new social policy destined to transform American life.

"This law," he said firmly, "represents a cornerstone in a structure that is being built but is by no means complete."

The AFL's William Green agreed.

"This act seeks to express as a national policy and practice our sense of obligation for those victims of forces beyond their control," he said. "This expresses the deep feeling of responsibility which society has for the persons made dependent through no fault of theirs. . . . We hope ultimately we can solve the problems of incomes for all."

Campaign centerpiece

Although the bill was now law, opposition continued and social security became a centerpiece in the 1936 presidential campaign.

Alf Landon's frontal assault came as a surprise. As governor of Kansas, he had put through legislation conforming his state's social security law to the new federal statute.

But midway through the campaign he unleashed a blistering attack on social security. The law, he said in a speech in Milwaukee on Sept. 26, was "unjust, unworkable, stupidly drafted and wastefully financed. The Republican party will have nothing to do with any plan that involves prying into the personal records of 26 million people.

"To call it 'social security' is a fraud on the working man," Landon went on. "To enact unemployment insurance statutes is something unheard of. It is most unwise."

The Republicans were joined by business leaders who bombarded workers with pay envelope stuffers on the weekend before the election. One of the items was made to look like an official government release, and used such emotionally laden words as "compulsion," "bureaucracy," "regimentation" and "socialism."

James A. Cox, the Democratic presidential candidate of a dozen years earlier (FDR had been his vice presidential running mate), had a ready answer for American workers: "Why didn't the boss put any political propaganda in your pay envelopes four years ago? Because there wasn't any pay envelopes."

On the day before the election, the Hearst newspapers let loose a final diatribe.

"You will have a record in the files in Washington," Hearst warned. "Your religion and the church you attend will be listed. Your physical defects will go down in black and white. Your life will be an open book. Your former employer's reason for discharging you will be given. Your union affiliation will be stated. All the wages you've ever drawn, however small, will be shown. Even your divorce—if you have one—will be included. You are to be registered—catalogued—put on file."

Landslide victory

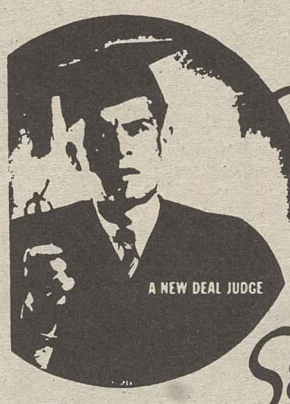
The Republicans, employers and Hearst completely misjudged the temper of the times. Roosevelt's landslide victory—523 electoral votes to only 8 for Landon—was an overwhelming vote of confidence for social security. But one major hurdle lay ahead.

In 1936, the Supreme Court had heard oral arguments in two cases challenging social security's unemployment compensation and old-age pension provisions, and its decision was awaited with some uncertainty. During Roosevelt's first term, the court had almost routinely struck down one piece of recovery legislation after another. But on Apr. 12, 1937, by the narrowest of margins, the nation's highest tribunal had upheld the constitutionality of the National Labor Relations Act. Would it do the same with the landmark social security bill?

The answer came on May 24, 1937.

Speaking for the majority, Justice Benjamin Cardozo said, on the unemployment insurance issue:

"During the years 1929 to 1936, when the country was passing through a cyclical depression, the number of the unemployed mounted to unprecedented heights . . . . Disaster to the breadwinner meant disaster to dependents. Accordingly, the roll of the unemployed, itself formidable enough, was only a partial roll of the destitute or needy. The fact developed quickly that the states were unable to give the requisite relief. The problem had become national in area and dimensions. There was need of help from the nation if the people were not to starve. In a crisis so extreme the use of the moneys of the nation to relieve the unemployed and their dependents is a use for...the promotion of the general welfare."



On old-age insurance, again speaking for the majority, Cardozo said:

"The hope behind this statute is to save men and women from the rigors of the poorhouse as well as from the haunting fear that such a lot awaits them when journey's end is near. . . . The number of persons in the United States 65 years of age or over is increasing proportionately as well as absolutely. What is even more important, the number of such persons unable to take care of themselves is growing at a threatening pace. . . . The problem is plainly national in area and dimensions. . . . Only a power that is national can serve the interests of all."

Social security had survived its most critical test; it had become firmly imbedded in the nation's social policy.

Historic picture shows President Roosevelt signing Social Security Act 50 years ago, with Labor Sec. Frances Perkins and key supporters from Congress as witnesses at White House ceremony.

ELECTION DAY

On the day that he signed the bill into law, Roosevelt had called it "the cornerstone in a structure that is...by no means complete," and in most of the years since then, labor and its allies worked to enlarge the scope and effectiveness of the program.

Benefits were added for dependents of retirees and surviving spouses and dependent children of workers who die during their productive years (1939); coverage was extended to farm workers and to most self-employed persons except doctors, lawyers, engineers and other professionals (1950); coverage was extended to farmers and most professionals (1954); disability insurance was added to protect workers and their dependents when the breadwinner is physically unable to continue gainful employment, and women were allowed to retire at age 62 with reduced benefits (1956); early retirement benefits were extended to men (1961); Medicare for the aged and Medicaid for the poor were enacted (1965); Medicare was extended to the disabled and the blind, and a program to supplement the incomes of the needy aged, blind and disabled was enacted (1972).

Republican target

The past four years, however, have been marked by a concerted assault on social security. President Reagan and Congress have rolled back benefits upon retirement for those at the lowest income level, phased out benefits for college students, eliminated the parent's benefit when the youngest child reaches 16, slashed Medicare and Medicaid outlays, delayed cost-of-living increases, and raised the retirement age to 66 by the year 2020, and to 67 by the year 2027.

These four years of cutbacks, standing as they do in sharp contrast to the four decades of progress which preceded them, pose a continuing concern to the AFL-CIO-backed Save Our Security coalition—composed of more than 200 organizations representing over 40 million senior citizens, the blind and disabled, trade unionists, teachers, veterans, social workers, religious organizations, women's groups, civil rights groups, Black and Hispanic groups.

The SOS agenda calls for reversing the regressive trend of the Reagan years and getting on with the business of making social security work better than it does right now.

High on its list of unfinished business are:

- Comprehensive health insurance to safeguard against the harsh economic burdens people now must bear when they become ill (an issue discussed, but not resolved, a half-century ago).
- Providing equity for women, on whom the burdens of aging fall with particular severity.
- Restoration of benefits to dependent children of deceased, retired or disabled workers, so that social security will regain its proper status as a "family protection plan."

Social security has changed the face of America in the last 50 years. People who would otherwise be among the nation's most economically vulnerable—the retired, aged, widows and orphans, and the totally disabled—have income they can count on month after month as a matter of right. And wage earners are insulated against at least some of the economic adversity which accompanies unemployment.

It has done so because it is founded on traditional values and concepts—self help, mutual aid, insurance, and incentives to work and save.

Its need is no less great today than it was a half-century ago, and it will continue to be a dynamic and influential factor in American economic, social and political life.

Carrying the message

These Texas members of the Letter Carriers, in Washington for their union's national legislative conference, call on Rep. Martin Frost (D-Tex.) to make a case for preserving retirement benefits from budget cuts. They were among 1,500 NALC delegates who lobbied their home-state congressional delegations during the union's two-day conference to support their position.

Migrant labor convention votes affiliation with UFW

Toledo, Ohio—The Farm Labor Organizing Committee, which speaks for some 6,000 migrant workers, voted at its convention here to affiliate with the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers.

FLOC President Baldemar Velasquez, who stressed the need for "one unified farm workers movement," said his group sees affiliation with the trade union mainstream as the path to growth.

The union represents migrant workers who come to northwest Ohio and southern Michigan to harvest the tomato and cucumber crops. Many of the growers are suppliers for the Campbell Soup Co., and the union has been sharply at odds with the company over the issue of union representation and collective bargaining.

Several hundred delegates to the FLOC convention, which was held at an Auto Workers hall here, voted unanimously for affiliation with the Farm Workers and applauded enthusiastically the welcome extended by UFW President Cesar Chavez.

Chavez, speaking in Spanish, told the convention that migrant workers must fight for their rights with boycotts, strikes and union contracts. "The farmworkers' struggle is a just struggle," Chavez said, "a necessary struggle, and we will continue to fight for as long as it takes to win our rights."

May agreement

In the battle over representation rights for the migrant workers, the FLOC and Campbell reached an "understanding" last May providing for an eight-person commission to develop and oversee representational procedures for farmworkers on tomato and cucumber fields in Ohio and Michigan.

Former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop heads the commission, which includes Msgr. George G. Higgins of Catholic University, former UAW President Douglas Fraser, Purdue University agricultural economist Don Paarlberg and Tom Anderson, an agribusiness leader from Ohio. Four others will be jointly named by the union and the company.

Velasquez stressed at the convention that the union's goal remains a collective bargaining agreement, not just procedural steps. He said the procedure contemplates a bargaining relationship between Campbell and its growers and between the growers and the migrant workers.

Charles D. Gray named director of Asian institute

Charles D. Gray, deputy executive director of the AFL-CIO's Asian-American Free Labor Institute since 1975, has been named to succeed Morris Paladino as executive director.

Gray, who is 56, was confirmed to the post by a vote of AAFLI's board of trustees. The appointment was announced by Federation President Lane Kirkland, who chairs the AAFLI board.

Gray spent 12 years with the International Federation of Commercial, Clerical & Technical Employees (FIET) in Amsterdam, Holland, and later in Geneva.

He came to AAFLI in 1971, overseeing expansion of the institute's in-country programs in the Middle East, Far East, and South Pacific. He began his trade union career in his native Ohio as a member of the Retail Clerks.

Paladino, 65, retired June 30 after 15 years as head of the institute. He came to AAFLI after serving as assistant general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels. Earlier, he served as deputy executive secretary of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Unemployment rate stagnating at 7.3 percent

When those two categories of workers are factored in, the Full Employment Action Council estimates, the nation's "real" unemployment rate last month was 13 percent.

The official jobless rate now has remained at 7.3 percent for six months in a row.

At the current rate, it appears that 1985 will mark the ninth post-World War II year in which joblessness was above 7 percent—and five of those years will have been Reagan years.

Employment, "while continuing to increase in the service-producing sector, remains clouded by weakness in manufacturing," BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told a congressional Joint Economic Committee hearing on the July jobs figures.

Factory jobs fell by 7,000 over the month. Since the beginning of the year, manufacturing production jobs are down 200,000.

Even as the government was announcing the latest monthly employment and unemployment statistics, some major companies were unveiling plans for deep layoffs.

Montgomery Ward & Co. said it will close its 113-year-old catalog unit and dismiss some 5,000 workers over the next eight to 14 months.

Meanwhile, National Semiconductor Corp., in Santa Clara, Calif., announced it will furlough at least 8,000 employees for five days in the next seven weeks and Apollo Computer Inc., said it will lay off most of its 3,700 employees for six days.

Telegraphers end strike on 2-year accord

Some 6,500 members of the Telegraph Workers ended a 10-day strike against Western Union and will vote by mail ballot on ratification of a new two-year contract.

Still unsettled is the parallel strike by 600 members of Communications Workers Local 1177, which represents Western Union employees in New York and New Jersey.

At issue in the dispute was the extent of concessions workers were called on to make in an effort to keep Western Union solvent after a heavy deficit last year.

Members of both unions had agreed to a temporary 10-percent pay cut last December, which has now been restored. The new agreement with UTW provides for a 3-percent additional raise in the second year of the contract. It also gives workers a share of profits if the company returns to profitability during the contract period.

Most of the concessions the UTW agreed to were modifications of Western Union's original demands. Thus present workers will not lose severance pay entitlement they have already earned, but others will be limited to 20 weeks. About 1,000 of the 6,500 workers covered by the UTW contract have been on a 35-hour workweek. Their schedule will be raised to 40 hours in two steps, rather than immediately.

Agreement to a union-proposed plan for cost containment on health care resulted in a smaller charge to workers than Western Union management had sought to impose.

The company backed off on an issue important to the union and agreed to retain the present prohibition on contracting out of work.

UTW President Richard Brockert termed the settlement "a very tough contract for us because we had to make concessions." But the company had serious financial problems, he stressed. "We hope to put them in a better position to market their services," he said, and to "turn things around so there will be more jobs."

John B. Geagan dies, SEIU organizing chief

Baltimore—John B. Geagan, general organizer for the Service Employees, died Aug. 4 of pneumonia at Johns Hopkins Hospital while under treatment for leukemia. He was 53.

Geagan served as a business representative for SEIU Local 99 in Los Angeles and as research director of the union's Southern California Council before becoming general organizer in 1968.

Put ideas to test, labor grads urged

The nine newest graduates of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies were urged to help bring "a new creativity, a new vision and a new sophistication to the labor movement."

AFL-CIO Vice President John J. Sweeney told the new graduates that "programs such as the one you have completed open the door for us and lets us develop and test our new ideas."

Noting how new ideas sometimes are stiffled, Sweeney said, "I believe in free speech, but I would like to ban from use in the labor movement, the phrase, 'We've always done it that way.'"

Sweeney, who is president of the Service Employees and a trustee of the studies center, challenged the unionists to create different ways to achieve labor's goals and called attention to the AFL-CIO Executive Council report on the Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions.

The nine received bachelor of arts degrees through the center's external degree program run in cooperation with Antioch College. Unionists can work toward a college degree while continuing their regular union jobs. So far, 80 trade unionists have graduated from the program and all received some college credits for their union work experience.

Like most of the more than 130 unionists now in the program, the new graduates brought with them college credits earned previously. Since enrolling, they have spent one week every six months in residence at the center attending classes where they were introduced to new courses of study that they pursued during the following six months.

Under the labor studies program, they earned credits in such subjects as organizing, collective bargaining, industrial sociology, science and society, economic policy, labor law, labor and government, and labor history.

Issac Hunt, dean of the Antioch School of Law, presented the students with their degrees.

The graduates are: Charles R. Barnes of the Laborers, Atlanta; Norbert W. Benson, Electronics Workers, Rochester, N.Y.; Curtis T. Ezzell, United Transportation Union, Macon, Ga.; Edna J. Miller, Food & Commercial Workers, Alexandria, Va.; John T. Ruel, Iron Workers, Chicago; Roy Silbert, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, Atlantic City, N.J.; Raymond J. Simonetti, Jr., Operating Engineers, Baltimore; Thomas E. Smith, Graphic Communications Union, Richmond, Va., and Frederick W. Stroud, Rubber Workers, Danville, Va.

The Penslinger

PRESIDENT REAGAN has served notice that he will have his veto pen poised to pounce on any appropriations bill that carries funds for government programs that the White House wants to end but Congress wants to keep.

And while the President didn't say flat-out that he will veto a relatively mild South African sanctions bill, he strongly suggested that's what he intends.

The Reagan threat is government by veto, in which nothing opposed by the White House can become law without a two-thirds vote to override from both the House and Senate.

That's one way to run the government, but not a very good one. Certainly there are times when a President must exercise his veto authority for the national good. But on a long-term basis, there has to be a certain accommodation between the legislative and the executive branches of government.

Until now, it has been a largely one-sided accommodation. A Republican Senate, anxious not to embarrass a popular Republican president, has sought to avoid sending him legislation he would feel compelled to veto. One byproduct of this reticence was that during the depths of the recession, a number of needed economic recovery measures that passed the House by bipartisan majorities were left to die in the Senate. So we've already had a taste of government by veto threat.

On occasion, to his credit, the President has been persuaded to bend his rigid position to accommodate the congressional will. And perhaps there is a bit of bluff in Reagan's flaunting of his veto pen. Let's hope so, because otherwise the nation and the machinery of government are in trouble.

FORTUNATELY, Congress has thus far denied to the President the power he has sought to veto a section of an appropriations bill while letting other provisions become law.

Legislation is a process of negotiation and the final product is often as carefully crafted as a collective bargaining agreement. More than many people realize, the executive branch of government is frequently a party to the negotiating process. The question is whether it is to become the dominant partner.

As a matter of constitutional principle, there are sound and compelling reasons for Congress to resist the so-called line-item veto as an attempt to stack the deck.

In practice, given the poised pen of President Reagan, adding to his veto power would be a disaster.

'Our Source of Strength'

THE LABOR MOVEMENT is facing challenges. Unfair employers who still dream of absolute power over the lives of workers have been asserting their right to redefine wage levels and working conditions as they alone see fit, and they have had a lot of help.

Many of the laws and instruments of government that were created to prevent the worst excesses of unfair employers have been subverted and placed in the hands of people who have no intention of administering or enforcing them.

We have been through difficult periods before. Unions are no strangers to adversity. Our unions were under challenge by powerful employers working hand in glove with hostile courts, hostile legislatures and hostile administrations. Laws were designed to protect and reinforce the power of the employer.

We met and overcame those challenges, and in the process we transformed the society we live in. I am confident that we can overcome all of the challenges we face today.

But to prevail, we are going to have to summon up, from every level of the labor movement, the spirit of solidarity and common purpose that has been, since the beginning, our only source of strength.

We have to carry the trade union message to every man and woman who works for a living, and we have to involve all of our rank-and-file members in the trade union mission.

Selective statistics hide drop in household income

By Press Associates, Inc.

The Reagan Administration always has been nimble-fingered in fashioning information and statistics to suit its purposes.

The Administration also has been featuring a magic act in which longstanding government statistical programs disappear like rabbits into a top hat.

But instead of a magic wand, it uses its sleight of hand to materialize its familiar budget ax. At least 50 major federal statistical programs which published important information about the nation's changing economy and workforce have been eliminated or reduced by the Administration.

Now the Administration plans to discontinue an annual Census Bureau report which has been churning out some embarrassing information. Called the after-tax household income report, it is not included in the Commerce Dept.'s budget request for fiscal year 1986. A few thousand dollars would be saved in the Administration's near trillion-dollar budget request to Congress.

On the surface, the report seems to confirm the impression rendered by the White House artists of illusion that the 1981 tax cuts put more spendable income into the hands of most Americans. Statistical reports can mislead if they omit pertinent information. This is a case in point.

Missing facts

The report showed that average household income—total household income adjusted for taxes and inflation and divided by the number of households—rose by 1.7 percent between 1980 and 1983. So far, so good.

What the report failed to say was that real after-tax income for about two-thirds of all households was lower in 1983 than in 1980.

It also failed to include the more meaningful statistic of the change in "median" household income, which fell by 1.6 percent between 1980 and 1983. The median household is the mid-point, where half the nation's households have more income and the other half have less.

The average income change rendered in the Administration's report is far less meaningful because it was pulled up by the large income shifts to high-income households. After-tax real income rose by 5.4 percent, or an average $1,480, for the highest fifth of the nation's households between 1980 and 1983.

Incomes rose even more for the top 5 percent households whose incomes start at $63,000. Their incomes rose by 7.7 percent, or an average $3,320.

Middle class pays

On the other hand, upper middle-class households—the second highest fifth of the income range—lost about $250 in spending power during the three year period. As for the broad middle-class population in the middle fifth income range, they lost most of all, $560.

Households in the second lowest fifth lost about $480 in 1983 dollars, and those in the lowest fifth averaged a $190 loss.

All this information is available thanks to a House Budget Committee economist who filled in the blank spots of the Administration's report and compared its data with earlier Census Bureau reports.

The Budget Committee found that nearly $25 billion had been shifted to the upper fifth income group from the four less affluent groups between 1980 and 1983. About half this shift was found to have resulted from the 1981 Reagan "tax cuts." The other half came about because job losses during the 1981-82 recession and social program cuts depressed income in the middle and lower ranges.

If the Administration proceeds with its plan to discontinue the after-tax household income report and Congress goes along, the nation will take a further step into ignorance about facts that are necessary in formulating economic and tax policy.

"Ignorance is bliss," it has been said. But that's only for those who seek to control the flow of information for devious ends, leaving the people uninformed.

MEMO FROM COPE

Party 'Realignment' De-aligned

GOP Stunned by Dem Texas Election Win

Short of sending in George Bush to sing "Git Along Little Dogie" while chawing on a half-pound plug of tobacco, the Republicans threw everything they had into the recent special House election in Texas' First Congressional District.

They spent $1.5 million. Spelled out, that's one and one-half million dollars—more than has ever been spent by one candidate in all but a few House races.

They ran a one-time football star from Texas A&M, Edd Hargett. They picked a district where President Reagan walloped Walter Mondale last November and is still the most popular person this side of Davey Crockett.

They desperately wanted this win to back up public boasts they've been making since Reagan's re-election victory that "party realignment" without question has occurred.

What a letdown. Their candidate lost to COPE-endorsed Democrat Jim Chapman. It was close, but given the money and the big guns the GOP turned loose on the district, it's a wonder Chapman survived at all let alone got elected. He beat Hargett by 51-49 percent—52,670 to 50,737 (one vote counts!).

Reagan's coat-tails have shrunk since 1984 (they weren't all that long at the time), and this alone must cause great dismay in GOP ranks. If the person more than the party has made them formidable, what happens as his political pulling power wanes?

In the special election, Hargett's campaign saturated the district in the final few days with television and radio ads featuring the President. Reportedly, most voters either were uninfluenced by the President's participation or wondered what he was doing telling people in the district how to vote.

The GOP had been riding high since last year and had begun to look bigger, stronger, smarter and more purposeful than any political party can be. Simultaneously, Democrats were looking dispirited and confused, mostly because they were dispirited and confused. National polls showed the GOP practically neck and neck with them in party allegiance among voters. A special push by the Republicans in four states—still in progress—aims at persuading 100,000 Democrats to switch party registration, and they are confident they'll reach that goal.

So, for Democrats, victory in the First District was a much-needed upper.

It demonstrated that (1) Republicans are mortal, (2) the President's impact on behalf of his party's candidates is ebbing, even if his personal popularity isn't, (3) the GOP has no monopoly on the issues.

Indeed, the election was an issue, as much as a personality and/or party, competition. The district has 9.4 percent unemployment, two points higher than the national figure. Many workers there either have lost—or are threatened with loss of—their job to low-wage imports.

Chapman understood the depth of fear in the district about unfair foreign competition. Hargett—like so many in his party—misread and misunderstood the issue. He said—and Chapman wisely and widely exploited the quote—that he couldn't see "what trade policies have to do with bringing jobs to East Texas."

In addition, Hargett campaign caps distributed to supporters in the district bore the label "Made in Taiwan." This only confirmed the suspicions that he was insensitive to the trade issue.

While the victory has got to satisfy Democrats, they shouldn't misread it, either, as a sharp and clear-cut turn for the better in their own political fortunes. Chapman won in a district whose previous representative—Democrat Sam Hall, who got a judicial appointment from Reagan—triumphed unopposed less than a year ago. Hall was conservative (73 percent "wrong" on the AFL-CIO voting record), and Chapman's not exactly a fire-breathing progressive.

However, on basic jobs and trade issues—and many others critical to working people—he should be a consistent supporter.

And that's a whole lot more than his GOP opponent would have been had "realignment" shipped him to Washington a winner.

Odds 'n Ends

TWO WHO ANNOUNCE they are not running for office in 1986, thus shutting off speculation that they might, are University of Georgia football coach Vince Dooley, and Edward M. Kennedy, Jr., son of Senator Ted and nephew of the late President JFK. Dooley had been rumored as possible candidate for Democratic Senate nomination in Georgia to run against incumbent Mack Mattingly. Right now, he says, he's too busy getting his "Dawgs" ready to face arch-rival Alabama in the season opener, and to delay entry into the Senate race until post-season would make an effective candidacy remote. Kennedy had been considering seeking the U.S. House seat being vacated by Speaker Tip O'Neill, a seat once held by his Uncle Jack. Instead, he opts to continue working as an advocate for programs for the disabled.

NOW, IT'S 'NEW COLLAR' voters candidates and their campaigns have to worry about courting. That, at least, is what Univ. of Mass. political science Prof. Ralph Whitehead says. He says Yuppies are out, in fact never existed as major force on national political scene. Defines "new collar" voters as offspring of blue collar families, claims they could form huge base for whichever party woos them successfully. Whitehead describes "new collars" this way: Middle Americans, under age 45, annual family income $20,000 to $40,000, mostly in service-type employment rather than traditional "blue collar" fields, politically independent. Further, according to Whitehead, "new collars" comprise 15 percent of electorate, lead all other categories in ticket-splitting, went strong for Reagan but strong as well for Democratic candidates for U.S. House and Senate.

REAGAN 1981 CUTS in Aid to Families With Dependent Children leave 442,000 families hurting, suffering substantial income loss and, as yet, unable to offset it. Most were families whose head worked full-time at low-pay jobs. General Accounting Office study reveals most lost Medicaid coverage also. Income loss varied geographically but in all cases was severe. GAO says in Boston, average income of family dumped by Reagan from AFDC—including earnings, welfare and food stamps—was $925 a month before the Reagan cuts, $801 after them. In Dallas, income went from $731 to $529; in Memphis from $649 to $479; in Milwaukee from $1,004 to 788; in Syracuse from $871 to $717.

BETTER LATE THAN NEVER is support for Fritz Mondale from, of all folks, Howard Baker—former Senator from Tennessee, who declined to run for re-election in 1984 and is going for 1988 presidential nomination. Baker recently proposed new taxes along lines suggested by Mondale in his 1984 campaign which then and since, have been both rejected and ridiculed by President Reagan. Baker says flatly that Reagan's adamant opposition to any tax increases to help reduce deficit is "wrong." He says, "There are some things only a Republican can do and some things only a Democrat can do. It is my hope that for a Republican to propose (a tax hike) will be an exercise in realism."

BAKER AND OTHERS seeking GOP 1988 nomination filed financial reports recently with Federal Election Commission. Vice President Bush leads with $816,000 for his PAC. Rep. Jack Kemp has $733,000. Baker reports $507,000 and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole files $88,000.

COMPUTERIZED SYSTEMS for voting are wide open to possible tampering, some experts charge. One claims such systems "centralize the opportunity for fraud." Indeed, one company that provides computer vote-counting systems has already been accused of rigging elections and is subject of court challenges. In 1984, votes of 60 percent of voters were tallied by one or another of the seven computerized systems on the market.

RETIREMENT FROM HOUSE for ultra-conservative Marjorie Holt (Md.) now midway through seventh term. This opens possibility of Democratic gain in district thought to be pretty solid for GOP. One contender for Democratic nomination is Tom McMillen, journeyman professional basketball player—like Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) a one-time college All-American and a Rhodes scholar.

LITTLE OR NO TAX paid in 1983 by nearly 30,000 individuals and couples with incomes of $250,000 and up, Treasury report reveals. Figure includes 3,000 who earned more than $1 million. Income was sheltered from taxation primarily by limited partnership arrangements, the "in" tax-dodge of recent years. Paper losses by partnerships saved 300 $1 million-plus earners and $1,900 at $250,000 and over from any tax at all.

UNCHECKED FEDERAL DEFICITS will send interest rates alone on government debt to at least $234 billion a year by 1990. That's about $640 million a day just to service the debt. In 1980, interest on federal deficit cost taxpayers $53 billion. We face almost a five-fold increase.

Council presses programs to put nation back to work

World action demanded on South Africa

Pittsburgh—Intensified international pressure on South Africa is needed to end government-imposed racial discrimination, the AFL-CIO said.

It urged an immediate dialogue between the Botha regime and the democratic and peaceful forces in South Africa to end the "cruel, unjust and violent system of apartheid."

The troubled nation's black trade union movement offers one of the few remaining means through which black and white South Africans can hold rational discussions, the Executive Council said.

"That is all the more reason why this movement should be strengthened at every level," it stressed.

The council called on all the free trade unions of the world to pledge full and continuing support to the black South African workers in their struggle for fundamental human and trade union rights.

A council statement noted that the Administration's policy of quiet diplomacy, or "constructive engagement," with Pretoria has not brought about any visible substantial results.

"No American policy can encourage real changes in South Africa unless it offers hope and material support to the democratic forces that are working for such changes within that unhappy land," the council declared.

Warnings unheeded

The AFL-CIO, which has been in the forefront of efforts to help South Africa's black workers obtain basic human rights, has repeatedly warned that the refusal of the South African government to dismantle the racist apartheid system can only lead to unrest and bloodshed.

"That warning has, tragically, been borne out over the last 11 months in which violence has claimed some 600 lives, 50 in the last week alone," the council said. "The imposition of a state of emergency indicates how perilously close South Africa is edging toward a breakdown in law and order."

Government action has not quelled the disorder, the council observed. Instead, turmoil has spread in several South African black townships.

In the kitchen

After touring ravaged steel communities along the Monongahela River outside of Pittsburgh, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Steelworkers President Lynn Williams take a lunch break at the Rainbow Kitchen and chat with its director, Bob Anderson, right. The kitchen provides meals, groceries and other assistance to hundreds of victims of steel mill shutdowns in the Homestead, Pa., area. (Story and more photos, Page 5.)

Weak federal rules hit on toxic chemical leaks

Pittsburgh—Strong regulations governing hazardous chemicals must be immediately adopted by federal job safety and environmental agencies, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

Citing the tragedy in Bhopal, India, last December that killed more than 2,600 people and injured nearly 200,000 others, the council stressed that none of the conditions that led to the Bhopal disaster would have been violations of workplace health and safety standards in the United States.

Nor apparently were the conditions involved in the Aug. 11 release of some 500 gallons of aldicarb oxime from Union Carbide's plant in Institute, W.Va., the council said. In that malfunction, 142 persons, including five Machinists, were overcome by the white toxic cloud that settled over a portion of the town.

Two days later, about 500 gallons of a nontoxic hydraulic fluid leaked from Union Carbide's South Charleston plant, just four miles from the Institute facility.

Initiatives drafted after Bhopal by the Environmental Protection Agency and Occupational Safety & Health Administration to provide voluntary emergency planning and inspections of chemical plants in eight cities have already been proven inadequate by the the accident at the Institute plant, the council said.

An international trade union investigation into the accident in Bhopal showed "unsafe process design, storage of large volumes of toxic chemicals, inadequate maintenance, faulty equipment and lack of disaster planning" contributed to the severity of the incident, the council pointed out.

Machinists Safety Director George Robinson said the lack of federal regulations covering the chemical industry and OSHA's

Calls imports major factor in job losses

By John M. Barry

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO called on the Reagan Administration and Congress to "get to work to put Americans back to work."

The federation's Executive Council, meeting in this city whose workforce has been ravaged by plant shutdowns, warned that the American economy is in "a weak and risky condition" and facing even higher unemployment than the current 7.3 percent official rate.

The council pointed to "a tidal wave of imports" as a major factor in eroding the nation's industrial base and causing a major part of the joblessness. In statements adopted at its summer meeting here, the council said the U.S. trade deficit has reached crisis proportions, and it is up to Congress "to take the right steps to resolve America's massive trade problem." Congress has the responsibility, the council stressed, to protect the national economy and basic industries and to "conserve the jobs of all American workers."

Discussing the statement on the trade crisis at his opening-day news conference, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland cited growing alarm among the public and "a widespread and deeply rooted demand" for action to overcome the trade imbalance.

Close-up view

The day before the council meeting opened, Kirkland along with Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and other federation officials accompanied Steelworkers President Lynn Williams on a tour of Pittsburgh's depressed industrial areas, getting a close-up view of the bleak picture facing laid-off Steelworkers.

"The steel industry has been suffering perhaps longer than others," Kirkland told reporters. But the impact of unfair foreign trade practices is spreading, he said, and was the "one constant theme" that pervaded his meetings and discussions with rank-and-file workers in dozens of cities since last spring.

"They're feeling the pain," Kirkland said, in the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest, the textile and apparel mills of the South, in the Midwest areas heavily dependent on the farm equipment industry, and in areas affected by the widespread shutdown of oil refineries.

"It's happening to a lot of regions, a lot of states, a lot of communities and a lot of people, and I think Congress is going to respond to that," Kirkland declared.

The statements on the national economy and the trade crisis were among a series of policy actions by the council during its three-day meeting here which are detailed elsewhere in this issue.

At its opening session, the council accepted the resignation of Vice President

Double standard mars tax reform

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO wants Congress to reshape President Reagan's tax reform proposals and end the double standard that favors income from investment over earnings from wages and salaries.

A genuine tax reform, the Executive Council said, would bring in the revenue needed "to run the government, promote economic and social progress, provide for the common defense and reduce the budget deficit."

The council welcomed sections of the Administration tax package that would lessen the burden on low-income households and narrow some corporate tax loopholes. But a double standard on income would remain, the council protested. And other changes sought by the Administration, such as taxation of health benefits, would add new burdens on workers.

If the Reagan tax plan is adopted, the Executive Council protested, "millions of middle-income Americans will pay higher taxes while the vast majority of wealthy Americans will pay less."

Corporate tax shrinkage

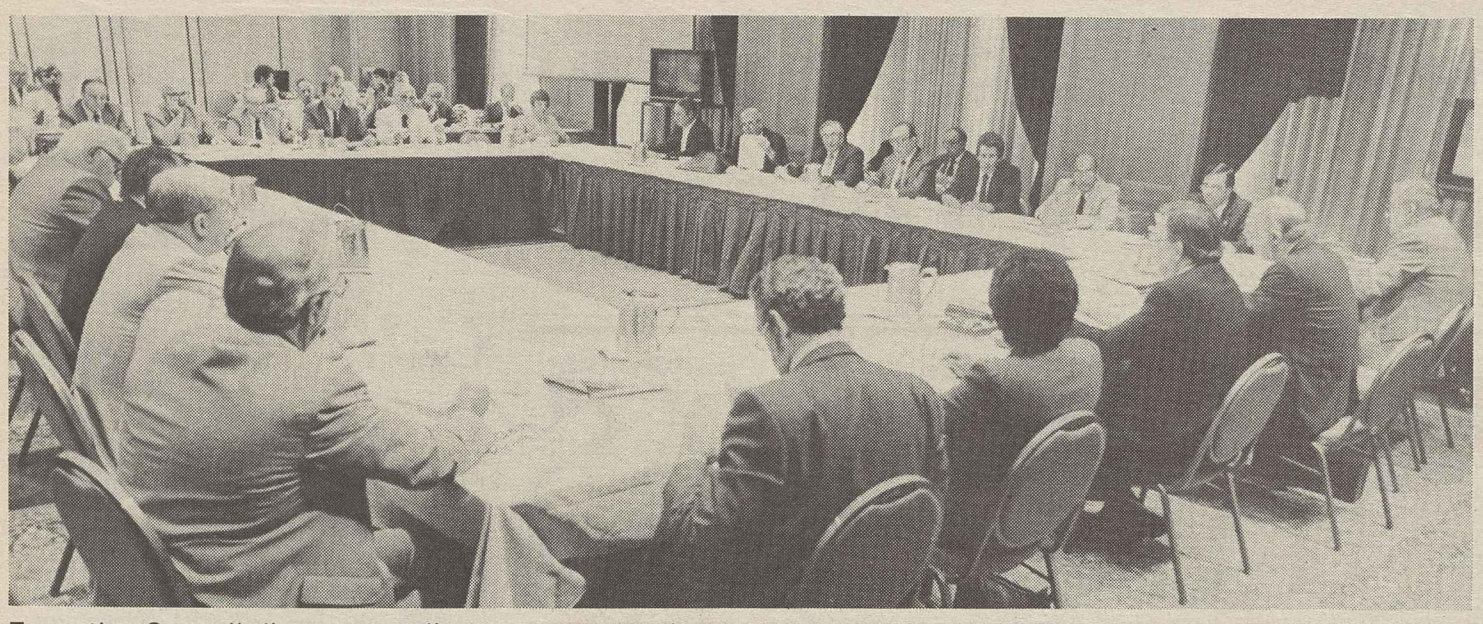
The council statement noted the steady shrinkage of the corporate income tax as a source of revenue, to the point where last year "dozens of giant, profitable corporations paid less income taxes than the lowest-paid employee who punches a time clock."

The statement reiterated the AFL-CIO's firm opposition to taxation of health insurance or other work-related benefits.

It warned of the detrimental effects of limiting the deduction for state and local taxes. And it protested targeting young working families for a higher tax burden by eliminating both the child care tax credit and the second-earner deduction.



Needed revenues can be raised by strengthening the corporate minimum tax and denying the deep cut in the corporate tax rate proposed by Reagan, the council said.

It urged a scaleback of the sharp tax-rate reduction Reagan has proposed for taxpayers in the highest-income brackets. The Executive Council discusses policy statements at its three-day meeting in Pittsburgh.

Rail unions backed in call for public sale of Conrail

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO supports rail labor's position favoring a public sale of Conrail and opposing the Administration's plan to sell the government-run freight line to the Norfolk Southern Corp.

In a statement at its summer meeting, the Executive Council said a public sale of the carrier would insure its viability as an efficient railroad system, assure the public of dependable railroad service at reasonable rates, and protect the jobs and livelihoods of thousands of Conrail and other railroad workers.

"The proposal by the Reagan Administration to hand the system over to Norfolk Southern would not produce a fair return to the Treasury because of tax loopholes available to the purchaser," the council said.

"The proposal would create a rail monopoly that would have an adverse effect on the public, shippers, industries, communities, and other railroads.

"It would also mean massive layoffs for Conrail employees and for many employees of other railroads."

The Railway Labor Executives Association, representing 19 unions with members employed by the carrier, announced last month that most of the unions favored selling Conrail to the investment firm Morgan Stanley & Co., which would sell the line's stock to the public.

Conrail was created by Congress from several bankrupt and ailing railroads to maintain vital railroad service to the Northeast, Midwest and Middle Atlantic regions. The government owns 85 percent of its holding, employees the remainder.

The system, which today is in a profit-making position, provides dependable rail shipping to the public and jobs for 35,000.

The federal law that created Conrail stipulated that it should be sold to divest the government of permanent ownership.

Funding pressed to aid Endowment for Democracy

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO reiterated its support of the National Endowment for Democracy, and urged Congress to provide the necessary funds for it to carry out its functions.

Noting that NED has encountered strong resistance from both ends of the political spectrum, where isolationism runs strong, the Executive Council said the work of the private organization is vital.

The agency was established in 1983 to assist labor, business, the two main political parties, and other nongovernmental groups to help their counterparts in other countries strengthen democratic institutions, promote human rights, and foster pluralism.

"Our own democratic institutions cannot survive in isolation," the council declared. "Freedom of association cannot be secure here if it is snuffed out in the rest of the world. Nor can peace be assured in a world in which ordinary people lack the means of expression and organization to influence their leaders."

Critics on the right oppose NED on budgetary grounds while some on the left see aiding democratic institutions as a form of interventionism.

"The AFL-CIO rejects both of these views," the council said. "We believe that private-sector efforts on behalf of democratic institution-building abroad are vital to a foreign policy centered on human rights."

White House rights retreat condemned

Pittsburgh—Affirmative action requirements are an important weapon in the battle against job discrimination and should be continued, the Executive Council said.

The council took note of news reports that the White House staff had drafted for submission to President Reagan a proposal to revoke a 1968 executive order establishing affirmative action requirements for firms doing business with the federal government. Government contractors must now make a good-faith effort to hire a representative number of qualified blacks, Hispanics or other minorities.

That policy, established under President Lyndon B. Johnson, would be replaced by an opposite approach, the news reports indicated. The White House staff proposal would bar the government from using hiring statistics or any form of numerical goal as a test of equal opportunity employment.

"Such a move would represent a giant step backward in the fight against employment discrimination," the Executive Council protested.

The AFL-CIO continues to support "strong affirmative action," the council stressed. It called on the Administration "to cease its constant search for ways to weaken the nation's civil rights laws, and instead to commit itself to enforcing those laws vigorously and effectively."

White House press spokesman Larry Speakes told reporters that the proposal was not official "Administration policy" because it had not yet been presented to President Reagan for final approval. He said the issue is on the agenda of the Domestic Policy Council, made up of eight Cabinet secretaries.

Memorial tribute cites Lee Minton's service

Pittsburgh—A memorial tribute to former AFL-CIO Vice President Lee Minton was presented in a statement by the federation's Executive Council, on which he had served for two decades.

Before his retirement, Minton was president of the Glass Bottle Blowers and was president emeritus of its successor union, the Glass, Pottery, Plastics & Allied Workers at the time of his death on June 22.

Unions urged to spurn bids by Soviet-controlled WFTU

Pittsburgh—The Executive Council urged all AFL-CIO affiliates and their members to shun contacts with the communist-run World Federation of Trade Unions, and to join with other free world unions to promote international worker solidarity.

Promoting free trade unionism can best be done through the Brussels-based International Confederation of Free Trade Unions with which the AFL-CIO is affiliated, the council said in a statement at its summer meeting here.

"The ICFTU, representing 145 unions with 82 million members in 99 countries, is the forum in which the free trade unions of the world seek to develop cooperative activities and common strategies to defend the rights and advance the interests of working people," the council observed.

The WFTU, based in Prague and controlled by the Soviet Union, is engaged in a continuous attack on the policies of the ICFTU and its affiliates, the council noted. For example, the communist labor group and its front organizations have launched a propaganda war on the international activities of the AFL-CIO at the same time they are encouraging American trade unionists to take part in meetings and exchanges with WFTU-affiliated unions.

"The WFTU's decision to accept into membership the official government-sponsored 'unions' of Poland, after the government had transferred to them the confiscated funds and property of Solidarnosc, tells us all we need to know about the real character of the WFTU and its commitment to workers' rights," the council said.

"The WFTU's defense of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and its relentless attacks on Israel are further evidence of its slavish adherence to the Moscow line."

The council urged all affiliates in their travels or relations with unions abroad, to work with ICFTU affiliates to promote free trade union solidarity.

Boycott set on Trojan luggage products

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO Executive Council condemned the union-busting tactics of Trojan Luggage Co. and called upon all union members not to buy its products.

The council noted that the Memphis, Tenn., company forced members of Furniture Workers Local 282 to go on strike in April after management submitted a "final offer" demanding drastic contract concessions.

Trojan employees average only $4.96 an hour, even though the company enjoys favorable profits. Yet the company is demanding a three-year wage freeze and changes in the health care plan that would force Local 282 members to pay up to $60 a month of the premium. For the past 20 years, the firm paid the full premium.

Five years ago, after the company was acquired by Dunbar & Associates of Prospect, Ky., it employed 700. The new owners began shifting production from Memphis to the low-wage countries of Taiwan and Korea, and laid off all but the current workforce of 64.

The company sells luggage under the brand names of Hampton, Newport, Vagabond, Nassau, Dante, Going to Grandma's, Monterey, Aspen, Magnum, Biscayne, and Executive Briefs.

New approaches respond to committee report

Pittsburgh—An extensive review of progress on key recommendations of the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work absorbed the Executive Council for most of the afternoon of the first day of its summer meeting here.

Federation President Lane Kirkland noted that more than 76,000 copies of the committee's report, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," have been distributed among AFL-CIO affiliates, local unions, and state and local central bodies since the report was issued last February.

Kirkland also reported that 1,000 discussion guides have been sent out by the Dept. of Education and that the report was a major topic at this year's regional conferences. A special briefing on the report and a discussion of its key points was held at the George Meany Center for leaders of AFL-CIO affiliates not represented on the council.

The council also heard a report from the Committee on State & Local Central Bodies, which discussed ways of strengthening state central bodies, increasing the affiliation of local unions and finding new methods of financing the state bodies. The council voiced support of the objectives outlined by the committee and directed it to continue to explore ways of developing these proposals.

Additional efforts

Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue described these additional efforts to implement recommendations set forth by the Committee on the Evolution of Work:

- A task force composed of union education directors has been formed to expand the "Labor in the Schools" program.
- The "One-on-One" program is being put into place on a trial basis in Georgia, Missouri and Idaho. This undertaking, Kirkland said at a news conference between council sessions, "holds great promise in terms of strengthening the labor movement in all of its activities."

It involves the development of a cadre of trade union activists "who will systematically meet with every trade union member, including those who hardly ever show up at conventional union meetings" and who otherwise relate to their union only when they have grievances or when their contract is up for renewal.

"The theory behind this," Kirkland said, "is that we cannot expect to attend or develop the level of awareness and support among rank-and-file members that the movement ought to have—and needs—by simply waiting until they show up at a union meeting and talking only to those who come. There are too many elements competing for every person's time and attention. . . ."

- Training films are being worked up by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the federation's television production arm, for use in the One-on-One program, and LIPA also is conducting a series of regional workshops to help unionists develop effective TV communication skills. Efforts to expand the use of the electronic media also will include a satellite feed of special Labor Day programs, making them available to TV stations around the country.
- A new approach to organizing is being taken by five unions in a coordinated campaign directed at a single national target—Blue Cross/Blue Shield. The unions are the Auto Workers, Office & Professional Employees, Service Employees, Communications Workers and Food & Commercial Workers. They will pool staff and other resources in the campaign to sign up an estimated 37,000 organizable workers employed by the Blues across the country. About 9,000 of those workers are already represented by the OPEIU and UAW.
- A survey has been commissioned to determine if a range or package of benefits can be developed that would appeal to workers as a membership benefit exclusive of contract coverage.

Council presses action to restore jobs

Demands new trade policies to halt 'tidal wave of imports'

Glenn E. Watts and elected his successor as president of the Communications Workers, Morton Bahr, to fill the vacancy. It thanked Watts for his long service to the federation and wished him well in retirement. The council also paid a memorial tribute to former Vice President Lee W. Minton, who died recently.

The increasing use of the electronic media by the federation and its affiliates was evident at the council session, with film or video presentations accompanying a half-dozen statements and reports. For example, a television production by the State, County & Municipal Employees on social security was viewed by the council before adopting a statement marking the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Social Security Act. Vice President J. C. Turner presented a film produced by the Operating Engineers for use in the campaign against the practice by some contractors of "double-breasting," that is, setting up parallel, non-union companies to skirt their union contract obligations.

The Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the federation's television production arm, presented a tape prepared for a Labor Video Bulletin on black trade unions in South Africa. LIPA also showed excerpts from a work in progress on health care cost containment, training films for the "One-on-One" program, and "Singing for the Union," a program on labor songs scheduled for showing on public TV stations across the country over the Labor Day weekend.

The keynote of the council meeting was set, however, with the early adoption of the statements on the national economy and the trade crisis, focusing on the high levels of unemployment that beset Pittsburgh and other major industrial centers. The council pointed out that the official national jobless rate has been stuck at or near 7.3 percent for the past year. And the 8.5 million unemployed workers covered by that rate do not include the 1.1 million "discouraged" workers and the 5.5 million part-time workers who want full-time jobs.

The council observed that unemployment has been above 7 percent in only nine years since World War II, but five of those years have been the five years of the Reagan Administration—1981 through 1985. Warning that a new downturn is likely this year or early in 1986, the council said the next recession will push unemployment even higher than the current levels.

Just a few days after the council issued this warning, the Federal Reserve Board reported that production by the nation's factories, mines and utilities went up only a meager two-tenths of 1 percent in July, extending the yearlong industrial stagnation.

Lacking jobless benefits

Kirkland, responding to reporters' questions, said organized labor is doing its best to arouse concern over the fact that only 26 percent of the workers officially recognized as unemployed are drawing any unemployment insurance benefits at all. What benefits there are, he said, usually terminate after 26 weeks, and "then the family is left to their own devices or to go through the embarrassment and pain of welfare and charity."

He charged that it was "an atrocity" for Congress to yield to the Reagan Administration and its budget authority and let the system of extended unemployment benefits expire.

The United States has the harshest unemployment insurance system among all the industrial democracies of the world, Kirkland observed.

"In Europe, England, Germany, France, there are systems for providing assistance to unemployed workers that virtually never end," he said. "They have a much more generous level of benefits and longer duration of standard benefits. . . . And there is a backup structure that goes on and on. . . . We need to overhaul the unemployment system and make it effective in dealing with human problems."

The council placed most of the blame for the wave of plant closings, the slowdown in economic growth, the persistence of high unemployment and the loss of factory jobs on "the strong, negative impact of the nation's unrealistic trade policies and the overvalued dollar." It reiterated the federation's call for specific emergency action to revitalize the economy and promote full employment. And it renewed labor's demand for a comprehensive program to deal with the trade crisis.

Congress is awakening to the need for new trade legislation, the council noted, and it stressed that this should be a package that deals with the overvalued dollar, deep deficits with particular countries and with the special problems of particular industries.

Major contributions

In other actions, the council heard a report from Vice President Murray Finley on the activities of the Labor Committee for the Martin Luther King holiday observance and approved a $10,000 contribution to help finance the committee's promotional efforts.

Another $10,000 contribution was voted for the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum fund, and Kirkland renewed his appeal for additional contributions from affiliates to help make the campaign a success.

Vice President Joyce Miller reported on a recent visit to four African nations by a team of 11 American women trade unionists to study the situation of African women on the job and in their unions. Vice President Barbara Hutchinson also was a member of the team.

Sec.-Treas. Donahue reported on the state of the federation's finances and on progress toward construction of the George Meany Memorial Archives at the Labor Studies Center campus.

Donahue joined Kirkland in describing steps being taken to implement recommendations of the council's Committee on the Evolution of Work. Other committee reports were given by Kirkland on political works and by Vice Presidents Wayne Glenn on state and local central bodies, John Sweeney on health care and on restrictive legislation, Gerald McEntee on the balanced budget amendment, Al Heaps on community services, Frederick O'Neal on civil rights, and Owen Bieber on South Africa.

Kirkland announced the creation of a new ad hoc committee of the council to deal with labor's role in marking the coming bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution. Its members are Vice Presidents Al Shanker, Patrick Campbell, Frank Drozak, McEntee, O'Neal and Miller.

Contributions were approved by the council to the National Planning Association, the NAACP, League for Industrial Democracy, Jewish Labor Committee, Center for the Study of Social Policy, Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition, United Negro College Fund, Citizens for Tax Justice, and Economic Education for the Clergy.

The next council meeting will be held in Anaheim, Calif., Oct. 26, the Saturday before the AFL-CIO convention opens.

Bill endorsed to end deportation of Salvadorans

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO declared its support of a bill in Congress to require the Attorney General to suspend the detention and deportation of displaced Salvadorans in the United States pending an investigation by the General Accounting Office.

Some 250,000 Salvadorans have entered the United States since 1980 and another 35,000 have been repatriated through deportation or voluntary departure, the Executive Council observed. Of the thousands who have asked for political asylum, however, only 3.3 percent have been granted it.

Suspension of deportations would begin on the date of enactment of the bill introduced by Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-N.M.) with bipartisan support, and remain in effect for 270 congressional days following submission of the GAO report to the Speaker of the House.

The GAO study would focus on the conditions of life and security of displaced Salvadorans still in Central America and the circumstances confronting Salvadorans who have been repatriated from the United States. It would also review the procedures governing the treatment of displaced Salvadorans by the United States compared with its treatment of other aliens in similar circumstances.

Safeguards urged for genetic tests

Pittsburgh—New and sensitive tests for damage to the genetic material in human cells could be helpful in identifying previously unknown hazards in the workplace, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said, but it called for strict safeguards to prevent abuse.

Adopting a substitute for a resolution referred to it by the last federation convention, the council said labor supports genetic monitoring tests as another tool in the fight to detect and eliminate workplace health hazards.

But it stressed that these tests must be made under "strict conditions of confidentiality," with adequate counseling and medical follow-up for the workers and a commitment to correct any hazardous conditions uncovered by the studies.

As for the genetic screening tests that some companies are experimenting with, the council warned that as a mass screening tool they have not proved their value and could do more harm than good.

Raising concerns

"Widespread genetic screening could lead to a new form of job discrimination based on genetic background by attempting to screen out so-called susceptible workers," the statement observed.

"Genetic screening could divert resources and attention from the effort to correct hazardous conditions. The AFL-CIO remains convinced that the real risk factors in the workplace are unlabeled chemicals, inadequate ventilation systems, badly maintained equipment and unsafe work practices —not the genetic makeup of the workers."

The statement said any efforts to protect high-risk workers through legislation or collective bargaining should guard against the abuse of genetic testing by:

- Setting strict conditions of confidentiality, with adequate counseling, medical follow-up and full earnings protections for injured workers.
- Developing programs that help workers and their families manage lifetime surveillance and treatment.
- Supporting community-based programs to solve special problems of exposed workers and their families.
- Outlawing job discrimination based on genetic differences.
- Allowing no letup in efforts to eliminate unsafe conditions in the workplace.

On another resolution referred by the convention which called for legislation to mandate more liberal vesting of pensions, the council voted non-concurrence. It cited special problems faced by multiemployer pension plans and other types of plans and said achieving the goals of pension portability and earlier vesting "is best left to collective bargaining."

A third referred resolution, dealing with worker protections under airline deregulation, was deemed to be covered by provisions in the convention resolution on transportation.

Heavy job losses laid to AT&T breakup

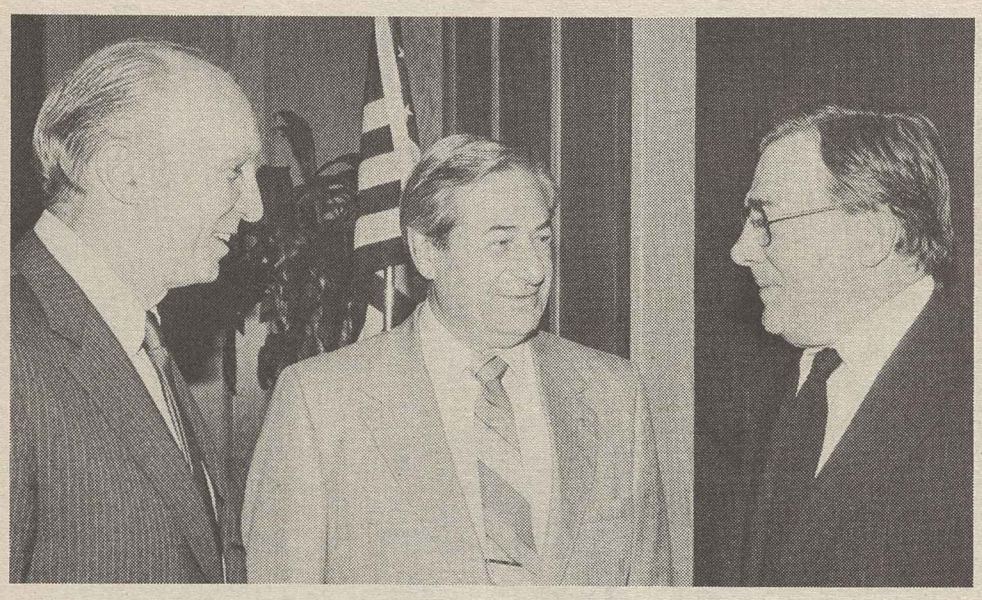
Pittsburgh—The telecommunications industry is threatening to become a job-loser rather than a job-gainer for the United States, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned.

Telephone users and workers alike have been hurt by the breakup of AT&T, the council said. It cited deteriorating telephone service and the loss of tens of thousands of jobs.

The job loss has been fed by an increase in import penetration from 2 percent of the telecommunications market in 1982 to 14 percent in 1984, the statement noted. It quoted an estimate by the Communications Workers that some 120,000 jobs have been lost in the unionized sector of the industry over the past three years.



Just recently, the council noted, AT&T announced that it will shift the manufacture of residential telephones from Shreveport, La., to Singapore. The move will wipe out the jobs of 1,000 Shreveport workers represented by the Electrical Workers.

The council pointed to other multinational operations spawned by the AT&T breakup, which indicate a still greater use of products made abroad and a continued loss of better-paid jobs.

A national "Job Savers Day" has been set for Thursday, Aug. 29, as a union day of protest at the threat to U.S. jobs and labor standards in the telecommunications industry.

The council requested all AFL-CIO affiliates "to join with their brothers and sisters in the telecommunications industry in rallies, informational picketing and other activities,"

It urged unions and members to insist on union-supplied telecommunications service and equipment. And it called on Congress to seek remedies to problems created by the breakup of the nation's major telephone system.

CWA President Morton Bahr is welcomed to the Executive Council by President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

Council elects Morton Bahr as Glenn Watts steps down

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO Executive Council elected Communications Workers President Morton Bahr a federation vice president, filling a vacancy on the council left by the retirement of Glenn E. Watts. Bahr succeeded Watts as head of the CWA at the union's recent convention.

The council acted after accepting Watts's resignation and offering its gratitude for his service as a council member since 1974. The statement expressed "respect and admiration" for the contributions Watts made over the past 40 years to his own union and to the labor movement.

Bahr, 59, was elected president of CWA on July 16 after he had emerged as the leading candidate for the post following Watts's announcement that he planned to retire a year before the end of his term. That decision was designed to give the new CWA president adequate time to prepare for next year's negotiations with the telephone industry.

Before moving up to the CWA presidency, Bahr served for 16 years as vice president for District 1, which covers New York, New Jersey and the New England states. A native of Brooklyn, he came to the CWA in 1951 when he joined the union's organizing campaign at Mackay Radio & Telegraph Co. (now ITT World Communications) where he had worked since 1947.

Bahr was instrumental in CWA's organizing victory at the company and was elected president of Local 1172 in 1954. He joined the national CWA staff as an organizer in 1957 and on his first assignment directed the successful drive to sign up some 24,000 employees of the New York Telephone Co. plant department.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland appointed Bahr to serve on the federation's standing committees on community services, public relations, international affairs and the economic policy subcommittee on trade, and on ad hoc committees dealing with Article XX appeals and review, the evolution of work, health care, political works and the United Way.

Chemical leaks add urgency to call for plant safeguards

placement of those manufacturers on a low-priority inspection list must change. The manufacturers and the government "have to plan as if something were going to go wrong, and they haven't been."

The Machinists represent some 1,000 workers at the Institute facility. "We've raised a lot of hell with the company," Robinson said. "It's still being investigated, but there are a lot of areas coming to our attention as needing real action."

Preliminary investigations of the Institute release show that some of the equipment installed after the Bhopal accident failed to operate properly.

A new computerized system used to track chemical vapors had not been programmed to track aldicarb oxime, the company said.

Aldicarb production at Institute began in May as part of the company plan to avoid having to ship methyl isocyanate by truck to its plant in Woodbine, Ga.

Chemical Workers Local 832, which represents the workers at Union Carbide's Woodbine plant, took action to conduct its own safety inspection of the plant.

The local had to filed a complaint with the National Labor Relations Board office in Atlanta to force the company to allow the union access for an inspection which will likely be held in October.

Because of the shutdown of aldicarb production in Institute, Union Carbide said it may lay off 240 workers at Woodbine until operations in West Virginia are resumed.

Safety Council cited as ally of workers

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO expressed its appreciation to the National Safety Council and its labor division for their efforts to promote occupational safety and health.

An Executive Council resolution noted that the safety council, through the initiatives of its labor members, has joined with the AFL-CIO and its affiliates to seek strong workplace regulations on asbestos and other hazards. It has also opposed legislation aimed at weakening the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

The NSC, in line with its charter mandate, has implemented programs "devoted to the occupational safety and health of American workers," the council said.

The NSC has long maintained a labor division, the council noted, whose members include the AFLCIO and many international and local unions.

For labor's food bank

AFL-CIO check to help stock a union-operated food bank for families of unemployed workers in the Pittsburgh area is presented by Lane Kirkland to Paul A. Stackhouse, Sr., president of the Allegheny County AFL-CIO. On hand are the chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, Vice President Alvin E. Heaps, left, and Community Services Director Frank Emig.

After 50 years

Social security found living up to promise

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO marked the 50th anniversary of social security with a pledge to protect the program against those who would dismember it and a commitment to completion of the structure envisioned by President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Social security has been "the nation's most successful anti-poverty program," the Executive Council said, giving the elderly "a measure of economic security and dignity." And for those still in the workforce, it provides family insurance "against the loss of income resulting from a worker's disability or death."

At his news conference, Kirkland assailed Republican proposals to take the cost-of-living adjustment away from social security beneficiaries. They want to use social security taxes "to pay for the Pentagon's $600 toilet seats and $800 wrenches," Kirkland suggested.

Kirkland voiced outrage at attempts to persuade young people that social security is a burden that they would be well rid of. Most young people do "give a damn about their parents and about their grandparents," Kirkland said. And if it were not for social security, many young people would be financially crushed by the burden of old and infirm parents.

The Executive Council statement noted the financial solvency of social security, with its annual surplus projected to reach $13 billion next year. Yet, the council noted, "there are still calls to reduce its benefits, solely to give the overall federal budget the appearance of a smaller deficit."

Segregate funds

To squelch that type of manipulation, the council proposed that the social security trust funds be separated from the federal budget immediately, rather than in 1992 as scheduled under present law.

At his news conference, Kirkland assailed Republican proposals to take the cost-of-living adjustment away from social security beneficiaries. "They want to use social security taxes to pay for the Pentagon's $600 toilet seats and $800 wrenches," Kirkland suggested.

The Executive Council adopted its statement exactly 50 years to the day after President Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act to provide Americans for the first time with some degree of protection "against the loss of a job and against poverty-ridden old age."

That same law, the council noted, established the unemployment compensation system and set up child protection programs still in effect. And 20 years ago, Congress added Medicare for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor to the social security structure.

The AFL-CIO statement quoted FDR's comment at the signing ceremony that the new social security law was only "a cornerstone in a structure which is being built—but by no means complete."

Millions of Americans have been helped by the programs that are part of the social security system, the council said, but all of them have inadequacies that need to be remedied.

Unemployment compensation varies from state to state, "and in most cases is still woefully inadequate," the council noted.

"Medicare beneficiaries are forced to pay more than half of their own medical expenses," it noted, while Medicaid "has been drastically cut by the Reagan Administration and now covers less than half the poor in nearly all states."

The council viewed the past "five years of cutbacks" as a blot on the "five decades of progress" since enactment of social security. It pledged to defend social security "against all who would undermine it and to complete the structure envisioned by its founders so that the programs will better serve the needs of the American people."

World pressure asked for change in South Africa

"It is rooted in apartheid itself, and cannot be brought to an end by repression," the council said.

Meanwhile, the council said, American labor will stand shoulder to shoulder with the 100,000-member National Union of Mineworkers (NUM) of South Africa if it is forced to strike for better wages and working conditions.

NUM announced recently that it will go on strike Aug. 25 over these issues. The announcement came after NUM's special congress in Welkom.

"The AFL-CIO considers this conflict to be a genuine labor-management dispute, and urges the South African government and the employers to negotiate in good faith with NUM and avoid provoking what could be a calamitous confrontation given the explosive climate in the country," the council said.

President Botha has threatened to expel foreign black workers in retaliation for the United Nations Security Council's vote to impose voluntary sanctions against South Africa. In response, NUM said it would extend the strike to other South African mines if the threat is carried out.

The council also called upon South Africa's Chamber of Mines to set a pattern for future direct negotiations with democratically elected black union leaders instead of resorting to the intervention of police and armed forces, whose past interference in labor-management disputes has been both "provocative and destructive."

"We call upon those white South Africans who have so far remained aloof and uncommitted in the struggle against apartheid and for human and trade union rights, to come forward and join the struggle," it said.

Reagan tax plan hit for double standard

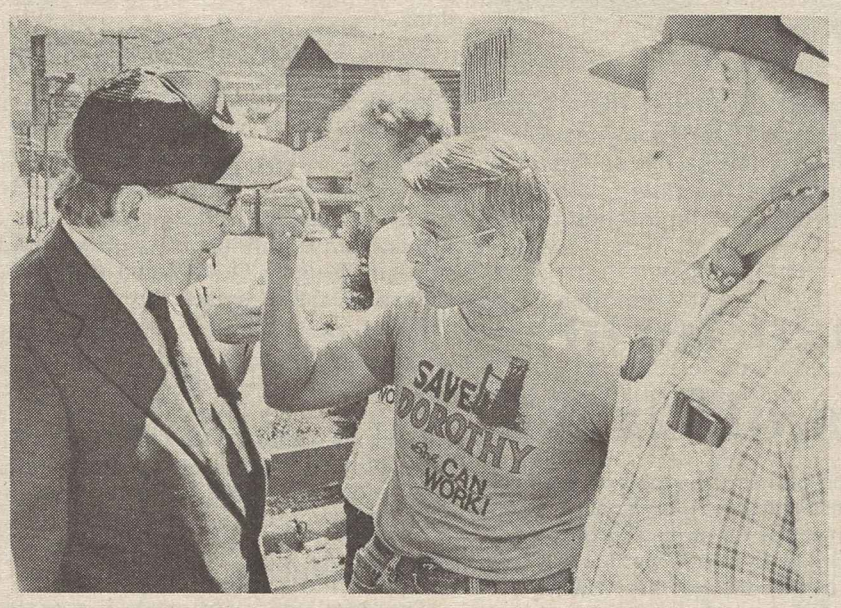
top rate, which was cut from 70 percent to 50 percent in Reagan's first term, would be reduced to 35 percent under the Administration's current proposal.



"The Administration's own figures show that the wealthiest one-half of 1 percent of the nation's taxpayers will receive 25 undercent of the total tax reduction, or an average of $10,000 each," the council said.

In calling on Congress to rewrite the Administration plan, the Executive Council protested that tax equity can't be achieved under the conditions set by the White House of "revenue neutrality, drastic cuts in tax rates for the wealthy and a small temporary shift in the share of tax burdens borne by corporations and individuals."

Mon Valley's wasteland an American tragedy

Pittsburgh—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland toured the ravished steel towns along the Monongahela River, stopping at a food kitchen in Homestead and joining the vigil to save the ''Dorothy Six'' blast furnace in nearby Duquesne.

Kirkland was joined by federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Steelworkers President Lynn Williams and local union leaders as he passed by vacant mills and boarded-up storefronts. He called the laid-off steelworkers throughout the Mon Valley ''victims of the nation's deindustrialization,'' and warned that ''no nation can survive the disappearance of its basic industries without terrible consequences.''

Meeting with workers outside the closed U.S. Steel plant in Duquesne, Kirkland criticized companies that are shutting down profitable mills in the search for even greater profit. ''These closed plants represent the irresponsibility of the corporate structure of America and the political leadership that allows this to happen. The difference between labor and employers is that industry is mobile. Industry doesn't have a flag or a community. It can go anywhere in search of profits,'' he said.

Kirkland praised the efforts of the Tri-State Conference on Steel, a coalition of local steelworkers, church and community activists working to enable Mon Valley communities to take over the abandoned steel mill. ''We're convinced this mill can be run properly by people who have a proper sense of values and a sense of concern and responsibility,'' he said.

U.S. Steel had announced in May 1984 it was shutting down the giant blast furnace, calling it ''insufficiently profitable.'' But local union leaders and community groups disagreed with the steelmaker's findings and set out to keep Dorothy Six in operation.

Buyer search

The coalition formed a ''Steel Valley Authority,'' with nine municipality-members including the city of Pittsburgh, to find a new buyer for the Dorothy Six furnace or turn it into a worker-owned operation.

While U.S. Steel agreed to postpone demolition of the Dorothy Six while the coalition reviews financial studies and options for eminent domain, union members are maintaining an around-the-clock vigil to make certain the company does not begin to raze the plant.

In Homestead, Kirkland's tour stopped at the Rainbow Kitchen, a food kitchen and job bank run by laid-off steelworkers and other volunteers. Opened in 1984, the center serves hundreds of families a week through its emergency food pantry and community center. The kitchen had received surplus food and dairy products from the Dept. of Agriculture, but since the government's surplus food programs ended, the Rainbow Kitchen must rely almost completely on private donations, receiving no assistance from the federal government.

One person answering the call for help for the unemployed was rock singer Bruce Springsteen. ''The Boss'' recently appeared in Pittsburgh and asked fans to support the Rainbow Kitchen, pointing out that people in America were hungry, as well as those overseas. Springsteen donated $10,000 to the kitchen and $10,000 to a local USWA food bank.

Kirkland also stopped at the Union Switch & Signal plant where workers learned that the 100-year old plant may close in 1987.

Kirkland called the joblessness and devastation of the Mon Valley a national issue, pointing out that layoffs and plant closing were happening all over the country, ''in the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest, depressed farm equipment manufacturers in the Midwest and textile makers in the South. It's no longer something that is happening only to somebody else, somewhere else.''

Wheeling-Pittsburgh battle termed cause for all labor

Pittsburgh—Steelworkers fighting to preserve collective bargaining at the Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. deserve the support of the entire labor movement, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

Some 8,600 USWA members at Wheeling-Pittsburgh plants in Ohio, Pennsylvania and West Virginia were forced to the picket line July 21 when the company tore up its union contract and unilaterally imposed a new round of pay and benefit cuts. A bankruptcy judge's approval of the contract nullification has been challenged by the union in a case pending in a federal district court.

The Executive Council noted that the Wheeling-Pittsburgh workers had agreed to three contract changes since 1982 to help the company solve its financial difficulties, giving up $141 million in wages and benefits. But over the same period, the council observed, the company's creditors were paid over $200 million in interest and principal payments.

''Now, Wheeling-Pittsburgh is seeking even greater contributions from its employees while its creditors have never agreed to any concessions'' to help the company reorganize. the AFL-CIO statement noted.

The council condemned the company's ''unfair actions'' against its workers and said the bankruptcy judge had misinterpreted the law Congress passed last year ''to prevent employers from using the bankruptcy laws to circumvent their collective bargaining obligations.''

Rallying support

It called on affiliates to help the USWA members ''win a fair and just agreement'' from Wheeling-Pittsburgh.

All nine plants have been shut down since July 21 by the work stoppage, which the union terms a lockout. The USWA members had offered to continue work under the terms of their agreement while negotiations continued on the company's latest demand for concessions it claimed were needed to stay in business.

The USWA has provided funds from the international union's defense and strike fund for distribution by the locals on the basis of need. It also has provided basic health benefits to replace the coverage that the company discontinued after July 21.

Mediation efforts were continuing but there has been no direct bargaining since the company tore up the contract.

Guild's first contract ratified in Milwaukee

Milwaukee—Members of Newspaper Guild Local 51 overwhelmingly ratified a first contract with Newspapers, Inc., publisher of the Milwaukee Sentinel and Milwaukee Journal.

The pact, covering some 325 newsroom and library employees of the two newspapers, is the first collective bargaining agreement for newsroom employees in the company's 103-year history. Approved by a 103-14 vote, the agreement was reached 13 months after the Guild won representation rights.

Police union rallies support for major organizing drive

Takoma, Wash.—In a move to broaden its membership, the Union of Police Associations convention called on AFL-CIO affiliates to help the IUPA organize unaffiliated law enforcement associations.

Al Angele, general manager of the union's California State Council, was elected secretary-treasurer, defeating incumbent Sec.-Treas. David E. Baker. The term of office is for five years. The presidency was not at stake this year. Robert B. Kliesmet's term does not expire until 1988.

Angele, 44, has been a member of the union's board of directors since 1981 representing retiree affiliates, and he held the top posts in IUPA Local 132, the Burbank (Calif.) Police Officers Association. He retired from the Burbank Police Dept. in 1978.

The 65 delegates, stressing the need to organize ''unaffiliated law enforcement officers,'' urged that federation affiliates ''encourage, endorse and assist'' in the organizing effort. A convention resolution pointed out that 90 percent of the nation's police officers belong to unaffiliated organizations.

Delegates voiced opposition to proposals to consolidate police and fire services, and pledged to work closely with the Fire Fighters ''to stop this attempt to undermine the careers of professional civil servants.''

The convention also endorsed a five-part national strategy for the prevention of drug abuse and drug trafficking. Those elements are prevention, enforcement, international cooperation, medical treatment and detoxification, and research. The resolution urged that drug abuse education begin in grade school.

The delegates voted to establish a committee to explore merger possibilities. The committee will report quarterly to the IUPA board on all merger contacts it makes.

The delegates, after hearing Rick Huntley of the Air Line Pilots detail the ALPA strike against Continental Airlines, urged the police association's 13,000 members not to fly on Continental or New York Air until a contract is won by the Pilots.

IUPA President Kliesmet said the convention approved a constitutional amendment to expand its membership for retirees.

N.C. unions cite progress in legislature

Raleigh, N.C.—Passage of right-to-know job safety legislation and defeat of weakening amendments to the workers' compensation law were cited by the North Carolina AFL-CIO as highlights of the state legislature's 1985 session.

State AFL-CIO President Christopher Scott termed the outcome a "modest success" from labor's viewpoint, especially since the 1984 elections brought in a Republican governor and a more conservative legislature.

Standards promulgated by the North Carolina Dept. of Labor give workers a basic right-to-know about the chemical hazards they encounter in the workplace. The new state law establishes in addition a strong citizens' right to be informed of potential chemcial hazards. The North Carolina AFL-CIO sees this as an additional means for workers and their unions to get information about toxic hazards.

Another section of the law requires companies using toxic chemicals to provide detailed information to local fire departments and permit inspections.

Labor victory

On workers' compensation, the legislature rejected a labor-opposed amendment that would have limited the amount of benefits that could be received by a worker whose pre-existing disability or illness was a factor in a job-related disease or accident.

The legislature also improved the law by adopting a labor-endorsed amendment strengthening safeguards against retaliatory discharges of workers who file complaints for benefits.

Some provisions of the unemployment insurance law were improved in legislative changes shaped in negotiations between the State AFL-CIO and North Carolina's Employment Security Commission. And a standby minimum wage bill was enacted, providing for a rise in the state $3.35-an-hour minimum to match any increase in the federal minimum wage that Congress might adopt, up to $3.60 an hour.

While not as strong as labor would have liked, the right-to-know law is considered one of the best in the country.

Sweet victory

These union stalwarts have a special reason for celebrating the election victory of District 1199-E of the Hospital & Health Care Employees at the Towson Convalescent Center, near Baltimore. They had been fired for attending a union organizing committee but were reinstated with back pay under an NLRB order. Their efforts led to union representation for the 24-worker unit earlier this month.

Railroad Signalmen term giveback demands off track

Las Vegas, Nev.—The Railroad Signalmen's convention flashed a warning light to management negotiators that demands for more givebacks and takeaways in wages in benefits are off track.

Voicing strong opposition to management attempts in current bargaining to slash hard-won gains, the 300 delegates stressed the need to preserve economic standards, and outlined contract goals for improvements in health and welfare benefits, vacations and sick leave.

The convention also returned President Robert Bates and Sec.-Treas. Willis D. Best to office for new three-year terms.

Bates outlined the union's intention to "fight for and preserve the benefits we have struggled many years to obtain. I don't agree that the standard of living for the working people of this country must be reduced. I believe we should expect that our standard of living will improve each and every year," he said.

The delegates heard from Sen. Paul Simon (D-Ill.) who promised to continue his fight to save the Railroad Retirement System. Simon also called for stronger safety rules in the railroad industry, particularly the legislation that would shift responsibility for railroad safety from the Federal Railroad Administration to the Labor Dept. He criticized the FRA for inactivity on important safety issues.

Richard I. Kilroy, president of the Railway & Airline Clerks and secretary-treasurer of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, spoke of the changing situation in the railroad industry, particularly, the decreasing number of carriers and drop in employment. Despite the changes, he said, railroad workers remain among the most well-paid workers in America.

Ole M. Berge, chairman of the RLEA and president of the Maintenance of Way Employees, called on the rail unions to continue to work together in solidarity to protect existing benefits and win future gains for their members.

Former Signalmen President Charles Chamberlain, a member of the Railroad Retirement Board, warned delegates that "there are still forces, as in the past, trying to dismantle the retirement system. You must be continually vigilant and alert to preserve our system and the only way to do that is to have a strong legislative team in Washington." Chamberlain praised the legislative efforts of the rail unions as "the best legislative team on Capitol Hill."

Other convention speakers included James Kennedy, assistant to the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer; James Snyder, chairman of the RLEA legislative committee and national legislative director of the United Transportation Union; Federal Railroad Administrator John Riley; William Greer, mayor of Las Vegas, and William Johnstone, vice president of the Association of American Railroads.

UAW sets industry parity goal at Chrysler

Highland Park, Mich.—After helping Chrysler Corp. out of its financial hole through wage and benefit concessions, the Auto Workers want parity with other major auto makers.

Contract talks involving 69,000 Chrysler workers in the United States opened here Aug. 12. Separate negotiations affecting some 10,000 UAW members employed by Chrysler in Canada opened the next day in Toronto.

Chrysler workers' earnings fell behind those of General Motors and Ford workers beginning in 1979 when they accepted cuts to help the shaky No. 3 auto maker survive. The typical Chrysler worker now earns $12.79 an hour, compared to $13.18 for workers at GM and Ford, the nation's number one and two automakers.

Chrysler has since made a comeback, and last year chalked up its most profitable year in history, earning $2.4 billion. Earnings for the first six months of this year were $1.58 billion before taxes.

Besides wage parity, UAW negotiators are seeking the same job security package negotiated at GM and Ford in their current contracts. The package provides job guarantees for workers displaced by new technology or work transfer and an "income stream" for senior workers of half pay until retirement if laid off.

The current agreements in both the United States and Canada expire Oct. 15.

There he goes again

While Congress is on its summer break, President Reagan jumped on the opportunity to make more recess appointments to avoid Senate review. This time, he named Robert E. Rader, Jr., and John R. Wall to the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission.

Last year, Reagan's recess appointments included Rosemary Collyer as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board and Robert A. Rowland to head the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

Labor protested both appointments. Rowland resigned last July 1 under a cloud of controversy concerning possible conflicts of interest.

Rader's appointment is "one of the grossest examples of the fox guarding the henhouse," AFL-CIO Job Safety Director Margaret Seminario charged.

The commission reviews appeals of OSHA actions. Rader is "one of the leaders in the crusade to stop OSHA," Seminario said.

Rader was at the center of a court controversy involving former OSHA Administrator Thorne B. Auchter and the B.B. Andersen Companies, Inc., of Topeka, Kan.

Acting on Andersen's behalf, Rader got Auchter to apologize for an inspection at an Andersen construction site and to drop a dozen citations and $12,600 in penalties. Auchter later became president of the Andersen group.

Rader said Andersen's case presented a "rare opportunity . . . that will significantly restrict OSHA in the future."

Wall, who retired from Republic Steel as its vice president of personnel in 1982, has no background in health and safety issues, Seminario pointed out. Wall is a former member of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's board of directors.

Mine safety spurred by court ruling

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers are celebrating a court victory that forced the Mine Safety & Health Administration to set a timetable for developing a revised standard to better protect hard-rock miners from cancer-causing radon daughters.

Dan Edwards, OCAW's director of safety and health, said that "if MSHA moves and stays on its timetable, we can live with that. That's a lot better than the five and a half years where it sat by and didn't do a damn thing."

Radon daughters are minute radioactive particles produced during the decay of radium, a radioactive element found in uranium ore.

In January 1985, following five years of inaction and in the midst of the court suit, MSHA initiated rulemaking and at the same time denied a petition for an emergency standard filed by OCAW and the Public Citizen Health Research Group in April 1980.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled that MSHA now appears to be "proceeding toward completion of its rulemaking within a reasonable time." The timetable that the agency advanced to the court calls for completion of a standard by June 1987.

'With diligence'

The three-judge panel made it clear that if MSHA should fail to adhere to its timetable "with appropriate diligence," OCAW and PHRG can renew their request for the court to direct the agency to complete the rulemaking process.

The possibility exists that the agency could find at the end of its rulemaking agenda that the current standard provides sufficient protection.

The court ruling, written by Circuit Judge Ruth Bader Ginsburg, said that in 1980 then MSHA Administrator Robert B. Lagather had written PHRG that the issue deserved a "thorough evaluation" on an "expedited basis."

Judge Ginsburg noted that MSHA initiated its rulemaking "after years in which the matter lingered on the agency's agenda." She pointed out that "human life and health are at stake" and MSHA's current activities do not show that expediting the rulemaking "is likely to crowd out agency action on items of higher priority."

Film crafts gain in new contract covering 30,000

Los Angeles—A new three-year contract negotiated by the Stage Employees and a bargaining alliance of craft unions will mean pay and pension improvements for 30,000 film and television workers.

Work rule changes agreed to by the unions in the contract with the Alliance of Motion Picture & Television Producers are intended to help keep film production in southern California, union negotiators said.

The new agreement provides $3-an-hour pay increases over the contract term through annual raises of 90 cents, $1 and $1.10. Pension benefits will rise 25 percent for future retirees and 10 percent for those already retired.

Helping to fund the pension improvements is an improved formula for employer payments of a share of revenues from the sale of videocassettes into pensions and the health and welfare fund.

The producers also agreed to pay $3.5 million to the health and welfare plan in settlement of union claims of past underpayments.

The mail ratification process is expected to be complete by the end of the month. Some 24,000 of the workers affected are members of 24 IATSE locals in the film industry.

Other crafts covered by the agreement are in locals of the Electrical Workers, Laborers, Plasterers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

America's Trade Crisis

AT LONG LAST, more and more Americans have begun to recognize what workers have known for a long time—that the nation's trade crisis is inflicting massive suffering on American workers and their communities. For too long, the concerns of the labor movement were written off as narrow "protectionism."

The AFL-CIO does not seek an end to trade or a wall around the United States. That is neither wise nor practical. We seek a government policy that acts to halt America's decline, promotes economic and social growth in America and recognizes that there are costs as well as benefits to trade.

The trade deficit, having reached record proportions last year, continues to worsen. Imports rose by 8 percent in the first half of 1985 and exports by only 2 percent. Based on the amount of the deficit in the first six months of 1985, the U.S. deficit will exceed $140 billion at the end of the year.

The consequences of America's precipitous decline in international trade are being felt in all sectors of the economy. Millions of workers, thousands of farmers and hundreds of communities are suffering from plant closings, foreclosures and high unemployment.

IN A WORLD where most international trade is managed by by governments seeking maximum national advantage, Americans are paying the price of the Reagan Administration's policy of callous indifference to the costs of trade.

Since 1979, an estimated 3-4 million jobs have been lost or not created because of the trade imbalance, mostly in manufacturing.

The overvalued dollar, increasing the price of U.S. exports and reducing the cost of imported products, has appreciated more than 70 percent against the currencies of other industrial countries since 1980. While declining somewhat in value in recent months, in June it remained more than 15 percent higher than a year ago.

The principal approach to trade problems taken by the Reagan Administration—requesting other countries to stop what are considered to be objectionable practices—has failed. The failure of this approach is typified by the $37 billion trade deficit with Japan in 1984—and this deficit existed before the end of the voluntary auto quotas. The general deficit with Japan is worsening.

While negotiations take place endlessly, as in the steel industry, injury to the American economy continues. The problem is not with other countries pursuing policies in their national interest; the problem is in America failing to adopt policies in its national interest.

THE TRADE CRISIS will not go away by itself. It requires effective legislation that mandates Administration action, not mere cosmetic treatment nor more talk of negotiations or of American competitiveness, or buck-passing between Congress and the Administration.

Specifically, the AFL-CIO calls upon Congress to deal with the overvalued dollar, deep deficits with particular countries and with the special problems of particular industries. Clearly, any trade bill should be a package that contains:

- The tightening of U.S. laws designed to relieve industries and workers injured by imports and to deal with unfair trade practices.
- Imposition of tariff surcharges or quotas on countries that maintain an excessive trade surplus with the United States.
- A directive to the President to begin international negotiations both to lower the dollar's exchange value and to bring greater stability to the exchange rate system—an action leveraged by a temporary surcharge on all imports.
- The enactment of industry-specific measures to counteract the difficulties encountered by individual industries, such as the Textile & Apparel Trade Enforcement Act and telecommunications legislation.
- Reauthorization and improvement of the Trade Adjustment Assistance program to provide substantial help to those workers displaced by imports.

Growing illiteracy festers as a national disgrace

By Press Associates, Inc.

Illiteracy is a problem often associated with the developing Third World nations.

However, a report released at a recent congressional hearing revealed some startling and disturbing findings about illiteracy here in the United States.

As many as 60 million adult Americans—nearly a third of the adult population—cannot read the front page of a newspaper, according to the report by the Northeast-Midwest Institute, a non-profit research and education group.

The report, titled Literacy at Work: Developing Adult Basic Skills for Employment, cited adult performance level studies which showed that about 20 percent of U.S. adults are functionally illiterate. They are unable to read, write or compute with the proficiency needed to function successfully in society.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress found that 13 percent of high school graduates fail to reach reading and writing competence beyond the sixth grade level.

The problem is growing, according to the Dept. of Education, which estimated that 2.3 million people are added each year to the ranks of the functionally illiterate: 1 million teenagers who leave school without basic skills and 1.3 million non-English-speaking arrivals.

Higher skill needs

This "literacy gap," as the report called it, exists at a time when changes in the job market require an increasing level of skill in the three R's. Proficiency in the basics is necessary for successful training and performance in jobs of growing complexity.

Literacy standards are higher than they were ten years ago, according to the Business Council for Effective Literacy. In the face of these changing standards, the council found that 11 percent of today's professional and managerial employees are functionally illiterate, as are 30 percent of semi-skilled and unskilled workers.

While necessary reading levels for specific occupations vary, several studies have concluded that a 12th grade level generally defines essential literacy for today's marketplace, the report said. It said studies have found that workers who perform better on reading tests are rated higher in both job proficiency and productivity.

Illiteracy thus is seen by the report as a problem of national as well as individual competitiveness. Jonathan Kozol wrote in his recent book, Illiterate America, that "The dollar cost to our society for our neglect of this injustice is intolerably high —$20 billion yearly to support unemployables, imprisoned or disheartened people, and in losses caused by workplace accidents and damage to military equipment, and billions more in lowered GNP."

Low federal priority

The federal government, said Kozol, budgets only $1.65 a year to reach each illiterate adult in our society.

The problem of dislocated manufacturing workers, the report said, illustrates the link between literacy and jobs. These workers, often with long experience, have difficulty finding good jobs because their reading, writing and computation skills are too limited for today's job market.

One of the bright spots mentioned in the report is an Auto Workers-sponsored literacy program for dislocated workers. The program, in cooperation with Ford and General Motors, has served as a model for other programs, the report noted. Before a Ford plant closing in San Jose, Calif., the UAW contracted with the local adult education office to provide courses at the plant, including remedial math and reading.

The report recommends a broad range of initiatives by business, state and local governments, colleges, and the federal government to address what it calls the "literacy crisis."

Public discussion and national leadership is needed now. As Rep. Patrick Williams (D-Mont.) said at the hearing, "Illiteracy is creating two Americas—to America's shame and national tragedy. It is a drag on the economy, a danger to our defense, and a blot on our democracy."

Double-breasting issue tops legislative agenda of construction trades

Chicago—Building trades unions have made passage of a bill to curb "double-breasted" operations by contractors seeking to evade union commitments a top legislative goal and are pressing for House passage early this fall.

Labor's campaign for its enactment was high on the agenda of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention.

The bill, introduced by Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.) and numerous co-sponsors, would clarify the Taft-Hartley Act's provision allowing a prehire union agreement in the construction industry because of the temporary and often short-term pattern of employment. It would make such a union agreement binding on all of an employer's operations unless workers vote to decertify the union as bargaining agent.

It is aimed at contractors who sign standard pre-hire union agreements but then set up non-union subsidiaries that pay lower wages, provide inferior benefits, and disregard labor standards.

An all-out drive to end double-breasting was urged by J.C. Turner, president-emeritus of the Operating Engineers, during discussion of the resolution. The 200 delegates from 15 affiliated unions saw a film dealing with the issue that was produced by the Operating Engineers and a video presentation developed by the department.

On other legislative issues, the convention:

- Strongly opposed taxation of employee benefits.
- Urged enactment of a long-range program to rebuild the nation's infrastructure of roads, water works, sewer systems and other capital development needed to support an industrial economy.
- Asked inclusion in new Superfund legislation of a requirement for safety and health training of workers employed in hazardous waste disposal.
- Pressed the need for jobsite picketing legislation long sought by building trades unions.
- Asked immigration reforms that would effectively ban the hiring of illegal aliens and limit employer use of temporary foreign workers brought into this country.
- Urged legislation to assure fair tax treatment of job-required travel expenses of construction workers.
- Opposed attempts to weaken the Davis-Bacon Act which requires payment of prevailing wages on federal construction.

Five-year schedule

Delegates approved a switch to an every-five-years cycle of conventions, instead of every two years. The department's next convention, its 64th, will be held in 1990. BCTD President Robert A. Georgine and Sec.-Treas. Joseph F. Maloney were re-elected to five-year rather than four-year terms to correspond with the convention change.

The convention adopted a two-step rise in the per capita tax, from the present 23 to 28 cents, and to 30 cents in 1988. The department's governing board of general presidents was given authority to impose a further rise if necessary.

The delegates also endorsed the concept of Apprenticeship Scholarship Loan Agreements, which require workers who went through a union apprenticeship to repay the Joint Apprenticeship Committee for the cost of their training if they leave their union and work at their craft non-union. The Sheet Metal Workers reported that its 8,000 apprentices are all under such an agreement.

Other resolutions supported a campaign to raise funds for diabetes research, asked support for the Phelps Dodge copper strikers and called for resistance to all forms of union-busting.

IBM memo cited as evidence of hostility to labor

The Communications Workers, their sights set on organizing conglomerated International Business Machines, revealed a confidential company memorandum outlining methods to stifle unionizing efforts.

CWA President Morton Bahr charged that the IBM memo he made public at a news briefing belies the company's assertions that it is not opposed to unions.

"This is one of the most anti-union companies in the world," Bahr declared.

The memo, marked "confidential" and circulated to IBM managers, called on management officials to report any incidents or even rumors of organized labor activity at any IBM location.

"All incidents, not simply those deemed important by local management, must be reported," the memo said. "A single incident may appear unimportant when viewed alone, but may be quite significant when connected with other information."

Running scared

Bahr, who announced plans for a worldwide coordinated organizing campaign against IBM shortly after his election as president a month ago, charged that IBM "appears to be running scared that its workers want to join a union."

CWA also plans to unionize employees of MCI, 30 percent of which IBM intends to acquire.

Bahr said he will seek support for the union's worldwide organizing drive at next month's 24th world congress of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone International in Interlaken, Switzerland.

Since CWA's announcement of its organizing plans, two other international trade secretariats—the International Metal Workers' Federation and the International Federation of Clerical, Commercial & Technical Workers—have added their support to the drive.

IMF Gen. Sec. Herman Rebhan, who distributed the IBM memorandum to all IMF affiliates, said that the company in effect was ordering its managers to spy on workers who discuss pay increases.

"It denotes to IBM workers an attitude that conforms to classic anti-union paranoia," Rebhan declared.

Aluminum union convention elects LaBaff as president

Toronto—Delegates to the second biennial convention of the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers elected Ernie LaBaff president to succeed Lawrence A. Holley, who is retiring.

LaBaff, 52, a vice president since 1965 who comes from Local 450 in Messina, N.Y., will take office Oct. 1 for a four-year term. Holley, who is 60, has held the union's top office since 1977.

Sec.-Treas. H. Max Webster does not come up for re-election until 1987.

In other action during the five-day convention here, delegates focused on the impact of new technology on workers and their jobs in the glass, brick and aluminum industries.

The convention adopted a resolution establishing committees in each bargaining unit to monitor management's introduction of new technology.

The measure also urged each unit to seek prior notification from employers when they plan to introduce new methods and technological changes in the workplace "for the purpose of meaningful discussion." It also calls on locals to negotiate provisions for training workers in the new technology.

Computerization in the aluminum industry has been going on for some time as in the nation's large aluminum rolling mills. New processes of making bricks and glassware also use high technology.

The 500 delegates adopted additional resolutions on tax reform, safety and health and other subjects.

In an address to delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue spoke of the trend toward union mergers already evident in the glass, aluminum and brick industries. The ABGW came about with the 1981 merger of the Aluminum Workers and the Brick & Clay Workers and the 1982 merger with the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

"Today you have a more diversified union, a bigger union, a better union, and one which is by definition better prepared to meet the needs of your members," he observed.

New computers

In a report to the convention, Sec.-Treas. Webster said the union is in strong financial health. He also noted that computerization of ABGW's headquarters in Bridgeton, Mo., is nearly complete and moving along with fewer problems than expected.

The convention voted increases in the salaries of the president and secretary-treasurer in line with recent increases granted staff personnel.

President Lynn Williams of the Steelworkers pledged close cooperation with ABGW when negotiations with the aluminum industry open next spring. Both unions represent workers in the industry.

Also addressing the convention were President Dennis McDermott of the Canadian Labor Congress, President Frank Drozak of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., and Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Boy Scouts learn from union skills

Fort A.P. Hill, Va.—In huge open-air and canvas classrooms, AFL-CIO and union representatives shared organized labor's story with 60,000 Boy Scouts at the BSA's 75th anniversary National Jamboree here.

Members of participating unions helped acquaint scouts with their specialties at a Merit Badge Midway where career and hobby displays were located. Included were demonstrations, exhibits and career information on surveying, railroading and printing merit badges.

Retired AFL-CIO Community Service Rep. Norm Osborne of Saginaw, Mich.; Ted Reed, research director of the Operating Engineers, and J. Robert Miller, the federation's Community Services liaison officer to the BSA, were on hand throughout the week-long jamboree to answer questions on labor's wide-ranging activities and to help with union-related badge requirements.

Osborne, who comes out of the Auto Workers, has logged 57 years of service as a scouting volunteer.

Gene Machado and Joseph Sanders of IUOE Local 3 in San Francisco tutored scouts on a revised version of the surveying merit badge program that was updated to include new techniques and equipment.

Robert N. Hightower of BRAC, who works for the Union Pacific Railroad in Palestine, Tex., coordinated volunteers at a display of the railroading merit badge. Model trains as well as full-size safety equipment were featured.

Printing demonstrations

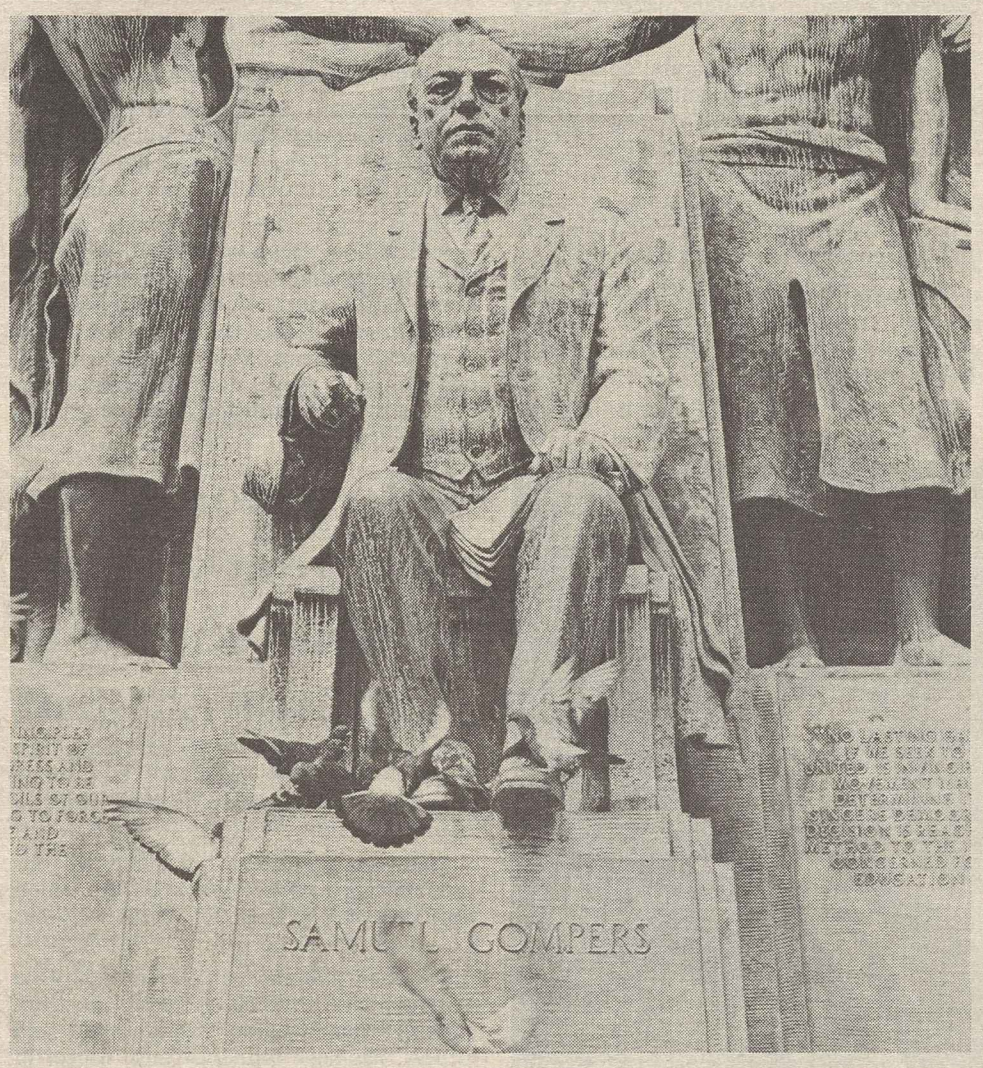
Intaglio printing was demonstrated on hand presses by members of Washington Plate Printers Union Local 2. Dan Bradley and Mike Bean of Silver Spring, Md., explained printing procedures by this process as well as letterpress, silk-screen and offset methods.

IUOE's Ted Reed noted that enthusiasm generated by labor's participation in the jamboree should encourage other AFL-CIO building trades, service and industrial unions to use the merit badge program and exhibit their skills in local councils and future jamborees.

Hightower said the BRAC leadership is on record urging all local unions, their officers, and members to get involved in the scouting program.

"The scout merit badge program and specialty explorer posts, are excellent pre-apprenticeship opportunities," he said.



Joseph Sanders of IUOE Local 3, left, teaches surveying to Boy Scouts with the help of IUOE Research Director Ted Reed, BSA labor liaison officer J. Robert Miller and retired Community Services Rep. Norm Osborne.

Not forgotten

Samuel Gompers monument in the nation's capital awaits some badly needed repairs as the Metropolitan Washinton AFL-CIO steps up its fund-raising drive to finance the $55,000 project. The central body is also raising funds for a memorial to A. Philip Randolph. (Story and more photos, Page 4.)

Economic growth remains sluggish as demand slows

By James M. Shevis

The government revised its estimate of economic growth in the second quarter from a 1.7-percent annual rate of increase to 2 percent, but the revision still pointed to a sluggish economy.

The puny increase in real gross national product—the value of the nation's total goods and services—remained far below the Reagan Administration's original forecast of a 4-percent growth rate for the year.

The 2-percent real GNP rise also was below the Commerce Dept.'s "flash," or preliminary estimate in June.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald pointed out that the April-June performance combined with the first quarter's negligible rise of three-tenths of 1 percent meant that the annual rate of growth for the first half of 1985 was just 1.1 percent.

Even to achieve the Administration's downwardly revised 1985 forecast of 3 percent, he observed, economic growth would have to accelerate sharply at a 4.9-percent rate in the second half of the year.

Weak rebound

Oswald and other private economists do not see that sharp of a rebound happening. Government reports on July activity indicate a much weaker bounceback of about 2.5 percent is more likely.

Consumer spending has contributed to whatever growth there has been so far this year but demand lately appears to have softened, Oswald noted.

Retail sales in July were up only four-tenths of 1 percent, and weakness in domestic automobile sales, which dropped to a 7-million annual rate in July, has caused producers to provide concessionary financing to buyers.

"However, even this new incentive may not be enough to offset the new flood of auto imports since the end of Japan's voluntary restraint of auto exports in April," he said.

A rash of other government reports, which taken together, "indicate that the economy is in a very unstable condition," he warned.

"Workers and farmers are suffering from the effects of serious trade deficit, reflected in bankruptcies and unemployment."

Imported goods of all kinds are behind the sharp slowdown in economic activity. The nation's trade deficit is forecast to swell to a record $150 billion, depressing sales of U.S. manufacturers and forcing them to cut back production.

U.S. industry has lost 220,000 manufacturing jobs since last January.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. reported a sharp 2.4 percent decline in housing starts in July and a 1 percent drop in building permits, which are considered an indicator of future construction activity.

Separately, the Federal Reserve Board reported the operating rate at the nation's factories, mines and utilities remained unchanged at 80.8 percent last month.

The Fed also said that industrial output in July edged up a mere two-tenths of 1 percent. The slight gain left industrial production just 1.4 percent higher a year ago.

The government also reported that Americans took on $6.8 billion more in installment debt than they paid off in June, the smallest monthly gain this year. That could indicate that consumers are cutting back on big-item purchases because of the burden of debt they are carrying.

The Commerce Dept. reported that personal income rose only four-tenths of 1 percent in July even with an unusually large jump in social security benefit payments. Without the higher social security payments, the rise would have been almost negligible.

Tune in

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue will make several media appearances over the Labor Day weekend.

A message from Kirkland will be heard on the CBS and Mutual Radio networks while Donahue will be on NBC radio outlets. In addition, Kirkland will be interviewed for a program over the CBS radio network and for another program to be broadcast overseas by the Voice of America.

National television appearances for both officers are under negotiations.

Official AFL-CIO Labor Day statements by Kirkland and Donahue will be distributed to national television and radio for possible use by local radio and television stations.

Beginning Friday, Aug. 30, their statements will be available for international and media distribution over the AFL-CIO toll-free telephone service: 800/368-5744.

Administration rebuked on disability challenges

New York—A federal judge slapped the Reagan Administration for continuing to flout court precedents in determining eligibility for social security disability benefits and issued a temporary injunction to force a change in policy.

While the court order is binding only in New York state, where a class action suit was filed, the AFL-CIO said the Social Security Administration should apply its principles nationwide.

The temporary injunction granted by Judge Leonard B. Sand was accompanied by a stern rebuke to the Dept. of Health & Human Services, which oversees the social security system.

Applicants who are eligible for social security benefits on the basis of court precedents in similar cases are still being rejected, Judge Sand found. Only in the higher stages of an appeal, before an administrative law judge, are court guidelines followed in determining eligibility, Sand pointed out.

AFL-CIO Associate Social Security Director Larry Smedley welcomed the court ruling. But it wouldn't have been necessary, he stressed, if the Administration hadn't flouted the intent of Congress and the directives of federal courts on eligibility standards for disability benefits.

Early in President Reagan's first term, the Social Security Administration launched a brutal purge of disability rolls in response to a congressional directive to save money by eliminating abuses.

The purge was especially devastating to persons with mental disabilities whose payments were ended after they failed to return forms mailed to them requesting information on their current medical conditions. Some 200,000 persons cut off from benefits had to win court suits to gain reinstatement.

'Import shock' laid to Reaganomics

America's economy is suffering from a severe "industrial import shock" brought on by the Reagan Administration's economic policies, a congressional study concluded.

It linked the decline in U.S. industrial competitiveness to the continuing high budget deficits, high real interest rates and a still overvalued dollar.

The impact of Administration economic policy decisions has been "devastating" to both the agriculture and manufacturing sectors, the staff report found.

The report was released by Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), chairman of the House Energy & Commerce Committee and its Subcommittee on Oversight. Dr. Milton Lower, a staff economist, directed the study.

Dingell said the import devastation documented by the report raises "grave concern" for the future well-being of the economy.

Double blow

"Between this Administration's misguided fiscal policies and its benign neglect of unfair foreign trade practices, American goods-producing industries in the 1980s have suffered cumulative damage without historical parallel," Dingell said in releasing the study.

He called for a reversal of the Reagan Administration course through "realistic policies to insure the productive health and long-term competitiveness of U.S. industries."

These are some of the findings of the report:

- Industrial import shock was brought on mainly by the overvalued dollar, which distorts the prices of U.S. goods and imports. Changes in the value of the dollar since 1980 have effectively raised U.S. export prices 70 percent and lowered import prices 40 percent.
- The dollar's distortion stems from high interest rates caused in large part by the soaring budget deficit. The effect has been to price industrial producers out of their own home markets.
- Industrial import shock worsened the U.S. merchandise balance of trade substan-

Pay equity dispute moving to bargaining table

Olympia, Wash.—The Washington state pay equity dispute is moving from the courtroom to the bargaining table in an effort to negotiate an end to a double-standard that has undervalued jobs traditionally performed by women.

Negotiating teams from the State, County & Municipal Employees and the Washington state government will meet here Sept. 9. Their goal will be an out-of-court agreement on restructuring pay classifications to eliminate sex bias and compensating workers for past discrimination.

The legislature earlier this year authorized $41.6 million to settle the pay discrimination case the union brought in 1982.

AFSCME acted after the state government refused to remedy sex-based disparities in job classifications. The union won a landmark victory in federal district court, and the case is now awaiting a decision by the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

About 15,500 workers, including some men, are in state jobs that the union has long contended have been undervalued in relation to job classifications requiring comparable skills held predominantly by men.

Back in 1973, at AFSCME's urging, then-Gov. Daniel J. Evans ordered a pay equity study that found sex-based disparities in a cross-section of state jobs. But with a change of administration, the legislature did nothing to rectify it.

Government inaction

In Washington state, wages are outside of the bargaining scope. When the state failed to remedy the inequities, AFSCME filed a sex discrimination complaint with the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

When EEOC failed to act, the union brought and won its case in federal district court. Judge Jack E. Tanner in 1983 ordered the state to achieve pay equity within two years and appointed a special master to conduct further pay studies to determine the extent of the inequities.

The state contested the decision, and a three-judge appeals court panel heard arguments last April but has not yet rendered its decision. Attorney Winn Newman, who represented AFSCME before the appeals court, argued that a former state policy of sex-segregated classified ads and job specifications had helped create a segregated workforce and a resultant pattern of pay discrimination.

Meanwhile, the legislature opened the door to negotiations by authorizing $41.6 million that could be spent to correct pay inequities, but specified that the money will revert to the state general fund if a tentative agreement is not reached by Jan. 1, 1986. The legislature also appropriated funds to hire a negotiating team to represent the state.

Any agreement has to be tentative since it will require final approval by the legislature, but neither side expects that to be an obstacle.

The union negotiators will be George Masten, executive director of the AFSCME-affiliated Washington Federation of State Employees; Diana Rock, national director of AFSCME's Women's Rights Dept., and two Washington state attorneys who have been involved in the union's case, Edward Younglove and Larry Goodman.

Seattle attorney Susan Agid will head the state's negotiating team.

Other actions

In other pay equity developments:

- In Hawaii, a federal judge refused to dismiss a pay equity lawsuit brought against the state by the Hawaii Government Employees Association, an AFSCME affiliate.
- The U.S. Dept. of Justice, reflecting the Reagan Administration's strong opposition to pay equity or comparability claims, filed a brief with the U.S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals backing the State of Illinois's opposition to a wage discrimination claim brought by the unaffiliated American Nurses Association.

Nevada state fed set to challenge picketing curbs

Stateline, Nev.—Delegates to the Nevada AFL-CIO convention here authorized a court challenge to the constitutionality of a new state law severely restricting picketing.

It was one of the few anti-labor laws that got through a "long and difficult" session of the legislature, the state federation officers reported. Otherwise, they said, labor was "fairly successful" in turning back anti-worker legislation.

President Mark Tully Massagli, who has served in the post since 1978, did not stand for re-election and Jeff McColl was elected to a three-year term as president. Massagli is a national vice president of the Musicians. The new president is an officer of Culinary Workers Local 226 in Las Vegas, an affiliate of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees.

Four incumbent vice presidents were re-elected. The terms of Executive Sec.-Treas. Claude Evans and six vice presidents were not up at this convention.

Delegates called for strict state regulation of asbestos use and removal "in the interest of public health and safety" and voted to establish a statewide Community Services Committee to work with the state federation and local central bodies.

The convention referred to the executive board a decision on labor's position on an anticipated attempt to petition to the ballot a proposal to raise the state tax on gambling. Evans said the State AFL-CIO will make its own assessment of the claim by casino operators that higher taxes would force some establishments into bankruptcy.

Mislaid blame

Seafarers President Frank Drozak told the delegates that the maritime and agriculture sectors of the economy are being wrongly blamed for each other's problems. The fact is, he said, that neither industry has recovered from the recession and both are in "worse shape than any time since the Great Depression."

"Farmers are losing their farms. The maritime industry is losing its ships, which means we are both losing our jobs," Drozak said.

Repeal of the cargo preference law would "destroy our merchant marine" without helping farmers, he asserted.

Nevada Gov. Richard Bryan was among the speakers at the two-day convention.

Change of command

Retiring Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers President Lawrence A. Holley passes gavel to successor Ernie LaBaff, center, who was elected to a four-year term at ABGW's convention in Toronto. Seated is Sec.-Treas. H. Max Webster. LaBaff, 52 has been a vice president since 1965.

Wage-chiseling contractors target of California coalition

Sacramento, Calif.—A cooperative venture between a building trades union and group of fair employers is making northern California unfriendly territory for contractors who chisel on wage and benefit standards or otherwise exploit non-union workers.

The union is Local 3 of the Operating Engineers. Its business manager, Tom Stapleton, is co-director of the four-month-old Foundation for Fair Contracting (FFC).

The employer co-director is Curtis Thornton, president of the W.M. Lyles Corp.

The small staff, operating out of a headquarters in nearby Rancho Murieta, is headed by Chuck Center.

Since operations got under way last May, FFC has filed or assisted in the filing of complaints that have resulted in assessments of some $800,000 in back pay on non-union contractors who failed to comply with state or federal prevailing wage laws.

It has conducted 247 investigations of non-union contractor operations and is monitoring 15 major open-shop construction projects. Employees on these projects are told what their correct wages should be and can use the FCC to recover any underpayments.

Stapleton, in a recent interview with the Operating Engineers magazine, said the combination of the Reagan Administration's moves to weaken Davis-Bacon Act enforcement and the reluctance of California Gov. George Deukmejian to enforce state labor standards "has created an open-season for non-union contractors."

"These are the contractors we find are most often guilty of breaking the law on job-safety standards and in the payment of prevailing wages. If the state and federal agencies won't go after them, then we will," Stapleton declared.

His union was involved, starting before the establishment of the labor-management group, in collecting evidence that helped bring about criminal indictments against two non-union firms on charges that include payroll kickbacks that workers were forced to make.

Center, the administrator of the program, said many of the non-union firms violate state apprenticeship standards and fail to make required contributions to apprentice training funds.

Other building trades unions have also been monitoring non-union public works projects, and many of the workers involved have been discovering first hand the advantages of working union.

BRAC gains accord at Northwest Airlines

Minneapolis—The Railway & Airline Clerks reached tentative agreement with Northwest Orient Airlines on a 42-month contract providing wage and benefit improvements for some 4,300 clerical, ticketing and reservation employees.

The union will complete a ratification vote on the contract Aug. 29.

BRAC's Northwest General Chairman Arlo Bertsch said that while details of the contract have not been released it does provide for an extended longevity scale in lieu of a two-tier wage scale under which new workers would have received a lower wage.

The adjusted longevity scale will require new employees to wait longer to reach the top of the scale, but they will receive the same starting wage as under the current contract, Bertsch said.

Current starting pay for ticket agents is $1,574 a month, with the top wage set at $2,501. The base wage for reservation clerks is $1,539 per month, rising to $2,431 after seven years.

The settlement also will increase pension benefits 9.4 percent over the life of the contract, improve sick leave provisions, and increase the number of part-time agents the airline may hire.

Auto union seeks emergency rule on toxic chemical

The Auto Workers petitioned the Occupational Safety & Health Administration for an emergency standard to sharply reduce the worker exposure limit to methylene chloride, a suspected cancer-causing chemical.

Methylene chloride is one of the two toxic chemicals that were released from Union Carbide's plant in Institute, W.Va., on Aug. 11, injuring 132 persons.

The chemical, now being reviewed by the Environmental Protection Agency, the Consumer Product Safety Commission and OSHA, has been found to cause cancer in laboratory animals.

High risk

A CPSC staff report said the risks from using methylene chloride "are among the highest ever calculated for chemicals from consumer products."

Methylene chloride is used in paints, paint-strippers, degreasers, wood stains, hair sprays and other consumer products.

Workers are exposed to it in certain solvents, foam plastic manufacturing, adhesives and paints and paint-strippers.

The UAW wants OSHA to lower its worker exposure limit from 500 parts methylene chloride per million parts air to 75 ppm, a level the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health has been recommending for years.

The emergency standard should include requirements that employers measure workers' exposures and inform them of the results, improve ventilation, provide protective equipment and eliminate spray applications, the UAW said. Further, OSHA should immediately begin working on a permanent standard, the union added.

Coors canned

Santa Cruz, Calif.—Coors beer and city functions don't mix, the City Council decreed.

A resolution adopted at the urging of the Santa Cruz County AFL-CIO cited the company's anti-union activities and noted "a long and clear public record" of discriminatory employment policies.

The resolution set a policy of "prohibiting official city participation in any event involving the Coors Brewing Co. or its subsidiaries, or involving the promotion of Coors beer or other Coors products, so long as the national organized labor boycott endorsed by the AFL-CIO shall continue."

It went on to direct city government staff to "avoid even informal involvement during the performance of their city duties in any future event involving the promotion of Coors beer."

Central Labor Council President Jerry Zellhoefer said Coors lobbied unsuccessfully in an effort to block passage of the resolution.

24,000 eliminated

CWA voices outrage at massive jobs slash

The Communications Workers charged AT&T with undermining union-management relations and demanded immediate negotiations over massive job layoffs announced by the company and related issues.

CWA President Morton Bahr said he was ''bitterly disappointed'' by AT&T's failure to consult with the union before deciding on the layoffs.

The union has been trying to build cooperative labor-management relations as a prelude to national bargaining next year, Bahr said. But he warned that AT&T's management ''is creating an almost insurmountable obstacle to successful negotiations.''

AT&T said it will eliminate some 24,000 jobs in its information systems group, the company's computer and business equipment arm, including 7,000 management posts.

Bahr was sharply critical of the company's withholding of information about the impending layoffs from the union. Newspaper stories about AT&T's intentions appeared the week before the official company announcement, he noted.

Management benefits

The CWA was also angered by AT&T's announcement of an 8.5 percent rise in management pensions, double the amount that non-management employees will receive this fall.

The timing, at a time of impending layoffs, shows ''incredible insensitivity,'' Bahr said.

It is comparable, he suggested, to the action of auto companies that announced generous bonuses for executives ''after squeezing wage concessions'' from workers.

Bahr charged that ''there has been nothing approaching equality of sacrifice'' in AT&T's cost-cutting operations.

In a letter to AT&T Chairman Charles Brown on behalf of the CWA executive board, Bahr called for negotiations over transferring the ''surplussed'' workers to other AT&T jobs.

Contract goals

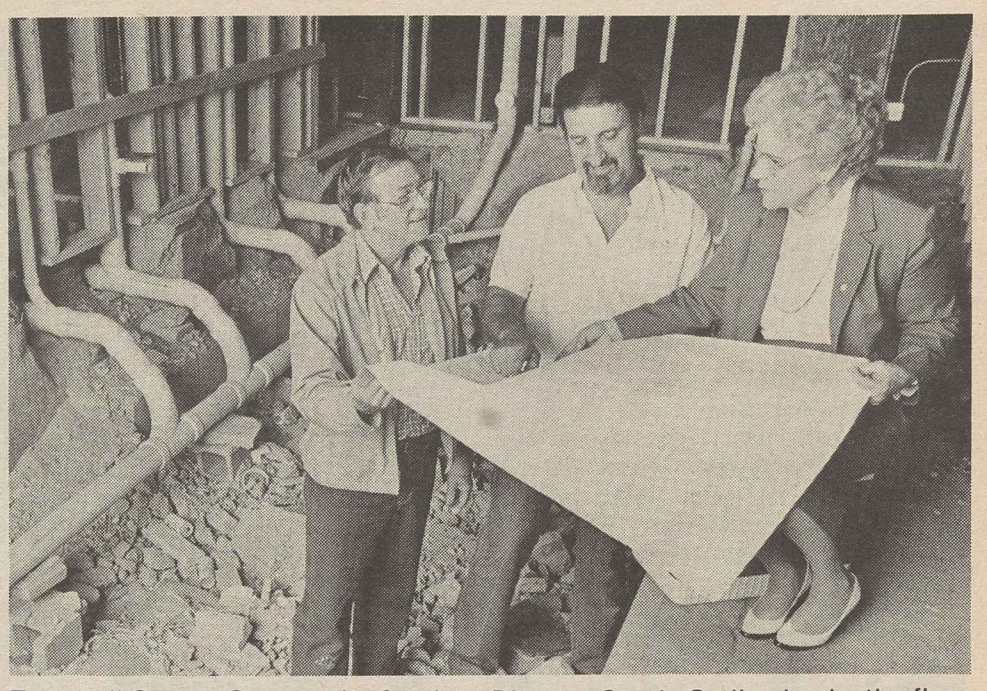
He said the union also wants the same early retirement incentives AT&T gave to management extended to bargaining-unit workers, an overall improvement in pension benefits, and the strengthening of existing job security provisions of the collective bargaining agreements.



The management announcement said most of the job cutbacks will take place before the end of the year and warned that further reductions might become necessary.

The company said its sales are up, but it needs to improve ''profitability.''

An AT&T official said the company would try to find other jobs for some of the workers affected but he was ''not optimistic'' about the prospects for achieving that goal.

The CWA said the AT&T layoffs, as well as a growing trend toward contracting out of union jobs and the foreign production of telecommunications products, will be a focus of a nationwide day of protest on Aug. 29.

The protest, endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting, will mobilize union members to press Congress for an investigation of the impact of telephone industry divestiture on workers and consumers.

Trumbull County Community Services Director Carole Catlin checks the floor plan of new food bank warehouse being renovated by union volunteers.

Ohio crafts donate skills to food center for jobless

Warren, Ohio—Building trades volunteers are converting a run-down building into a food warehouse that will serve thousands of unemployed and needy families in the Trumbull County area.

The renovated warehouse will be used by the Warren-Trumbull Food Coalition, a food bank which has aided more than 100,000 persons since it opened in November 1982.

The project began with a $10,000 grant from the Trumbull County commissioners and an additional $20,000 from the Warren City Council to purchase materials to remodel the unused city-owned property.

Carole Catlin, AFL-CIO Community Services executive director for Trumbull County, coordinated the renovation project. She praised the union volunteers, stressing that the hundreds of hours of manpower needed to complete the job are ''no measly donation.''

Catlin said she received ''a positive response from every trades group that we talked with to get the job done.''

The volunteering union crafts include Bricklayers Local 43, Carpenters Local 1438, Electrical Workers Local 573 and Plumbers & Pipefitters Local 225.

Electricians have rewired light and heating outlets and installed an electrical hookup for a walk-in cooler that coalition members hope will be donated.

Plumbers are installing bathrooms and connecting the warehouse to the city's sewer lines, while carpenters build new walls and add a drop ceiling and bricklayers work on a new loading dock.

The warehouse was to be completed in early August, but a fierce summer storm caused a roof cave-in, and set back the work schedule. Catlin hopes the facility will be finished by mid-September, when ''truck loads of food will be arriving.

Catlin said more than 100 building trades workers and other union volunteers have joined in the warehouse project, many working evenings, weekends and holidays.

The building will be leased from the city for $1 a year and the coalition hopes to cover its utilities and maintenance costs through outside donations and government grants.

Five-fold increase

The remodeling work will expand the food bank's storage space to 2,500 square feet, more than five times the size of the center's former space. The coalition now plans to buy food and supplies in larger quantities to take advantage of volume discounts. Since 1982, the coalition has used more than $500,000 in federal grants and local dollars to buy food for needy families. The new warehouse will serve as a central storage point for food distribution centers.

Catlin said that increasing numbers of families in the area are using the food service, demonstrating the continuing need for emergency food assistance. She noted that the AFL-CIO Community Services office served 680 families in 1984 but already in the first six months of 1985, 609 families have needed assistance.

Video features to highlight programs for Labor Day

Labor's message will spread across the country this Labor Day weekend thanks to two broadcasting projects being made available to public and commercial radio and television stations by the AFL-CIO.

Developed by the federation's Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the projects include a 15-minute video newsfeed that will be offered some 500 commercial TV stations across the country.

Titled ''The State of Labor, 1985,'' the videotape will be beamed by satellite on Aug. 29 and 30. A 5-minute radio feed taken directly from the video feed will be offered radio stations.

''State of Labor, 1985'' includes a statement by Federation President Lane Kirkland, a segment on the changing situation of workers and their unions with a statement by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, rare photos and footage of labor history, and a question-and-answer segment with Kirkland.

Labor songfest

The second LIPA project, ''Singing for the Union,'' is a half-hour celebration of new labor music, a series of specials for public TV. Ninety-one public TV stations will carry the program.

The specials spotlight a new breed of labor troubadours who are composing songs about contemporary workplace issues, such as working mothers and their problems, job safety, and high tech concerns.

LIPA noted that the musical program will appear in markets reaching 47.7 percent of all American TV households and that additional stations may be added to the list.

Meanwhile, New York City's Channel 13 announced plans to begin a month-long series of 10 documentary specials paying tribute to the American worker.

The series, ''Made in the USA,'' will begin on Sunday, Sept. 1, at 6:30 p.m. with ''Singing for the Union.''

The specials will portray the struggles of workers across the country to achieve decent working conditions, fair wages, equality of pay, and human dignity.

Lillie C. Brown dies, aided labor abroad

New York—A memorial service was held here Aug. 20 for Lillie C. Brown, a former consultant to the AFL-CIO who helped establish the federation's European bureau.

Brown, who died Aug. 19 of a heart attack, was the former wife of AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown. She is survived by a son, Robert Brown, of New York.

Public-sector pacts average 4.9%

First-year wage increases negotiated for state and local government workers during the first half of 1985 averaged 4.9 percent, about the same as that reported for all of 1984, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Data based on 110 contracts covering nearly 560,000 workers also showed that the average annual pay raise over the life of the agreements was 5.1 percent.

The figures compare with increases of 4.8 percent and 5.1 percent, respectively, for all of last year.

Each of the contracts covered bargaining units of 1,000 workers or more. BLS said that of the 558,000 workers covered in the settlements during the first six months of the year, 54 percent were employed in general government and administration, 20 percent in education, and the remainder in health care, transportation and protective services.

The average wage increase was about the same in state as in local government—4.9 and 4.8 percent, respectively, in the first contract year, BLS said. Corresponding increases averaged 5.2 and 5.1 percent annually over the contract life.

''Almost all state and local workers will receive a wage increase during the contract term, and none will have a wage decrease,'' BLS said. ''However, no first-year wage increase was negotiated for 12 percent of local government workers compared with 2 percent of state government employees.''

In key contracts covering 5,000 or more workers, increases in total compensation—wages and benefits combined—averaged 4.7 percent while the average gain over the life of the settlements was 4.9 percent annually.

Bargaining activity in the second half of 1985 will be considerably heavier. BLS said that about 1.1 million state and local government employees may be involved in negotiations, including 737,000 under 177 agreements that had expired or had not renegotiated by June 30.

Another 277,000 workers are under 85 major agreements scheduled to expire between now and December, and 77,000 more are covered by contracts that have provisions for wage reopening.

BLS said nearly nine-tenths of the workers under expiring or reopening agreements are in local government, most in education and general government.

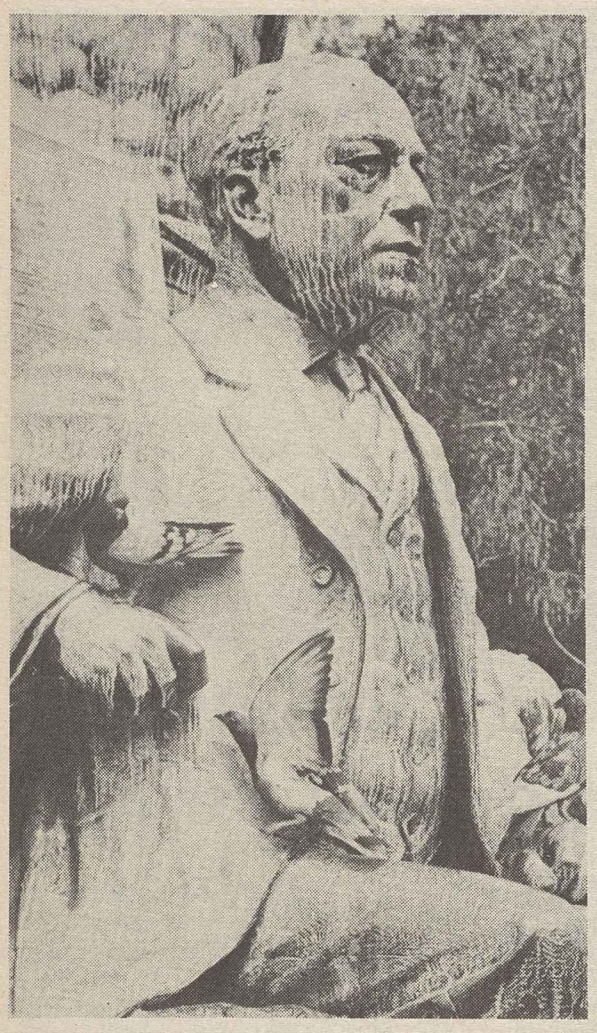
Nearly 390,000 workers are scheduled to receive deferred wage increases averaging 4.9 percent in the last half of this year, BLS said.

These increases will be made under provisions of existing bargaining agreements negotiated earlier.

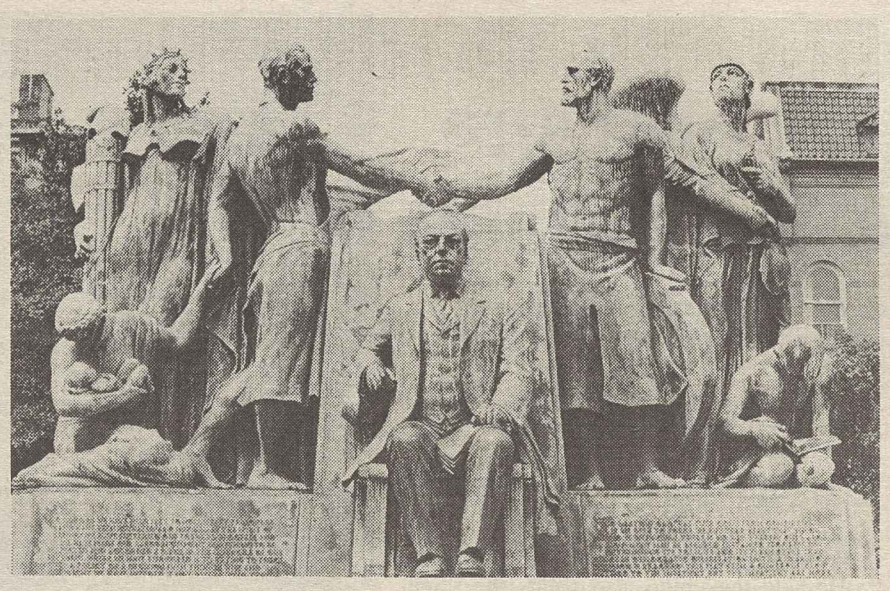
About 2,000 workers are scheduled for cost-of-living adjustment reviews during the last six months of 1985, BLS added.

New Jersey plant-closing bill on Kean's desk

Trenton, N.J.—One of the nation's strongest measures to protect workers who lose their jobs due to a plant closing is awaiting New Jersey Gov. Thomas Kean's decision.



The bill, passed by the state legislature in June, was strongly supported by the New Jersey AFL-CIO, which believes it has an even chance either way to get past the Republican governor.



Kean, who has not publicly indicated his position on the measure, has until the next meeting of the legislature to sign, veto or recommend changes in the bill. The legislature is on summer recess, and is expected to convene within the coming month.

The bill would require employers who have been in business for three years or more to give the state up to six months notice of a closing or transfer of operations that would result in the permanent layoff of more than 50 persons, and three months notice to employees.

The measure would also provide six months' extension of health and life insurance benefits and severance pay of up to 12 weeks.

In these respects, the State AFL-CIO pointed out, the bill is more stringent than plant closing bills now in effect in Maine and Wisconsin, the only states that have plant closing laws in effect, or a federal bill reported out of two House Labor subcommittees in June.

Gompers: worn but not forgotten

The nation's memorial to Samuel Gompers, founder of the American Federation of Labor, needs major repairs and the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO is doing something about it.

The city labor federation is stepping up a national campaign to raise funds to restore the 52-year old bronze monument and beautify the park where the statue is located in northwest Washington.

The monument was built by the AFL and dedicated by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in 1933.

A $5,000 contribution from the AFL-CIO launched the campaign in 1983, but the fund-raising effort was stalled by financial problems and was subject to government delay since the monument sits on federal property.

Council President Joslyn N. Williams said funds also are being raised toward a memorial to A. Philip Randolph, founder of the Sleeping Car Porters, the first major union for black workers.

Initially, the labor council had planned only to clean the 16-foot Gompers statue. But an architectural survey by the National Park Service uncovered serious structural problems. The statue has several deep cracks, and erosion has affected the internal ironwork, requiring major repairs on the bronze, iron and granite base. The engineering report estimated the repairs would cost nearly $55,000.

The city government has promised to find a site for a Randolph monument, but the labor council has not decided what would be the most fitting tribute to the labor and civil rights leader, Williams said.

The labor council plans to complete both projects and rededicate the Gompers monument for Labor Day 1986, Williams said.

Reagan veto threat of South Africa sanctions triggers deep discord among Republicans

By David L. Perlman

The next target of the veto weapon that President Reagan has been waving may be bipartisan legislation intended to pressure South Africa to dismantle its apartheid system of racial discrimination.

Mainstream Republicans—and even a branch of the GOP's right wing—have been aghast at the growing White House tilt against any semblance of economic pressure to push the cause of human rights.

To achieve the overwhelming bipartisan support sought to send a clear message to the Pretoria government, the original House passed bill was substantially toned down.

The final House-Senate conference agreement included a curb on bank loans to the South African government, a ban on importation of Krugerrand gold coins, and some sales restrictions. It directed President Reagan to submit recommendations for further sanctions if the Pretoria regime does not move toward ending apartheid during the coming year. But it dropped a House-passed ban on new investments in South Africa by U.S. firms.

Wide margin

The House approved the conference agreement by a thundering 380-48 margin, and a group of 30 Republican conservatives in the House sent President Reagan a letter strongly opposing a veto. The Senate has scheduled action for Sept. 9, after Congress returns from its summer recess.

Bipartisan support for the legislation was an open rebuke to the policy of quiet diplomacy, which the Reagan Administration has consistently asserted will be more effective than sanctions in bringing South Africa to a respect for human rights.

The Administration's policy was sharply criticized by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its recent meeting. The council called for intensified international pressure to compel an end to government-imposed racial discrimination.

Officially, the White House says President Reagan has not yet made a final decision on whether to veto the legislation when it reaches his desk. But White House officials were sending a clear message of hostility to anything other than the mildest of rebukes to South Africa.

And in right-wing circles, the ideological line was being set by the pro-South African views of Moral Majority leader Jerry Falwell, political fund-raiser Richard Viguerie and White House aide Patrick Buchanan.

Right-wing target

Their target in the right-wing intramural fight has been the group of so-called populist conservatives loosely organized by Rep. Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) and generally allied with the presidential aspirations of Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.).

The pro-sanctions bloc has argued that the goal of a conservative majority won't be achieved through identification with racial segregation. The Washington Post quoted a White House official as retorting that the pro-sanctions conservatives are "politically naive."

These were some of the signals being sent:

- Rev. Falwell, who met with South Africa's President P.W. Botha in a brief "fact-finding" visit to South Africa, said he would urge his followers to buy Krugerrands, invest in firms doing business with South Africa, and lobby senators to vote against final passage of the sanctions bill. He denounced Bishop Desmond Tutu, the Nobel peace prize winner considered the moral leader of non-violent resistance to apartheid, as "a phony."
- Bishop Tutu was also criticized by White House spokesman Larry Speakes, although not directly by name.
- Comments by Reagan's national security adviser, Robert C. McFarlane, and widely reported off-the-record remarks by other senior White House officials strongly pointed toward a presidential veto. The veto message would likely be coupled with strong criticism of apartheid and announcement of some token wrist-slap of South Africa. Commonly mentioned has been a ban on the sale of American computers to South African agencies involved in carrying out the apartheid policy, one of the leading provisions of the legislation.

HRDI project aids New York state jobless

New York—The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute is working with central labor bodies throughout New York state to get a tally of union members left jobless by plant closings and major layoffs.

The survey project is being conducted in cooperation with the New York State AFL-CIO. Its goal is to set the stage for programs designed to give dislocated workers the best chance of returning to the workforce with decent jobs.

HRDI has already surveyed the state's 31 central labor councils to identify the scope of the problem and is now completing a survey of the state's 1,300 union locals. The surveys are being funded under the Job Training Partnership Act.

The follow-up to the surveys will include:

- Assistance to laid-off workers in obtaining re-employment help.
- Sponsorship of workshops, with the cooperation of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, to let affected workers know what services and benefits are available.
- Cooperation with the unions, central bodies and local JTPA organizations to develop dislocated worker programs.

Another major project will be a series of training sessions for the 71 union representatives serving on local and state councils set up under the federal Job Training Partnership Act.

Two HRDI-trained employment and training specialists are serving the New York areas—Judith McFatter of the Teachers, working out of the State AFL-CIO's New York City offices, and Edwin Aspinall of the Ladies' Garment Workers, operating from the state federation's Albany headquarters.

HRDI Regional Rep. Tom Scotland is coordinating the program.

Unions boost Icahn's bid to acquire TWA

The Air Line Pilots and the Machinists ratified new agreements with financier Carl C. Icahn that will give their members at Trans World Airlines profit-sharing and stock in the airline in return for wage and benefit concessions.

The contract approvals virtually assure Icahn success in his bid to acquire the nation's fourth-largest airline and block the attempted takeover of TWA by the anti-union Texas Air Corp. Icahn announced on Aug. 21 he plans to raise his stake in TWA to more than 50 percent, giving him control of the carrier.

Icahn already holds 45.5 percent of the airline's 34.5 million shares outstanding.

Under the three-year agreements, IAM members would receive 20 percent of TWA common stock and 20 percent of company profits in return for a 15-percent wage reduction.

ALPHA members would accept a 26-percent cut in wages and benefits and a lower pay scale for new hires in exchange for the same percentage of stock and profits as IAM members.

Icahn has agreed to provide a minimum of $127 million a year in capital investments to the airline, assuring TWA's continued growth.

The contracts would become effective when Icahn officially takes control of the airline.

Solid front

IAM Vice President John Peterpaul said that the Machinists, in concert with ALPA and the unaffiliated Federation of Flight Attendants, "have wrested control of their future from the company's board of directors who would have handed TWA over to a proven union-buster."

"This is a historic achievement for these workers. The IAM congratulates Icahn on his success in acquiring TWA and looks forward to working with him," Peterpaul stressed.

Icahn's takeover of TWA would end a protracted battle for the airline between him and Texas Air Corp. President Frank Lorenzo. Lorenzo was bitterly opposed by the unions for his decision to unilaterally abrogate contracts at Continental Airlines, which Texas Air controls.

However, Icahn's position was strengthened after the TWA board of directors rejected proposals by Lorenzo that would have favored the Texas Air takeover bid.

Labor plays vital role in hurricane rescue

When Hurricane Danny threatened the Louisiana-Texas coast, union volunteers swung into action, preparing for the worst.

Three local union halls designated as coastline disaster centers by the American Red Cross became hurricane watch headquarters, as labor Community Services representatives helped coordinate a relief plan for the anticipated flood and storm damage.

Emergency vehicles were located, 12 fully equipped disaster vans were sent out to low coastal areas and 28 shelters were set up for emergency food and housing.

The shelters housed more than 3,100 people seeking safe ground before the storm struck the western Louisiana coast.

Outlook remains bleak for action on job hazards

By Arlee C. Green

Workers can expect little progress from the Occupational Safety & Health Administration over the next few years, either in the issuance of new standards or the enforcement of existing ones, an AFL-CIO safety specialist said.

The responsibility for changing OSHA's direction lies with new Labor Sec. William Brock, Margaret Seminario, associate director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, explained to a symposium sponsored by the Urban Environmental Conference. Brock will shortly name a new administrator for OSHA and must decide the fate of a field sanitation standard for farm workers.

Labor will be watching both those actions to see how much independence Brock will be given by the White House, Seminario said.

"He has his first test sitting before him on the field sanitation issue." There has been extreme pressure from the White House and the Office of Management & Budget not to issue this standard, she noted.

"If the Secretary of Labor is not allowed to make a decision to issue a standard (requiring) drinking water, toilets and hand washing facilities for farm workers, you can be sure that when it comes to asbestos... benzene, formaldehyde, that the problems are going to be pretty great," Seminario said. "This is the real bell-ringer to tell us not only what the Secretary of Labor is planning on doing at OSHA, but what he's able to do."

Part of the pressure to stall or abort standards will likely come from OMB's newly named director, James C. Miller III who is awaiting Senate confirmation.

Personal agenda

"You can be sure that when he comes in as the head of OMB, blocking and stopping OSHA regulations are going to be very high on his personal agenda because that is what this man has been doing for a number of years," Seminario said.

On the appointment of a new OSHA administrator, she stressed the importance of getting someonw "who is respected in the health and safety field."

Seminario suggested that OSHA may complete a few standards over the next few years because of court orders to do so and because of public pressure on such substances as asbestos, benzene and formaldehyde, she said.

Product liability suits against manufacturers and employers have provided the impetus for the business community to apply pressure for at least minimal standards, especially for those three substances, she added.

Workers still hold the key to the setting of standards, Seminario said, citing their success in getting a number of states and communities to adopt stringent right-to-know laws. The grassroots effort will work on other issues such as stress and video display terminals, she said.

In detailing the history of OSHA, Seminario pointed out that the law owes its existence to tragedies in the workplace. Yet major tragedies still occur before adequate enforcement is carried out. Seminario pointed to the recent Oklahoma fireworks plant explosion that killed 21 workers. Now OSHA has announced it will inspect every fireworks plant in the country by next July 4.

Despite severe chemical accidents in Bhopal, India, and Institute, W.Va., OSHA does not inspect chemical plants regularly because they fall below the national average in worker injuries, Seminario said.

After Bhopal, OSHA inspected several facilities that make methyl isocyanate, the toxic chemical that killed more than 2,500 persons in India. OSHA's press releases said it couldn't happen here. The same process, the same plant design exists at Institute and OSHA declared it safe, she said.

Now since the Institute accident with its failed gaskets, gauges and valves, it will be "interesting to see what OSHA has to say."

OMB involvement

Commenting on President Reagan's latest executive order expanding the power of OMB to involve itself in all phases of the regulatory process, Seminario noted that it requires agencies, such as OSHA, to give OMB an annual regulatory calendar. From this, OMB is telling agencies the type of studies they can do and the information they can collect.

"If you stop the information from being collected, then there is never a problem identified to regulate and that's how insidious it's getting," she observed.

AFL-CIO's Margaret Seminario voices concerns on OSHA's future performance.

Brock challenged on delay of field sanitation review

The failure of Labor Sec. William E. Brock to reconsider the issuance of a field sanitation standard by a court-ordered deadline of Aug. 9 is being challenged by the AFL-CIO and the Farmworker Justice Fund.

In a petition to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, a coalition of 29 labor, religious and social welfare groups asked that the court clarify the Labor Secretary's obligation to have completed his review by that date.

The field sanitation standard, as proposed in March 1984 by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, would have required farmers to provide field workers with portable toilets and clean water for drinking and handwashing.

Following the appellate court's consolidation and dismissal in July of two cases that had been filed to force the issuance of a field sanitation standard, the Labor Dept. considered it was no longer obligated to meet the Aug. 9 deadline. In one of those cases which dated back to 1973, OSHA had agreed to decide by January 1985 on whether to issue a standard.

In April of this year, then OSHA Administrator Robert A. Rowland chose not to issue a final field sanitation standard, a move that drew widespread criticism from Congress, labor, farm and religious groups about the Reagan Administration's "meanspiritedness." Rowland later resigned amid questions of conflict of interest.

Front burner

Brock, during his Senate confirmation hearings in the spring, had promised to review that decision. For three of the four weeks since the court dismissal of the two other cases, Brock has been on vacation. Following the court request for clarification, he now has put the issue on "the front burner," David Demarest, a spokesman for the Secretary, said.

The petition to the court charges that the Labor Secretary failed to comply with appellate court rules by not responding to the farm workers' earlier petition for review of the decision not to issue a standard.

The coalition asked the court to set a date for oral arguments in the case "at which the Secretary will not be permitted to be heard," as provided under court rules.

In the alternative, the court should at least order the Secretary to respond by Sept. 12 on the decision not to issue a standard.

Drain of skilled educators distresses Administrators

San Juan, P.R.—Concern over the future of education in America emerged as a major theme at this year's convention of the American Federation of School Administrators.

During a panel discussion by school superintendents from urban areas, the warning came that unless proper incentives are provided the profession will continue to lose qualified teachers and administrators.

Dr. Nathan Quinones, chancellor of the New York City school system, said New York is 4,200 teachers short going into the new school year and the city is going abroad to recruit teaching personnel.

Dr. Herman LaFontaine, school superintendent for Hartford, Conn., also indicated concern for the general outlook of education.

LaFontaine said that to maintain good administrators, school systems need to provide the opportunity to grow on the job as well as to earn promotions and higher salaries.

School administrators, like any other workers, need to have an avenue for promotion, he said.

He indicated that teacher salaries in the Hartford area will rise in the next few years to a range of $17,000 to $50,000.

Teacher exodus

Both men warned that big city systems are losing competent teachers to the suburbs where the pay tends to be higher. They said the key to attracting more qualified people to the profession and to keep top administrators is to improve salaries. This in itself, they agreed, is a compelling reason to join the Teachers or the School Administrators.

The AFSA, which was chartered as an AFL-CIO affiliate in 1976, has about 10,000 members in 78 locals. The union represents middle-level school supervisors, including principals and vice principals, in 14 states and Puerto Rico, with large concentrations of members in the Northeast and Midwest.

The 112 delegates re-elected the union's top slate of officers to new three-year terms as well as eight vice presidents. Re-elected were President Martin Kalish, Sec. Aaron Z. Gordon, Treas. Murray Schneider, and Executive Vice President Theodore Elsberg.

Delegates also updated the constitution to provide for separate offices of secretary and treasurer to conform with the leadership structure now in effect.

Fair representation

In another panel discussion, Attorney Bruce Bryant of Local 1 in New York City stressed the duty of local unions to accord members fair representation in grievance procedures.

On the same panel, Lynne S. Coffin, general counsel for the union in New York, spoke of the need for union representation in cases where local boards of education "play politics" in the hiring and placing of teachers.

Mark Cousin, counsel for Local 28 in Detroit, emphasized that locals should write into their contracts provisions for releasing teachers according to seniority during reductions-in-force, or RIFs. Without such contract provisions, he said, school districts might be able to release personnel as they wish.

Cousin said there has been an increase in RIFs in recent years, and called upon locals to review their contracts to insure members' protections.

The convention concluded with a women's caucus, which focused on promoting female leadership within the union, and a meeting of presidents of 70 AFSA locals for an exchange and dialogue on their problems.

Reagan policies blamed by study for 'import shock'

tially more than the oil import price escalation of the 1970s.

- Goods-producing industries have felt the brunt of the import battering. The most severely-affected sector is capital goods, "for decades the mainstay of U.S. trade and the symbol of U.S. industrial strength."
- The United States has become a "net debtor" nation, after having been a "net creditor" to the rest of the world since 1914.

Dingell said the deterioration of the nation's economy began when the Reagan Administration "cut taxes for the rich and financed a military buildup with budget deficits."

But "because this Administration harks back to some golden age of 'free trade,' it fails to offer any semblance of a policy to address trade and industrial ills, whether resulting from its own errors or the cheating of other nations," Dingell charged.

The staff report examined the competitiveness of American industry, apart from the distortion caused by the exchange rate of the dollar.

Unit labor costs, the report noted, are one of the important measures of industrial competitiveness. It cited a study undertaken by the Citicorp Bank research department last fall as bearing directly on that issue.

The Citicorp study examined data on unit labor costs for the United States and 11 other industrial countries for the 1980-83 period in what was described as "an attempt to separate real cost factors from the effect of changes in exchange rates."

The conclusion was that the United States had outperformed nearly all other industrial nations during that period. The median increase in labor costs for the 11 other countries was about twice that in the United States.

But the distortion of the dollar exchange rate gave every other country in the comparison an artifically created unit labor cost advantage, the study found.

Rubber Workers ratify Armstrong contract

Akron, Ohio—The Rubber Workers approved a new three-year agreement with Armstrong Rubber Co. that provides wage increases and benefit improvements for 2,600 employees.

The pact, similar to the union's settlements earlier this year with the Big Four tiremakers, was ratified by four of the five URW locals representing Armstrong workers.

The new contract increases hourly wages by 25 cents the first year, 10 cents the second, and 8 cents the third. It also provides for cost-of-living adjustments and improvements in health care and supplemental unemployment benefits and pensions.

The agreement covers workers in West Haven, Conn., Des Moines, Ia., Natchez, Miss., Madison, Tenn., and Hanford, Calif. Only the Madison plant voted against it.

Court slams Reagan stand on benefits

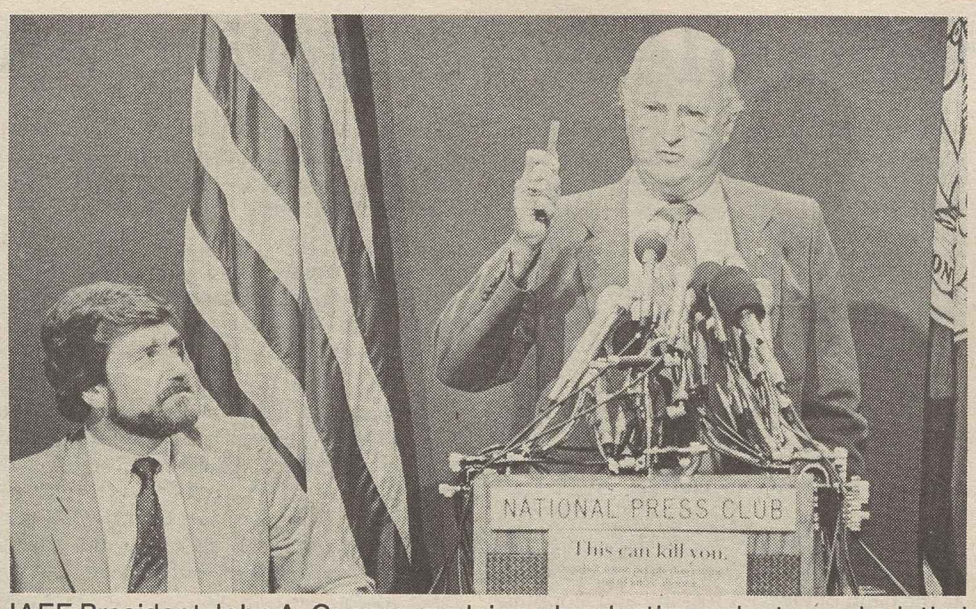
Public outrage at the harsh policy spurred unanimous approval by Congress of labor-urged legislation to set up safeguards and put the burden on the government to show that a recipient is no longer occupationally disabled.

But new applicants are still being turned down for reasons the courts have rejected in the past, the injunction decision stressed.



The Social Security Administration first adopted a policy of applying a court decision only to the case directly involved, without changing its rules for similar cases. When that brought a new burst of congressional protests, the agency last June modified its regulations so that a ruling by a circuit court of appeal would be followed as a guide by administrative law judges in that judicial circuit.

Not far enough

But the change didn't go far enough, Judge Sand ruled. A court-mandated policy is binding in the judicial circuit where it was handed down, he said, and should be applied at the first stage of an application for benefits. Half the applicants who are denied disability benefits don't carry an appeal to the administrative law judge level, often because of their unfamiliarity with the law.

The City of New York had joined in seeking the court order, noting that it faces a heavier welfare burden when federal disability benefits are cut off or denied.

Further hearings before Judge Sand will be held to determine if the temporary injunction should be made permanent and to decide on compensation for persons who have been improperly denied benefits.

Fire Fighters call for tests of all building materials

The Fire Fighters intensified the union's campaign for tougher state laws to require testing of all building materials, while attempting to extinguish a blaze of protest from the Society of the Plastics Industry, Inc., concerning the IAFF's film, "The Burning Issue."

IAFF President John A. Gannon, at an Aug. 21 press conference, explained that the film is part of the union's overall campaign for updating of state codes to require the testing of all building materials before they can be used in construction.

Gannon said, "Our crusade (is) to make fire fighting safer and to reduce the staggering number of deaths caused by fires in this country." He pointed out that nearly 80 percent of some 6,000 fire-related deaths every year are caused by smoke inhalation, and that, in a fire, plastic products produce extremely toxic fumes.

Several states, including New York, may soon require makers of building and furnishing materials to test their products for toxic-gas emission during fires. Pittsburgh already has an ordinance barring the use of plastic pipe and conduit in new and renovated buildings higher than three stories.

"The plastics industry doesn't want this film shown because they don't want you to know the truth about some products which are very dangerous," Gannon said. The industry has tried to stop public television stations from showing the 26-minute film.

"They have even gone so far as filing a motion with the Federal Trade Commission to block its showing," Gannon said.

In its motion to the FTC, the industry called the IAFF film "anti-competitive in purpose and effect." The film was financed in part by a steel electric pipe manufacturer, but the IAFF had full editorial control over the film, Gannon said.

The film shows scenes from fires at the MGM Grand Hotel fire in Las Vegas and the Beverly Hills Supper Club in Kentucky where many people died from smoke inhalation.

Multiple dangers

The danger to the public and firefighters, however, is not limited to the fumes from burning plastic, Gannon insisted.

"We've seen in recent incidents in West Virginia and in accidents on the Washington beltway that chemicals can be very dangerous when they are being manufactured or transported," he said.

"Something must be done to help fire fighters carry out their jobs better and to help defend the public's right to know. Otherwise, it's like trying to save people's lives while blindfolded."

The IAFF president also cited the hazards of polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) which when burning can produce dioxin, one of the most dangerous substances in the world. In 1977, the Environmental Protection Agency banned the use of PCBs in power transformers and ordered the phase-out by 1990 of those already in existence. Several power companies are now preparing to challenge the ban in the courts, Gannon said.

Montana delegates back plan to strengthen COPE's role

Helena, Mont.—The Montana AFL-CIO has launched a campaign to encourage union members to sign voluntary agreements to join in political action efforts on behalf of COPE-endorsed candidates.

The action was approved at the State AFL-CIO convention here to boost support for pro-labor candidates. It would commit a participating member to campaign for COPE-endorsed candidates by going door-to-door, manning phone banks, putting up signs or whatever other efforts are needed, COPE Director Don Judge said.

In other major action, the 120 delegates re-elected State AFL-CIO President Jerry Driscoll and Executive Sec. Jim Murry to two-year terms. Both were unopposed.

Murry conducted one of three workshops that highlighted the convention. Titled "New Directions," it sought to boost delegate input on the goals of the state federation.

A workshop on state and national tax structures was conducted by the Montana Alliance for Progressive Policy (MAPP), a coalition of labor, agriculture, conservation, women and education groups.

Candy Brown, regional coordinator of the Human Resources Development Institute and the State AFL-CIO staff conducted a workshop on employment and training programs, reviewing federal and state programs and how unions can have greater input.

Gov. Ted Schwinden (D), in an address to the convention, said organized labor hasn't done a complete job in telling its story to the public. He urged the delegates to work to get labor's message out.

Dave Wanzenried, director of the state's Labor Dept., praised the Montana AFL-CIO's job training programs for meeting or exceeding their goals in terms of placement of trainees, wage levels of trainees placed and in other areas. "They are almost categorically better than any program directors in the state," he said.

Fighting RTW

Idaho AFL-CIO President Jim Kerns detailed labor's efforts in Idaho to defeat a so-called right-to-work law. Union members led the successful effort to put the recently passed measure to a referendum.

Rep. Patrick Williams (D-Mont.) told the delegates of legislation he is sponsoring to create a federal occupational disease compensation program and require employers to purchase federal liability insurance.

Other guest speakers included Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers President Lawrence A. Holley; Henry Bechtholdt, director of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum division of the Boilermakers; AFL-CIO Field Rep. Tom Patterson; Carpenters Executive Board member Paul Johnson; Director Alan Kistler of AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services; Electrical Workers Vice President John Walters; Food & Commercial Workers Vice President Don Hofer and Field Rep. Earl McDavid of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

OSHA redrafting job hazards rule under court order

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration is drafting a notice to expand its hazard communication standard, the so-called right-to-know rule, to include all employers, not just those in the manufacturing sector.

The agency's action was ordered by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last May in a lawsuit filed by the Steelworkers. The court directed the agency to expand the standard to all industries unless it could show why that was not feasible.

Acting OSHA Administrator Patrick Tyson said the notice, to be published in about a month, would seek recommendations on how best to accomplish this.

The agency will then issue an advanced notice of proposed rulemaking, the first step in ordinary standard-setting. Tyson said there are "some problems" in including all employers under the rule. He cited the difficulty in applying the training requirements to construction sites. A department spokesman said it is likely that a final rule will be ready by the end of 1986.

The Labor Dept. last month let its appeal deadline pass and decided against seeking a Supreme Court ruling in the matter.

Jobs outlook seen mixed in Tennessee

Nashville, Tenn.—The impact of the changing nature of the economy on Tennesseans provided a focal point for delegates to the State AFL-CIO's 14th biennial convention.

On one hand, the convention welcomed the decision by General Motors' Saturn Corp., to locate its new $3.5-billion automated car manufacturing plant in Spring Hill, Tenn., for the thousands of jobs it will bring.

On the other hand, economic policies of the Reagan Administration continue to cost the state jobs in other industries, notably textiles and shoes.

To cope with the job losses due to imported goods and plant closings, the convention adopted a number of resolutions to protect worker rights.

Noting the increasing flight of multinational companies abroad, the 400 delegates passed a measure calling for an end to tax incentives that foster plant closings and requiring adequate advance notice of such closings.

Other resolutions opposed President Reagan's attempts to tax major employee benefits and scored the union-busting activities that have clouded labor-management relations under this Administration.

Illustrative of the anti-union efforts of some employers, the current negotiations between Local 34 of the Broadcast Employees & Technicians and WKRN—Channel 2 in Nashville—were held up as a case in point.

18th Century style

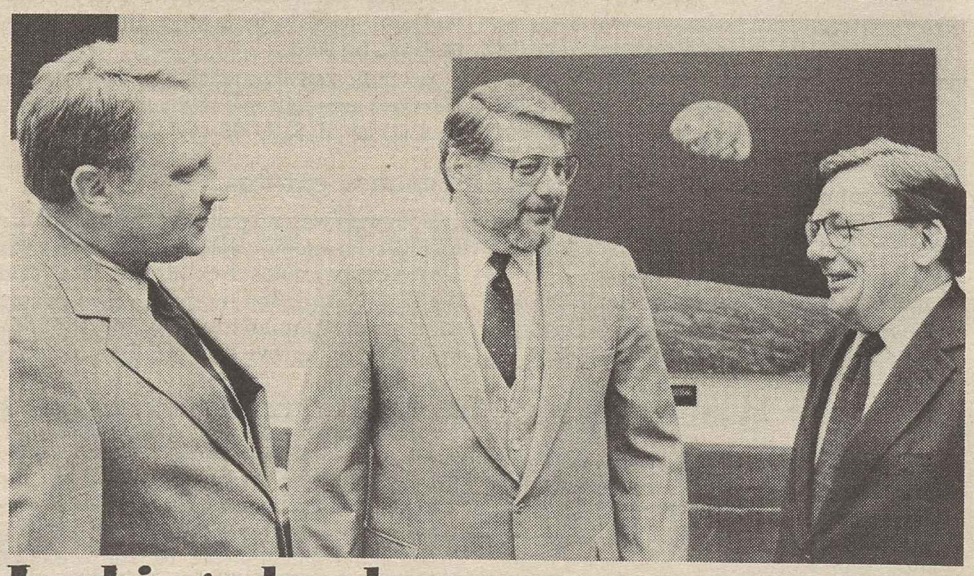
Channel 2, the only unionized television station in Tennessee, recently was purchased by Knight-Ridder Broadcasting, Inc., which is asking its workers for massive contract concessions.



The delegates unanimously passed a resolution censuring the ABC affiliate for its "18th Century practices of labor-management relations." The measure called for a fullscale campaign to support the 62-member NABET unit in its struggle to preserve its contract.

Ken Moffett, assistant to the president of NABET, told delegates Channel 2 is not bargaining in good faith. The station's hiring of an anti-union law firm is clear evidence it is "out to bust the union," Moffett told the delegates.

During the four-day meeting, delegates re-elected President James G. Neeley, Sec.-Treas. Eddie Bryan, 1st Vice President H.T. Powell and 2nd Vice President Charlie Dunning.

Also elected were four new vice presidents, James Hale of the Laborers, Nashville; Ed Pierce of the Machinists, Chattanooga; Rev. James E. Smith of the State, County & Municipal Employees, Memphis, and Eddie Whitefield of the Stove & Furnace Workers, Lewisburg.

Among the speakers were Sen. Albert Gore, Jr. (D-Tenn.); Rep. William H. Boner (D-Tenn.); Paperworkers President Wayne Glenn; President Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and State Labor Commissioner Francis Guess.

An Earned Right

YOU HAVE a big stake in social security. Throughout your working life, you're building up an entitlement to social security benefits. These are earned rights—you earn them by your work and your contributions.

What's more, for every dollar you put into this system, your employer is required by law to put in one dollar, too—insuring better benefits for you and your family.

Most people think of social security as a pension plan which will help provide for them in their retirement years.

Sure, it's a pension plan—and a good one, too. The average retired worker in 1985 receives $449 a month; the average aged couple's monthly benefits amount to $776.

But social security is more than just a pension plan. It also provides:

Disability Insurance—to help you and your family if you become too disabled to work. (The average disabled worker with spouse and children receives $893 a month.)

Life Insurance—to provide income for your spouse and dependent children if you should die during your productive years. (The average surviving spouse with two children receives $998 a month.)

Health Insurance—to help retirees and the severely disabled meet hospital and medical bills which can take such a big bite out of their budgets.

So social security is, in a very real sense, a family protection plan.

OPPONENTS OF social security claim that you can buy bigger retirement annuities from private insurers for the same amount of dollars you put into social security. That's not true.

For one thing, these people include the employer's contribution—which your boss has to make under social security, but which he would not be required to make toward financing a private annuity.

For another, they completely overlook the other key features of social security—disability insurance, life insurance and health insurance.

Your benefits are indexed to wages during your working years, and indexed to prices after you start receiving them. Only social security can give you this total insurance package at a price that's within reach of your family budget.

Because nine out of every 10 jobs are covered by social security, its benefits move with you from job to job. It doesn't matter how often you change occupations.

In 1983, Congress passed and the President signed into law social security amendments which closely followed the recommendations of the bipartisan National Commission on Social Security Reform.

As a result, the social security trust funds are already building up multi-billion dollar surpluses each year. So social security will be there when you and your family need it—whether the need arises out of retirement, disability or death.

Opponents of social security are trying to drive a wedge between young and old Americans—between those paying into social security and those drawing benefits. But it won't work.

IF IT WEREN'T for social security, someone would have to support your parents and grandparents in their old age. Someone would have to support disabled workers and their families. Someone would have to support surviving spouses and their dependent children.

You'd either have to take over the direct financial support of needy relatives, or you'd have to pay more taxes for expanded welfare programs.

Social security is an easier and fairer way of meeting the needs of the elderly, the disabled, and surviving spouses and dependent children. It provides benefits as a matter of right, not in the demeaning form of welfare or charity.

Social security is today what it has been for the past 50 years: an alliance between workers and retirees, to make certain that neither group will be shortchanged.

Job Corps wins friends, but not at White House

By Press Associates, Inc.

The Job Corps, now in its 20th year, is a tested and popular program.

It's popular with congressional liberals and many conservatives. It's popular with the communities across the country where 107 Job Corps centers are located. It's popular with disadvantaged high school dropouts who were redirected from lives of poverty, welfare, despair and crime to become productive members of society.

With its proven track record, which studies have calculated in terms of dollars and cents as well as in terms of human success stories, one might think that the Job Corps would even be popular with the Reagan Administration. But think again.

While praised in the past by President Reagan and Labor Dept. officials, this year the Job Corps was among several domestic programs the Administration sought to eliminate from the Fiscal 1986 budget.

Fortunately, Congress refused to go along. Before its August recess, it approved a budget resolution which would fund the program next year at its current $617 million level plus inflation.

Fight continues

However, the fight to save the Job Corps from termination or crippling cutbacks isn't over since Congress still must pass appropriations legislation to fund the program in its budget resolution.

The White House, meanwhile, has been wielding the veto threat over spending bills it doesn't like. In a direct challenge to the congressional budget process, presidential spokesman Larry Speakes said recently that Reagan would seek to hold domestic spending to levels contained in a budget resolution passed earlier by the Republican-led Senate. Reagan wants the line-item veto so he wouldn't even have to negotiate with Congress for more cuts.

Since its inception in 1965, more than a million disadvantaged young people have been served by the Job Corps, a disciplined residential program which provides vocational training, remedial learning, counseling and job search assistance.

Training is given in occupations including auto repairs, heavy equipment operation, carpentry, clerical and office work, and electronic assembly. Several trade unions play a key training role at many centers.

About three-fourths of all enrollees move on from the Job Corps to either a job, a school or the military. One well-respected study showed that for every $1 spent on the program, there was a $1.46 return to society in terms of increased employment and revenues, reduced welfare payments, and less crime and incarceration.

Change of mind

Iowa Republican Congressman Jim Lightfoot became a staunch defender of the program after a close, first-hand look. "I spent half a day at the Dennison Job Corps center and it was a real eye opener. What I saw were disadvantaged kids—kids who before they were enrolled in the program were destined to a life of low-paying jobs, welfare dependency, and despair," the congressman told a House Government Operations Employment & Housing subcommittee on which he serves.

Lightfoot said the enrollees "were there working together to improve their lives. I saw hope on those kids' faces. I was also impressed with the attitude of the students, the enthusiasm of the instructors, and the strong support of the community.

"As a fiscal conservative, many people are surprised by my strong support for the Job Corps program," he continued. "Although efforts must be made to reduce the large federal deficit, they must not come at the expense of programs that work."

As the Government Operations Committee concluded in a recent report, "The Job Corps is one of the success stories of the War on Poverty. This committee believes that society receives full value for the money spent on it. Attempts to eliminate or significantly cut this program, which represents the best hope for so many disadvantaged young people, are short-sighted and ill-advised."

MEMO FROM COPE

WATCH OUT, presidential hopefuls, you're going to be put on the griddle. Right-wing leaders are reported to be planning National Conservative Convention in Dallas July 2-4, 1986 (get the symbolism of July 4; these folks own Independence Day). It will be like a political party convention, complete with state delegations. Delegates will be drawn, in the description of one planner, from "the separate religious, economic and defense/foreign policy wings" of the ultra-conservative movement. Candidates for GOP 1988 presidential nomination doubtless will be invited and will speak to convention. Before that particular collection of right-wingers, representing just about every issue on their vast agenda, candidates better say exactly the right thing on everything or risk a chorus of boos—possibly on national TV — and an early collapse of candidacy.

NOT RUNNING for re-election to U.S. Senate in 1986 is Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.), the President's best buddy in Congress and a major voice in GOP ultra-conservative circles. His announced retirement as of end of term gives boost to Democratic hopes to gain control of Senate in next year's elections. GOP presently has 53-47 margin, must defend 22 seats next year to only 12 for Democrats. Laxalt's was considered safe for GOP, but now is viewed as Democratic possible pick-up. With Laxalt will depart 90 percent "wrong" score on AFL-CIO voting record, among worst in Senate.

YES, RUNNING for re-election is Illinois Gov. Jim Thompson (R), seeking fourth term. Already holds state's record for length of service as chief two races going away, but last time around—1982—exec, has served since 1977. Thompson won first barely squeaked by former Sen. Adlai Stevenson III by only 5,074 votes, smallest plurality in governor's race in Illinois history.

MAYBE RUNNING is actor Fess Parker, who says idea of 1986 try for Senate from California is intriguing. He played Dan'l Boone and Davey Crockett in TV series, also—and more to the point—starred in "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." If he runs, it would be to seek GOP nomination against incumbent Democrat Alan Cranston.

Odds 'n Ends

CHRISTIAN RIGHT continues deepening political involvement. Wall Street Journal runs lengthy story about relatively unknown group, Maranatha Christians, headquartered in Gainesville, Fla. Claims about 4,000 members—mostly college youth. About 100 of them went door-to-door for the election of ultra-right Rep. Mark Siljander (R-Mich.), others were very active for Jesse Helms' re-election last year. They draw praise from rightist leaders for producing bodies at rallies for ultra-conservative candidates and causes. They're headed by a guy who claims a "gift" of revelations from God.

ON SAME TRACK, apparently recent suggestion by rightist chief Richard Viguerie to TV evangelist Pat Robertson is being taken seriously. Viguerie said he thought Robertson would make good presidential candidate. Now come reports Robertson is giving it thought. His TV talk show, the 700 Club, reaches millions of homes, and he has a donor base as large as the GOP National Committee that produces some $200 million a year for his various enterprises. He recently responded to a question about a presidential race, saying "I'm praying about it," but news accounts indicate he's gone past prayer. The Washington Post claims he's purchased a 24-seat jet plane, set up a precinct organization called the Freedom Council, provided seed money for a research arm, and strengthened ties to key rightist leaders—Viguerie, Paul Weyrich of the Free Congress Foundation, Howard Phillips of Conservative Caucus.

WHILE ON SUBJECT, James Reichley of Brookings Institution comes out with book, "Religion in American Political Life," whose figures dramatically illustrate climb in GOP strength due to support among Christian fundamentalists. He says they went from 56-43 pro-Democratic in 1976 presidential election to 61-39 in 1980 and 81-19 last year. In hard numbers, trend translates into a switch of 8.25 million votes for President from Democrats to GOP among nation's 22 million born-agains. Equally significant, this same group cast 77 percent of its ballots for GOP congressional candidates last year, a sign that more than Reagan is moving them.

GOP FRESHMAN crop scores high on rightist group's voting record. Fund for Conservative Majority says GOP Class of 1984 is "significantly more conservative" than upper-classmen, finds 31 freshmen have over-all support score of 87 percent on 10 issues used by rightists. Eight of them score 100 percent. Two key GOP House leaders also reach perfect score by Fund's standards—Minority Leader Bob Michel (Ill.) and 1988 presidential hopeful Jack Kemp (N.Y.).

MONEYBAGS Republicans still piling it in, leaving Democrats way behind. Combined finances of three major GOP committees—National and House and Senate — pulled in $53.2 million January through June, while their Democratic counterparts managed $14.3 million. This 4-1 edge, though awesome, doesn't live up to margins of past few years, when 8-1 and 10-1 were common.

'Impressions'

If "favorable impression" of a politician among the public can be translated right now into a presidential sweepstakes, then Vice President George Bush heads the GOP eligibles and former President Jimmy Carter and Sen. Ted Kennedy are out front among Democrats. That's what a Washington Post-ABC poll shows.

As far as anybody knows, Carter isn't running, despite his elevated standing. On the other hand, in the GOP former President Richard Nixon isn't running either, and the poll puts him ahead of Rep. Jack Kemp among GOP leaders in "favorable impression" but even more ahead in "unfavorable."

Among Democrats, Carter and Kennedy each have 55 percent favorable rating, with Carter 39 and Kennedy 33 percent unfavorable. The balance of responses are 'don't know."

In order, rounding out mentioned Democrats favorable to unfavorable were: Chrysler Chairman Lee Iacocca 49-15; Sen. Gary Hart 47-22; Rev. Jesse Jackson 43-41; Gov. Mario Cuomo 24-12.

President Reagan is out front of Bush among GOP leaders but ineligible to run again. Following Bush's 59-28 rating are former Sen. Howard Baker 38-15; Sen. Bob Dole 36-15; Nixon 28-64; Kemp 21-10.

Don't bother to ask how the lists were determined or, for that matter, why the poll was taken.

Velasquez, David Named COPE Aides

COPE Director John Perkins announced appointment of Marta M. David and Joe Velasquez as assistant directors.

David served for eight years as research director and deputy director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Previously, she worked for the Democratic National Committee and for the successful 1976 presidential campaign of Jimmy Carter. She is a graduate of Catholic University, Washington, D.C.

Velasquez was COPE region director for Ohio and Michigan. Among previous positions: International Representative, United Auto Workers; Ohio administrator of industrial relations; U.S. Labor Dept., Labor Liaison for OSHA; field director, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement; Hispanic political coordinator for Mondale-Ferraro 1984 campaign. He is a graduate of Indiana State University.

HUBRIS — Beware, GOP . . . it goeth before a fall

HUBRIS: (noun) Exaggerated pride or self-confidence often resulting in retribution.

—Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary

The Republicans possess hubris, scads and scads of hubris. They got more hubris than sense. When it comes to hubris, they're the reigning champs. Boy, are they hubristic.

One thing about hubrism, sooner or later it brings you down, "resulting in retribution." Like, for example, the Republicans swaggered into the First Congressional District of Texas a while back just certain that the sun was shining for them alone down there, and what happened? They up and lost a special U.S. House election they spent $1½ million trying to win and sure they'd do it.

Now a little more news comes along just instructing us all over again that pride and hubris goeth before a fall, and you never know when you're going to get egg on your face.

There were the Republicans again, making a big splash early last May promising to move into four states — Florida, Louisiana, North Carolina and Pennsylvania — and get 100,000 registered Democrats to switch registration and join the GOP.

They were going to achieve this in 100 days with a budget of $500,000. But life caught up with their hubris.

They announced recently they're going to keep the campaign going past the 100-day mark — and past the $500,000 mark, for that matter. Latest cost figure is up to $750,000 (or $7.50 per crossover if they reach target) and many observers feel three-quarters of a million doesn't begin to reflect what the GOP is really spending.

Even though they're already claiming success, independent surveys dispute them.

Take Florida. When they launched this "Operation Open Door," GOP leaders set a goal of 45,000 converts there. A survey by the Tampa Tribune reported switches of only 6,340 Democrats in the GOP's target counties.

To get what they got, the GOP mailed 400,000 letters to registered Florida Democrats, hired solicitors to go door-to-door and paid them $4.50 an hour, plus $5 for every voter they bagged.

In North Carolina (home of Jesse Helms) a Charlotte Observer survey of all counties found 2,130 Democratic defectors. The GOP target was 15,000.

Reportedly, but without authentication yet, the Open Door drive was doing better in Louisiana. In Pennsylvania, no figures were available as this went to press.

The fact is, no matter the final results — even if the GOP reaches its goal — the campaign is tainted.

Spend enough money and take enough time and you can probably convert base metal to gold, let alone Democrats to Republicans—or, for that matter, Republicans to Democrats.

No matter how they proclaim it, the GOP's Operation Open Door slammed in its face.

They really oughta get rid of that hubris.

Reagan stand barring shoe quotas blasted

By John R. Oravec

President Reagan's refusal to provide any kind of import relief for American shoe factories and their workers drew sharp rebukes from unions, industry and both Democrats and Republicans in Congress.

Reagan rejected recommendations of the International Trade Commission to place quotas on imported shoes that retail for more than $5 a pair. Earlier this year, the ITC found in a unanimous decision that the domestic footwear industry has been seriously injured by imports, which have now claimed 76 percent of the U.S. market.

Since 1968, the torrent of imports—surging to more than 700 million pairs last year—has forced the shutdown of 500 U.S. shoe factories and wiped out 120,000 American jobs.

The ITC's recommendations for a five-year plan of quotas and other remedies would have initially limited imports to 454 million pairs a year while the U.S. footwear industry retooled to challenge the competition of low-wage imports.

Footwear union presidents, Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers and William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers, said in a joint statement: "It is a bitter day for American shoe workers and their families. President Reagan's refusal to save the shoe industry is a callous and deplorable act."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said Reagan's decision "is further evidence that this Administration is locked into dogmas of the quiet past that don't meet the needs of the stormy present."

National issue

Citing the imbalance in international trade as the nation plunges toward a record $150-million trade deficit in 1985, Kirkland said the import problem has become a national issue that requires immediate attention.

"There is not just a groundswell but a tide—a strong current of deep concern about stripping the United States of its capacity to produce essential goods," he stressed.

"The case of the shoe industry was overwhelming. The case of the injury and the circumstances that brought about that injury are overwhelming. If the President can't respond to that, it's hard to see what element of the problem he can respond to."

Similar criticism came from members of Congress representing shoe-producing states:

- Sen. William Cohen (R-Me.) branded Reagan's decision "grossly insensitive to the needs of the 200,000 shoe workers throughout the country. . . . By refusing to impose quotas on the cheap foreign shoes which are flooding the country, the President is effectively signing the death warrant of the U.S. footwear industry."

ITU members rebuff Teamster takeover bid

Motown to Coaltown

A 217-vehicle caravan of Auto Workers is welcomed to a Mine Workers rally in Belfry, Ky., for 1,500 unaffiliated UMW members on strike against the giant A.T. Massey Coal Co. The convoy, bearing signs of "Motown to Coaltown—Support and Solidarity," brought much needed food, clothes and money. (Story and more photos, Page 5.)

Merger plan rejected by 2-to-1 vote

Colorado Springs, Colo.—The Typographical Union crushed a takeover attempt by the unaffiliated Teamsters, rejecting a proposed merger by a 2-to-1 margin—34,234 votes to 17,547.

ITU President Robert S. McMichen credited the union's "traditions of democratic unionism and involvement with the mainstream of organized labor" as the deciding factors in the sweeping rejection of the Teamsters.

About 75 percent of ITU's active and retired members cast ballots in the referendum, which was conducted by the American Arbitration Association. Some 3,000 ballots were challenged, mainly by pro-Teamster observers, but they are too few to affect the outcome.

The AFL-CIO welcomed the results of the mail refendum. Federation President Lane Kirkland declared the ITU members "have overwhelmingly rejected the attempt of the Teamsters to take over their union."

Fraternal support

Noting the tally is a "strong affirmation of the printers' historic belief in democratic trade unionism," Kirkland pledged that the federation will "continue to assist the ITU to maintain the high standard of representation of its members who face a time of challenge and change in the publishing industry."

The referendum results are a defeat for Teamsters President Jackie Presser who personally initiated IBT's push to take over the ITU, the nation's oldest union.

McMichen, in a joint statement with Vice Presidents Billy J. Austin and William Borman, said that because of the large turnout, "we are confident this strong vote will put the Teamster affair well behind us. We look forward to the resumption of cordial relations with the Teamsters and expect to be working with them wherever the need arises to serve our two unions' mutual interests."

McMichen observed that many ITU members in casting ballots for the Teamster offer "were voting more for the concept of merger with a larger union than with the Teamsters specifically. We plan to move

'Resurgence' of unions keys Labor Day themes

"A new spirit of solidarity and confidence" is growing within the labor movement, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in his Labor Day message, and he predicted it will lead to a brighter future for America's workers.

Kirkland noted that over the last five or six months "that spirit has forced itself on the attention of observers who were saying only last year that our movement was a thing of the past." The difference this year, he said, is that "most commentators see 'resurgence,' not 'decline,' as the word for the American trade union movement."

As for his own observations, Kirkland said that his recent meetings with thousands of union members in all parts of the country have convinced him that "internally, at least, this movement was never in better shape. Morale is as high as it has even been in my lifetime."

'Continuing problems'

The spirit of renewal now pervading the labor movement set the major theme for the Labor Day statements of Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. But they also pointed to the setbacks and the "enormous continuing problems" confronting organized labor.

"Coming out of the worst recession since the Great Depression of the 1930s, we find economic policies designed to keep unemployment permanently at recession levels," Kirkland charged.

"We find our country opened wide to floods of imports that are systematically driving American goods from the American marketplace and inflicting injuries from which some of our most essential industries may never recover."

Kirkland charged that these and other afflictions grow directly from policy choices by the Reagan Administration and "blunders committed by corporate managers." He accused the Administration and its corporate allies of trying "to make American workers their scapegoats and to depress their living standards" by subverting the laws designed to protect workers, giving new benefits to

Railroad Yardmasters' vote clears affiliation with UTU

Park Ridge, Ill.—The Railroad Yardmasters, a 67-year-old union with a proud history but a declining membership, will become an affiliate of the United Transportation Union this fall.

Members of the Yardmasters voted 3-1 approval of the merger-affiliation agreement in a referendum ballot. The UTU board of directors had earlier unanimously endorsed the proposal.

The UTU has 130,000 active members in the United States and Canada, and is the largest of the railroad operating unions. The Yardmasters, with 2,400 members, represents supervisors in railroad yards.

UTU President Fred A. Hardin welcomed the decisive vote of approval by the Yardmasters as "a major step toward our mutual goal of a united rail labor organization." The UTU was founded in 1969 by a merger of four railroad unions.

Yardmasters President A.T. Otto, Jr., predicted "a harmonious future" for his union, which has struggled under the shrinkage of railroad employment. "We must unify to protect the welfare of our members," he stressed.

While the affiliation is subject to final approval at the UTU's next convention, in

Steelworkers' rally builds support for Wheeling-Pitt lockout victims

Pittsburgh—Steelworkers raised their voices against the union-busting tactics of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp.'s chairman Dennis Carney at a solidarity rally here Aug. 26.

Nearly 2,000 locked-out Wheeling-Pittsburgh workers, their families and supporters gathered at "Steelworker Plaza" near USWA headquarters for speeches and songs, then marched to W-P's corporate offices, chanting "Carney's got to go."

The rally was billed as a message not only to Wheeling-Pittsburgh and Carney but to other steel companies whose agreements expire next July 1. In an earlier letter to members, USWA President Lynn Williams said "the pattern of steelworkers' wages will not be set by one bankrupt company."

Paul Rusen, the union's chief negotiator told the protesters they were sending a clear answer to the industry's cry for more concessions, and "we're not going to walk backwards anymore."

USWA District 15 Director Andrew Palm said the action at Wheeling-Pittsburgh "awakened a sleeping giant" at a company that hasn't had a work stoppage since 1959. "We're going to rise up right across this country starting today," he vowed.

Rally speakers promised to keep up the fight to defend their union, and blasted Carney for his "lack of feeling for working people."

Eight busloads of workers came from Local 1229 in Monessen, Pa., and another 10 from Local 1187 in nearby Allenport, both closed W-P plants. More than 200 USWA members and supporters made the trip from Chicago and Gary, Ind.

A gate-collection and fund-raising drive by District 31 members in Gary, Ind., resulted in a $29,000 donation to the W-P members. "Our contract is coming up next and we don't want them coming after us," said Local 1010 vice president Mike Olszanski.

Financial aid

The USWA also created a "Wheeling-Pitt Strike Fund" to provide financial assistance, and established an emergency medical plan which offers health benefits to the idled steelworkers and their families. Medical benefits for W-P workers were cut off by the company on July 22. Other donations to the fund have exceeded $13,000.

More than 8,600 workers at nine Wheeling-Pittsburgh plants in Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio have been off the job since July 21, after the nation's seventh largest steelmaker filed for bankruptcy and announced plans to slash their wages and benefits.

On July 17, a federal bankruptcy court judge allowed W-P to cancel its union contract and agreed that the steelmaker could impose wage and benefit cuts of $4 an hour. That ruling was upheld Aug. 28 by a federal district court judge in Pittsburgh.

Union members had already agreed to nearly $141 million in concessions and held that W-P's creditors should make similar efforts to save the steelmaker by easing their interest and payment schedule, a move resisted by the lenders. "Steelworkers won't ship money from the Mon and Ohio Valleys to bankers in New York," said Rusen. "The members insist that they be treated as fairly as the banks."

Wheeling-Pittsburgh is seeking a preliminary injunction to block the locked-out workers from filing for unemployment compensation during the dispute. However, top corporate officials have asked the bankruptcy court to protect their own "golden parachutes" and job benefits.

The USWA noted that the continuing labor dispute is putting pressure on Carney, the stockholders and lenders to reach a settlement.

Another W-P rally is planned at the Steubenville, Ohio, plant Aug. 31, followed by a march through Monessen on Sept. 7.

Soft landing

While Wheeling-Pittsburgh tries to block unemployment benefits for its locked-out workforce, the steelmaker's top executive officers decided they needed to keep their own "golden parachutes" in place.

W-P asked Bankruptcy Judge Warren Bentz to protect the bonuses and pensions of the company's top 12 executives.

Chairman Dennis Carney's "golden parachute" could provide about $1 million in severance pay, plus an annual pension of $100,000. Carney would also receive additional stock options if W-P is sold.

Detroit AFL accord hikes teacher pay

Teachers in Detroit reached a tentative agreement on a pay package that would provide increases totaling 17 percent over the next two years.

In two other large cities, Philadelphia and Chicago, members of the American Federation of Teachers continued negotiating with school boards in hopes of reaching agreements before classes start next week.

No AFT locals were on strike, and the number of contract disputes was down from previous years.

In Detroit, some 12,000 teachers stand to receive across-the-board salary increases of 10 percent this year, 4 percent in September 1986, and 3 percent in January 1987.

Their agreement also would provide vision care coverage and preparation time for high school teachers. The Detroit AFT local recommended approval of the agreement. Mail ballots will be counted Sept. 6.

Contract term

In Chicago, the stumbling block is over length of contract. The union, representing 28,000 teachers, wants a two-year contract; the school board one year. The AFT local is asking for a wage increase of 8 to 10 percent.

In Philadelphia, where the AFT is negotiating a new contract for 21,000 teachers, pay is also an issue—but the main dispute centers on teacher preparation time.

The AFT won another breakthrough settlement in Broward County, Fla., the ninth largest school district in the nation, where 8,000 teachers will receive an 11.5 percent increase.

Meanwhile, Auto Workers Local 2300 at Cornell University in Ithaca, N.Y., reached tentative agreement on a three-year contract covering 900 service and maintenance employees.

The agreement, reached Aug. 24, was ratified the next day and ended a two-day strike.

George Francisco dies, headed Firemen & Oilers

Fairfax, Va.—George J. Francisco, Sr., president emeritus of the Firemen & Oilers, died of cancer Aug. 25 at the Hospice of Northern Virginia. He was 66.

Francisco joined the union in 1937. He held top elected offices in New York Local 520 and served as chairman of IBFO Council 2 in New York.

In 1967, he was elected an IBFO vice president and later served six years as secretary-treasurer before being elected president in 1981. He retired in December 1984. He also served on the boards of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept., Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. and Maritime Trades Dept.

Survivors include his wife Mary, and three children. Funeral services were held Aug. 29 at St. Timothy's Catholic Church in Chantilly, Va. Burial was in Quantico National Cemetery.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

Eleven labor studies programs will be offered by the George Meany Center for Labor Studies during September and October. The schedule:

Television: The Cool Medium, Sept. 3-6 and Sept. 30-Oct. 3—Coaching workshop for union officers on facing TV cameras and working with TV reporters.

Negotiating for Better Health Care, Sept. 16-19—Collective bargaining institute focusing on health care benefits.

Organizing Techniques, Sept. 22-27 and Oct. 20-25—Courses for union organizers covering target selection, in-plant committees, house calls and winning issues.

Right-to-Know: Make It Work, Sept. 30-Oct. 1—Two-day workshop for union staff who train local members in using right-to-know laws and monitoring employer compliance.

Computers for Local Unions, Oct. 6-10 and Nov. 24-27—Introductory course on computers for unions thinking of buying computers or upgrading existing systems.

Effective Speaking, Oct. 6-11—A workshop to coach union leaders on how to select, prepare and deliver the message.

Discipline & Discharge Arbitration, Oct. 20-24—An institute to examine standards applied in arbitration hearings on discipline and discharge cases.

Contract Administration: Life Without Arbitration, Oct. 27-31—A program to explore speedier and low-cost alternatives to arbitration.

Four AFL-CIO affiliates will use the center in September for their own staff training programs: Railway & Airline Clerks, Sept. 8-13; Service Employees, Sept. 8-13; State, County & Municipal Employees, Sept. 15-20; Communications Workers, Sept. 22-27.

Also scheduled on campus are the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services national staff meeting, Sept. 16-18; Dept. of Education conference for union and university labor education directors, Sept. 23-24; Labor Lawyers Coordinating Committee conference on occupational health and safety, Sept. 23, and Industrial Union Dept. seminar on corporate power and coordinated bargaining, Sept. 29-Oct. 2.

The Asian-American Free Labor Institute will bring 13 Japanese trade unionists to the campus Sept. 4-11.

AAFLI country directors will be on campus for their annual meeting Sept. 13-20.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will graduate 37 trade union leaders from 16 Latin American countries Sept. 20. They've been on campus since Aug. 18 studying political theories and advanced organizing techniques.

More information on these and other labor studies programs is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Avenue, Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Tel. 301/431-6400.

'Disappointing' report

Poverty rate drops, income gap widens

A decline of nine-tenths of 1 percent in the nation's poverty rate last year was hailed by the Reagan Administration as good news, but it was "disappointing" to others concerned with the hardships faced by low-income families, who noted the widening gap between the rich and the poor.

The Census Bureau reported that the total number of poor people in the United States was 33.7 million last year, down 1.8 million from the year before. But that meant the number of persons living below the government's poverty threshold—defined as $10,609 a year for a family of four—was still 4.5 million greater than when President Reagan took office.

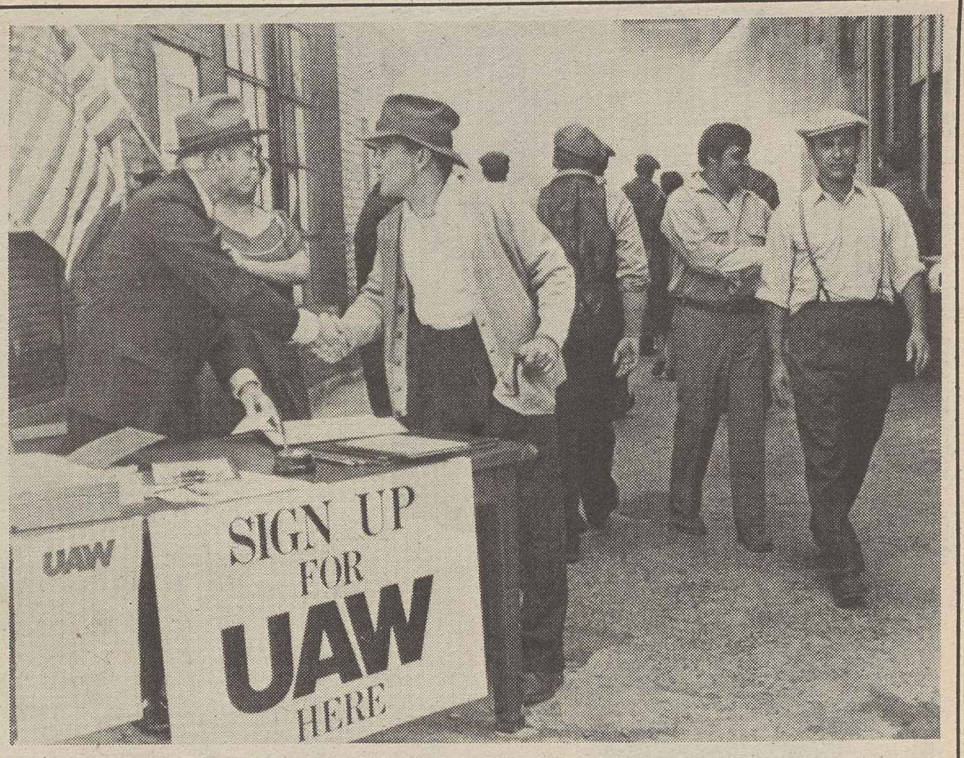
The report said the share of the population living in poverty declined from 15.3 percent to 14.4 percent last year.

One research and analysis group, the Center on Budget & Policy Priorities, termed the decline "disappointing" because it left the poverty rate "far above" the level prior to the Reagan recession that began in 1981.

The center pointed out that the 1984 poverty rate is nearly three full points over the rate for 1976-77 when unemployment was about the same as now.

In releasing the poverty figures, the Census Bureau also reported that median family income, measured in 1984 dollars, was $26,433, for a real increase of 3.3 percent following a 1.6 percent gain the previous year.

But this left real median family income still well below the $28,029 median recorded in 1979.



Bob Neuman, a spokesman for the Center on Budget & Policy Priorities, said the Census Bureau report shows the gap between the rich and the poor in the United States "is now wider than at any time since the Census began collecting income distribution data in 1947."

Record low

Neuman pointed out that the government's statistics show that the poorest two-fifths of American families received only 15.7 percent of total national income in 1984, the lowest ever recorded, while the highest two fifths got 67.3 percent.

The center blamed budget cuts in programs for the poor and the failure to raise the federal minimum wage as key factors in the widening income gap.

The government report also showed that while the poverty rate for all blacks declined from 35.7 percent in 1983 to 33.8 percent last year, the rate for black children under age six was 51.1 percent, the highest rate since the bureau began collecting data for this group in 1970.

UAW ads mark 50 years

Detroit—The Auto Workers are lighting up their 50th birthday cake with a series of network and cable television ads, fulfilling a 1983 convention mandate to "reach our members and the public" through television.

Backed by the UAW's new song, "Together," the commercials "sum up who we are as unionized workers, our pride in past achievements and our commitment to a bright future for America," UAW President Owen Bieber said.

"We wanted to use the occasion of our 50th birthday to proudly emphasize the fundamental union concept of collective action. UAW members have made enormous contributions to building a better America and we can continue to do so for the future if we stand together," he said.

"Charter Week," which kicks off the year-long celebration that will conclude with the triennial convention in June 1986, runs through Labor Day. UAW regions and local unions are holding picnics, banquets, parties, dances and other activities to mark the event. The UAW was chartered by the AFL Aug. 26, 1935.

UAW Local 664 members and their families in Tarrytown, N.Y., aided in the production of the ads.

The TV spots are being aired on NBC Nightly News, ABC World News Tonight, Cable News Network and NBC Baseball.

Statewide organizing drive mapped by Iowa convention

Waterloo, Iowa—The Iowa AFL-CIO is gearing up for a two-year statewide organizing campaign in an effort to add thousands of unorganized workers to union rolls.

Delegates to the state labor federation's convention underlined the need to establish organizing committees in each affiliated local union to help spur the grass-roots campaign.

The State AFL-CIO, which is allocating $5,000 toward the effort, has some 300 local affiliates with 49,000 members.

The convention also explored the new AFL-CIO report, The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions.

AFL-CIO Region I Director James Freeman urged that an extra effort be made to get all local unions affiliated to make the state central body more effective.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and a Clothing & Textile Workers vice president, told the delegates of recent successes in pay equity and of the efforts needed to end discrimination against women, both on and off the job.

Machinists Vice President George Kourpias cited corporate greed and bottom-line mentalities, bolstered by Reagan Administration policies, for the current attack on workers. He noted the ability of companies to cash in on the trade laws by exporting workers' jobs.

Officers re-elected

President James L. Wengert and Sec.-Treas. Mark L. Smith were re-elected with out opposition. Two new vice presidents elected to office are Mark Flaherty, president of Aluminum Workers Local 105 in Davenport, and Don Winter, vice president of State, County & Municipal Workers Council 61 in Des Moines.

Several convention resolutions reaffirmed the federation's goals of passing legislation that was vetoed by Republican Gov. Terry E. Branstad.

Delegates stressed their support of workers' compensation and unemployment benefits, both of which have been under attack by the governor.

Another resolution called for the enactment of legislation to provide workers free choice of medical care under the workers' compensation program.

Unfair taxes were the focus of several resolutions whose actions included a call for the restoration of corporate taxes in America, an end to loopholes in the state and federal tax codes, and opposition to tuition tax credits and to President Reagan's scheme to tax workers' benefits.

The delegates also backed the federation's efforts to gain fair, progressive taxes in the state through participation in the Iowa Tax Reform Action Coalition.

All state affiliates were urged to encourage their members to watch the twice weekly cable television shows sponsored by labor and produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO's television production arm.

Other resolutions called for full worker rights for public employees, affiliation by all local unions and central bodies with the state AFL-CIO, repeal of the state's right-to-work law, and a reduction in the nation's foreign trade deficit.

Delegates were bused to the Crossroads Mall on the second day of the three-day convention to join a dozen members of Food & Commercial Workers Local 46 in picketing G G Management Co., Inc., which fired its union workers after a change of management in the mall. Wengert said the picketing got wide media coverage. The delegates donated $430 from a floor collection to the dozen strikers.

Railroad Retirement Act also marks 50th birthday

Two weeks after President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act into law, he signed a companion measure on Aug. 29, 1935, the Railroad Retirement Act, which created a national pension system with a solid foundation for rail workers.

Eleven months later, 18 retired railroad workers became the first beneficiaries of the system.

William Wesley Billett of Bellefonte, Pa., headed that first list of rail pensioners. A car inspector for the Bellefonte Central, Billett retired in May 1936 at the age of 73.

Billett was interviewed by the railroad brotherhoods' newspaper, Labor, and asked how he felt about receiving his check for $63.83.

"Unless one is past 70 and separated from the activities of a lifetime," Billett said. "he cannot begin to understand what it means to be able to look to the future without fear."

The first formal industrial pension plan in America was established in the railroad industry in 1874, and by 1925 more than three-fourths of all U.S. rail workers were covered by pension plans. But few workers actually received benefits, especially after economically troubled railroads cancelled their pension obligations during the Depression.

The railroad unions sought a reliable national plan to ensure that workers on collapsed carriers or those who transferred to other carriers would not have their pension rights destroyed.

Court challenge

As part of Roosevelt's New Deal legislation, the law creating a national rail pension system was enacted in 1934, but was struck down by the Supreme Court. The 1935 Railroad Retirement Act also was challenged in the courts. While the appeal was pending, the unions and the carriers, at the urging of Roosevelt, resolved their dispute over the issue of carrier taxation for pensions and signed an agreement that led to the Railroad Retirement and Carriers' Taxing Acts of 1937.

Railroad retirement was kept separate from the social security program to preserve the past retirement credits earned by rail workers under individual railroad pension plans. The social security program did not credit past service and was not scheduled to begin monthly benefit payments until the 1940s.

Administered by the Railroad Retirement Board headquartered in Chicago since 1942, the rail retirement system has paid out more than $77 billion in benefits to more than 1.6 million retired rail workers, 800,000 spouses and 2 million survivors.

The board is made up of three members appointed by the President. Traditionally, one member has represented labor and one the carriers, with the impartial chairman representing the public interest.

As a result of laws passed in 1938 and 1946, the board also administers railroad unemployment and sickness benefits.

Reagan blasted for rejecting ITC proposal for shoe quotas

- Sen. John C. Danforth (R-Mo.) charged that Reagan's action "makes a mockery of U.S. trade law," and he pledged to fight to rewrite the law to curb the President's authority to reject the recommendations of the ITC.
- Sen. George Mitchell (D-Me.) said, "This is a total abdication of presidential responsibility. . . . It is an insult to thousands of hard-working shoe workers."
- Sen. Robert Kasten (R-Wis.) warned that "the Administration is trying to pull the plug on small shoe factories all over America, but Congress isn't going to stand by and let it happen."

Labor-backed legislation is pending in the House and Senate that would mandate shoe import quotas at about 55 percent of the domestic market.

George Langstaff, president of the Footwear Industries of America, charged that Reagan's decision is further evidence the President and his "free trade" advisers are trying to circumvent the congressional intent of trade law.

In announcing his decision, Reagan said Labor Dept. funds will be redirected to retrain shoe workers whose jobs are lost.

A Labor Dept. spokesman said the funds would be made available in about 60 days, but that no amount has yet been specified.

2nd convention ballot

OCAW votes merger with Paperworkers

Denver—The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers voted to merge with the Paperworkers as the OCAW convention approved the proposal with the required two-thirds majority on a second ballot.

The 600 delegates cast 70,336 votes Aug. 22 in favor of the merger with UPIU. The first ballot, conducted two days earlier, fell about 1,900 votes short of the 69,857 needed for approval.

"This is truly our finest hour," OCAW President Joseph Misbrener told the delegates following the approval. He had earlier noted that a merger "would create a unified force to attack the problems facing workers. The merged union would be a larger social force and we will be able to build on that combined strength."

The Paperworkers will consider the merger plan at a special, one-day convention Dec. 3 in St. Louis. If UPIU votes approval, the merger will take effect next Jan. 1, and the OCAW, headquartered here, will move to the UPIU building in Nashville, Tenn.

OCAW's 115,000 members would be combined with UPIU's 255,000 to form the United Paper, Energy & Chemical Workers International Union.

UPIU President Wayne E. Glenn addressed the convention between the two votes. His speech, coupled to a question-and-answer session, is credited with improving the merger vote.

Welcome action

"We are pleased and honored that the OCAW convention delegates have supported the merger proposal," Glenn said after the second vote. "We feel confident that our own delegates will give it their consideration and support in December."

Glenn said that "essentially there won't be any serious changes in the way either union operates" if the merger is approved Dec. 3. "There will be, however, a number of minor changes in the constitutions of both internationals to allow the merger to be effective."

The OCAW delegates re-elected the union's top four officers—President Misbrener, Sec.-Treas. Michael Ricigliano, and Vice Presidents J. Calvin Moore and Robert B. Wages III.

Four new members were elected to two-year terms on the eight-member executive board. They are Lowell 'Pete' Strader of Radford, Va., Charles Thompson of Kansas City, Robert Sell of Manistee, Mich., and James McHale of Frankford, Pa.

Under the proposed merger, Misbrener would become the senior executive vice president, Ricigliano would be executive vice president and Moore and Wages would be vice presidents at-large. Glenn would be the president of the merged union, with UPIU Sec.-Treas. John Defee retaining that post.

Bylaw changes

The convention action on merger also included changes in the union's constitution.

In his keynote address to the convention, Misbrener called attention to the recent boom in corporate mergers in the United States. "The Reagan Administration has a relaxed attitude toward the takeover craze and all other manifestations of greed in high place," he declared. "This anti-social behavior sooner or later will bring on a backlash—a swing of the political pendulum."

The delegates adopted a comprehensive statement on the need for the nation's leaders to set up policies that will lead to full employment. Among the actions needed, the delegates said, are a reduction in the workweek, elimination of overtime, a boost in the national minimum wage to $4.35 per hour and establishment of trade and industrial policies to retain and promote U.S. jobs.

The convention directed the OCAW officers to fully explore the feasibility of providing comprehensive medical coverage for members on strike. OCAW locals should be able to voluntarily participate in the plan through the international, the resolution said.

Workers' real wages drop with cutback in workweek

The real earnings of American workers fell six-tenths of 1 percent in July and were down 1.9 percent over the year, reflecting a sharp drop in hours worked, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Workers have suffered a falloff in buying power throughout 1985. Every month this year, real wages have trailed behind the corresponding month of 1984.

July's drop in real, or inflation-free, earnings resulted from a similar decrease in average weekly hours worked in nonfarm businesses, no change in average hourly earnings, and a rise of one-tenth of 1 percent in the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners & Clerical Workers (CPI-W).

The BLS said the average production or nonsupervisory worker in the private sector grossed an average weekly pay of $299.09 in current dollars. Adjusted for inflation since 1977, however, this amounted to $170.52.

BLS said that real average weekly earnings fell in seven of eight industry categories which it measures over the year. Declines ranged from six-tenths of 1 percent in manufacturing to 3.4 percent in retail trade.

Fuel and utility costs increased eight-tenths of 1 percent in July, as did personal education costs and school supplies.

Of the seven major expenditure groups in the CPI-W index, only the "other goods and services" component rose faster in July than in June.

BLS's other measure of changes in retail prices, the Consumer Price Index for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U), rose two-tenths of 1 percent over the month. CPI-W is used for indexing social security and some other federal payments and as an escalator in collective bargaining agreements.

Shelter costs up

BLS said that nearly three-fourths of the increase in the July CPI resulted from a jump in shelter costs, which have risen at a 6 percent seasonally adjusted rate so far this year. Housing costs climbed three-tenths of 1 percent last month, matching the increase in June.

Food and beverage prices edged up one-tenth of 1 percent. But fresh vegetable prices, which fell 8.9 percent in the second quarter, soared 6.5 percent in July and more than offset the continued drop in fresh fruit prices—down 4.3 percent last month.

Meanwhile, prices for meats, poultry, fish and eggs fell in July after rising in June, the first monthly increase in 1985.

Medical care costs climbed five-tenths of 1 percent seasonally adjusted last month, the smallest monthly increase since February. Prescription and nonprescription drugs, along with medical supplies and medical care services all rose five-tenths of 1 percent.

Under medical care, physicians' fees rose six-tenths of 1 percent while charges for hospital rooms declined four-tenths of 1 percent. Over the year in July, medical costs were up 6.2 percent.

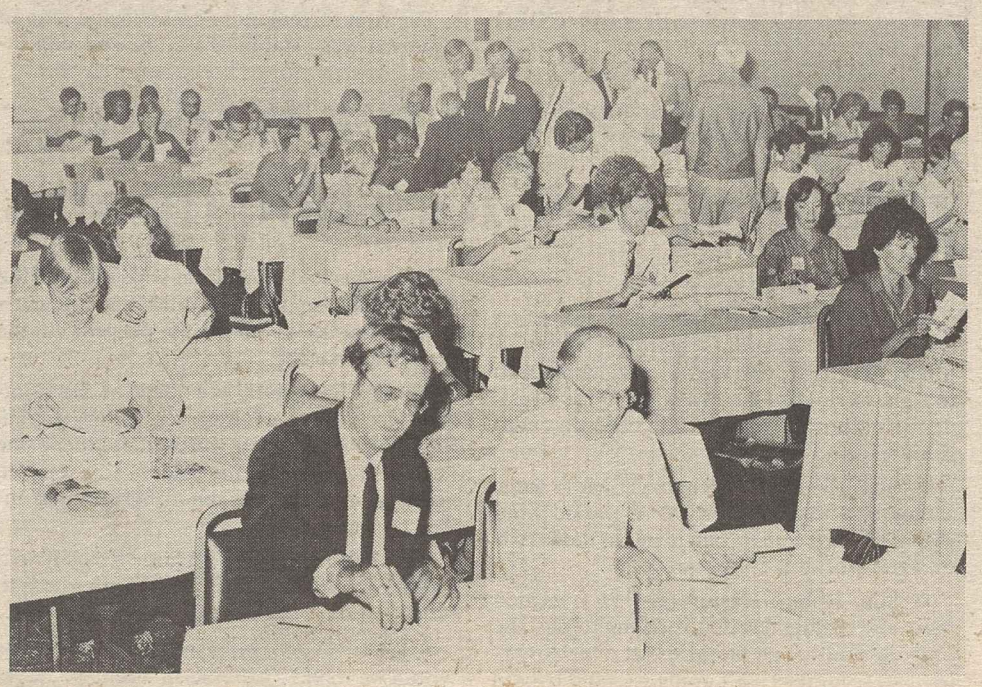
ahead with plans to try and complete a more appropriate merger."

The issue of merger with the Teamsters was brought to a vote because of the efforts of a previous ITU executive board, headed by former ITU President Joe Bingel.



The merger document was drawn up and approved during a period when Bingel held office, even though he had been defeated by McMichen by some 5,000 votes. A second election, conducted by the Labor Dept., confirmed McMichen's election by an even greater margin.

The subsequently elected board was sharply divided with McMichen, Austin and Borman supporting merger with an AFL-CIO affiliate, and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Kopeck and Vice President Allan J. Heritage backing a Teamsters takeover.

McMichen, Austin and Borman expressed their desire to work with Kopeck and Heritage "on a more appropriate merger."

The 200,000-member GCIU earlier this year voted against a merger document that had been quickly drawn up to comply with deadlines established by the ITU convention.

The joint statement added, "We look forward to having more time to devote to the day-to-day business of running this union," citing the strikers at the Chicago Tribune and other members as being in "need every moment of our attention."

Official tellers count ITU referendum ballots.

Railroad Yardmasters' vote clears affiliation with UTU

1987, the joining of the two organizations will take place at a signing ceremony to be held shortly. The target date for the physical move to the UTU headquarters in Cleveland is November.

Under the agreement, the Yardmasters will maintain their craft identity and governing structure, except that the secretary-treasurer post would be abolished and the UTU would administer the dues collections.

Otto said that he and Yardmasters Sec.-Treas. Robert J. Culver will retire in December. Under the affiliation schedule, James L. Roy, now a vice president and general chairman on the Norfolk Southern, will head the UTU Yardmaster Dept. Donald Carver, who is assistant to the president, will continue as the other full-time Yardmaster officer. Otto has served as president since 1970 and Culver has been secretary-treasurer since 1968.

Under the affiliation agreement, local lodges of the Yardmasters would retain their identities unless their members voted to merge with another Yardmaster or UTU local.

A drastic shrinkage of the railroad industry led the two unions into the negotiations that resulted in the affiliation agreement.

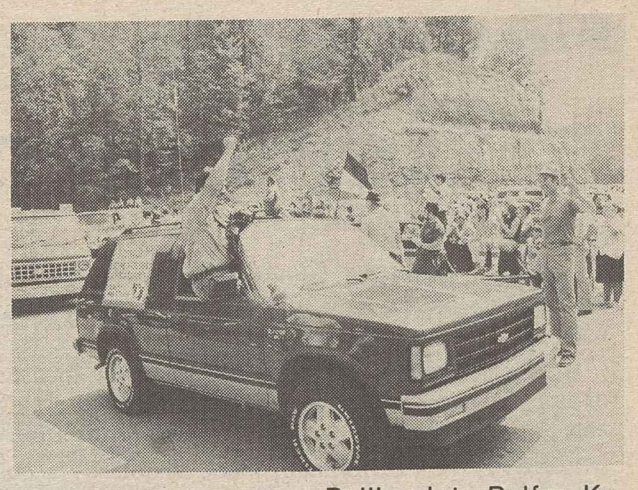
Railroad employment has fallen from a high of more than 1.5 million in the 1940s to about 380,000. About 100,000 jobs were lost just in the past 10 years, and the wave of consolidations is not yet over.

Consolidation of railroads calls for consolidation of unions, UTU President Hardin said. He predicted that the affiliation of the Yardmasters will strengthen both organizations.

Boston Herald local joins Newspaper Guild

Boston—Editorial workers at the Boston Herald, members of a directly chartered AFL-CIO local union, voted 110 to 3 to affiliate with Newspaper Guild Local 32.

The affiliation vote ends nearly 50 years of separate union representation for the paper's editorial and commercial departments. The Guild has represented the advertising, business and circulation workers since 1938.



The DALU had been chartered by the AFL in the late 1930s. The secret ballot election was conducted by AFL-CIO representatives.

UAW brings Motown aid to Coaltown strikers

A 217-vehicle caravan of Auto Workers from Detroit traveled 500 miles in 16 hours to bring food, clothing, money and expressions of support to some 1,500 Mine Workers on strike against the A.T. Massey Coal Co.

It was a demonstration of trade union solidarity—a closing of labor's ranks—that harked back to the struggles of the 1930s.

The convoy of pickup trucks and vans that snaked through the coalfields of southern West Virginia and eastern Kentucky, the scene of the bitter, 11-month-old strike, bore signs reading, "Motown to Coaltown—Support and Solidarity." The UAW workers were greeted by loud cheers and hand-made banners as they passed through small coal towns in the nerve center of the strike.

A strike support rally in an open field near Belfry, Ky., drew more than 6,000 miners, Auto Workers and supporters.

President Rich Trumka of the unaffiliated UMW declared, "During the Reagan years, while companies revel in a new-found freedom to trample workers and their communities in the name of profit, I can't tell you how good it feels to witness today the power which can overcome even the mightiest of these corporate giants—the solidarity of working people."

Since Oct. 1, 1984, the UMW has been waging a selective strike at 32 Massey mines and processing plants. The union struck after Massey refused to sign the contract agreed to earlier between the UMW and the industry's Bituminous Coal Operators' Association.

Company demands

Massey, owned by two multinational conglomerates—the Royal Dutch/Shell Group and the Fluor Corp.—contends that its more than 100 subsidiaries in four states should be allowed to negotiate separate contracts on their own terms. Some of the company's operations are non-union.

Testing a selective strike strategy for the first time, the union said Massey's aim is to bust the contract and ultimately the UMW. For UMW members not employed by Massey, the union says the issue is protection of job security and other rights for miners who work for subsidiaries of large companies which might try to follow Massey's lead.

Trumka, who spent the night with the UAW caravan in the "Camp Motown" field where tents were pitched, recalled that in 1978 a similar union-sponsored caravan had come to the coalfields to support the Mine Workers during their 111-day strike.

"Solidarity among all working people, no matter whether they share the same union affiliation, is critical to sustaining the life blood of the labor movement," Trumka told the gathering.

"This is why Corporate America has worked so hard to try to break our ability to exercise this unity. Just look at how Corporate America has shaped the labor laws to ban secondary boycotts and other job actions by workers in solidarity with other labor struggles," he said.

Underscoring "the power of the solidarity of working people," Trumka said, "Mr. Massey, hear this: 'It ain't over til we say it's over, and it won't be over until we get a fair and decent contract.'"

UAW Regional Director Frank Runnels, who organized the caravan, called the gathering a "history-making" event. "The UMW and the brotherhood of unions will march to victory over the A.T. Massey Coal Co. and all of those companies who think they can return us to the days of yesteryear when we worked in a state of semi-slavery," he said.

Solidarity's flame

"If they can break a union in southern West Virginia and eastern Kentucky, they can break a union in Detroit. We have to do something to show that the flame of solidarity still burns in the hearts of working men and women."

Runnels, who also helped organize the 1978 caravan said, "This dwarfs what we did in '78. This is much bigger, with more help, more participation on both sides. It's amazing."

In Ripley, W. Va., the caravan was met by members of the State, County & Municipal Employees, Steelworkers and the West Virginia Education Association.

During the rally, the crowd joined in the singing of traditional contemporary labor songs mixed with gospel and folk music. Striking miner Rocky Peck sang two songs he wrote about the strike, soon to be released on a 45 rpm record by the UMW.

Labor educator and songwriter Tom Juravich, whose album "Rising Again" was released by the UAW, led much of the singing.

In addition to thousands of dollars worth of food and clothing, more than $55,000 was collected by the UAW members for the strikers and their families.

Trumka summed up the event when he said "this caravan has nurtured the spirit and resolve of all of us who will continue to wage this strike." (PAI).

Labor Day theme keyed to renewal

the rich and heaping new burdens on the working middle class, and wielding the federal labor law "as a blunt instrument" to discourage collective bargaining and deny justice to workers.

"All these abuses will be remedied, and the resurgent labor movement will lead the way," Kirkland predicted.

He cited the federation's recent report on "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions" and its recommendations for changes in structure, strategy and techniques to strengthen and invigorate the institutions of organized labor.

"We have to carry the trade union message to every man and woman who works for a living, find new links and avenues of communication, and involve all of our members more deeply in the trade union mission. . . .

"Our mission is clear, despite the range and complexity and magnitude of the challenges we face, and it has remained unchanged since our founding.

"In 1985, as in 1895, our task is to remain faithful to the working men and women of America, to strengthen this movement which they have created, and to strengthen, nurture and renew the spirit of solidarity which is its heart."

Donahue's Labor Day message also denounced the Reagan Administration for imposing anti-union and anti-worker policies, but pointed out on the positive side that many unions are turning to self-help "with the resourcefulness that has always characterized the American trade union movement."

He cited specifically a Texas Auto Workers local that rebuilt its strength through organizing and wiped out contract takebacks imposed by management, the efforts of unions in airlines and telecommunications to overcome the ill effects of deregulation, the cooperation of building trades unions and 13 employer groups to revitalize their industry and recapture work lost to open-shop contractors, the elimination of two-tier wage schedules at two big aerospace companies, organizing successes in the Beverly nursing home chain, the UAW role in General Motors' Saturn project, and the achievement of union security at General Electric and Westinghouse.

Message for employers

These "pieces of good news," Donahue said, contain a message for other employers:

"The dream of a 'union-free environment' is dead. . . We know that many employers are still intent on denying, by fair means or foul, the fundamental right of workers to band together in organizations of their own choosing in order to negotiate on equal terms on their own wages and working conditions.

"We know the dimensions of the fights that lie ahead in thousands of workplaces, scores of legislatures and countless elections. But another corner has been turned in the fight we have been waging for the last 104 years."

Labor Day messages from leaders of AFL-CIO constitutional departments focused on some of the challenges facing American workers and their unions.

"We live in the greatest country in the world," said President Robert Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. "We have enjoyed a standard of living second to none. However, there are forces in this country determined to shove the working men and women backwards, reduce our wages, reduce our benefits, reduce the conditions under which we work, reduce our standard of living.

"Organized labor must slam the brakes on this trend. . . We must close ranks. We must pull together."

President Howard D. Samuel of the Industrial Union Dept. warned of the "new-style invasion" of imported manufactured goods that is overwhelming American industry.

"We must reform our international trade structure," he said, and "in some way we must bring business and labor and government together to devise industrial strategies, or we will find ourselves deindustrialized and impoverished."

Secretary of Labor William E. Brock, in his first Labor Day message as head of the Labor Dept., paid tribute to American workers and their unions for the role they have played in the nation's history. He pledged to work with labor and management to meet the challenges ahead "so that more and more American working men and women can live better and richer lives."

Alfred Hayes dies, wrote 'Joe Hill' lyrics

Sherman Oaks, Calif.—Alfred Hayes, labor poet and screenwriter, died of meningitis here Aug. 14. He was 74.

In 1938, Hayes wrote "Joe Hill," a poem commemorating the life of a union organizer for the Industrial Workers of the World who was executed in Utah in 1915. Put to music by Earl Robinson, it became one of America's most popular union songs.

Hayes brought Joe Hill to life again in his verse:

I dreamed I saw Joe Hill last night alive as you and me. Says I, "but Joe, your ten years dead." "I never died," says he.

Kirkland on Labor Day

'Resurgence' marks today's unions

By Lane Kirkland

On Labor Day 1985, trade unionists are observing their traditional holiday in more than the traditional way.

As always, this is a day when we take the measure of our situation and our resources, assess the gains and losses of the past, and look ahead to the future.

But there is a difference, made visible by a conspicuous departure from another long-standing tradition: There seems to be a comparative shortage of the traditional Labor Day proclamations by journalists, academics and political pundits that unions have no future and that the American labor movement is dead or dying. That is a welcome change.

Our obituary has been written at least once for every one of our 104 years of history, and at least that many causes of death have been diagnosed—gleefully or sorrowfully, depending on the diagnostician.

Over the last five years, despite severe problems—and in good part because of them—we in the labor movement have been aware that a new spirit of solidarity and confidence has been growing within our ranks.

Over the last five or six months, that spirit has forced itself on the attention of observers who were saying only last year that our movement was a thing of the past.

Resurgence in the ranks

Many employers and professional labor baiters are clinging to that line—no one who has made a career of predicting Armageddon or the Millennium welcomes disappointment—but on Labor Day 1985, most commentators see "resurgence," not decline," as the word for the American trade union movement.

And so do I. Recent meetings with thousands of union members in dozens of communities have convinced me that internally, at least, this movement was never in better shape. Morale is as high as it has ever been in my lifetime.

Externally, we face problems and challenges as severe as any in our history. But we have faced difficult periods before, and we have a long memory.

Coming out of the worst recession since the Great Depression of the 1930s, we find economic policies designed to keep unemployment permanently at recession levels.

We find our country opened wide to floods of imports that are systematically driving American goods from the American marketplace and inflicting injuries from which some of our most essential industries may never recover.

These afflictions stem directly from choices made by the Reagan Administration and blunders committed by corporate managers. To disguise their follies, the Administration and its corporate allies have tried to make American workers their scapegoats and to depress their living standards.

We find an Administration dedicated to emasculating the federal government and to dividing the country, region against region, race against race, and rich against poor. Under the flag of "tax reform," this Administration is attempting to give new benefits to the rich and to heap new burdens on the working middle class.

For five years since this Administration took office, unfair employers who have never given up the dream of total control over the lives of workers have been reasserting their right to rearrange wage levels and redefine working conditions as they alone see fit, and they have had a lot of help.

Many of the laws and instruments of government that were created to prevent the worst excesses of unfair employers have been subverted and placed in the hands of people who have no intention of administering or enforcing them as Congress intended.

The National Labor Relations Board has been packed with radical conservatives who wield the nation's basic labor law as a blunt instrument to frustrate organizing, discourage collective bargaining, and delay and deny justice to workers.

All these abuses will be remedied, and the resurgent labor movement will lead the way.

We know that to succeed we must summon up, from every level of the labor movement, the spirit of solidarity and the sense of common purpose that have been, since the beginning, our only source of strength.

We have to carry the trade union message to every man and woman who works for a living, find new links and avenues of communication, and involve all of our members more deeply in the trade union mission.

One measure of how well that process is underway is the reception that has been given to the AFL-CIO's report on "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions."

That report analyzes the profound changes we face: changes in technology, changes in the makeup of the workforce, changes in production patterns and job patterns, changes in the relationships between workers and employers and governments.

It offers a set of recommendations for changes within the labor movement to match the changes around us.

It proposes structural changes to broaden and strengthen our institutions, changes in organizing techniques, changes in the categories of union membership and in the range of union services.

The report is in no sense a set of marching orders or a blueprint for any union to follow. It was designed to fire up discussion, to bring about a general reexamination of our aims and goals, methods and resources, and that is taking place from coast to coast, at every level of the labor movement.

Political commitments

There are, as always, powerful forces that would like to see union activity confined to the workplace and the bargaining table. They want us to withdraw from political action and leave that field exclusively to others. There is not the slightest chance of that.

Were it not for the labor movement, American politics would be taken over, lock, stock and barrel, by the "special interests" greedy for money and power. Not just one party, but both would be controlled by the bankers and oil barons and by the admen, lawyers, consultants and lobbyists who serve corporate avarice.

This labor movement is the main line of defense for all the plain people who have no desire to live high on the hog at others' expense, but who want only a decent job that will support a decent family life, enable them to pay off the bills and the mortgage and give the kids a decent start in life.

To help such people to help themselves ought to be the highest priority of any decent society, and that is the kind of society we seek.

Our mission is clear, despite the range and complexity and magnitude of the challenges we face, and it has remained unchanged since our founding.

In 1985, as in 1895, our task is to remain faithful to the working men and women of America, to strengthen this movement which they have created, and to strengthen, nurture and renew the spirit of solidarity which is its heart.

That we are doing. On behalf of the 14 million members of AFL-CIO unions who are engaged in that task, I wish to all of our fellow citizens a happy Labor Day and a brighter future.

Donahue on Labor Day

'Another corner turned' in labor's struggle

By Thomas R. Donahue

The good news on this 91st Labor Day is that the American labor movement is once again showing the toughness and resilience, the solidarity and resoluteness, that has been our trademark for a century.

Unions are making headway despite the handicaps imposed on them, and real improvements are being made in the behavior at the bargaining table of at least some major corporations.

The bad news is what hasn't changed since last Labor Day. There has been no change in national economic policies, and that means the budget deficit and the trade deficit are still out of control. Plants are still closing, industrial jobs are still vanishing. The Administration continues to discourage productive investment and to encourage the further concentration of economic power through hostile mergers and takeovers that swallow up billions of dollars in credit to no good or useful end.

The continuing drive to undercut the minimum wage, the renegade attacks on workers' rights on the part of officials sworn to defend those rights and the relentless chipping away at the principle of collective bargaining are the same bad news that we have faced on each Labor Day since President Reagan took office.

But although the NLRB's machinery has become useless to workers, many unions are turning to self-help with the resourcefulness that has always characterized our American trade union movement.

One example comes from an Auto Workers local in Texas which went 15 months without a contract while the company installed a two-tier wage system, imposed one takeback after another and fired 65 union activists on phony charges. All the while, the NLRB, seeing no evil, refused to issue a single unfair labor practice charge.

Union activists didn't mourn, they organized. Through face-to-face missionary work with free riders and new hires, they multiplied union support and increased paid membership by 50 percent. Then they went back to the bargaining table, undid the damage and put labor-management relations back on course.

Let me cite a few other wholesome collective bargaining developments:

In construction, 13 employer groups and AFL-CIO building trades unions are cooperating in a far-reaching program to revitalize their industry and business lost to cutthroat, non-union competitors.

In airlines and telecommunications, two industries victimized by ill-advised "deregulation," workers are striving to rebuild the protections they had in their former, more rational world.

Concessions abandoned

In aerospace, two major companies have abandoned the two-tier wage concessions wrung from the Machinists three years ago at the low point of the Reagan Recession. "We could see that it could become a problem in the future," one company official said. "There were just too many 'wes' and 'theys' among union employees."

In health care, the steady progress at the giant Beverly nursing home chain bodes well for the arrival of workplace democracy in a sector which sorely needs it. We have no doubts that similar successes will continue in health care and other growth sectors.

In the auto industry, when the president of GM's new Saturn Corporation was asked if the company was building its giant new plant in Tennessee because of the state's compulsory open-shop law, he said this: "It wasn't a factor at all. The Saturn program is for General Motors an opportunity to try new relationships with all our constituents, including the UAW. If we didn't bring the UAW with us to Saturn, it would not be a victory for General Motors."

And more good news came from 1985 bargaining in the electrical industry, when both General Electric and Westinghouse reached an agreement with the 13-union Coordinated Bargaining Committee that provides outstanding economic improvements, a strong job security program, and—for the first time—a union security clause.

Until a few years ago—remember "Boulwarism?"—General Electric was as tough on workers and their unions as any employer in America, and Westinghouse was close behind. Both GE and Westinghouse now agree that it makes sense to display faith in collective bargaining. Their example in constructive labor-management relations ought to lead anti-union employers everywhere to re-examine their principles.

What do these pieces of good news add up to? Simply this, I think, and I invite the Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers or any representative of employers to take note of it:

The dream of a "union-free environment" is dead. Also, the quest for a universal compulsory open shop was dealt substantial setbacks in 1985 state legislative sessions in New Hampshire and Oklahoma.

We know that many employers are still intent on denying, by fair means or foul, the fundamental right of workers to band together in organizations of their own choosing in order to negotiate on equal terms on their own wages and working conditions.

We know the dimensions of the fight that lies ahead in thousands of workplaces, scores of legislatures and countless elections. But another corner has been turned in the fight we have been waging for the last 104 years.

On this Labor Day 1985, we have good reason to look forward to happier Labor Days.

The Meaning of 'More'

WHAT BETTER occasion than Labor Day to replenish the trade union spirit by recalling the now famous words of Samuel Gompers:

''What does labor want? It wants the earth and the fullness thereof. There is nothing too precious, there is nothing too beautiful, too lofty, too ennobling, unless it is within the scope and comprehension of labor's aspirations and wants.

''We want more school houses and less jails; more books and less arsenals; more learning and less vice; more constant work and less crime; more leisure and less greed; more justice and less revenge; in fact, more of the opportunities to cultivate our better natures . . .''

A handful of critics have torn the word ''more'' out of context to castigate what they call ''business unionism.'' But the ''business'' of unions today—the philosophy and hopes that guide the labor movement—is exactly what it was in Gompers' time. As he put it more than 65 years ago:

Workers ''will never stop in their efforts to obtain a better life for themselves . . . and for all humanity. The object is to obtain complete social justice.''

Memories of Gdansk strike

Spirit of Solidarnosc survives repression

By Murray Seeger

Five years ago this week, tens of thousands of brave, mostly young Polish workers broke the suffocating hold of communist rule over their lovely land for a few, heady months.

Rallying behind a mustachioed electrician blessed with leadership and negotiating skills far beyond his years, the workers brought the Polish economy to a halt. They defied the potential retribution of a massive internal security police force.

The explosive rise of Solidarnosc—Solidarity—brought down a government and forced the ruling communists to negotiate fundamental changes in the way Poland had been ruled for 35 years. The entire East European communist bloc from East Berlin to Moscow was shaken by the Polish events.

Ultimately, Solidarnosc was broken by the imposition of military rule in Poland. But even in their defeat, the workers of Poland achieved a great victory: they proved the communists did not have a public mandate to rule and could only hold power with the guns of the army, encouraged and manipulated by the Soviet Union.

It is difficult in 1985 to recall the incredible atmosphere of Poland in the summer of 1980. Those of us who witnessed it first-hand cherish the memories along with the most precious of experiences, the scattered events that change one's life.

Press pass issued by Gdansk strike committee.

The scene in Gdansk, ancient Danzig in the German name, was remarkable that August five years ago. The warm, dry air seemed tense and the old seaport was remarkably quiet.

One of the most visible signs of historic events taking place was that all sales of liquor, beer and wine in a city that loves its booze were halted. While the government for decades could not reduce the Poles' love of drink, the workers through word of mouth communications turned the region dry overnight.

Ten years before, when the workers of the same shipyard took to the streets to protest food price boosts, some vodka-heads had attacked the police and burned the Communist Party headquarters. The police then had an excuse to bash heads.

A lesson learned

Lech Walesa, who was 27 when the 1970 riots took place, remembered the lesson well. When he climbed the brick wall surrounding the huge V.I. Lenin Shipyard in August 1980 to take command of an impromptu strike, he sent out strict orders against selling alcohol.

When western journalists arrived at the shipyard, they found it occupied by the ''Coordinating Strike Committee.'' The closed gates were covered with bouquets of flowers; thousands of men and women stood outside just waiting to see what might come of the momentous events taking place inside.

Next to the gate was a crude wooden cross that had been erected to honor the dead of the 1970 riots, martyrs the city government had tried to forget.

All day long, townspeople came to the gate to bring food and money to support the strikers inside.

The workers were so well organized that they recognized western press documents and issued press passes of their own. We were given free access to the area around the shipyard offices and commissary, where the negotiations with the government were taking place. We were not allowed to visit the shops—the workers wanted no one to accuse them of endangering machinery and equipment.

Under the trees of the yard, some workers sprawled in small groups. Others talked among themselves. They had been sleeping in the yard for days.

Monitors patrolled the yard looking for undercover policemen. They had photos of known spies who had been expelled. Anyone who opened a bottle got the same treatment.

Inside the commissary building, worker delegates from the entire Baltic Coast industrial area sat quietly at long tables, dressed in their best clothing. At the sides, volunteers pounded out statements and resolutions on old typewriters.

The delegates—male and female—had been elected by their co-workers in each plant and shop to take part in the historic meeting. They debated issues and voted openly and freely as if they had been born to democracy and not to single-party totalitarianism.

Other volunteers made sandwiches and coffee. At the front of the room, a tall white party-issue statue of Lenin stared out the window as if he did not want to watch what was happening to his master plan.

The main negotiations were held in another room with Walesa heading a committee of workers and Deputy Prime Minister Mieczyslaw Jagielski speaking for the government.

All during the days of talks, Jagielski in his dark suit and stiff white shirt maintained the formal manner of high-ranking communist officials.

But he was clearly uncomfortable. Accustomed to the secret meetings where the party and government made decisions, Jagielski found these negotiations were being broadcast over loudspeakers to the delegates in the commissary and to everyone in the yard and outside the gates.

The government on Aug. 30, 1980, agreed to the key union bargaining points, and on the next day Solidarnosc agreed to end its strike of two weeks.

Although the agreement signed by the negotiators had made many revolutionary points, the key to the settlement was the guarantee of the right of the workers to form their own trade union federation—Solidarnosc—free of government or Communist Party interference.

Broken promises

The next six months were filled with tension and confusion. The government soon started reneging on its promises, and the workers reacted by gathering closer to their brilliantly designed red and white union banner.

Ultimately, the government that signed the agreement with Solidarnosc was expelled by the military behind Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski. Soviet officers who permeated the Polish high command called the signals for the ultimate power play, because Moscow lost confidence in the Polish Communist Party.

A gray miasma has settled over Poland. A selective repression has been imposed, but no one who knows Poland can believe that even the military can hold power indefinitely.

Every objective observer who visits Poland finds that the spirit of Solidarnosc survives and the exciting memories of the sunny summer of 1980 are fresh and vivid.

America's Voices Are Saying: Stop Job-Killing Imports—Pass Trade Laws That Curb Unfair Trade Practices!

America's workers have known for a long time that this nation's trade crisis is inflicting massive losses to jobs, industries and communities. For too long, these concerns have been written off as narrow "protectionism." But now, journalists, academics, corporate leaders, Members of Congress, governors and farmers are expressing alarm over the trade and job crisis. Congressional action now becomes more likely. But to save jobs and U.S. living standards Congress must pass effective legislation—not window dressing—and must pass it now.

Write now to your Senators and Representative. Tell them that swift enactment of these bills is necessary to help restore fairness in trade.

H.R. 3035, S. 1449 — The Trade Emergency and Export Promotion Act
H.R. 1950, S. 1356 — The Trade Law Modernization Act
H.R. 1562, S. 680 — The Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act
H.R. 1926 — The Trade Adjustment Assistance Amendments of 1985

Dear _____:

I urge you to support trade legislation to curb unfair foreign trade practices and import devastation. Only legislation will save millions of American jobs. Specifically, you are urged to support The Trade Emergency Act (H.R. 3035, S. 1449), The Trade Law Modernization Act (H.R. 1950, S. 1356), The Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act (H.R. 1562, S. 680) and the Trade Adjustment Assistance Amendments of 1985 (H.R. 1926).

Sincerely,

Major corporations pay no taxes despite big profits

Many of America's most profitable corporations have piled up so many tax credits in the Reagan years that they pay no federal taxes and pocket big refunds of taxes paid in previous years.

That's what Citizens for Tax Justice found in its 1985 update of the tax status of 275 major corporations. The group's research has spotlighted the extent of corporate tax avoidance and given impetus to a labor-supported campaign for fair-share taxation.

These are some of its latest findings:

● Last year, 40 corporations with combined profits of more than $10 billion didn't pay any federal income tax—and 36 of them also received tax refunds.

● Over a four-year period, dating from the start of the Reagan Administration, special tax breaks for business enabled 129 of the 275 corporations to avoid taxes in at least one year of high profits.

During their no-tax years, these corporations earned $66.5 billion in profits. But instead of paying any taxes, they collected a total of $6.5 billion in tax rebates.

● Of the 129 companies, 74 paid no taxes for two of the four years and 26 paid no taxes for three years.

● Nine firms, described in the report as "particularly imaginative and aggressive corporate tax-avoiders," paid no taxes in any of the four years and generally ended up with refunds.

Boeing Co., for example, paid no taxes on profits exceeding $2 billion during this period and collected $285 million in tax refunds.

Others who went tax-free during all four years were ITT, General Dynamics, Transamerica Corp., First Executive Corp., Mitchell Energy & Development Corp., Greyhound Corp., Grumman Corp., and Lockheed. Most on the list are major defense contractors.

Counting profits, taxes and refunds over the entire four years, a total of 50 of the 275 companies received more in rebates than they paid in taxes. Dow Chemical, for example, collected $180 million more in rebates than it paid in taxes.

There was some change from previous reports. Thus, General Electric paid its first taxes in four years in 1984—amounting to $185 million on profits of more than $3 billion. But the effective tax rate of 6.1 per-

Trade, job deficit posing dire threat to U.S. industries

By James M. Shevis

The nation's foreign trade deficit rose by $10.5 billion in July, widening the trade gap for the first seven months of 1985 to a record $81.2 billion.

The seven-month total is 10 percent higher than a year earlier and virtually assures this year's trading deficit with other countries will surpass 1984's record $123.3 billion. Many observers expect the 1985 total to reach $150 billion.

It has been estimated by private and government economists alike that for every $1 billion of trade imbalance 22,500 American jobs are lost. Some domestic industries already have become extinct and others are threatened.

American textile and shoe industries have been hit particularly hard by the torrent of imports from low-wage countries such as Korea, Singapore and Taiwan.

Presidential inaction

The Commerce Dept. report of the soaring deficit came just two days after President Reagan refused to provide any relief for the import-battered domestic shoe industry.

The Footwear Action coalition—comprising the Footwear Industries of America and two unions, the Clothing & Textile Workers and the Food & Commercial Workers—pointed out that 79 million pairs of shoes entered the United States in July, compared to 77.7 million pairs a month earlier.

Foreign-made footwear now controls 77 percent of the American market, and unemployment in the domestic shoe industry is double the national average.

Not a trend

The July deficit was the smallest since January's $10.3 billion gap, but analysts were quick to observe it was not an indication of a turnaround in the country's dismal trade performance.

One major reason for the imbalance between imports and exports has been the overvaluation of the American dollar, which makes imports cheaper and more attractive to Americans at the same time it makes it more difficult to sell U.S. manufactured goods abroad.

The narrower merchandise trade gap in July followed three successive months of widening deficits and reflected a 19.3 percent decline in oil imports and a 16.7 percent drop in auto imports.

The drop in oil imports resulted from a decrease in both volume and price, the Commerce Dept. said. The decline in auto shipments came in deliveries from Japan during the car haulers' strike.

Despite July's $2.9 billion decline in imports, $27.9 billion worth of foreign goods poured into the country during the month. Exports were also down slightly, by two-tenths of 1 percent, to $17.4 billion. The export total reflected continued drops in sales of manufactured goods and

Labor Day regains its union label

By David L. Perlman

Labor Day across the country was again a workers' holiday with a big union label.

It was a sparkling five-hour parade by a quarter-million union members up Fifth Ave. in New York City and it was a pig roast and volley ball tournament that raised funds for COPE political action programs in Belleville, Ill.

It was the big parade in Chicago that started with a rally of support for striking printers at the Chicago Tribune, and it was veterans of the sitdown strikes of the 1930s riding in triumph as the Auto Workers merged 50th anniversary celebrations with Labor Day events across the country.

Solidarity Forever

It was the El Paso, Tex., celebration that began with the presentation of the colors by a Marine unit and a bishop's invocation and concluded with the singing of Solidarity Forever. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland spoke at that one, and later that day at the big Los Angeles County AFL-CIO picnic at Valley Plaza.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and 170,000 other union members marched through Detroit to the traditional Cadillac Square rally. In that four-hour parade were some 200 striking coal miners from West Virginia and Kentucky, accompanied by UMW President Rich Trumka. A couple of weeks earlier, UAW members from Detroit had brought food, clothing and proceeds of plant gate collections in a "Motown to Coaltown" auto caravan. Now on Labor Day, it was "Coaltown to Motown."

President Reagan chose Harry Truman's home town of Independence, Mo., to make a speech about taxes. It was part of a historic celebration, not a union-sponsored event. But there were some union members present, carrying placards. They included shoe workers from nearby plants, including members of both the Clothing & Textile Workers and the Food & Commercial Workers, protesting Reagan's decision to let unrestricted shoe imports wipe out their jobs. And there were members of the Rubber Workers, just hit by news of large-scale, import-related layoffs at a B.F. Goodrich plant.

Labor's message came across in television features, starting with the CBS morning news interviews of UAW President Owen Bieber and Service Employees President John J. Sweeney.

Other union leaders made appearances throughout the day or marched with their members at parades and rallies across the country.

Pay equity talks not derailed by court's decision

Olympia, Wash.—Negotiations aimed at closing a sex-based pay gap between state jobs held by men and women will get under way here Sept. 9 as scheduled—despite a federal appellate court ruling that the State, County & Municipal Employees will seek to overturn.

In Washington state, where the court case originated, the legislature has already authorized funds to eliminate salary discrimination and both sides had agreed to seek a bargaining table settlement without awaiting the conclusion of pending court actions.

cent, Citizens for Tax Justice noted, is only about half the federal income tax rate paid by the average American family.

The study found a similar pattern for other major defense contractors. Over the four-year Reagan period of heavy military build-up, the 12 largest defense contractors paid in federal taxes only 6.3 percent of domestic profits totaling $27.7 billion.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. and many individual unions have joined with the Citizens for Tax Justice and other public interest groups in a grass-roots campaign to restore the corporate income tax as a major source of federal revenue. Corporate taxes have shrunk from more than one-fourth of federal revenues to about 8.5 percent, thus adding to the deficit and shifting the tax burden to working Americans.

Learned the game

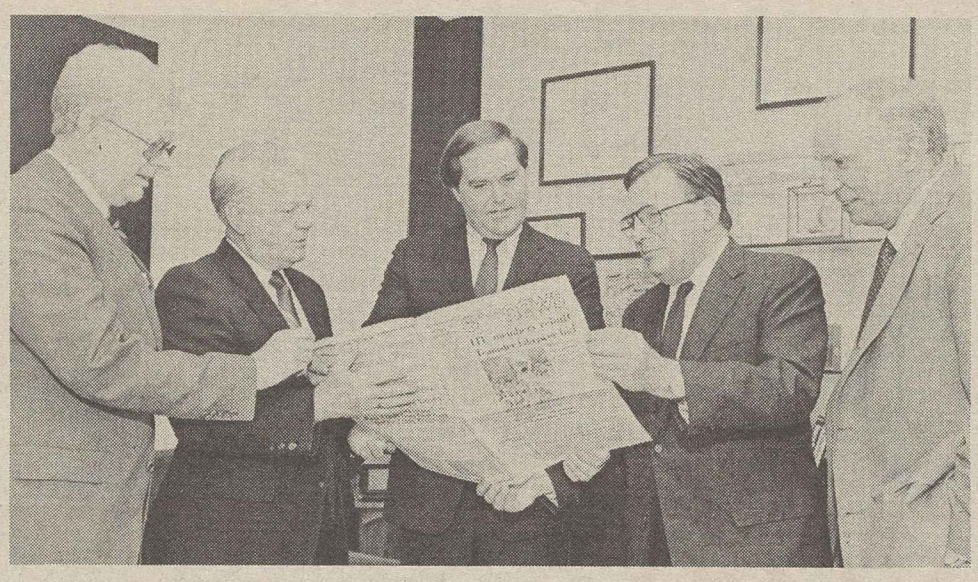
The 1985 tax study noted that some companies still pay over 40 percent of their profits in federal taxes because the loopholes don't apply to them. Two textile firms were in this category. But others that paid larger amounts in previous years have found ways to join the "tax-avoidance game," the report noted. It adds:

"Many of the special tax preferences for particular industries have been on the books for years. But corporate tax avoidance really took off following enactment of the 1981 Reagan tax act. That bill dramatically changed the way that corporations write off—or 'depreciate'—their investments in machines and buildings, and led to a dramatic reduction in the taxes that corporations pay."



The new tax breaks were defended as an incentive to new capital investment to make American industries more productive. But the reality has been that business investment in plant and equipment increased at less than half the rate of the previous four years, the report found.

New York protest set for Jaruzelski visit

The AFL-CIO is urging trade unionists in the New York area to demonstrate their support for the outlawed free trade union movement of Poland when that country's ruler comes to the United States later this month.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland issued the call on the fifth anniversary of the Gdansk agreement, when the Polish government acknowledged the role of Solidarnosc as representative of Poland's workers and committed itself to uphold trade union and other democratic rights. But General Jaruzelski quickly moved to crush the solidarity movement, Kirkland noted.

The federation stands with the workers of Poland, Kirkland said, urging New York area trade unionists to join with the Polish-American community and other supporters of a democratic Poland in a Sept. 26 demonstration to show their opposition to Jaruzelski upon his arrival in New York.

Good news for ITU

McMichen has pledged to continue efforts at merging the 70,000-member ITU with another AFL-CIO affiliate.

HRDI conference stresses help for displaced workers

Hollywood, Fla.—The trade union movement's continuing responsibility to members displaced by plant closings and labor's commitment to help handicapped workers get a foothold in the job market set the agenda for the national staff conference of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute.

"Innovation and initiative" must be key elements of labor's employment and training activities in this period of persistently high unemployment, HRDI President Alan Kistler emphasized in opening remarks at the three-day conference.

Kistler and HRDI Executive Director Mike McMillan stressed the exchange of experiences and ideas among the institute's diverse staff as the most important element of the conference. The interchange, in workshops and discussion groups as well as general sessions, involved HRDI's national and regional staff, handicapped placement specialists, and special project workers who carry out programs funded through federal grants to the states under the Job Training Partnership Act.

Training efforts

There were reports of the large-scale displaced worker assistance program being launched in cooperation with the New York State AFL-CIO and local central bodies, of job-search assistance in high unemployment areas of Texas, of the use of vans in New Mexico to cover a large but sparsely populated state.

Participants learned of interviews with job-seekers carried as public-service television features, of individual initiatives such as the decision by two Houston handicapped placement specialists to take training in sign language for better communication with deaf workers, of resources available through community and trade union groups.

Kistler, who is director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, stressed that the trade union movement's commitment to the workers it has represented continues beyond the job and the union contract.

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Frank Emig sounded a similar theme in urging close coordination of all labor programs to deal with the "man-made disaster of unemployment."

The hurricane then poised off the Gulf Coast, Emig said, is no more devastating than home foreclosures, loss of health insurance coverage, actual hunger, and the mental depression and alcoholism so often a byproduct of job loss.

Other conference speakers from the labor movement included John T. Smith, assistant to Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams; Merlin Taylor, apprenticeship and training director of the Bricklayers, and Florida State AFL-CIO President Daniel J. Miller. Roberts T. Jones from the Labor Dept.'s Employment & Training Administration also addressed the group.

HRDI officials reported that bipartisan support for HRDI's programs, reflected in the budget resolution adopted by Congress and in rejection of an earlier Administration proposal to rescind previously appropriated funds, appears to have assured continued funding through the next fiscal year. And while the conference was in session, word came of approval of a Job Training & Partnership Act grant to HRDI for a displaced worker program it will administer for the Auto Workers in Kenosha, Wis., to help 1,000 American Motors' workers whose jobs were eliminated.

The program will provide job search assistance and counseling for all the workers affected and offer training in high-demand skills for about 500 workers. It is based on the recommendations of a task force set up by the UAW and the Wisconsin AFL-CIO.

P. L. Siemiller, right, president-emeritus of the Machinists, accepts an award from HRDI President Alan Kistler for his long service as a trustee. Also honored was Stanley Ruttenberg, who headed the government's job training program in its earliest years as Assistant Secretary of Labor.

Unions assail freezing of federal pay

Federal workers and their unions protested a pay freeze announced by President Reagan and said the elaborate pay-setting mechanism intended to keep government salaries in line with comparable private-sector jobs hasn't worked and should be replaced.

Government Employees President Kenneth Blaylock, whose union represents the largest group of workers affected by the salary freeze, termed the comparability law "a sham."

He urged Congress to "explore alternatives such as full-scope collective bargaining" or adoption of a comparability concept that would take into account both salaries and fringe benefits received by workers.

John Leyden, executive director of the federal/postal division of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., said the law should be changed if it's not going to be followed. As it stands now, he said, the complex pay-setting mechanism is "an exercise infutility."

Comparability standards set by a 1970 law have been regularly disregarded by presidents of both parties, and the last time government workers received their full scheduled raise was in 1977. The gap has widened each year, and federal workers would need a catch-up raise of more than 19 percent to achieve comparability by the government's own standards.

Pay cut blocked

Reagan's initial budget proposal was for a 5 percent pay cut but Congress balked at this. It adopted instead a budget that assumed salaries would remain at present levels. Reagan's pay freeze was in accord with the congressional budget. Thus, there is no realistic expectation that Congress will reject the President's pay recommendation and let the 19.15 percent comparability increase go into effect.

The freeze does not affect postal employees, whose pay is set through collective bargaining. It will not affect blue-collar workers paid local prevailing wage scales unless Congress passes separate legislation or imposes restrictions on appropriations bills.

Actors negotiate accord with regional theaters

New York—Actors' Equity reached a tentative settlement with the League of Resident Theatres (LORT) on a new three-year contract covering members who perform in nearly 100 regional theaters.

The agreement, which would cover about 1,000 performers, must be ratified by the union's governing council and membership, and also by the LORT-affiliated theaters. Negotiators for the union and the producers urged approval of the package.

The settlement would replace the old contract that expired on Sept. 1. Details of the accord will be released after the memberships of both sides have been notified, Actors' Equity Executive Sec. Alan Eisenberg said.

Continue income averaging, Professional Employees ask

Income averaging is an essential element of fair taxation to many working Americans, the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees stressed in statements to the tax-writing committees of the House and Senate.

DPE Director Jack Golodner, said an Administration "tax-reform" proposal to eliminate income averaging would severely penalize people in occupations subject to significant income fluctuation. Musicians, entertainers, athletes, farmers, writers and artists are among those who may experience relatively high income one year after a long period of low earnings, he noted.

An optional method of tax calculation now allows taxpayers to use an income-averaging system that lessens the disadvantage of a sudden jump in tax bracket. Golodner noted that income-averaging requirements have already been tightened through tax law changes that took effect for 1984 returns, assuring that the provision is not abused.

The Administration's argument that income averaging should be eliminated entirely in the interests of tax simplification doesn't justify the hardship and inequities that would result, Golodner insisted.

The DPE's affiliates, he noted, include performers, athletes and other workers whose employment and earnings change with the health of the economy.

"Even with income averaging, these people pay substantially more in taxes because their incomes fluctuate more than they would otherwise," he testified.

He told the congressional committees that the introduction of income averaging was "a step in the direction of more equitable taxation." And "this improved fairness," he contended, "has been achieved at a very low cost in terms of lost revenue."

Union labels glow from coast to coast for America's Labor Day celebrations

Commercial and public stations broadcast special Labor Day programs. Before and during Labor Day, 93 public television stations serving nearly half the PBS audience carried the half-hour "Singing for the Union" program produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the AFL-CIO's television unit.

As in the past, unions actively participated in the Jerry Lewis Muscular Dystrophy telethon, raising a record amount in pledges.

The breadth of the union-sponsored events across the country testified that the revival of Labor Day traditions has taken hold, even without the national direction given to recent observances.

Day of protest

In many communities, Labor Day had lost its union origins and become merely the three-day holiday that drew crowds to beaches and resorts before schools reopened. But with the Reagan Administration battering the nation's economy and the trade union movement, labor's holiday increasingly became a day of protest.

In 1982, the impetus was the centennial of the first Labor Day and more cities than ever before had union-originated events. Chicago, for example, held its first Labor Day parade in 40 years.

An even bigger push came on Labor Day 1983, which the AFL-CIO had designated as Solidarity Day III—coordinated by a task force at federation headquarters and counterparts in state and local central bodies across the country. Union banners were raised at 151 observances, sounding the theme, "Across America, We Will Be Heard."

And Labor Day 1984 marked the traditional start of the presidential campaign—for union-endorsed candidates.

Without these special spurs, would the expanded observances continue?

Overwhelmingly, it turned out, observances launched or revived in recent years have become established as traditions. Picnics and barbecues are still the most popular events, family occasions to bring the kids.

In Wichita, Kan., for example, the Labor Day parade was sponsored by the Carpenters, and concluded with "food, drinks and entertainment" at the Laborers Hall. But there was an added post-parade bonus of a picnic with no charge for "all members of Wichita Typographical Union No. 148, their spouse or friend, and dependent children living at home."

Events beyond the control of the union sponsors—namely the threat of Hurricane Elena to Gulf Coast areas—compelled the cancellation of the Labor Day parade in Mobile, Ala., and another nearby celebration. In Gainesville, Fla., the hurricane threat washed out the picnic planned by Electrical Workers Local 1205. But the food wasn't wasted. It went to the Red Cross.

There were union parades in Augusta, Me., in New Haven, Conn., and in St. Louis, of course. Toledo, Ohio, revived the Labor Day parade tradition in 1983 after a quarter-century lapse and its unions were out in force again this year, each contingent with its own T-shirt and caps.

In Broward County, Fla., the theme of a Labor Day rally was a protest against Administration proposals to tax job benefits and speakers included the local congressman, the president of the county NAACP and the business manager of the Operating Engineers local.

A Miami Herald reporter talked to some of the union members in Broward County for a feature section with a front-page heading of "Our working-class holiday." The story quotes a union electrician who grew up when workers were struggling to achieve economic justice. Now, James Weldon said, "We're trying to keep it."

A local Carpenters official wishes "that everybody would take the time to study a little labor history." If they did, Joe Dolvin said, they would see that the accomplishments of organized labor, including minimum wage and child-labor laws as well as safety protections, also were victories for the public. "Unions bring up the standard of living for everybody," he was quoted.

There was optimism in the radio broadcasts of Kirkland and Donahue, reinforced by their series of regional meetings with rank-and-file union members.

United movement

"This labor movement is the main champion of all the plain people of America who want only a decent job that will support a good family life, pay the bills and the mortgage, and give their kids a fair start in life," Kirkland said. "In the face of extraordinary changes, problems and issues, this movement is strong in spirit and united."

Donahue acknowledged that "the past year has been a tough one for America's workers," with unemployment high and continued loss of jobs to unfair foreign trade policies. But he welcomed signs that "at least some of America's employers are beginning to see the real benefits of cooperative and productive labor relations—and that's a welcome development."

So it went, with bands sounding "joyous noise" and heroes of labor's battles of yesteryear riding on floats or walking proudly behind their union's banner.

New York's governor and mayor—and candidates for mayor—marched in New York's parade. And John Cardinal O'Connor watching from the steps of St. Patrick's Cathedral, lifted his red skull cap to the paraders and assured them, "You know this hat the Pope gave me has a union label inside."

Then he turned to reporters and said seriously, "It is so easy to be critical of labor and unionism, and to forget what we had before we had organized labor unions."

There were scores of other Labor Day events that deserve notice. But for the spirit of the day, the cardinal's words came as a benediction.

agricultural commodities, the government said.

President Reagan's refusal to put some retraints on imported shoes has spurred moves in Congress for some overall curbs on imports.

A number of proposals in both houses of Congress have been introduced to restrict the imports.

Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.), who is cosponsoring a labor-backed bill to impose a 25 percent tariff on goods from countries that do not try to reduce their trade surplus with the United States, said he expects Congress to approve some form of import restraints this year.

Norton assumes top position in Graphic Union

James J. Norton became the acting president of the Graphic Communications Union on Aug. 29, following the retirement of Kenneth J. Brown.

In 1949, Norton joined the Photo Engravers, one of the predecessor unions of the GCIU, and served four terms as president of its Boston local. After 23 years as an international representative, he was elected in 1978 as recording-financial secretary-treasurer of the union, then the Graphic Arts International Union. He later became secretary-treasurer and since 1981 has served as financial-recording secretary of the merged GCIU.

Norton has been an advocate of "one big union" in the printing trades and considers that objective still "very much alive." He participated in the merger talks earlier this year between the GCIU and the Typographical Union.

A special referendum election will be held over the next four months to elect a successor to complete the presidential term that runs through June 1988.

Brown, who served 25 years as president of the GCIU and its predecessor unions, was feted Aug. 29 at a retirement dinner in Washington that was attended by more than 400 labor, political and business leaders and friends.

Nationwide rallies protest AT&T move to slash jobs

Thousands of telephone company workers at nearly two dozen locations across the country staged a day of protest Aug. 29 to draw attention to the jobs loss and erosion of telephone service coming in the wake of the AT&T/Bell System divestiture.

Sponsored by the Communications Workers, the demonstrations—from Los Angeles to New York, Minneapolis to Birmingham—highlighted what the union described as the ''misuse'' of the breakup of the system.

Since divestiture began nearly two years ago, the CWA estimates direct job losses have totaled 40,000 to 50,000.

''Callous and unnecessary'' layoffs have resulted from the company's growing foreign and non-union production of telephone equipment, the union charged.

The protest grew out of the union's last convention. AT&T's announcement a week before the protest that it will eliminate some 24,000 jobs in its information systems group, the company's computer and business equipment arm, intensified resentment. CWA represents more than 16,000 workers facing the new wave of layoffs.

Joining in the local rallies were members of the Electrical Workers, which also represents AT&T workers.

The biggest demonstration was outside AT&T headquarters in New York City, where 1,000 placard-carrying pickets lambasted AT&T management. Other major protests took place in Denver, Philadelphia, Los Angeles, Atlanta, Milwaukee, Birmingham, Ala., and San Antonio, Tex.

In Minnesota, Gov. Rudy Perpich proclaimed Aug. 29 CWA Recognition Day throughout the state. St. Paul Mayor George Lattimer also drew attention to the demonstration in a declaration.

Rates skyrocket

Many communities have seen local telephone rates skyrocket an average 18 percent since the federal government broke up the Bell System on Jan. 1, 1984.

The rate increases have been followed by job losses and job exportation to low-wage places such as Singapore.

''Layoffs mean less service, not lower costs,'' CWA observed. ''This hurts the local economy. Fewer workers mean fewer people to serve already confused customers.''

As the telephone companies announce layoffs, they are also increasing their contracting-out of work to inexperienced, non-union providers, undermining the quality of service rate payers should receive, the union pointed out.

Some of the union's harshest criticism of AT&T was for the company's export of jobs to other countries.

''Breaking its historic promise of domestic production for national markets, AT&T closed a Louisiana manufacturing line, and moved 1,000 jobs to Singapore where high tech assembler wages are one-eighth of U.S. wages,'' it observed.

''Unless the Administration and Congress act decisively and soon to set a national trade policy, American telecommunications equipment manufacturing will be devastated in much the same manner as autos, color television, machine tools, steel, rubber and chemicals.''

Pilots ratify plan for $100 million in defense fund

The Air Line Pilots voted in a mail ballot referendum by nearly two to one to create a $100 million ''war chest'' to repel attacks by the deregulated airline industry on the wages and benefits of ALPA members.

The members approved an increase in dues from 1.35 percent to 2.35 percent of income.

ALPA President Henry Duffy said, ''This is a message, in foot-high red letters, to all airlines: We've got the desire, the determination and now the money to protect the professional airline pilot from the onslaughts of deregulation and anti-unionism.''

Duffy said the war chest, which will bring in about $22 million per year, is mainly a defensive deterrent to finance the innovative—but expensive—tactics that ALPA and other unions have developed recently to protect airline workers from predatory managements.

United strike

The ALPA leader noted that in the recent United Airlines strike, every $1 million spent by the union ended up costing the airline $30-$40 million.

''Any airline that's contemplating a head-to-head battle with ALPA had better take a close look at those figures and the size of our checkbook,'' Duffy said.

The Pilots also voted to continue a separate, additional assessment to fund the strike activities against Continental Airlines.

The union charged that Continental's latest attempt to oust ALPA as the bargaining agent for the carrier's 1,600 pilots is a violation of the Railway Labor Act and ignores a bankruptcy court's order to bargain in good faith.

Continental management released a petition reportedly signed by employees denouncing union representation. ALPA called this another step in a ''carefully orchestrated attempt by Continental to eliminate labor representation for its workers.''

Wheeling-Pittsburgh lockout

Jobless pay approved for Ohio Steelworkers

By Candice Johnson

The Ohio Bureau of Employment Services ruled that Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. workers in the state are eligible for unemployment compensation. In a victory for the Steelworkers, the agency concluded that the company locked out its workforce when it nullified the USWA's collective bargaining agreement during bankruptcy proceedings last July.

The Aug. 30 decision upholds the USWA's stand that the steelmaker is engaged in a lockout and vindicates the workers' decision ''not to work for substandard wages and working conditions,'' said chief union negotiator Paul Rusen.

Roberta Steinbacher, Ohio employment services administrator, said the agency determined that W-P workers were made jobless against their will and that in such cases, state law clearly requires that benefits be paid.

Pending claims

Some 4,300 USWA members idled at four Ohio plants will receive unemployment benefits ranging from $147 to $233 a week, while the union awaits action on benefit claims in Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

''We hope they make their decisions just as quickly as Ohio did, and that they decide for the workers,'' Rusen said.

He called W-P's attempt to stop payment of unemployment compensation ''mean-spirited'' and another in a series of spiteful actions by the company.

''First, the company tore up our contract, then it canceled medical insurance,'' Rusen said. Next, it failed to make payments to the pension plans, threatening their termination. Finally, it tried to stop the states from processing claims for benefits. These have been five difficult weeks for W-P workers.''

The Ohio announcement followed by one day a decision by U.S. District Judge Glenn E. Mencer denying Wheeling-Pittsburgh's request for an injunction to stop the three states from processing unemployment claims of nearly 8,600 W-P workers, off the job since July 21.

However, in an Aug. 28 ruling, Mencer upheld an earlier federal bankruptcy court decision allowing Wheeling-Pittsburgh to terminate its contract with the USWA.

Mencer found that the company had complied with the key elements of the Bankruptcy Code that require a firm seeking protection from creditors to present a proposal to the union to modify the agreement, supply necessary financial information and meet and confer in good faith to fashion a mutually satisfactory package of concessions.

The union argued that the contract modifications W-P requested were too drastic and not supported by the company's financial standing. The USWA also contended that the company's proposed plan placed a disproportionate burden on the steelworkers rather than a fair and equitable sharing of the financial burdens by all parties.

USWA President Lynn Williams said the federal court ruling would be ''vigorously appealed on an expedited basis.''

Mencer said he hoped the ruling ''will prompt the parties to negotiate without ceasing until a fair accord is reached.'' No talks have been held as the dispute continues in its sixth week.

TWU airline contract brings gains for 12,000

New York—The Transport Workers ratified a new three-and-a-half year contract with American Airlines covering about 12,000 members, primarily mechanics.

The agreement, approved by a 6,954 to 2,959 vote, provides for three lump-sum payments totaling $2,000 plus a 5 percent across-the-board increase on Mar. 5, 1988. TWU members rejected an earlier contract proposal in May.

Full employer-paid health benefits were maintained for all current employees. Job security provisions from the previous contract were retained and an additional 1,400 members became ''station protected,'' meaning they won't be required to move to another location to work.

A new pension provision will give about 1,900 members an additional one to six years of credits for the years they worked before age 25 which until now had not been counted toward pension benefits.

Chicago 1-day strike gains new contract for Teachers

The Chicago Teachers Union ended a one-day strike after the city school board agreed to a new two-year pay and benefits package.

The CTU, an affiliate of the Teachers, struck Sept. 3 when marathon talks broke down.

Elsewhere, AFT's Philadelphia local reached an agreement on a new three-year contract and negotiations continued in Pittsburgh, New York, Los Angeles and Boston. In Kansas City, litigation over interpretation of the current contract remained unresolved and in court.

Under terms of the new Chicago contract, which must be ratified by the 28,000 CTU members, a 6-percent pay increase will go into effect this year. A conditional 3-percent increase is slated for next fall.

A ratification referendum will be scheduled in the next 10 days, the union said.

To fund the increased pay, Gov. James R. Thompson used his executive powers to shift $65 million from the 1987 budget to the 1986 budget.

The 3-percent raise next year is conditional on the school board's ability to raise the extra money from the legislature.

The CTU had sought a multi-year pact to give members greater stability. Previous agreements were for one year. The strike had been sanctioned overwhelmingly.

Salary issue

Salaries are a major issue in many other school system negotiations this year, and there is growing recognition of the need for better pay for teachers.

In New Jersey, the legislature passed a bill making $18,500 the minimum salary for all public school teachers in the state.

The AFT settlement in Philadelphia will give some 19,000 teachers a 4-percent pay increase on Oct. 15 and raises of 6 percent each in March 1987 and March 1988. The agreement also increases health and welfare benefits and extends maternity leaves.

Other teacher strikes by locals of the unaffiliated National Education Association continued in Seattle; Pawtucket and Newport, R.I.; Toronto, Ohio; four Michigan districts, including Pontiac and Flint; several in Pennsylvania and the Wheaton-Warrenville District in Illinois.

Federal study hits OSHA for rulemaking delays

By Arlee C. Green

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration needs to ''establish a credible rulemaking process'' to gain public confidence in the agency's ability to provide protections for workers, the General Accounting Office said in a draft report presented to Labor Sec. William E. Brock.

The report also told the agency to improve its financial management controls.

The GAO, as part of its overall Labor Dept. review, recommended that a special committee be set up to determine how to expedite OSHA's rulemaking process.

It also suggested the agency ''make the public aware that in certain areas, it could be several years before standards are established.''

The report noted the difficulty in protecting workers on the job, and cited union dissatisfaction with the Reagan Administration's ''voluntary and cooperative approach'' to OSHA enforcement.

The GAO noted that OSHA has come under attack for foot-dragging since its creation in 1971 as a number of investigations and reports have focused on the agency's ''slowness in the issuance of regulations.''

The most recent findings, issued last April by the Office of Technology Assessment, pointed out that from 1971 to 1984, OSHA issued just 18 health standards.

Pressure by unions

The GAO's draft report also noted that ''in some instances, groups representing employees have petitioned the courts to expedite issuance of certain regulations.''

In citing the need for an expedited rulemaking process, the GAO listed the main problems as being ''little public confidence'' in OSHA due to the delay in issuing regulations, ''limited information on the specific causes of delays,'' and corrective actions taken by the agency that have been ''of limited benefit.''

The report pointed out that of 27 OSHA regulations currently in the rulemaking process, 17 have been in the system for more than two years and one has been under agency consideration for more than five years.

The GAO found varying reasons for the delays, foremost among them ''the need to review and analyze voluminous amounts of comments received, often resulting in additional notices of proposed rulemaking.''

Other reasons cited were the complexity of the issues and the turnover of top officials resulting in changes to the proposed regulations or delays until new officials became familiar with the area of concern.

Interference by the White House Office of Management & Budget also was cited as a cause of delay. On 10 of 21 notices of proposed rulemaking by OSHA between January 1983 and December 1984, it took longer than 60 days to obtain OMB clearance. In some instances, clearance took more than five months, the GAO draft report noted.

The complexity of both the administrative process and the issues themselves were also listed as reasons for delays in rulemaking.

The GAO study also found that individual Labor Dept. agencies are designing and implementing new financial management projects with no controls to assure they are consistent with departmental policies or the Comptroller General's principles.

Accounting fault

It cited the weaknesses in OSHA's system for controlling its accounts receivable and collectable, noting OSHA has had to estimate the amount of money it is collecting from employers in penalties.

In one case, OSHA's national office showed that the Jacksonville, Fla., office was due $63,430 from 79 accounts, when the actual balance was $24,470 due from 29 accounts.

Emergency panel named in railroad contract dispute

President Reagan named a three-member emergency board to study the contract dispute between the United Transportation Union and the nation's major railroads, preventing a possible strike for up to 60 days.

The UTU would have been free to strike the railroads on Sept. 20 under the terms of the Railway Labor Act.

The three selected are all arbitrators and all headed other presidential emergency boards. They are Harold M. Weston of New York, chairman, and Richard R. Kasher of Philadelphia and Robert E. Peterson of Briar Cliff Manor, N.Y.

Under the Railway Labor Act, the emergency board must file its report within 30 days. The UTU and the National Railway Labor Conference, representing the nation's major railroads, will have another 30 days in which to review the recommendations before resorting to a strike or lockouts. Should the panel's recommendations be rejected, Congress can end the dispute through emergency legislation.

The UTU had been in the 30-day cooling off period following the last three-day bargaining effort which ended with no progress. It had declined the National Mediation Board's proffer of arbitration to resolve the bargaining conflict.

The two sides have been bargaining since early 1984 to replace national agreements that became amendable on June 30, 1984.

The UTU reached a tentative agreement in June covering its 90,000 members, but it was rejected by the firemen, one of eight crafts that make up the union. The proposed contract would have eliminated the firemen's jobs by attrition.

The UTU is the first of 13 national unions bargaining with the NRLC to have exhausted the RLA mediation procedures. Eleven other unions are still in mediation, while the Yardmasters are bargaining without NMB assistance.

Glass-Pottery union scores 'free trade' export of jobs

Pittsburgh—Congressional action to protect American jobs from the rising tide of imports emerged as the rallying call of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers' convention here.

The 756 delegates heard GPPW President James E. Hatfield, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Steelworkers President Lynn Williams underscore the need for a ''fair trade'' policy to replace the ''free trade'' posture which has destroyed the jobs of millions of American workers. The speakers also called for intensified political action to elect congressional representatives who support labor's goals.

Hatfield said, ''We are being badly hurt by imports,'' noting that pottery, ceramics and sanitary ware are pouring into the United States from countries where workers earn pennies an hour.

''This year the trade deficit will top $150 billion,'' he warned. ''We call upon our government to protect American jobs and industries by making the necessary political decisions.''

Exchanging congratulations on their re-election to four-year terms: GPPW President James E. Hatfield and Sec.-Treas. Frank W. Carter.

Hatfield, Sec.-Treas. Frank W. Carter and other top officers were re-elected to new four-year terms. Delegates also bestowed the title of president emeritus on Harry A. Tulley, who headed the union before Hatfield.

Williams characterized the Reagan Administration as an enemy which is doing all it can to create an atmosphere of union-busting in America. He condemned unfair competition from abroad subsidized by foreign governments, and assailed weak and unenforced trade laws. He asked for support for striking Wheeling-Pittsburgh steelworkers who have already given the company $140 million in wage and benefit reductions and are being asked for more.

Kirkland lashed out at the Administration's proposals to tax workers' health plans and other benefits and its refusal to stem the flood of foreign imports.

No straitjacket

Calling for continued political action by labor, he said, ''The trade union movement does not intend to let anyone, Republicans or so-called new-style Democrats, confine us in a political straitjacket. To those of either party who want to drive us from the political arena, we say, 'Hell no, we won't go.' ''

Sec.-Treas. John Mara of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. noted that one reason imports can flood U.S. markets is the pitiful level of wages paid girls age 12 through 14 in places like Thailand, working in sweatshops from dawn to dusk for as little $3 a week, less than 10 cents per hour. He urged, ''Tell your friends the purchase of imports not only eliminates jobs in America, but also eliminates childhood for youngsters overseas.''

Other convention speakers included Rep. Bob Edgar (D-Pa.), who was endorsed by the union's executive board for Pennsylvania's U.S. Senate seat; Pittsburgh Mayor Richard S. Caliguiri; Sec.-Treas. Shirley G.E. Carr of the Canadian Labor Congress; COPE Director John Perkins; Bob Rae, head of the Canadian New Democratic Party; President Bernard Butsavage of the Molders; President Robert Harbrant of the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., and Harry Tully, GPPW past president.

Union halls used as command posts in Gulf hurricane

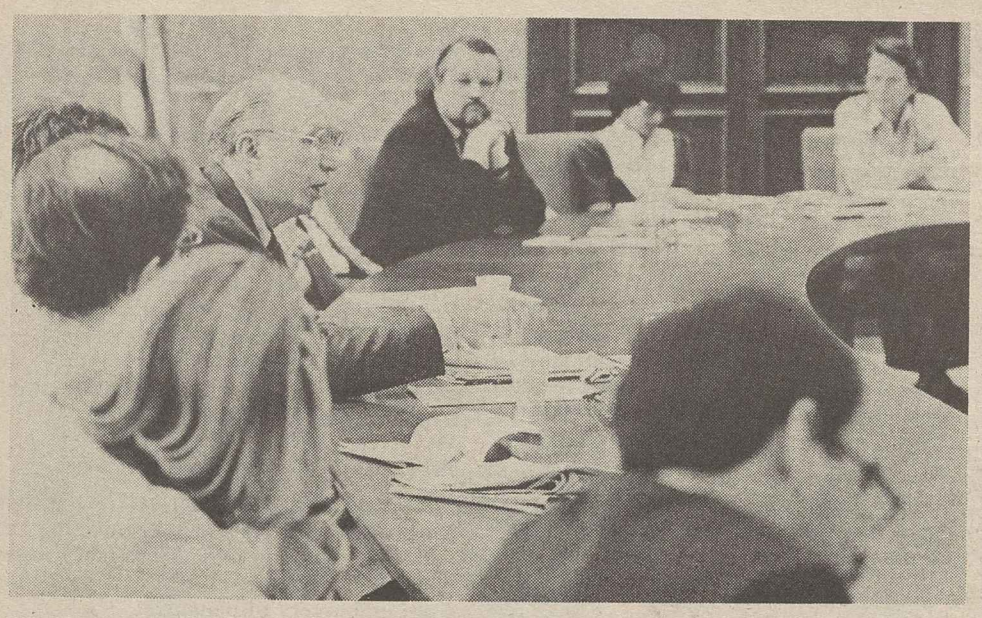
Union halls along the Gulf Coast were filled with volunteers ready for Hurricane Elena, as AFL-CIO Community Services representatives and Red Cross teams operated shelters and provided meals, clothing and other assistance for residents waiting out the storm.

Fifteen local union halls became Red Cross command centers, buildings specially equipped with communications and electrical systems as part of the Coastline Disaster Project.

The Lousiana AFL-CIO headquarters building served as an unofficial relief center for 20 people needing shelter during the worst of the storm.

The Red Cross set up a disaster command headquarters in Gainesville, Fla., at the Electrical Workers Local 1205, to help the hundreds of thousands of Florida residents ordered to evacuate the panhandle area. Relief centers also operated out of union halls in Mobile, Ala.; Baton Rouge and Lafayette, La., and Pascagoula and Gulfport, Miss.

Only four deaths were attributed to the storm because Gulf Coast residents heeded evacuation warnings, said state and local officials. More than 1.7 million people were evacuated over the four-state area.



Many residents had refused to leave their homes in 1969 when Hurricane Camille hit the Louisiana and Mississippi coast and left 256 people dead.

Heavy damage

Early Red Cross estimates show 17,000 dwellings damaged or destroyed by the storm across the four-state area. Total storm damage may exceed $2 billion as tornadoes spawned by Hurricane Elena ripped through factories and businesses along the Alabama and Mississippi coast.

Some 4,000 volunteers and Red Cross staff workers joined in the relief effort, working around the clock since Aug. 29 when storm warnings were issued.

Unions participating in the Coastline Disaster Project included the Electrical Workers, Communications Workers, Boilermakers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Carpenters and Clothing & Textile Workers.

Outlook remains bleak for nation's economy

Private and government reports pointed to a continuing sluggishness in the economy as unemployment remained high and new factory orders declined.

The Commerce Dept. said its index of leading economic indicators—a sort of barometer of future economic activity—rose by four-tenths of 1 percent in July after climbing a revised four-tenths of 1 percent the month before.

The June revision represented considerable downward movement from the 1 percent increase originally reported.

In a separate report, the agency said orders to factories fell 1.3 percent in July, the biggest drop in 10 months. The government said the decline came primarily from a 14 percent plunge in military orders.

However, orders in the key category of nondefense capital goods also were down 5.4 percent over the month.

The ongoing slump also showed up in a nationwide survey of purchasing managers which formed only a slight increase in production and a significant decline in employment.

The National Association of Purchasing Management said new orders—the source of future production—were virtually about unchanged last month. The report, based on a survey of purchasing managers at 250 major companies representing 21 industries.

In the government's index of leading economic indicators, six of the 11 components available for July contributed to the slight increase. The largest positive contribution was the money supply expressed in constant dollars.

One bright note was sounded in a report by F.W. Dodge that showed new construction contracts up 16 percent in July after declining 12 percent in June.

Statistics and politics an explosive mix

The First Hundred Years of the Bureau of Labor Statistics

By Joseph P. Goldberg and William T. Moye, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 330 pages. $15 hardbound, $10.50 softbound.

By Markley Roberts

American workers and the unions that represent them have a big stake in good, timely, reliable, accurate labor statistics. There's big money—and basic human welfare—riding on these numbers. So it's no wonder that labor statistics stir up political passions and controversy.

For collective bargaining, labor union officials need solid information on price changes that affect the cost of living, wages and hours that affect workers' earnings and family buying power, protection for workers in times of sickness and retirement and job loss, labor-management relations, and many other issues.

Statistics on employment and unemployment, poverty, technology and productivity, occupational employment developments and projections, foreign trade, and job-related safety and health are vital information for workers and their unions in collective bargaining—and also for determining what kind of public policies are necessary to advance the welfare of workers and their families.

And, of course, labor statistics are important economic indicators for policy-makers.

Union support for BLS

The source of almost all basic labor statistics is the Bureau of Labor Statistics, a semi-autonomous agency now within the U.S. Dept. of Labor. But BLS was in existence long before the Dept. of Labor came into being in 1913.

"The First Hundred Years of the Bureau of Labor Statistics," by BLS historians Joseph P. Goldberg and William T. Moye, is an institutional history written from within the institution. It is also, surprisingly, a fascinating piece of social history. And it tells a lot about how we know what we know about labor and economic and social conditions.

If you are interested in labor history, in labor statistics, in the politics and personalities and passions that swirl around "dry as dust" numbers that affect the welfare of working men and women and their families, you will find this book richly rewarding.

Here are a few items from the Goldberg-Moye history:

Basic union support for BLS existed from the start. In 1881, at the first convention of the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions, later to become the American Federation of Labor, the federation called for a national Bureau of Labor Statistics. AFL President Samuel Gompers told Congress of the urgent need for sound information on conditions facing workers and their families.

In 1884, Congress voted to set up a new Bureau of Labor "to collect information upon the subject of labor, its relation to capital, the hours of labor, and the earnings of laboring men and women, and the means of promoting their material, social, intellectual, and moral prosperity."

This social uplift purpose reflected an altruistic reaction to prevailing "law of the jungle" doctrines of Social Darwinism. Labor union observers often think now that the social uplift mission has been weakened by increasing BLS emphasis on labor statistics for economic policy-makers rather than for social legislation and for collective bargaining.

First commissioner

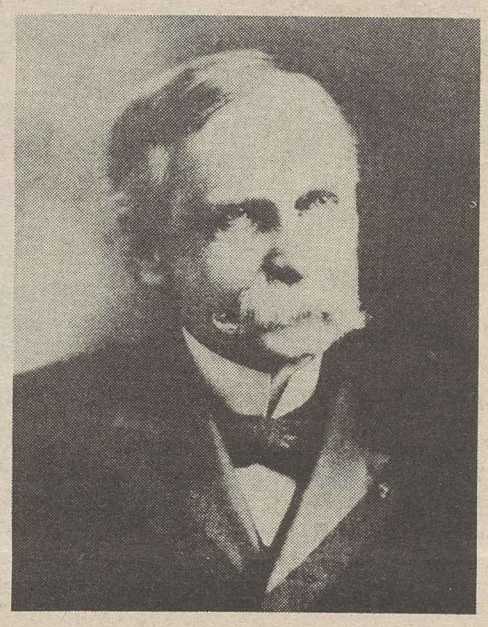
For the first four-year term set by law for the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, President Chester Arthur appointed Carroll Wright, who had already served 12 years as chief of the Massachusetts Bureau of Statistics of Labor.



Wright pioneered in application of quantitative methods for studying social and economic problems. His impartiality and professionalism included support for union organization and collective action. He enlisted help from scholars outside BLS like John R. Commons of the University of Wisconsin and W.E.B. Du Bois, who wrote articles for BLS on conditions of black workers.

President Theodore Roosevelt used BLS to push reform efforts of the Progressive movement. In 1908 he declared:

"Already our Bureau of Labor (Statistics), for the past 20 years of necessity largely a statistical bureau, is practically a Dept. of Sociology, aiming not only to secure exact information about industrial conditions but to discover remedies for evils."

Ethelbert Stewart was the first—and so far only—BLS commissioner with a "labor" background.

While working in a coffin factory in the early 1880s, he joined a workingmen's club in Decatur, Ill. In 1885, he ran for city clerk on a workingmen's ticket and served as an officer of the Illinois State Trades & Labor Convention. The coffin company blacklisted him for his union activity.

Carroll D. Wright

The governor appointed Stewart as head of the Illinois Bureau of Labor Statistics, where he served from 1885 through 1893. During this time Stewart joined the Knights of Labor and edited the Decatur Labor Bulletin and other labor newspapers.

Stewart was first appointed BLS commissioner by President Woodrow Wilson, then re-appointed by Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. In a time when business interests were dominating, he kept BLS independent and objective, opposing use of BLS reports for political purposes.

This was his undoing in the end. In 1932, Stewart was retired against his will after he disagreed with the bright, optimistic, cheerful view of the unemployment situation taken by President Hoover's Secretary of Labor.

Another conflict

A similar conflict in interpreting unemployment statistics took place some 40 years later. Assistant Commissioner Harold Goldstein declared at a 1971 BLS press conference that a small drop in the unemployment rate was "marginally significant" at the same time that President Nixon's Secretary of Labor was calling the decline of "great significance."

The Nixon Administration then decided there would be no more monthly BLS conferences on the unemployment situation. This produced charges of politicization of labor statistics, investigations by various professional organizations, and monthly hearings on the unemployment situation by members of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

Union criticism of BLS started early. Unions were angered by a 1904 report that wages had gone up more than food prices. The Machinists, Meatcutters, and Mine Workers' unions charged the report was politically motivated and methodologically unsound.

World War I forced the issue of adjusting wages for the rising cost of living to maintain workers' buying power and thus to prevent strikes that would interfere with the war effort. Cost-of-living changes based on BLS price surveys were used to set shipyard wages in World War I as a result of a government agreement with the AFL Metal Trades Dept. And the tripartite War Labor Board used prevailing wages and cost-of-living conditions in fixing wages.

But the first comprehensive cost-of-living indexes for the nation and for major industrial and shipbuilding centers—based on spending—did not appear until after the war in 1919.

World War II brought rising prices and higher cost of living for American workers and their families. The Little Steel wage stabilization formula allowed a 15 percent general wage increase from January 1941 to June 1943—but the BLS cost-of-living index went up 24 pecent during this period. Labor members of the War Labor Board declared even the 24 percent understated the true increase in the cost of living.

In June 1944, George Meany, then AFL secretary-treasurer and a member of the War Labor Board, charged that the nation's anti-inflation program was ineffective and that BLS was holding down the cost-of-living index to conceal inflation and hold down workers' wages:

A fettered agency?

"We are led to the inescapable conclusion that the Bureau has become identified with an effort to freeze wages, to the extent it is no longer a free agency of statistical research."

Soon thereafter, BLS admitted that "the index does not show the full wartime effect on the cost of living of such factors as lowered quality, disappearance of low-priced goods, and forced changes in housing and eating away from home. It does not measure changes in total 'living costs'—that is, in the total amount families spend for living."

In 1911—after a two-year study and 19 volumes of reports on working women and child labor—BLS issued the first standard family budgets.

How much does it cost a family to exist at a "fair standard of living" with some allowance for comfort? How much for a minimum standard of living with only bare essentials? It turned out that cotton mill families were often spending less for food than the federal prison in Atlanta was spending on food for one of its prisoners.

In the 1960s and 1970s, BLS family budgets were written into many state and federal laws on unemployment insurance, public welfare, social security, and employment and training programs. Unfortunately, against protests from union officials, BLS stopped producing these family budgets in 1981.

The last 20 years of BLS history get shorter treatment by Goldberg and Moye, probably because passions and politics still swirl around the issues and the people involved.

Labor history and social history get a new perspective in this history of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Try it. You'll like it. And you'll learn a lot about labor statistics.

Paycheck Equity

THE UNFAVORABLE ruling of a federal court of appeals in a union-initiated pay equity case does not diminish by one whit the labor movement's commitment to the principle that a worker's sex should not determine the pay level of a job. Neither of course should race, color, religion, national origin or any other irrelevancy that has sometimes been factored into the wage scale.

Labor's position was staked out clearly at the last AFL-CIO convention in a resolution calling on affiliates "to work to attain pay equity through collective bargaining agreements that upgrade undervalued job classifications." But if an employer's bargaining policy makes it necessary, the convention said, the case for pay equity should be pursued through administrative and judicial channels.

THAT, OF COURSE, is what the State, County & Municipal Employees was doing and is doing in support of its members employed by the State of Washington. The dispute began at the bargaining table. And under an agreement reached several weeks before the appeals court decision was handed down, the parties agreed to return the issue to the bargaining table.

Other unions have been equally diligent in pursuing the goal of pay equity, in both the public and private sectors.

Job upgrading agreements have become increasingly common, taking important first steps—sometimes giant steps—towards a sex-blind job evaluation. And in no case has a union's efforts led to the downgrading of any job. That's the bugaboo that some employers have tried to use to divide their workers on the issue.

The opinion in the Washington state case, by one of 12 federal circuit courts of appeal, may or may not stand up under review or be adopted by other courts in similar cases. But the moral principle that pay inequities based on sex are wrong and should be remedied has already been adopted by the labor movement.

It is being affirmed every day at the bargaining table.

Touching Bottom

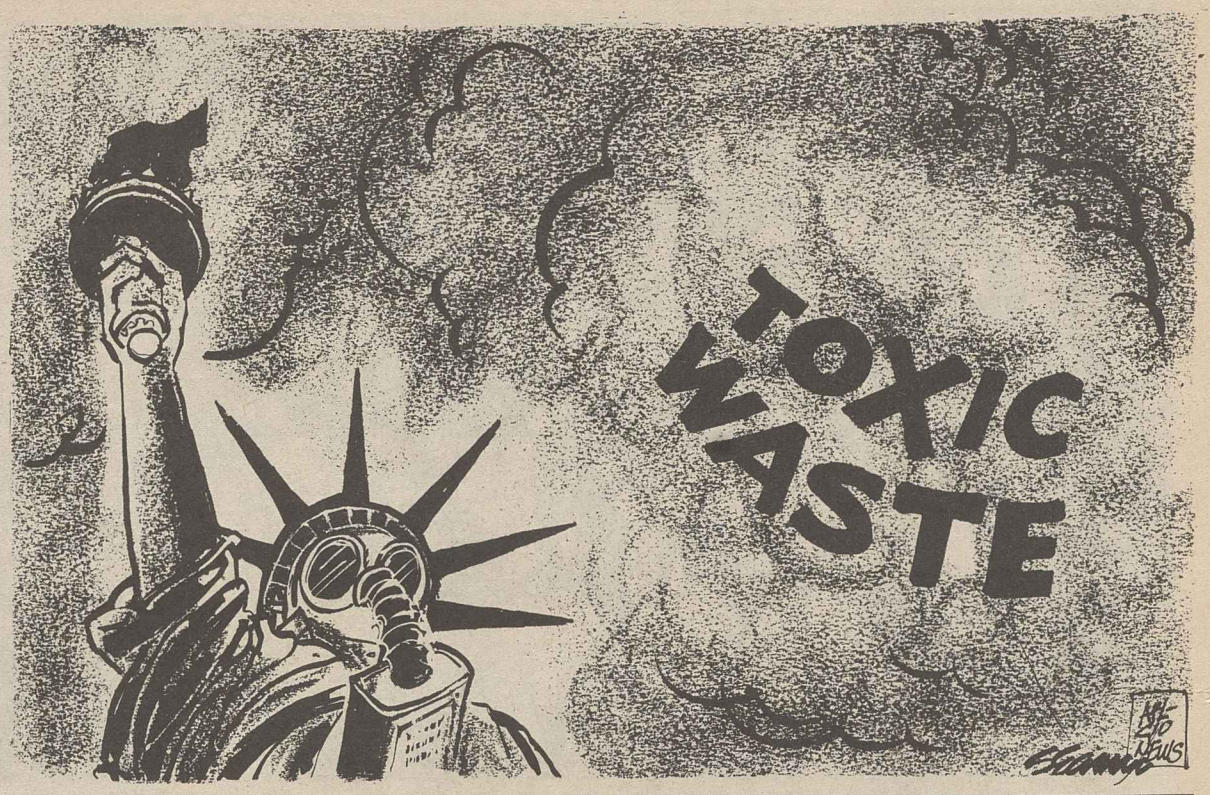
DON'T LOOK to your government for redress if a torrent of imports destroys your job and forces your employer out of business. That's the back-of-the-hand Labor Day message that President Reagan gave to America's shoe workers when he turned down the recommendations of the International Trade Commission for a temporary ceiling on imports.

The President did not dispute the unanimous findings of his trade commissioners that the domestic shoe industry has been devastated.

There never has been any question about the facts. Imports have forced the closing of 500 U.S. shoe factories, 100 of them just in the last year. Some 120,000 jobs have been eliminated.

Under the 1974 Trade Act, President Reagan has the power to take remedial action on a finding of import-caused injury to an industry.

But as the President and his advisers see it, that would be "protectionism" and an affront to the values of the marketplace. So the law remains on the books, but this President won't use it.



The President's trade representative, Clayton Yuetter, demonstrated the Administration's callousness during an interview by Judy Woodruff over public television.

It's too bad, he reflected, that the people involved can't look at the situation "objectively and a little less emotionally."

JOB-LOSERS will just have to find work in some field where the United States "can compete," he suggested. Of course, "some people are not going to want to move from Maine to the Silicon Valley to get a job in high technology." And in those cases, Mr. Yuetter acknowledged, "there's going to be some travail."

Has the President's trade representative been to California's Silicon Valley lately? Does he know that high-tech companies that were supposed to provide jobs for the future are moving their production overseas?

President Reagan's inaction on shoe quotas makes clear the futility of giving this Administration powers that it has no intention of using. Let Congress act, or take the responsibility for continued inaction. The buck stops at Capitol Hill.

Washington Window

Millions of unemployed get no jobless benefits

By Press Associates, Inc.

The Social Security Act is being praised on its 50th anniversary as probably the legislative achievement of the century.

During this commemoration period, many Americans are gaining an appreciation of how creative the federal government can be in helping people meet, in FDR's words, "the major hazards and vicissitudes of life."

Many are now aware of how social security replaced the county poorhouse, enabling the elderly to retire in dignity and relieving their children of an economic burden. The 1939 amendments turned social security into a "family protection plan" by extending benefits to wives, widows and children. Later improvements included disability insurance in 1956 and Medicare in 1965.

The younger generation can be reassured by the 1983 amendments which put social security financing on a sound basis for decades to come.

Yet there is one program that has failed and that is the unemployment insurance system. It failed because of basic flaws in the way it was set up and because employers and political conservatives have effectively sabotaged the program.

Need for help

When Franklin D. Roosevelt's Committee on Economic Security looked at the mass unemployment and suffering of the Great Depression, it decided the most urgent need was to get help to the many millions of unemployed.

From among several approaches, a federal-state system of unemployment compensation was devised based on the Wisconsin Plan. It was the only state with a program, and it used an "experience rating" formula under which an employer's tax was low if he maintained a stable workforce and it rose if he had high worker turnover. This assumed, erroneously as it turned out, that the employer had some control over the market conditions.

Building a state role into the program also was felt to be necessary to get it past states' rights conservatives in Congress and have it upheld by a conservative Supreme Court.

When the legislation was before Congress, the National Association of Manufacturers expressed alarm that it would bring "ultimate socialistic control of life and industry."

Opposition by business

For nearly 50 years now, organized business has fought at the state and federal levels against almost every improvement in the program. Employers have become expert at challenging benefit claims and defeating worker appeals. Business lobbyists in state legislatures work to keep eligibility tight and benefit level and duration down.

Organized labor has fought for many years for national standards on the duration and level of benefits. During the worst recessions, Congress has gone along with federal extended benefits, but these are now phased out.

This summer, the percentage of jobless workers receiving unemployment benefits fell to an all-time low of 26.9 percent. In June, of 8.8 million officially unemployed, only 2.4 million drew benefits.

And what is worse, in its callousness, is a planned "quality control" drive by the Labor Dept. at the behest of employers to root out "overpayments" to claimants. There is no similar effort to collect an estimated $1 billion a year in employer underpayments or non-payment of taxes.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has taken sharp issue with the flawed program, calling it "the harshest system amongst all the industrial democracies." In Europe, "there are systems for providing assistance to unemployed workers that virtually never end."

Kirkland also said it was "an atrocity" that Congress blithely let extended benefits expire in the face of prolonged high-level unemployment and widening pockets of poverty.

Marching for justice in the 100-degree-plus Texas heat.

Sharing in the spirit of solidarity.

SEIU Sec.-Treas. Richard Cordtz fields questions.

Civil rights era spirit rekindled in Texas nursing home protest

Beaumont, Tex.—The temperature soared above 100 degrees and rivulets of sweat turned into steam when they dripped to the sizzling pavement. But the march in support of low-paid nursing home workers joined the trade union and civil rights movement in a solidarity reminiscent of the commitment that brought Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., on his final mission to Memphis to support striking sanitation workers.

The heroines of the mile-and-one-half parade on the Sunday before Labor Day were the 157 women, all but two black, who struck for two months because the state's largest nursing home demanded that they take a pay cut in a new contract.

They had boosted their pay from the minimum wage to an average of $4.10 an hour after voting for representation by the Service Employees, and no way were they going to roll the clock back.

So they marched under the SEIU banner, singing "We Shall Overcome" and chanting union slogans.

SEIU Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz marched with them and spoke at the concluding rally. So did Texas State AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard and area labor leaders.

Heat no barrier

Members of industrial and craft unions from throughout the Texas Golden Triangle area marched in the record-breaking heat. As Donald Bird, a member of Pipe Fitters Local 195 explained to a reporter, "I'm just here to support them. Would you like your wages to be cut if you were making $4.10 an hour?"

Area NAACP chapters turned out for the march to the A.W. Schlesinger Geriatric Center. And 76-year-old Velma Jester, a veteran NAACP leader from nearby Orange County, told the rally at the nursing home, "My black brothers and sisters, your wages started going up with union wages. You've got to fight for it."

President Tom Turner of the Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO came to Beaumont to join in the march and to speak to the rally of labor's commitment "to economic justice for women and for blacks."

Joe Madison, NAACP national voter registration director, was on hand. And so was Atlanta City Council member John Lewis, who was a leader in the civil rights crusades of the 1960s.

"If Dr. King were alive today, he'd be identified with this struggle," Lewis said.

During two months on a 24-hour-a-day picket line, nursing and medication aides, food workers and others taking part in their first strike have deepened their union loyalties and only three of the original strikers broke ranks.

Leader emerges

Doris Smith, who has never missed a daily turn on the picket line, has emerged as a rank-and-file leader.

"This union has made me very bold," she told a reporter, "especially when I know I'm right, and I know in my heart I'm right."

The labor dispute took a new turn when the NLRB regional director on the eve of the protest march issued an unfair labor practice complaint against the nursing home, charging it with failure to bargain in good faith and refusal to provide information properly sought by the union.

At that point, SEIU Local 706 Business Manager Rick Hall brought to the door of the nursing home a letter announcing that the union members were dropping their picket lines and returning to work—exercising their legal right to reclaim their jobs in a strike involving management's unfair practices. He dropped the letter on the ground when guards hired by management refused to touch it. But later, it turned out, someone did pick up the letter and management officials reportedly huddled with their attorney but put off an immediate decision.

Earlier, management had rejected the union's proposal to submit the contract dispute to a panel of community leaders.

Negotiations over pay equity still on despite court ruling

AFSCME had won the first round of the Washington state legal battle when a federal district judge in 1983 ruled that the salary disparities found in a job study that the state itself had undertaken showed illegal sex discrimination. The job survey found jobs filled primarily by women were lower-paid than comparable jobs held mostly by men.

The state appealed the ruling, but the legislature meanwhile enacted legislation authorizing $41.6 million that could be used to achieve pay equity and an out-of-court settlement.

It is that fund which will be on the negotiating table.

High court appeal

Because of the principle involved, AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee said, the union will seek Supreme Court review of the unfavorable decision by a three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

The thrust of the appellate decision was that the pay disparities in state employment reflected marketplace values and therefore weren't illegal since the employer hadn't deliberately discriminated against women workers.

The lower court decision, by Judge Jack Tanner, stressed the findings of a study commissioned by the state showing a 20 percent sex-linked salary gap in a sampling of jobs requiring similar skills, intelligence, responsibility and working conditions.

But the appellate panel reversed the finding of illegal sex discrimination, declaring: "The state did not create the market disparity and has not been shown to have been motivated by impermissible sex-based considerations in setting salaries."

McEntee told a news conference at AFSCME headquarters in Washington, D.C., that the appellate decision will make union efforts to achieve pay equity "a little tougher" but will not lessen the effort to do so.

Despite the appellate reversal, he said, "we believe we have both the law and equity on our side."

McEntee stressed that pay discrimination on the basis of sex remains illegal, and the issue in dispute in the Washington state case was whether it had been established that "this specific employer" had engaged in illegal discrimination.

Other federal courts will be addressing the issue in various pending cases, he noted.

Mental health study cites perils of joblessness

Unemployment must be viewed as a serious social problem as well as an economic curse, the National Mental Health Association said in releasing a new study.

"The nation must develop a long-term understanding of and sensitivity to the interrelations between economics, work and the mental health of America," the report of the NMHA National Commission on Mental Health & Unemployment warned.

The commission, established in 1983, observed that the American work ethic has "made employment central to the functional mental health of most Americans." As a result, it said, there is a strong correlation between joblessness and physical and mental health problems.

Dr. Harvey Brenner of Johns Hopkins University, one of the commission's nine members, told reporters at a press conference the economy is shifting from what was an industrial-based and labor-intensive economy to one that is information based and non-labor-intensive.

A major implication of this shift, he said, is that "the new economic base depends on machines—not people—to do the work."

Job drain

As a result, there will be a loss of "good jobs," those middle-ranked jobs that have a human craft component and require educational preparation—white-collar, middle management, and skilled blue-collar jobs.

The NMHA report said this means new jobs and retraining efforts "must be flexible, that workers must be adaptable, and that unions and management must work together to find creative, viable ways to address jobs and joblessness in a rapidly changing economic environment." It was one of her last major undertakings.

Another member of the commission is Legislative Director William Welsh of the State, County & Municipal Employees. The panel was chaired by the late Patricia Roberts Harris, former Secretary of Health & Human Services.

The study recommends ways in which government, business and the public can help minimize the detrimental effects of unemployment. It calls on the business community to give workers and community leaders at least one year's notice of plant closing, provide on-site job counseling, placement, training and retraining.

Extend insurance

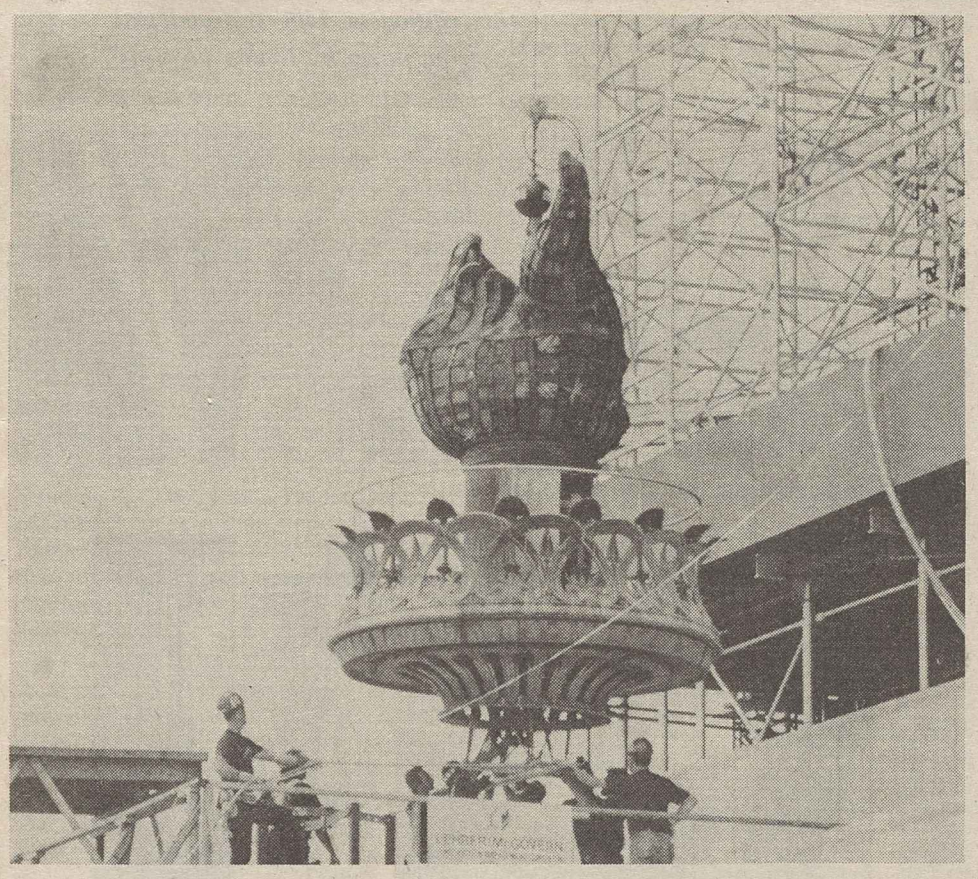
It also urges employers to extend medical and mental health insurance coverage to laid-off workers for a reasonable length of time.



Copies of the report, "American Dream or Nightmare? Unemployment and Mental Health in America," are available at $8.95 from the National Mental Health Association's headquarters at 1021 Prince St., Alexandria, Va.

Public employees score Reagan bid to scuttle pay rule

By Gene Zack

The Reagan Administration, in what public employee unions called a ''wrong-headed'' move, threw its support behind efforts to overturn a Supreme Court decision affirming the right of state and local government workers to the overtime protections of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Following the recommendation of a Cabinet council headed by Atty. Gen. Edwin Meese, the Administration sent two of its top officials to Capitol Hill to back legislation that would invalidate a 1974 law, upheld by the high court earlier this year, extending the overtime umbrella to employees of state and local governments.

Labor Sec. William Brock and Assistant Atty. Gen. William Bradford Reynolds told a Senate Labor subcommittee that implementation of the ten-year-old law would cost the 83,000 government units as much as $3 billion a year in earned overtime pay.

This contention has been challenged by public employee unions. They charge that state and local governments are inflating the compliance costs. The price tag, according to the State, County & Municipal Employees, would be far lower because most public sector contracts already provide for overtime pay.

Endorsing rollback legislation introduced by Senators Pete Wilson (R-Calif.) and Don Nickles (R-Okla.), the Administration spokesmen also argued that existing law would violate the doctrine of ''states' rights.''

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee was sharply critical of the Reagan Administration's ''wrong-headed support for changes in the Act.''

Enforce the law

The present law should be enforced, he said, calling the proposed exemption of public employees unfair.

Al Bilik, executive director of the state and local division of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., said that ''there is no compelling reason why 10 million workers should be arbitrarily excluded'' from FLSA coverage.

The high court's ruling that state and local governments should not be immunized from FLSA requirements should have put an end to the controversy, Bilik said, and the Administration should move ahead with implementing the law.

Brock told the subcommittee that, although the court had said it was constitutional to extend wage-hour requirements to state and local governments, ''there now remains the broader question of the appropriateness of so doing.''

'Improper reach'

The Administration, he said, believes imposing FLSA requirements on these units of government is an ''improper reach of federal power,'' and that ''corrective steps'' are needed ''to assure that state sovereignty is not unduly infringed.''

Reynolds denied that the Administration was taking a ''states' rights'' position. ''We advocate states' responsibilities,'' he insisted.

Raising the specter of new Reagan appointees to the Supreme Court before the Administration's term ends in 1989, Reynolds said that the four justices who

Kirkland hits U.S. failure to ratify ILO conventions

By James M. Shevis

Failure of the United States to ratify conventions of the International Labor Organization seriously threatens America's role and influence as a defender of human rights, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned the Senate.

''It is imperative in the interests of our global obligations and aspirations to put an end to this stagnation of U.S. ratification of ILO conventions,'' Kirkland told the Senate Labor Committee.

''It would contribute so much to the worldwide effort of the free and democratic societies whose leaders are now involved in a struggle to win the minds and souls of the people of the world and offer some hope especially to those who are now living in oppression under dictatorial and totalitarian regimes,'' Kirkland declared.

After 51 years of membership in the ILO, the United States has ratified only seven of the more than 160 conventions adopted by the tripartite body.

ILO conventions involve the basic standard-setting activities of the specialized United Nations agency. They cover not only freedom of association but also the right to collective bargaining and other worker issues.

Only one other country with comparable years of ILO membership—El Salvador—has fewer ratifications than the United States, Kirkland observed.

By contrast, the Western European members of the European Economic Community have an average of 70 convention ratifications and some have more than 100.

Failure to ratify the basic human rights conventions hampers and obscures the U.S role as the leading spokesman for freedom, democracy and human values in the world and places a propaganda weapon in the hands of the enemies of those values, Kirkland said.

He blamed the country's poor ratification record on resistance by employer organizations.

Brock postpones OSHA standard on field sanitation

By Arlee C. Green

Just when farm worker, labor, church and congressional groups could see time running out for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to issue a field sanitation standard to require that farm workers have portable toilets and water for handwashing and drinking, the Labor Dept. moved the deadline for federal action back two years.

Labor Sec. William E. Brock deferred federal action for 18 months to allow individual states to pass legislation requiring these basic sanitary facilities for farm workers. If they fail to act, Brock said, OSHA will issue a standard within six months after that.

The AFL-CIO said the refusal to issue a standard ''is continuing evidence of the

Donahue tells House

Fairness vital to immigration policy

''Tough and enforceable sanctions'' against employers who either hire undocumented workers or discriminate against those legally entitled to work must be at the heart of any immigration reform legislation, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told a House Judiciary subcommittee.

At the same time, Donahue said, immigration reform must demonstrate compassion toward those who entered the countrv illegally, but who have now become ''settled, contributing members of their communities.''

Donahue expressed regret that, in the previous Congress, House and Senate conferees deadlocked on immigration legislation, and urged legislators to come to grips with the issue in this session of Congress.

''No subject is more in need of legislative action,'' he said, adding that ''the time will never be more appropriate'' to resolve the immigration dilemma facing the country.

He said legislation introduced by Rep. Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Rep. Romano L. Mazzoli (D-Ky.) is a ''good vehicle'' for addressing the problem, but cautioned that improvements must be made before the bill meets the AFL-CIO's criteria for fairness and equity.

Too much power

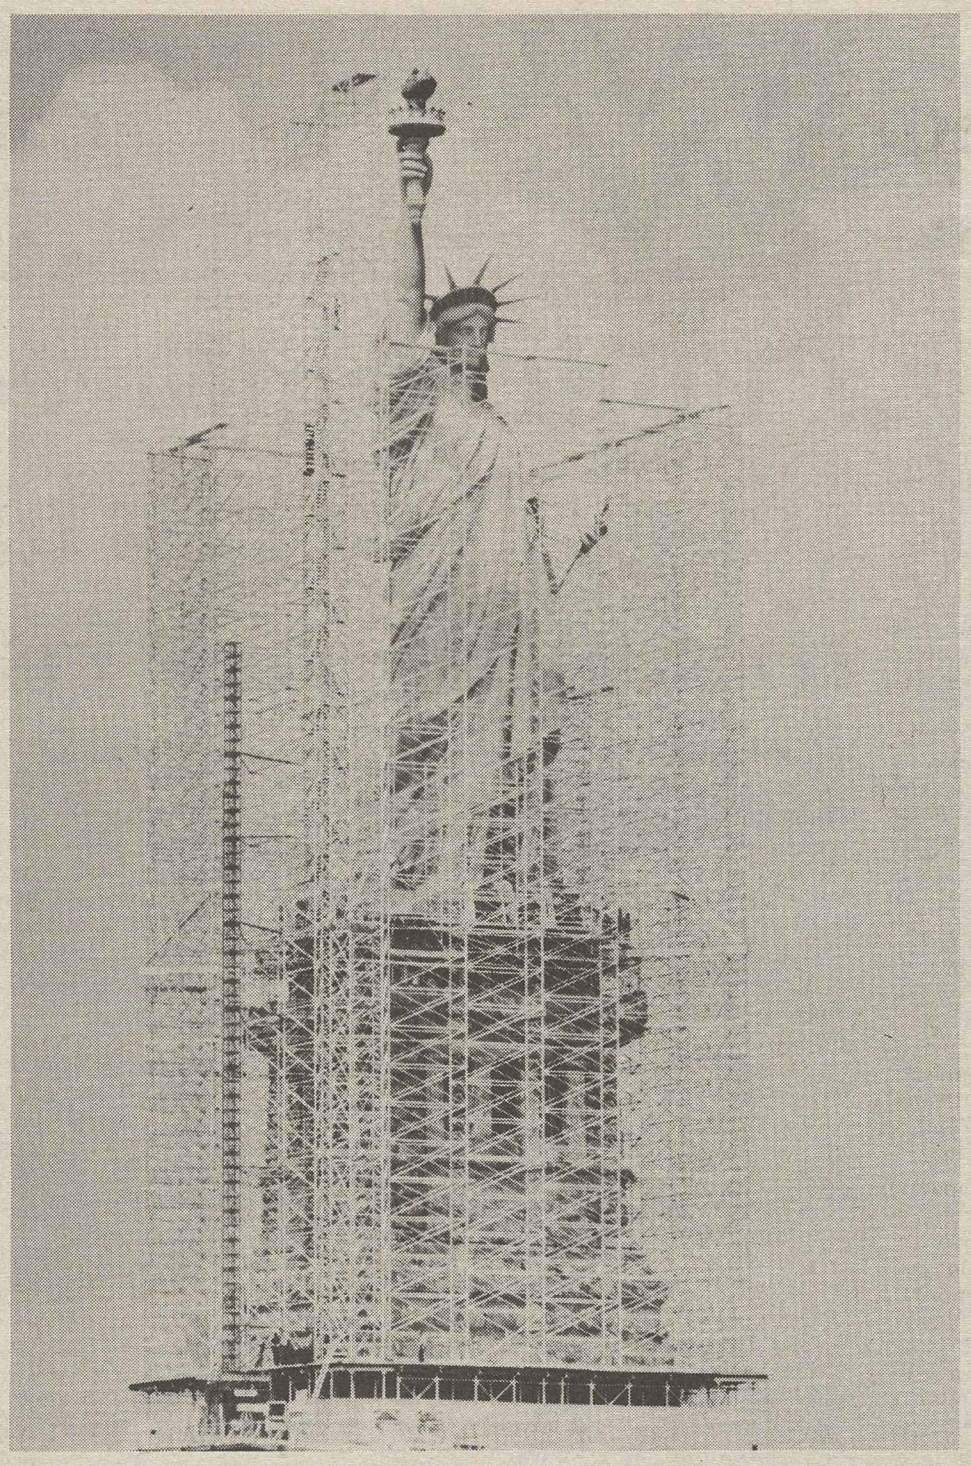
Pointing specifically to the bill's provision dealing with those who have already entered the country illegally, Donahue voiced concern that it would give the Attorney General too much discretion in adjusting their status. Once Congress determines the legalization policy and the accompanying requirements for admission, he said, it should ''direct the Executive Branch to put the policy into effect.''

''We can see no reason to make the whole structure dependent upon the standardless judgment by a Cabinet officer,'' he said. ''It would be a serious error to permit the withholding of legalization on a person-by-person basis.''

Turning to the issue of enforcement, Donahue stressed the need for universal coverage, rejecting the argument that small employers should be exempted from the prohibition against employing undocumented workers, on the ''fallacious'' grounds that it would be too burdensome for them to comply.



''If the document-checking that is required is made as simple as it should be, and if only good-faith inspection of documents is required, compliance could not reasonably be considered onerous.''

Donahue said there is an urgent need to develop a fool-proof system for determin-

Union restoration of Liberty

New York—The Statue of Liberty—America's symbol of freedom that has weathered the battering of nearly 100 years of storms—is being restored by skilled union craftworkers.

Except for needed repairs in 1937, Liberty has had no major work done since she was placed in New York Harbor almost a century ago. The restoration project, directed by the National Park Service, includes work on the Liberty Island monument as well as the buildings and grounds at Ellis Island, where millions of immigrants entered the United States during the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

The original statue—a gift from the people of France—was crafted by French workers, then dismantled and shipped to the United States. But the renovation work that began in 1984, for the most part, bears a union label and a made-in-America tag.

Ready in '86

Members of the Building Trades have been working around the clock to complete the restoration for a special July 4th celebration in 1986.

Unions participating in the restoration effort include the Bricklayers, Carpenters, Electrical Workers, Elevator Constructors, Ironworkers, Laborers, Lathers, Operating Engineers, Painters, Plasterers, Cement Masons, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and the Sheet Metal Workers.

Members of Steelworkers Local 8377 cleaned and prepared the 40,000 pounds of copper sheets donated by a Pennsylvania company to repair the statue's torch and hand. Members of six other USWA locals also had a part in the restoration project as six U.S. specialty steel firms produced and donated 40,000 pounds of stainless steel bars for the monument and another 10,000 pounds for the Ellis Island project, worth more than $200,000. Contributions from domestic steelmakers to the Statue of Liberty-Ellis Island Centennial Commission provided 40 tons of raw steel.

Structural overhaul

Inside the monument, Ironworkers are forging and replacing more than 1,700 armatures—bars that fasten the statue's copper "skin" to the inner skeleton. Each bar must be bent, twisted or molded into shape to fit the curves and folds of the statue, and each bar takes an average of six hours to put in place. While the workers must sometimes use antiquated blacksmith methods, the materials being used in the restoration are strictly 20th century, as the deteriorating iron bars are replaced with stainless steel.

Painters are removing layers of paint and coal tar that covered the steel structure and interior of the statue with care not to harm the sheet copper surface.

Since traditional blasting materials could not be used on the delicate copper, crews experimented with rice, sand, cherry pits and even walnut shells before discovering that baking soda was the ideal cleaner. Painters used four tons of baking soda to remove the 99 years' accumulation of coal tar.

Elevator Constructors dug new pits 20 feet down into solid concrete to replace the aging system with double-decker glass elevators. Most of the demolition work was done by hand, using small drills and chippers, due to cramped quarters.

In a special workshop outside the statue, a team of ten French metalworkers are creating a new two-ton torch, remodeling its base and restoring the spikes around the statue's head.

Using a centuries-old process called repousse, the craftsmen use more than 100 different hammers to form the copper sheets into the flame and torch shapes.

Sheet Metal Workers are repairing some earlier "fixes" to Liberty, by patching the holes that were punched in the statue's skin years ago to drain water. The union crew will install an internal drainage system along with a new heating, ventilation and air conditioning system.

New systems

Plumbers & Pipe Fitters are installing a new sprinkler system in the statue and replacing piping systems on Ellis Island.

Other work yet to be completed on the monument includes new spiral staircases, interior and exterior lighting systems and outside masonry work.

The renovation project, funded by donations from the American people, will cost about $39 million. The monument will be rededicated on her 100th anniversary in October 1986.

Long-term security

Stable policy pressed on retirement income

Congress should develop ''a clear and consistent national retirement income policy'' geared to the needs of working men and women rather than to either tax or budget considerations, the AFL-CIO told a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

Social security and private pension systems work in tandem to make up ''the foundation of the nation's retirement income security'' plan, Lawrence Smedley, associate director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, testified. It is imperative that Congress develop a coordinated program to ''strengthen their future effectiveness,'' he stressed.

The subcommittee also heard from:

● Robert A. Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., who expressed concern that, under the guise of ''tax reform,'' proposals are being advanced to ''impose tax and other burdens'' on employer contributions for retirement and health benefits.

● William Hoffman, director of social security for the Auto Workers, who said that national policy should be directed toward providing retirees with ''an adequate replacement of their pre-retirement income, and maintaining the purchasing power of that income for the remainder of their lives.''

Unneeded alterations

Smedley voiced concerns about the tendency to alter social security for budgetary purposes, at a time when the program is ''financially sound and does not contribute to the deficit.'' The result has been to shake the public's faith in this half-century-old program, he said.

To increase public confidence in social security and to insure its nonpolitical administration, Smedley said, the program should be ''removed from the unified budget and made an independent agency free from the pressures of political appointees.''

He called for restructuring social security to ''deal more equitably with income protection for women,'' noting that ''the problems of poverty and low income'' fall with particular severity on elderly women.

The AFL-CIO testimony also urged repeal of the provision, enacted in 1983, which would raise the retirement age, in increments, to 67 effective early in the next century.

Smedley called on Congress to move swiftly to prevent the diversion of private pension fund assets to corporate purposes, because such actions jeopardize ''the income security of millions of workers.'' He said reforms are needed ''to prevent solvent employers'' from evading their responsibilities by ''dumping unfunded pension liabilities'' onto the government-operated Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.

Shrinking value

He pointed out that automatic inflation protection is ''virtually nonexistent in the private pension sector.'' Thus, with an annual inflation rate of 4 percent, today's retiring worker's private pension dollar would be worth only 67 cents in purchasing power in ten years, while the social security beneficiary's dollar would buy $1.49 worth of goods.

Georgine, who testified in his capacity as chairman of the National Coordinating Committee for Multiemployer Plans, hit hard at current proposals to make employer-paid health benefits subject to income taxes. If that were to happen, he said, ''younger, healthier workers who do not feel they are likely to need health benefits . . . would likely drop out'' of such plans, leading to new or expanded government programs which would ''increase, rather than decrease, federal budget deficits.''

Hoffman told the subcommittee that, although the needs of retirees differ somewhat from those of active workers, there are ''certain timeless necessities of life which are common to all and are the birthright of every citizen.'' He defined these universal needs as including ''adequate housing, proper nutrition, clothing, transportation and medical care.''

The UAW spokesman pointed out that social security offers ''the fairest and most efficient way'' to provide basic retirement benefits. Two-thirds of the over-65 beneficiaries rely on social security for more than half their income, and a third rely on it for 90 percent of their income, while only a third of those over 65 receive benefits from private plans.

New pamphlet issued on social security benefits

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet describes the protections workers and their families receive through social security and answers criticisms spread by opponents of the system.

There is no charge for the pamphlet, Publication No. 167, which is titled ''The Worker's Stake in Social Security.'' Copies are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Joining Kirkland at Senate hearings are International Affairs Director Irving Brown, right, and Edward Hickey, adviser to U.S. worker ILO delegation.

Holdout on ILO conventions undermines U.S. credibility

''Ratification would involve a supervisory scrutiny of our democratic laws and practices and involve some of our domestic labor standards,'' he said.

The United States has been subjected to an ever increasing barrage of stinging criticism for its ratification record—not only from the Soviet bloc, but also from its West European allies and developing world countries, Kirkland said.

''Our friends throughout the world cannot understand our failure to ratify not only conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining but especially such conventions as forced labor, which we helped to draft.

''Isn't it a mockery before the world that a nation which went through a civil war over the issue of slavery has not ratified an international convention on slavery?'' he asked.

''It is even more puzzling to our friends, inasmuch as we implement these conventions in practice in the field of industrial relations, employment and civil rights.''

Within the ILO, the failure to ratify conventions prevents the United States from introducing any complaints against other governments on those conventions.

''The United States is thus reduced to being able merely to associate itself with other governments on many issues that are and have been vital to the national interest of the country,'' he said.

Despite the government's poor ratification record, the American labor movement will continue to stay in the forefront of the worldwide struggle for worker rights, Kirkland declared.

Brock orders 2-year delay on field sanitation standard

federal government's unwillingness to meet its responsibilities under the Occupational Safety & Health Act.''

The federation expressed concern that Brock's decision will become a ''precedent for federal inaction and the ceding of authority back to the states.''

The states have had numerous opportunities since 1972 to require these basic facilities for farm workers with disappointing results, the AFL-CIO statement said, adding, ''There is no reason to believe the states will act now.''

By postponing any federal action, the right to clean water and portable toilets—the minimum standard proposed 18 months ago—is being denied to the nation's 550,000 farm workers, the AFL-CIO said, stressing that this increases their already high risk of parasitic and pesticide-related diseases.

Brock had pledged during his Senate confirmation hearings in April to review the decision of former OSHA Administrator Robert Rowland not to issue a standard.

The Farm Workers called the Labor Dept.'s decision ''pretty terrible,'' declaring that it shows the ''state of mind of the growers is still in the last century.''

Farm Workers Vice President Dolores Huerta said female farm workers are hurt more by the Labor Dept.'s decision. ''It is degrading for women farm workers to have to bare themselves in front of male foremen. It could be considered a form of sexual harassment. There are no trees in most of these fields. Really no place to go. This should be a concern to consumers, too, as most of these crops go directly to the marketplace.''

Lacking clout

Huerta said she doubted that the state legislators would be rushing to pass field sanitation legislation. ''In most states, farm workers aren't unionized and they lack political clout,'' she observed.

The Farm Workers Justice Fund, which has spearheaded the 13-year effort by a coalition of labor, church and farm groups to pry a standard out of OSHA, vowed to continue its fight in the courts.

Charles Horwitz of the Migrant Legal Action Program called Brock's decision ''outrageous'' and said he felt the Labor Secretary had been under great pressure from the White House not to issue a standard.

Horwitz said the department's approach was ''very novel, the reverse of what Congress had intended for OSHA.'' He noted that OSHA did not defer to the states when it issued its weak right-to-know standard that it insisted should pre-empt stronger state standards.

OSHA must file its reply to the review petition by Oct. 16, and the Farm Worker Justice Fund will have until Oct. 31 to respond.

Democrats continue sanctions drive

Blocked by a conservative filibuster against legislation imposing tough economic sanctions on white-ruled South Africa, Senate Democrats vowed to attach the bill's provisions to key legislation pending in Congress ''until we win.''

Although sentiment had been running high among both Democrats and Republicans against Pretoria's racial policies, President Reagan sought to take the steam out of the sanctions fight by issuing an order imposing far less stringent sanctions against the South African government.

Reagan had resisted pleas from his own party's leaders in the Senate to crack down on South Africa, insisting that his policy of ''constructive engagement'' was sufficient to deal with the mounting crisis caused by the white minority government of President Pieter Botha.

The President opted in the end for limited sanctions as the only way to avoid the embarrassment of having the measure en-acted by the Republican-controlled Senate.

After three unsuccessful attempts to muster the 60 votes needed to choke off the filibuster, Democrats began devising new tactics to bring the labor-backed measure to the floor, confident that they still have the simple majority needed for passage.

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), the assistant minority leader, said supporters would seek to attach the anti-apartheid provisions to either the pending debt limitation bill or a subsequent continuing resolution to fund the federal government beyond the end of the current fiscal year.

Either of the bills, Cranston said, would be ''tough to filibuster and . . . very tough to veto.''

''We are going to keep this issue before the Congress and the country until we win,'' Cranston said.

Other issues

Meanwhile, Congress was scheduled to get down to business on a number of labor issues, some of which have been hanging fire for years.

Among the items on the congressional plate are measures that would:

● Launch a frontal assault on the deepening crisis caused by the flood of imports swamping U.S. markets.

To deal with the job-destroying effects of unchecked foreign trade, a number of get-tough bills have been introduced, with labor's all-out backing, that would crack down on countries that erect unfair trade barriers to U.S.-made goods and concentrate on development of a consistent and long-overdue U.S. trade policy.

● Workers and their communities from the devastation of unexpected plant closings by requiring employers to give workers and their unions three months' advance notice before shutting down a plant or laying off more than 50 employees during a 30-day period.

The measure, expected to reach the House floor shortly, has been described by the AFL-CIO as ''modest'' in comparison to previous proposals, but a strong challenge to the legislation has been mounted by business and industry lobbyists, and a close vote is anticipated.

● Prevent construction frims with union contracts from creating non-union counterparts to which they divert work that would otherwise be covered by the collective bargaining agreement.

● Mandate a study of the federal wage and classification systems to determine whether they discriminate on the basis of sex, race or Hispanic origin—the first step toward possible achievement of pay equity.

● Revise the overtime requirements of the Walsh-Healey Act to exempt to exempt federal contractors from the obligation to pay overtime for anything beyond eight hours a day limiting them to the law's requirements only when a worker puts in more than 40 hours a week.

● Ban the use of lie-detector tests in private sector employment and impose harsh economic sanctions for employer violations. Introduced by Representatives Pat Williams (D-Mont.) and Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.), and strongly endorsed by the trade union movement, the bill has already drawn more than 160 cosponsors in the House.

Saving the farm

Labor support for new legislation to help rescue hard-pressed family farmers from a continuing wave of foreclosures is pledged by Kenneth Young, executive assistant to the AFL-CIO President, at a Capitol Hill rally. The farm delegation from Iowa, Missouri and Nebraska is campaigning for needed measures to ease plight of family farmers caused by tight credit, budget deficits, weak commodity prices and faulty foreign trade policy.

Labor vows continued effort to win freedom for Sakharov

The American labor movement stands ready to help in whatever way possible to secure freedom for Soviet human rights crusader Andrei Sakharov, exiled internally in the USSR five years ago.

"It's vitally important to keep public attention focused on the Sakharov case and on the issues and values that are at stake in it," Federation President Lane Kirkland told newsmen near the Soviet embassy in Washington, where Sakharov's stepson has been on a hunger strike since Aug. 30 to protest his stepfather's exile.

Kirkland and other supporters signed a sidewalk petition circulated by Alexsei Semynov and his sister Tatiana Yankelovich who joined her brother six days after he began his protest.

The petition calls on President Reagan and Sec. of State George Shultz to intervene on behalf of the Nobel Peace Prize winner and his wife.

Kirkland said the Soviets' denial of freedom for the Sakharovs is "the most glaring example" of their violation of the Helsinki agreement and other international accords guaranteeing basic human rights.

"It also raises the broader question of what undertakings of the Soviet Union can be trusted," he said.

Kirkland said Sakharov should be allowed to travel wherever he wishes and to speak to whomever he wants—"just as anyone can in this country and as the Soviet Union has committed itself to in any number of international instruments."

The AFL-CIO is following the Sakharovs' case closely, Kirkland noted.

"Anything that can be done to focus American attention more broadly on this question and on the enormous stature and great symbolic importance of your stepfather is a vital importance to us, and we'll do anything we can to be of help," he told Semynov.

The Sakharovs were exiled from Moscow to Gorki, a city closed to foreigners, in January 1980 after the Nobel prize-winner continued to criticize the Soviet regime for violations of human rights.

Affiliates urged to join in marking Rev. King holiday

The AFL-CIO is calling on affiliates to contribute to the federation's fund for labor's remembrance of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., when the nation officially observes his birthday for the first time next January.

"Because of the strong bonds between organized labor and Dr. King," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a letter to presidents of all affiliated unions, "it is appropriate that the labor movement should be an important and visible part of the commemoration of his life.

"In fact, it was while Dr. King was in Memphis, Tenn., helping sanitation workers organize as members of an AFL-CIO affiliate, that he was assassinated.

"With your help, organized labor will play an appropriate and leading role in honoring a man who dedicated his life to our shared goals of freedom, justice and dignity."

Labor support

The AFL-CIO strongly supported passage of the federal law that made King's Jan. 20 birthday a national holiday. It is participating in the first national observance of the holiday through a labor advisory committee to the national King Holiday Commission, which is planning activities in connection with the event.

Kirkland said in his letter to affiliates that the advisory committee is preparing a written history and short film on King's life and his bonds with the labor movement.

In a number of cities, too, the committee is working with local labor organizations on commemorative events scheduled for the holiday, he said.

At its last meeting, the Executive Council voted to contribute $10,000 to its King Holiday Fund. Affiliates should make checks payable to the AFL-CIO/King Holiday Fund, and send them to the attention of Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

Comprehensive program pressed to assist victims of occupational disease

Union witnesses told Congress that a misnamed Asbestos Workers' Recovery Act fails to adequately compensate asbestos victims and limits workers' legal remedies by shielding asbestos companies from further liability.

President Edward J. Carlough of the Sheet Metal Workers, was joined by AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel, Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert Georgine and AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Jay Power in calling for a comprehensive program to aid occupational disease victims.

Testifying before the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Health, Carlough decried the proposed limitation on manufacturer liability. "This bill seeks to establish—as the only form of compensation—a no-fault payment system similar to a workers' compensation system, he said. "But the fault of the industry has already been proven."

Carlough testified that if a compensation system is to be set up, it should be in addition to the tort system, not instead of it.

He called the compensation scheme contained in the bill, sponsored by Sen. William Armstrong (R-Colo.), "totally inadequate."

The bill would allow an asbestosis victim to be paid his average weekly wage once a month. "At most, this payment would last for a period of five years," Carlough noted. "If the average weekly wage were $300, for example, that victim would receive only $28,000 over the five year period."

Carlough told the subcommittee that asbestos victims should not be singled out from all the other workers who get occupational diseases.

Power, testifying for the AFL-CIO, suggested that another compensation bill, the Occupational Compensation Act of 1985 introduced by Rep. Patrick Williams (D-Mont.), better meets the needs of workers exposed to asbestos and other toxic substances.

Limitations opposed

In opposing Armstrong's bill, Power cited the limitation it puts on the liability of employers and manufacturers. "Companies should not have the shelter and protection of exclusive remedy when occupational illnesses related to toxic substances are the result of willful and intentional misconduct," he said.

He noted that potential manufacturer liability has proved to be a major incentive for high standards of testing and production, as well as comprehensive notice of possible hazard."

A federal compensation program is needed to furnish adequate compensation to occupational disease victims, Power said. He stressed that it should cover all known health hazards and provide adequate coverage and protection, including generous time limits for filing claims and eligibility requirements that presume many disabling diseases are caused by work-related exposure to toxic substances.

Samuel also supported the comprehensive approach contained in Williams's bill.

In additon to a system for compensating victims, a program is needed to identify and inform workers who are at risk of disease due to occupational exposures, Samuel said. To this point, he urged passage of the High Risk Occupational Disease Notification & Prevention Act of 1985.

Early detection

Georgine also called for legislation to mandate identification of potential victims of occupational diseases and require a system of early detection.

He stressed that every union in the BCTD has members who are exposed to asbestos and other toxic substances on the job.

Commenting on the financing of a federal compensation program, Georgine said the burden of payment should be placed on the manufacturers of toxic substances.

"We don't believe that the American public should pay for the workplace disability caused by exposures to toxic substances," Georgine said.

Because of the latency and multiple exposure factors, "it is appropriate that a compensation fund be created that will have an industry-by-industry orientation," he said.

Sheet Metal union to screen members for asbestos risks

The Sheet Metal Workers launched a multi-million dollar program to screen and treat their members for asbestos-related disease and to develop new safeguards on asbestos hazards.

SMW President Edward J. Carlough announced the new program at a Washington press conference following congressional testimony on a victim compensation bill.

At the press conference, Carlough noted that when he told the union's 300 business agents of the new program he asked how many had been exposed to asbestos on the job. "Every single hand was raised, including mine," he said.

Carlough said that the past behavior of the asbestos companies "has been not only criminal, but also immoral. They inflicted future injury on their workers for a half century, knowing full well what they were doing. Now we must invest millions to meet our obligation to our members' health and safety. They must not die in agony, in poverty, in despair and in ignorance of the causes of their misery."

Selikoff role

The first step of the SMW program would involve a detailed screening of 1,500 members under a $707,000 agreement with Dr. Irving Selikoff, director of the Environmental Science Laboratory at Mt. Sinai Hospital in New York City and a leading expert in asbestos-related diseases.

The screening will include an evaluation of the members' current health, recommendations for treatment when required, and a follow-up program to monitor the latent effects of asbestos exposure.

Selikoff will also review and recommend changes in work practices in the sheet metal industry.

The SMW program will also press for legislation covering asbestos in the workplace, provide legal counsel to members who suffer asbestos-related diseases, sponsor research on new products and technologies to be sure substances that are replacing asbestos are not equally hazardous, and provide training to members.

The information developed in the first step of the program will be used in a larger screening program to be available to all members of the union and their families.

Clothing pact sets pattern for 100,000

New York—A sweeping new contract, which will affect more than 100,000 shirt, cotton garment and pants workers, was overwhelmingly ratified by members of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

The three-year pact, covering 23,000 workers employed by the nation's leading producers of furnishings and other non-tailored apparel for men and boys, sets a pattern for 88,000 more workers in the industry, both union and non-union.

With the ratification vote running at 95 percent favorable, ACTWU President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman, who headed the negotiating team, hailed the agreement as representing "a major improvement" in dealing with the economic needs of workers in the industry.

Under the agreement, all workers received an across-the-board bonus of $500 on Sept. 1. In September 1986, workers will receive a bonus of 6 percent of their basic earnings in the previous year, followed by a 25-cent-an-hour wage boost in August 1987 and, in November of that year, a 6 percent bonus for all workers who have been on the payroll for at least one year.

20-percent bonus

The union estimated the value of the wage and bonus package at 20 percent of current workers' income over three-years.

The settlement also provides for an improved health care plan, including major medical coverage, plus increases in life insurance, disability and pension benefits. It also adds the birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., as a paid holiday, bringing to 11 the total number of paid holidays.

Among the major companies involved in the negotiations were the Alatex, Inc., and Arrow Co. divisions of Cluet-Peabody; the Jay Mar-Ruby subsidiary of Hartmarx; Eagle Shirt, Health Tex and Manhattan Industries.

Union volunteers work to remove shed during first phase of community service project.

Outdoor center built by union volunteers makes life safer, brighter for handicapped

Wichita, Kan.—Volunteers from eight area unions are donating their time and energy toward making life a little sunnier for the mentally and physically handicapped adults who are cared for daily at the Culver Center here.

These adults of all ages, who because of their disabilities are unable to care for themselves, were facing another season of being shut in for lack of safe, accessible, outdoor facilities on the center's grounds.

In a three-phase project, union members are converting a 33-by-100-foot lot behind the center into an enclosed garden accessible by wheelchair-bound adults.

"This is a real community effort," said project coordinator Andy Yunos of Machinists Local 733, noting that heavy machinery and supplies have been provided by a number of companies.

"We just felt we could help," Yunos said. "All we have to do is give a little bit of our time, a little bit of muscle." There has been no charge for labor and no charge for supplies and equipment.

About 75 union members turned out for the first phase of the project, demolishing a large storage shed, removing a fence and clearing the ground.

Hard work

Phase two drew nearly 30 volunteers to break up a concrete slab and remove tree stumps. None of the work was easy in the heat of mid-August.

The third phase of the community service project will include the building of three raised garden plots, a gazebo, a 6-by-24-foot pond with fountain, a round flower bed, and a patio edged with planters, all surrounded by a redwood fence and for privacy enhanced beauty.

Area unions began working on the project shortly after the end of the Kansas AFL-CIO Community Services Conference held here in June.

Charles Dutton, local AFL-CIO community services director, said participants at the conference toured the facility in June and learned that the center wanted an outdoor garden for its clients, but had been turned down for federal and state grant money. It was then that the unions chose the Culver Center project to aid the adults.

The volunteers are from Machinists District 70, Operating Engineers Local 101, Electrical Workers Locals 271 and 523, Carpenters Local 201, Teachers Local 725, Plumbers Local 171 and Bricklayers Local 199, and an unaffiliated Teamsters local.

8.1 million unemployed

Jobless rate still at recession level

The nation's unemployment rate, stuck at 7.3 percent for the previous six months, fell three-tenths of 1 percent in August, but at 7 percent still was historically high.

"The sad part is that it is still at recession levels," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald observed, pointing out "there has been no substantial movement" in the jobless rate in 15 months.

Oswald and other economists were generally cautious about the decline in the rate as 8.1 million workers were listed on the nation's unemployment rolls by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

"The drop is not likely to stay at that level, but continues to bounce around in the range of 7 and 7.5 percent, where the unemployment level has been since May 1984," Oswald said.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee "we need to have a couple more months of data" confirming the decline before calling it a new trend.

Most of the August decline was concentrated among younger workers, those between 16 and 24, particularly teenagers whose jobless rate is volatile.

While the rate for teenagers fell from 19.5 to 17.3 percent last month, there were actually 34,000 fewer teenagers working than in July. That was because nearly 250,000 of them dropped out of the labor force, many returning to school.

Black teens

The jobless rate for black teenagers fell sharply from 41.3 to 34.4 percent in August, but as the Washington-based Roosevelt Centennial Youth Project noted, even this can be misleading.

"The stark fact we still face," Project Director Frank Slobig warned, "is that less than 4 percent of black teenagers living in poverty who are in school are employed."

Also, nearly two-thirds of the country's unemployed received no unemployment compensation benefits in August, largely due to limitations on allotments or budget cutbacks by the Reagan Administration or the states.

Despite the shrinking proportion of benefit recipients, the Labor Dept. reported the number of new claims for benefits rose 12,000 to 382,000 during the week ended Aug. 24. But only 2.5 million of the more than 8 million unemployed workers were collecting benefits.

There likely will be more claimants as some companies plan layoffs. AT&T announced in August it will eliminate some 24,000 jobs in its information systems group, and Ford Motor Co. said it will lay off about 10,000 white-collar workers over the next five years.

Oswald noted that 7-percent jobless rates have always been regarded as "recession levels." He recalled that the jobless rate was 5.6 percent in 1979, and moved above 7 percent in 1980.

In his campaign for the presidency, Reagan attacked Jimmy Carter on the unemployment issue. Two years later under the Reagan Administration, the jobless rate rose to a high of 10.7 percent.

Rise in jobs

Civilian employment rose by 310,000 to 107.2 million in August, BLS reported, but the labor force shrunk by 15,000 to 115.3 million, leaving 8.1 million persons without jobs.

The BLS count of jobless persons does not include those who have stopped looking for work, or work part-time because they cannot find full-time work.

There was continued strong growth in the number of service sector jobs, particularly in wholesale and retail trade and finance, insurance, and real estate. Construction employment continued to rise, mining declined slightly. Factory jobs held steady.

Grim year

More than 21.5 million Americans were unemployed for at least one week during 1984, the Labor Dept. reported.

This widespread unemployment occurred while the nation's official jobless rate hovered in the mid-7 percent range and about 8.5 million people were out of jobs each month.

The proportion of men with some joblessness last year was 18.1 percent; for women it was 16.5 percent.

The proportion of blacks who experienced some unemployment last year was 26.7 percent.

Frontier unions back buyout plan

Denver—Four of five unions representing employees of Frontier Airlines have ratified new contracts aimed at making the carrier a worker-owned company.

The Air Line Pilots, Association of Flight Attendants, Air Line Employees and Transport Workers agreed to a $32-million wage and work rule concession package, paving the way for an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP) that will give their members 80 percent control of the company.

Non-contract employees agreed to a separate ESOP that will give them 10 percent of the holdings while management will receive another 10 percent through stock options.

The Machinists left the four-union coalition last February but discussions are continuing and may lead to IAM participation in the employee takeover plan.

The buyout plan, the first of its kind in the airline industry, would allow Frontier to buy back some 12.4 million outstanding shares in the company at $17 a share. The Akron-based GenCorp., which owns 45 percent of Frontier Holdings, the airline's parent firm, already has pledged to vote in favor of the buyout.

Approval of the plan by the Securities & Exchange Commission is not yet complete, but the unions expect a shareholder vote on it late next month. The buyout requires 72.5 percent approval of the shareholders' vote.

Under the plan, each union will get a certain percent of the 80 percent share of the company set aside for the coalition. In return, ALPA agreed to a 6.7 percent wage reduction, AFA 10 percent, and ALEA 13 percent.

Details of TWU's agreement were not available.

The IAM is also continuing contract talks with Frontier. Its current pact expires later this month.

dissented from the decision upholding the 1974 law "are prepared to overrule . . . if given an opportunity in the future."

The extension of wage-hour coverage to state and local government workers was passed by lopsided votes of 350-45 in the House and 71-19 in the Senate, and was signed into law by President Ford.

Hardly had the ink dried on the measure before it was challenged in the courts. In 1976, by a 5-4 vote, the Supreme Court ruled it unconstitutional. The law remained in limbo until last February when, also by a 5-4 majority, the court restored federal wage-hour coverage to millions of government workers at the state and local level.

The case, titled Garcia vs. San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority, was initiated by the Amalgamated Transit Union on behalf of city bus drivers who had been denied overtime pay.

"These employees have a right to the basic protections of the law," Bilik said, "and there is no reason in the world why they should be excluded."

Immigration policy keyed to fairness

ing whether an individual has the legal right to work in this country. Existing documents are "too easily, and therefore too frequently, fraudulently produced," he said, and there may be a need for "a truly tamper-proof social security card" or other means of verification. Congress, he said, should direct the President to develop a workable verification system as expeditiously as possible.

Donahue recommended the enforcement mechanism in the Rodino-Mazzoli bill as the way for dealing with unfair immigration-related employment practices, calling them a "natural model" for what is needed with respect to sanctions.

Organized labor is especially concerned about an unexpected consequence of immigration reform legislation: discrimination by employers against "foreign-appearing or foreign-sounding applicants," Donahue said, and he welcomed the bill's requirement that employers check the documents of all potential employees.

Donahue reserved his sharpest criticism for the provisions in the Rodino-Mazzoli bill which would weaken current limitations on the importation of foreign workers. The result would be a return to the "old bracero program" in the agricultural field, a program abolished more than two decades ago, and could lead to the denial of jobs in other areas to qualified American workers.

"No need has been shown" for abandoning the provisions of current law, he said, "and therefore it should not be done."

British labor hits Thatcher for weak stand on apartheid

Blackpool, England—Britain's trade union movement condemned the Thatcher Government for failing to respond to South Africa's inhumane treatment of blacks, and launched a campaign to press Pretoria to end apartheid.

In a resolution adopted at its 117th annual meeting, the British Trades Union Congress scored the government for not imposing economic sanctions against South Africa and called on its nearly 100 affiliated unions to seek ways to apply pressure to alleviate the condition of South Africa's black trade unionists.

The measure, adopted unanimously, calls for renewed efforts by British unions to get South African goods barred from stores. It also urges affiliates to withdraw any investments their pension funds may have in South Africa and try to get British firms not to invest there.

Britain is the largest investor in South Africa and its fourth biggest trading partner.

The resolution also seeks a government ban on new investment in South Africa, an end to British bank loans to Pretoria, withdrawal of Britain's ambassador, and expulsion of South Africa's envoy to Britain.

Repression of blacks

Turmoil has engulfed several South African black townships in recent months, with the government brutally quelling worker uprisings.

Delegates also adopted a number of other resolutions during the weeklong meeting, and heard from fraternal delegates from other national trade union centers.

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams, representing the AFL-CIO, stressed the right of workers to associate freely and to form unions for their common welfare wherever they may be.

"We must resist the pernicious idea that freedom of association is appropriate only in certain social systems, where there is private ownership of the means of production but unnecessary in systems of state ownership," Williams said.

"We hold to the single standard that workers must be free to create and control their own unions—regardless of who owns the means of production.

"We must hold to this standard in Poland and South Africa, in Chile and the Soviet Union, in El Salvador and Nicaragua."

A cornerstone

Freedom of association is not a passing fad, Williams declared. Nor is it just a trade union issue or a civil or political right to be counterposed to economic and social rights.

"Economic and social rights cannot be won without the right to organize," he said. "And without the right to organize, the people have no power to restrain their leaders from acts or threats of war."

Noting the economic interdependency of the free world, Williams said there are no purely national solutions to problems that afflict industrialized nations or those of the developing world.

"That is why the AFL-CIO attaches great importance to the work of the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development," he said.

Through TUAC, labor movements of the two dozen OECD nations can pursue proposals to end massive unemployment and solve other economic problems, Williams observed.

North Dakota delegates push recovery goal

Bismarck, N.D.—Delegates to the North Dakota AFL-CIO convention here signaled their determination to better serve, protect and organize the state's workers through stepped-up efforts in the community, at job sites and in the legislature.

Acknowledging that national economic and farm policies have dealt North Dakota a stiff blow over the last two years, the delegates to the three-day meeting encouraged state federation leaders to aid all proper efforts to offset the hardships brought by mounting job losses and to shore up the state's economic potential.

President David L. Kemnitz said he was encouraged "by the solidarity that has grown among union members in these hard times." He reported to the convention that the "initiative and willingness of the state's union members" were clear throughout this year's session of the legislature, when a large number of volunteer lobbyists turned out to help push labor's legislative program.

Director Alan Kistler of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services told the delegates that while the AFL-CIO's new report, The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions, lays out tough challenges for the labor movement, it also outlines areas of opportunity to develop and expand into a much larger "union family."

The real culprit

Kistler said the membership decline in recent years is the result of changing economic forces, not a loss of faith in the union approach. "We haven't lost members because of disaffection; we've lost members because they haven't had jobs," he stressed.

Kemnitz, an Electrical Workers' member, was elected to a second two-year term as president. IBEW member James McLaughlin of Dickenson was elected first vice president, and Myron Yantzer of Mandan, a United Transportation Union member, was elected secretary-treasurer, replacing UTU member Robert A. Donegan of Jamestown, who did not seek re-election.

The delegates also re-elected two incumbent vice presidents and chose four new vice presidents: Terry Busse, a member of the IBEW in Walhalla; James Weisenberger, State, County & Municipal Employees, Grand Forks; Gary McKenzie of Fargo, Plumbers & Pipefitters; and David Gienger, a member of the Communications Workers and president of the Jamestown Central Labor Council.

Gov. George Sinner and Sen. Quentin Burdick were the principal speakers at a convention banquet honoring outgoing Sec.-Treas. Donegan, who retired after two decades in the post.

Farm union wins bargaining order despite vote loss

Sacramento, Calif.—The California Supreme Court has upheld the power of the state's Agricultural Labor Relations Board to require a grower to bargain with the Farm Workers, even though the union did not win a secret ballot election.

In a 5-2 ruling against HCS, a grower of table grapes in the Coachella Valley, the court upheld the ALRB's certification of the Farm Workers and its subsequent order to bargain, after the board had found HCS guilty of committing some 30 unfair labor practices.

Those violations included acts of violence against union organizers, firings of union supporters, threats of discharge and deportation, surveillance of union activities, interrogation of workers, an illegal wage increase and an election-eve promise of better working conditions. The workers in the June 27, 1977, election voted down representation by the UFW, 88-80, with 142 challenged ballots.

Bargaining order

The court cited a 1969 U.S. Supreme Court ruling in the Gissel Packing Co. case in upholding the ALRB. It observed that the California labor law, like the Taft-Hartley Act, neither expressly authorizes nor prohibits the "issuance of 'Gissel bargaining orders'—that is, an order issued as a remedy for egregious employer unfair labor practices in the absence of an election won by the union."

The majority opinion said, "Where an employer forecloses the possibility of holding a free and fair election by committing egregious unfair labor practices, a bargaining order may be the only way to ensure worker self-determination.

"Were we to construe the ALRA's mandate for secret ballot elections to prohibit the board from issuing remedial bargaining orders, we would, in essence, be transforming the workers' most effective shield into the employers' most formidable sword."

The court held the signed UFW authorization cards were reliable enough to support the bargaining order. It rejected the grower's contention that enough time had passed and the extensive worker turnover had dissipated the "taint" of past company actions so that a fair election could now be held.

HUD moves to undo home losses

Bowing to a federal court order, the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development began a nationwide search to locate thousands of families who lost their homes because of what the AFL-CIO labeled a "miserly policy" toward the jobless and others in financial straits.

From the beginning of 1980 through mid-1984, HUD imposed a harsh system of temporary mortgage assistance to replace a more lenient procedure which, in the past, had made it possible for financially strapped families to hold onto their homes.

The U.S. District Court for Northern Illinois ruled in June that HUD had improperly applied eligibility requirements which resulted in up to 35,000 homeowners being rejected for mortgage assistance. It directed the federal government to take immediate remedial steps.

Financial harm

The homeowners involved "were done an injustice and suffered financial and housing hardship" because of HUD's actions, Henry Schechter, director of housing and monetary policy for the AFL-CIO, said.

"Some of the insured homeowners will never be compensated in any way," he noted, "and there can be no way of erasing the family housing hardships that many needlessly suffered."

In the past, the problems of financially troubled homeowners were dealt with by having lenders assign the insured mortgages to the Federal Housing Administration, which then worked out a repayment schedule until homeowners got back on their feet.

HUD replaced this with a scheme whereby the lender held onto the mortgage, instead of assigning it to FHA. Assistance payments were limited to 18 months and were covered by a second mortgage.

To comply with the court order, HUD has begun a major outreach program to find the victims of its procedures and try to remedy the injustices that resulted.

The department said it will reconsider applications for mortgage assignment if foreclosure is pending. If HUD now owns the property, no sale will be made until eligibility under the pre-1980 system has been determined.

If the family's home cannot be recovered, HUD will try to offer the owner a comparable home, and if that is not possible, the homeowner may receive a sum of money as compensation.

Council okays Article XX extensions

Pittsburgh—The AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its summer meeting here last month, approved the request of the State, County & Municipal Employees for extension of Article XX protection of bargaining relationships in several units beyond the initial five-year period.

The extensions are granted where active organizing efforts continue, but election petitions cannot be filed because of contract restrictions or other rules.

Requests for initial extensions were granted to AFSCME until February 1987 for Minnesota State Employees Unit 14; August 1986, Buffalo Sewer Authority, and August 1986, Michigan 36th District Court (probation officers).

Further extensions were granted for Billings, Mont., city employees until February 1987 and Montana State Penitentiary employees until August 1987.

Requests for further extensions also were granted until August 1986 for units in Illinois of clerical workers at Northern Illinois University and Governor's State University and Macomb municipal employees; in Massachusetts for Lawrence city employees, State Employees Unit 5 (Metro District Police) and Unit 9 (engineers); in Missouri for Jackson County jail and juvenile court employees; in New York for Cheektowaga town employees; and in Connecticut for Community College Professional Employees.

The ILO Conventions

OF THE COUNTRIES with comparable years of ILO membership, only one—El Salvador—has fewer ratifications of ILO conventions than the United States. By contrast, the Western European members of the European Economic Community have an average of 70 ratifications and some have more than 100.

Of more critical importance is the fact that a nation that prides and proclaims itself as a champion of human rights has ratified none of the basic human rights conventions.

Our failure to ratify such conventions as those on tripartism, freedom of association, collective bargaining, forced labor and slavery has weakened our position not only in the ILO but throughout the world. It hampers and obscures our role as the leading spokesman for freedom, democracy and human values in the world, and places a propaganda weapon in the hands of enemies of those values.

The familiar excuse offered over the years for this record of non-ratification—that it is due to our federal structure—is overdone. Other comparable federal countries have ratified a respectable number of conventions—by way of example, Australia (43), Canada (26), Federal Republic of Germany (66) and India (34).

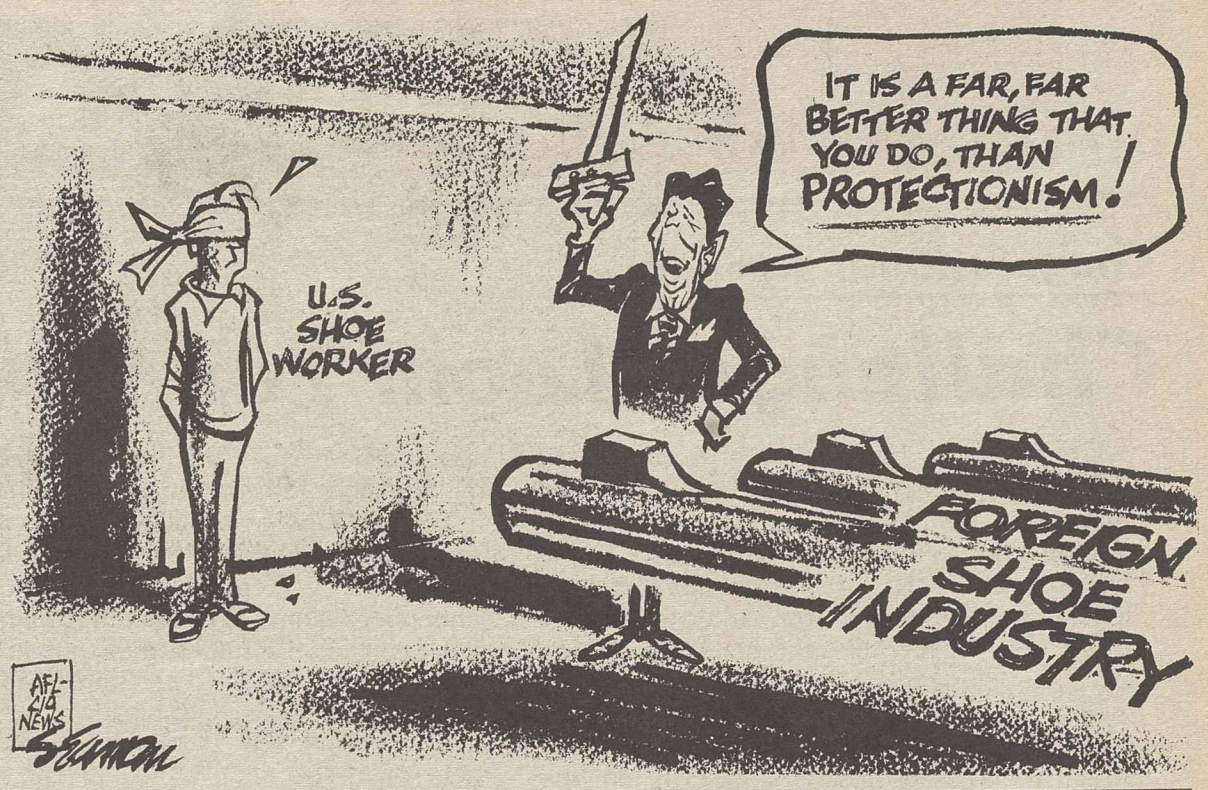
MOREOVER, the federal structure is not the real reason for our non-ratification record. Rather, it stems from the resistance by employer organizations because ratification would involve a supervisory scrutiny of our democratic laws and practices and involve some of our domestic labor standards. Their position on tripartite consultation is a classic example. This convention poses no federal-state conflict of jurisdiction whatsoever. Their real argument is that it would open the door for other ratifications.

Such an argument insults the integrity and judgment of the branches of government which must deal with consideration of ratification, including the U.S. Senate by a two-thirds vote. If such an evaluation on the merits can hurdle the obstacles presented in all of these bodies, they should be ratified whatever their number.

We are now engaged in the ILO in a continuing struggle over standard-setting. The Soviets are attempting to dismantle these procedures, as well as to weaken one of the most prestigious bodies in this field, namely the Committee of Experts dealing with the application of conventions and recommendations. We have been successful so far in blocking these maneuvers, but for how long? Our position would be greatly strengthened if the United States had a better record on ratification.

The United States has been subjected to an ever-increasing barrage of stinging criticism for its ratification record—not only from the Soviet bloc but also from our Western European allies and Third World countries.

OUR FRIENDS throughout the world cannot understand our failures to ratify not only conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining, but especially such conventions as forced labor (which we helped to draft) and slavery!



Isn't it a mockery before the world that a nation which went through a civil war over the issue of slavery has not ratified an international convention on slavery? It is even more puzzling to our friends, inasmuch as we implement these conventions in practice in the field of industrial relations, employment and civil rights.

From a purely political standpoint, the excuses offered by the United States are wearing so thin that these friends and allies in the ILO are becoming increasingly embarrassed and even annoyed with the moralistic criticism of the performance of other countries under ratified conventions when we continue to do nothing ourselves about ratification.

The failure to ratify conventions already prevents the United States from introducing any complaints against any other government on these conventions. The United States is thus reduced to being able merely to associate ourselves with other governments on many issues that are and have been vital to the national interest.

We believe that it is imperative in the interests of our global obligations and aspirations to put an end to this stagnation of United States ratification of ILO conventions and seriously attempt to ratify some of these basic human rights conventions.

Rhetoric masks inequity in Reagan's tax reform

By Press Associates, Inc.

President Reagan, speaking on Labor Day in Independence, Mo., in front of a bronze statue of Harry S. Truman, called the current tax reform system "unfair, unworkable and unproductive," comparing it to a "daily mugging."

Reagan contrasted the current tax code with his "tax reform" proposals. "Our fair share tax program is a good deal for the American people," he declared, adding that it would mean "more justice, more equity for every American."

White House officials said Reagan will make his tax plan the centerpiece of his domestic "fall offensive" and campaign for it across the nation.

Congressional leaders of both parties said they will try to move a tax reform package through Congress by year's end. However, returning to Washington after the August recess, members of Congress said their constituents back home had expressed skepticism about the prospects of genuine tax reform as well as criticism of major elements of the Reagan plan.

Reagan's ringing appeals for tax "reform" and his populist-sounding attacks on his plan's "special interest" opponents won't be enough to push it through Congress if the American people keep probing beneath the rhetoric.

Loopholes for rich

Recent Harris and Roper public opinion polls show that public support for tax reform is founded on overwhelming agreement that corporations and high-income individuals "pay too little in federal income taxes" and that "the rich tend to get out of paying taxes by using accountants and lawyers."

But the Reagan tax program enacted in 1981 made the tax system less fair by skewing tax cuts in favor of corporations and the rich. The current Reagan tax plan, despite a few worthy provisions, basically means more of the same, plus additional tax burdens for millions of middle-income Americans.

A recent study by Citizens for Tax Justice (CTJ) said Reagan's plan "would not only fail to put most tax-avoiding corporations back on the tax rolls, but would, as the Congressional Budget Office has concluded, 'probably provide a corporate tax cut over time.'

"It calls for a new brand of accelerated depreciation that is even more generous and costly than our current system. It would target tax relief to the most well-to-do households, with those earning $200,000 or more a year receiving a 10.7 percent tax cut," the report said.

Little change

While Reagan claimed in his Labor Day speech that "silly or unproductive tax shelters will be eliminated in our tax reform," the CTJ study noted that "it would leave intact most of the loopholes which make both corporate tax avoidance and upper-income tax shelters possible."

The report, which surveyed 275 major corporations, found that 50 of these companies paid no federal income tax during the 1981-84 period. Despite about $57 billion in pre-tax profits, these 50 corporations received net tax refunds from the Treasury totaling $2.4 billion.

Titled "Corporate Taxpayers and Corporate Freeloaders," the report showed that 126 of the 275 companies paid an effective tax rate of 12 percent or less during the past four years, considerably less than the rate paid by the average individual taxpayer.

Boeing was the leading corporate tax avoider between 1981 and 1984, managing to generate refunds of $285 million on profits of more than $2 billion. Six other companies—Dow Chemical, ITT, Tenneco, Santa Fe Southern Pacific, Pepsico and General Dynamics—each received net refunds of more than $100 million over the four-year period, the report said.

It's now up to Congress to fashion real tax reform to make corporations and the wealthy pay their fair share and, to borrow the President's description, put a stop to this "daily mugging."

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congressional Agenda:

Challenges Loom For Workers This Fall

Congress is back from its recess to begin dealing with many issues that are important to middle class America's pocketbooks, rights and dignity. The Legislative Alert! will follow these issues closely and keep you up to date on the latest developments as legislative action intensifies during the next weeks.

TAXES

At this time the proposal to tax your vital life-support benefits is still on the legislative agenda, despite the months-long campaign to kill this regressive and unfair tax. Also still on the so-called "tax reform" agnda is the elimination of the deduction of state and local taxes. It should be noted that despite Reagan Administration claims to the contrary, millions of taxpayers will be adversely affected if this deduction is eliminated, inasmuch as the latest figures show that 41% of all taxpayers now itemize their returns. The House Ways and Means Committee is scheduled to begin the mark up of this measure on September 23.

TRADE

Sentiment is rapidly growing in Congress for legislation that will roll back the tide of imports that is costing millions of American jobs. The AFL-CIO stresses that any trade bill should be comprehensive and not a quick fix that glosses over long-term problems. Specifically, labor is backing these four major trade bills:

H.R. 3035, S. 1449 -- The Trade Emergency and Export Promotion Act

H.R. 1950, S. 1356 -- The Trade Law Modernization Act

H.R. 1926 -- the Trade Adjustment Assistance Amendments of 1985

(See the 9/2/85 issue of the Alert! for full details.) It is important that any legislation meant to deal with this crisis include the language contained in these bills.

BUDGET

As it now stands, it is unlikely that any appropriation bill will be signed into law before September 30, the end of the fiscal year. As a result, it is probable that all appropriations funding will be carried in a massive continuing appropriations resolution. Tell your Congressmen that you are opposed to any last-minute amendments to this continuing resolution that would further cut back or eliminate programs that benefit working people, the poor or the elderly.

GARCIA

As reported in the last two issues of the Alert! damaging legislation is pending in Congress that would reverse the Supreme Court's Garcia decision that extended to all state and local public employees the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act. Specifically, tell your Senators and Representative that you are opposed to S. 1570, sponsored by Sen. Don Nickles (R-OK), chairman of the Senate Labor Subcommittee, which would overturn the Court's decision. Hearings were held last week.

IMMIGRATION

Two specific bills dealing with the thorny problem of illegal immigration will get a great deal of attention. S. 1200 sponsored by Sen. Alan Simpson (R-WY), falls short in three out of four areas deemed necessary by the AFL-CIO for effective and fair immigraton reform. Only its sanctions provision is considered acceptable. The other measure, H.R. 3080 sponsored by Rep. Peter Rodino (D-NJ), Chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, goes further in meeting these basic criteria but needs to be improved in some important areas.

SOUTH AFRICA

Bipartisan efforts to stop a filibuster of H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985, failed in the Senate. Differing versions of the bill had been passed by both houses of Congress and a compromise version had been approved in conference and passed by the House. Only final Senate approval was needed to send the bill to the President. Though not as far-reaching as they should be, the sanctions contained in this bill would send a clear signal that the United States will no longer tolerate the racist and oppressive policies and practices of the South African government. Attempts may be made to attach the language of this bill to a continuing appropriations measure or to the debt-ceiling bill, which has to be passed in the next few weeks.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Congress will be continuing its work on H.R. 700 and S. 431, which would reverse the Supreme Court's infamous Grove City decision which gutted the provisions of Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, and undermined 20 years of federal civil rights law. Tell your Members of Congress that you support H.R. 700 and S. 431, which would reverse the Grove City decision.

AT the same time inform them that you are opposed to S. 272, which is much narrower in scope and does not reestablish the broad civil rights protections which existed prior to the Supreme Court action. If the Grove City decision is not overturned, thousands of women, disabled, aged and minority persons will find themselves without remedy in the face of discriminatory practices.

PLANT CLOSINGS AND DOUBLE BREASTING

The AFL-CIO will also be continuing its efforts to get H.R. 281 and H.R. 1616 passed by the full House of Representatives. H.R. 281 would restrict the insidious practice of double-breasting, while H.R. 1616 would among other things require employers to give 90 days' notice before closing a plant or making permanent layoffs. Urge your Representative to cosponsor these crucial worker-protection measures.

Now Is The Time

For Your Representative To Stand Up -- And Sign Up -- Against The Taxation Of Life-Support Benefits

The writing of a new tax law is about to begin. Despite a massive flow of mail and many polls showing that Americans are opposed to any taxation of employee benefits, the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee has before it a proposal to tax these vital benefits.

Now is the time that a strong signal must be sent to the tax-writing committee that these benefits not be taxed.

There is one way to send that signal: A bipartisan "Sense of the House" resolution is being circulated for signatures among Members of the House of Representatives. Members who sign that resolution are thereby declaring their opposition to such a tax and telling the tax committee that the final tax bill must not include such a tax.

The more Members who sign the resolution, the more emphatic is the signal to the tax-writing committee. Your Member's name on this resolution is critically important.

Virtually every strata of America is in full opposition to this tax--senior citizens, business, consumers and working people. The only support comes from the tax-raisers who drafted the proposal.

Urge Your Representative To Co-Sponsor This House Resolution Today!

Have Him Call Or Write You When He Has Signed Onto The Resolution. Members May Put Their Names On This Resolution By Calling Congressman Augustus Hawkins' Office at 225-6808.

Foreign debts erode vitality, labor warns

By James M. Shevis

Mounting debts abroad threaten the country's economic vitality, the AFL-CIO warned as the United States slipped into debtor nation status for the first time since World War I.

"More and more of the nation's income must be used to pay interest and to repay the debt owed to foreigners," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

"Meanwhile, the heavy flood of imports displaces American workers. The longer term costs are shifted to tomorrow, but they must be paid through higher interest rates, inflation, or recession."

Oswald's comments came after the Commerce Dept. announced that the nation's current account in its trading with foreign countries ran $31.81 billion in the red during the first quarter of 1985.

The deficit total was the second largest on record, nearly equaling the $32.5 billion gap in last year's third quarter.

"While the Reagan Administration preaches to the rest of the debtor countries through the International Monetary Fund that those nations must reduce their imports and expand their exports, it rejects that same prescription for the United States," Oswald said.

Imbalance grows

"As the trade deficit mounts to $150 billion in 1985, the Administration rejects any meaningful actions to reduce that deficit," he said, calling this posture the major contributory factor "pushing the country into its debtor status."

The Commerce Dept. report on the nation's balance of payments, or current account, showed that foreign investors—governments, industries and individuals—increased their holdings in the United States by $39.5 billion in the first half of this year and by $25.8 billion in the second quarter alone.

The U.S. balance of payments deficit last year was $101.5 billion. For the first half of 1985 it is already at $62.1 billion.

Other government reports indicated the economy is at no better than a standstill.

- Retail sales rose 1.9 percent in August, the Commerce Dept. said, but the gain was heavily influenced by cut-rate auto financing programs.
- The Federal Reserve Board reported that industrial production rose a skimpy three-tenths of 1 percent last month.
- Along with the disappointing sales and output figures, the government reported a reduction in corporate capital spending plans. The Commerce Dept. said U.S. businesses plan to scale back spending for new plant and equipment for the rest of this year to an increase of only 5.8 percent, down

Kirkland spurs action to combat trade crisis

Strike interlude

While strikers fiddled, negotiators hammered out an agreement between the Musicians and Kennedy Center in the nation's capital, ending a 10-hour walkout. At issue was guaranteed employment for 61 tenured orchestra members. The accord was reached after a marathon bargaining session, and the intervention of Theatrical Stage Employees and Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees. The impromptu outdoor concert featured pickets in formal dress performing Haydn String Quartet.

Hits Reagan's 'indifference' to import tide

By Gene Zack

"Plant closings, bankruptcies, farm foreclosures and recessionary unemployment levels" are the bitter harvest America is reaping because of the Reagan Administration's "studied indifference" to the rising tide of imports and the decline of American exports, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told Congress.

Testifying before a House Ways & Means subcommittee in support of emergency trade legislation, Kirkland decried the "sharp deterioration" in the country's international economic position, declaring that it has had "a profound and negative impact on scores of domestic industries and millions of American workers."

The "realities of international commerce" are well known to "the Maine shoemaker, the Ohio machinist, the Kansas farmer, and even the so-called high tech worker in Silicon Valley," he said.

Recognition of problem

Congressional recognition of the dimensions of the problem, which is driving America's trade deficit to a record $150 billion level this year and has made the United States a debtor nation for the first time since 1914, "stands in sharp contrast to what can only be viewed as studied indifference on the part of the Administration," Kirkland told the subcommittee.

Kirkland said the proposed Trade Emergency & Export Promotion Act could form the "foundation of a new national policy that will begin to reverse America's precipitous decline in international trade."

The measure was introduced in the House by Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) and Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.).

The legislation, which has 88 bipartisan cosponsors in the House, would restrict injurious imports and seek equitable access to foreign markets for U.S.-made goods.

Kirkland rejected Administration claims that legislation to defend and promote U.S. industrial production would "trigger a worldwide economic collapse," asserting that in a world where trade and investment

Senate flip-flops, votes new 'bracero' scheme

In a backsliding flip-flop, the Senate voted 51-44 to open the nation's borders to a flood tide of foreign workers to pick, process and pack perishable agricultural products, after having defeated the proposal only a few days earlier.

The AFL-CIO branded the action a scheme for a "new bracero program" which would undercut the government's role in "protecting job opportunities for American workers and decent job standards for foreign workers."

In a letter to all Senators prior to the vote, Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that the amendment would undo present provisions of law which permit the temporary importation of so-called guestworkers "only if unemployed persons capable of performing the needed labor cannot be found in this country."

The amendment to pending immigration legislation was introduced by Sen. Pete Wilson (R-Calif.) with the backing of a powerful West Coast agricultural lobby. It would permit up to 350,000 aliens to cross the border at any one time to work in fields and packing facilities.

Unregulated flow

Denison warned that it would lead to "an essentially unregulated flow of aliens" who could "come to this country on their own and hunt seasonal agricultural work."

The Senate action also came under attack from Rep. Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and chief sponsor of immigration legislation pending in the House. Declaring that he was "deeply disappointed" by adoption of the Wilson amendment, Rodino added:

"I continue to be adamantly opposed to any massive importation of foreign agricultural labor which can seriously jeopardize the job opportunities as well as the wages and working conditions of American farm workers."

Sen. Howard Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) said there was no evidence that corporate farmers have tried to hire American workers. "What kind of Senate are we that we not only let imports take American jobs, but let foreign workers come in?" he asked.

Sen. Paul Simon (D-Ill.) pointing to last year's 13.5 percent level in agricultural sector unemployment, challenged what he said was a "virtually open-ended" program to admit a massive number of foreign workers. Simon won Senate agreement to phase the program out at the end of three years.

The AFL-CIO has set four criteria which

Urban wage gains slacken, barely keep pace with COL

The average annual pay of workers in metropolitan areas edged up only 4.7 percent in 1984, barely keeping ahead of the increase in the cost of living.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that this was the third consecutive year of a slowdown in the rate of growth in wages. In 1981, before the full impact of the Reagan recession made itself felt, wage gains averaged 9.1 percent. They slipped to 6.8 percent in 1982 and 5 percent in 1983.

BLS said the average annual wage in all metropolitan areas inched upward to $19,028 last year, while for the nation as a whole the average wage was $18,350.

Overall, workers in "right-to-work" states stayed at the lower end of the pay scale. Workers in more unionized states fared better.

Trailing far behind the national figures were Jacksonville, N.C., with an average wage of $11,769; McAllen-Edinburg-Mission, Tex., with $12,389, and Naples, Fla., with $12,951—all open shop states.

Earlier this year, BLS reported that workers represented by unions earned on the average $5,200 a year more than non-union workers.

The highest average annual pay of $27,994 was recorded in Anchorage, Alaska, a high cost-of-living area. It was followed by Flint, Mich., where generally high wages in auto manufacturing and other

Nabisco pact yields $1.42, sets pattern

San Diego—A two-year agreement, covering 9,000 workers at Nabisco Brands and setting a pattern for the biscuit and cracker sector of the baking industry, was hammered out by the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers.

The negotiations with Nabisco, the largest single employer under contract with the BCT, were the first since the company's merger with R. J. Reynolds Industries earlier this year.

The union said the total package of benefits, negotiated by representatives from 13 BCT locals, is worth $1.42 an hour for the production and maintenance workers covered by the agreement.

Workers will receive wage increases of 50 cents an hour, in three steps, during the first year of the contract, plus a $1,000 lump-sum payment, equal to 50 cents per hour, effective Sept. 1, 1986.

The pact also calls for Nabisco to increase its pension contribution by $25 a month in each of the two years of the contract, bringing the pension level to $650 a month by March 1987.

The union won company agreement to pay the entire cost of health benefits, with major medical coverage subject to deductibles of $200 per individual and $300 per family, effective this November.

The BCT also negotiated an increased night premium, an improved funeral-leave clause, and new starting and stepping-up procedures.

The contract, which was overwhelmingly ratified by members at the 13 Nabisco bakeries involved, was negotiated by a team headed by BCT Vice President Patrick D'Angelo and International Rep. Robert Oakley.

Dotson's bugaboo

Facing an embarrassing court challenge, National Labor Relations Board Chairman Donald L. Dotson has decided that a union printing "bug" on a collective bargaining contract has more than just "symbolic value."

With Dotson's turnaround, the NLRB dismissed an unfair labor practice complaint against a Kansas City local of the Electrical Workers.

Last May, the board held that IBEW Local 1464 committed an unfair labor practice in refusing to sign a 1980 contract with Kansas City Power & Light Co. that lacked a union label.

The board's 2-1 ruling rubberstamped an opinion by NLRB General Counsel Rosemary Collyer. But it was in jeopardy of being overturned in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

The company filed the complaint even though it had pledged that contracts with the IBEW would carry a union bug.

In switching his vote, Dotson joined member Patricia Diaz Dennis in upholding an administrative law judge's ruling that recommended the power company's complaint be thrown out.

"No matter how trivial the (NLRB) general counsel and the employer view the bug, the union should not be forced to forfeit what it secured during negotiations," ALJ Jay Pollack wrote.

Former NLRB member Robert P. Hunter, who left the agency Aug. 27, stood by his earlier decision. He insisted that the union violated the law by conditioning its signing of the agreement on the inclusion of the union bug on the contract.

Oregon unions beat back sales tax for seventh time

Salem, Ore.—Oregon voters resoundingly defeated a proposed 5-percent sales tax, a levy strongly opposed by the Oregon AFL-CIO's 30th annual convention at North Bend/Coos Bay.

Only 21 percent of the voters in the Sept. 17 special election supported the tax. It marked the seventh time since 1933 that Oregonians have voted against a sales tax. The state labor federation warned that the measure would unfairly burden the poor.

Delegates to the four-day convention adopted resolutions on a number of other issues vital to workers, elected officers, and heard from a slate of speakers.

President Irvin H. Fletcher and Sec.-Treas. Robert C. Baugh were re-elected to their third two-year terms without opposition. Both are members of the Teachers.

Gerald Greer of the Machinists was elected first vice president to succeed Earl Kirkland, who had held the post 18 years and did not seek re-election.

Arlene Collins of the State, County & Municipal Employees was elected second vice president to succeed Artha Adair of the Communications Workers, who also did not seek re-election.

Eleven members of the executive board were re-elected, and eight new board members were elected.

Nellie Fox retiring

The federation did not elect a director of political education and legislation. That position, held by Nellie Fox, who is retiring after 10 years in the job, has been made an appointive one, and will be filled later this year.

Neil Goldschmidt, former Portland mayor and Secretary of Transportation during the Carter Administration, described Fox as a modern-day pioneer of women's rights, and praised her for her efforts to achieve them.

Besides the sales tax proposal, delegates passed measures calling for labor law reform, prohibition of raw log exports and restrictions on the importation of Canadian lumber, and a number of other domestic matters.

They also went on record favoring advance notice on plant closings, prohibition of tax incentives for companies to shift production abroad, and support for Idaho unions in their fight against "right-to-work" proposals.

Other measures called for enactment of a national industrial policy, improvements in the state's workers' compensation and unemployment insurance programs, and establishment of centers for occupational disease research and the dissemination of toxic exposure information.

Delegates also reiterated their support for boycotts against Coors beer and Louisiana-Pacific wood products and adopted resolutions advocating labor history studies in public schools and permitting state employees to serve in the legislature.

On the international front, the convention condemned South Africa's apartheid racial practices.

Regional workshop explores international labor issues

New York—Trade union leaders from a four-state area participated in the first of four scheduled regional workshops exploring international issues affecting labor.

Cosponsored by the AFL-CIO's Departments of International Affairs and Organization & Field Services and the New York State AFL-CIO, the workshop centered on the federation's positions on some of the world's trouble spots—particularly South Africa and Central America, where workers are struggling to attain basic human rights.

The nearly 100 delegates included state and local labor officials from New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts.

International labor representatives attending the sessions were Phiroshaw Camay, general secretary of the Council of Unions of South Africa; Deputy Gen. Sec. Cristobal Aleman of the Union Communal Salvadorena, El Salvador; Mariano Gonzalez, president of the Confederacion de Trabajadores Hondurenos, Honduras; and Jose Espinoza, political affairs secretary of the Confederacion de Unificacion Sindical, Nicaragua.

International Affairs Director Irving Brown presented an overall perspective of labor's views on international developments directly involving workers.

Executive Director Patrick O'Farrell of the African-American Labor Center made a presentation on the struggle of black workers in racist South Africa and the emergence of the black trade union movement.

Executive Director William C. Doherty, Jr. of the American Institute for Free Labor Development discussed the situation in Nicaragua, Honduras and El Salvador, and showed a film clip on a May 1 worker demonstration in Managua broken up by police.

Service Employees President John Sweeney, a member of the AFL-CIO's Standing Committee on International Affairs, outlined the federation's criteria in formulating its international policy.

The second of the four workshops is being held this weekend in Detroit. The others will be in Dallas, Oct. 18-19, and in Anaheim, Calif., Oct. 26.

President Edward J. Cleary of the New York State AFL-CIO addresses regional workshop on international affairs.

CWA asks equal access fees for phone carriers

The Federal Communications Commission should require equality in access charges for all long-distance telephone carriers because failure to do so would be "discriminatory," the Communications Workers told a Senate subcommittee.

CWA Vice President James E. Levine, head of the AT&T national bargaining unit, stressed that long-distance telephone companies other than AT&T are seeking further shelter "from the rigors of open competition in the marketplace."

Levine called on the FCC and the subcommittee to question AT&T's long-distance competitors about their apparently contradictory claims concerning service.

The CWA vice president pointed out that under the 1982 divestiture decision, AT&T's non-union competitors were given equal access to exchange networks and most equipment conversions will be completed by September 1986. In the interim, the non-union carriers have received various discounts on network access charges, originally paying no access fees. The FCC then granted these carriers a 65 percent discount, later reducing it to 55 percent.

Now, Levine noted, AT&T's competitors want to retain that discount, claiming that they will not be able to deliver the same quality of service offered by AT&T. At the same time, these carriers are telling the public "in print and broadcast advertising that their circuit quality and ease of dialing will be exactly the same as AT&T's."

Four of AT&T's major competitors filed a petition with the FCC in June requesting expedited rulemaking to grant them continued discounts on access charges. "There is no justification for the discount," Levine told the subcommittee.

Levine said that AT&T's recent announcement that it would lay off 24,000 workers from its Information Systems Division was related to the increased importation of telecommunications equipment, which has risen from 2 percent in 1982 to 14 percent in 1984.

He urged Congress to adopt effective trade policy legislation to bring fairness to the nation's marketplace.

State cracks down on wage law chiselers

Olympia, Wash.—The State Dept. of Labor & Industries is starting to crack down on wage-chiseling contractors who violate Washington's prevailing pay law on state-funded construction projects.

For the first time in the 12-year history of the state's "Little Davis-Bacon Act," a contractor has been barred from bidding on state projects for violating the law.

Pride Drywall of Olympia was assessed $5,020 for shorting an apprentice painter in wages and benefits. A state administrative law judge who made the finding recommended debarment until the firm paid the full wages and benefits.

"We want companies to realize we're serious about enforcing the law," Assistant Director Don Anderson of the Dept. of Labor & Industries said. "Those who cheat get an unfair competitive advantage over honest firms and take advantage of the worker, too."

Kirkland spurs support for measures to counter job-destroying imports

is almost universally managed by governments seeking maximum national advantage, "U.S. reliance on free trade theory as the foundation for public policy is not simply irrelevant, but harmful."

The trade crisis, Kirkland said, "is now striking at every point on the industrial spectrum, from labor-intensive to capital-intensive industries, high tech and low tech, from the oldest to the newest industries. No sector is immune."

The root causes of the trade deficit, he said, are the "unfair trade practices" of foreign governments, including non-tariff barriers, informal quotas, stringent inspection requirements, discriminatory standards, export subsidies and incentives, and other actions which make it possible to flood the U.S. market with foreign-made goods while denying American-made goods access to overseas markets.

Rejecting the claim that the problem can be traced to low productivity in American industry, Kirkland praised U.S. workers as "the most productive in the world." They are, he said, "better educated and have a deep sense of pride in the quality of their work."

The massive trade imbalance, he told the subcommittee, has been fueled to a large extent by the overvalued U.S. dollar, which has appreciated more than 60 percent against other currencies since 1980. This currency misalignment has "imposed severe costs on American industry and workers," Kirkland said.

"Should a $10-an-hour production worker take a pay cut to $4 an hour in order to restore his product's international competitiveness? Can any company cut costs and improve productivity as rapidly as the dollar has appreciated?" he asked.

"Continued pressure for Third World wages" in the United States, Kirkland warned, "will only result in a Third World economy" in this country.

Clayton Yeutter, the U.S. trade representative, told the subcommittee that the Rostenkowski-Gephardt bill and other trade legislation pending in Congress, would "punish the most efficient abroad and reward the less efficient in this country." He insisted that massive foreign retaliation would result if America sought to turn the situation around.

Kirkland disagreed sharply. Britain, he said, limits the imports of Japanese automobiles to 12 percent of the market, France to 3 percent, and Italy has a ceiling of only 2,000 Japanese-made cars per year.

There is no evidence, he said, that Japan has "retaliated against these countries" because of these restrictions.

Countermeasures hailed

He praised the bill's provision directing the Treasury Secretary to control harmful fluctuations in the monetary exchange rate, and its requirement that countries with excessive trade surpluses either increase U.S. imports or cut back their exports to this country or face a 25 percent tariff surcharge on goods bound for the American marketplace.

However, in order to "pry open the markets of these countries," Kirkland said, the bill should be amended to take away from the President the authority to determine whether unfair trade practices abroad are the cause of these excessive surpluses.

A negative determination by the President would prevent the imposition of any sanctions. Citing the Administration's "track record" in relation to predatory foreign trade practices, he questioned whether there would ever be any finding that a given country is trading unfairly.

In addition to the Rostenkowski-Gephardt bill, Kirkland called for passage of other pending trade measures to deal with the crisis, including legislation to "tighten and streamline" laws to assist workers and industries injured by imports, and individual bills designed to aid the textile, apparel, telecommunications and shoe industries.

Lockout victims win jobless pay in Pennsylvania

Harrisburg, Pa.—Idled workers at two Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. plants in Pennsylvania are entitled to unemployment compensation benefits, the state's Bureau of Employment Security ruled.

The Steelworkers from W-P's Monessen and Allenport Works join nearly 4,300 USWA members in Ohio who earlier were declared eligible for jobless benefits. Ohio's employment services agency found that Wheeling-Pittsburgh had locked out its workforce when it canceled the USWA contract and tried to impose severe wage cuts. The union is still awaiting action on unemployment claims from West Virginia.

The Pennsylvania decision allows nearly 500 USWA members to receive weekly benefits of up to $224. Another 2,000 steel workers laid off by W-P before the nine week-old work stoppage began are already receiving jobless pay.

The steelmaker had sought a preliminary injunction to stop Pennsylvania, Ohio and West Virginia from processing claims of the 8,600 workers who have been off the job since July 21. That petition was denied by U.S. District Judge Glenn E. Mencer on Aug. 29.

USWA negotiators met with W-P representatives Sept. 10 for a one-day session at the behest of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, but no further talks have been scheduled.

James Stephens nominated for vacant Labor Board seat

James M. Stephens has been nominated a member of the National Labor Relations Board to succeed Robert P. Hunter, who resigned in August.

Stephens, 39, a Republican, had served as labor counsel to the Senate Committee on Labor & Human Resources since 1981. His nomination to the NLRB, which requires Senate confirmation, is for a five-year term.

AFL-CIO Associate Counsel David Silberman said that the federation has had limited dealings with Stephens and will examine his record before commenting on his qualifications.

If confirmed, Stephens would be the second Republican on the five-member board. Chairman Donald L. Dotson is the other. There are two Democrats, Marshall Babson and Patricia Diaz Dennis, and one independent, Wilford Johansen.

In announcing Stephens's appointment, President Reagan also nominated Roger D. Semerad as Assistant Secretary of Labor for employment and training; Jeffrey I. Zuckerman as general counsel of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and Ford B. Ford as a member of the Federal Mine Safety & Health Review Commission.

Semerad, who is executive vice president of the Brookings Institution, has a background in labor issues, vocational education, manpower and refugee aid, and manpower training.

Zuckerman, EEOC's chief of staff since 1984, would succeed David L. Slate, who left the agency. Zuckerman's nomination to a four-year term requires Senate confirmation as does Semerad's appointment.

Ford, who has been Under Secretary of Labor since 1983, temporarily served as acting Secretary of Labor while former Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan was on a leave of absence prior to his resignation.

Reagan said he intends to designate Ford as chairman of the five-member review commission.

Article XX sanctions placed on hospital workers' union

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has notified all affiliates that the National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees has been found to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Vice Presidents Lynn R. Williams and Kenneth T. Blaylock.

The finding, Kirkland said, follows from decisions of the impartial umpire and the Article XX Appeals Committee that the Hospital & Health Care Employees' "ongoing participation in representation proceedings concerning the Mental Health and Mental Retardation Institutions, State of Ohio, violates Article XX, and from NUHHCE's refusal to withdraw from those proceedings."

In his notification to affiliates, Kirkland said the union, effective Sept. 16, 1985, will be subject to the following provisions of Section 15 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Section 16;

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be in violation of this article;

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution;

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

In addition to the Hospital & Health Care Employees, two other affiliates remain in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision and subject to Article XX sanctions: the International Typographical Union and the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians.

Shoe worker retraining called 'hoax'

The Reagan Administration, in an action organized labor branded "a cruel hoax," announced a $5 million job retraining program to aid 2,300 shoe workers facing permanent layoffs because of imports.

The plan made public by Labor Sec. William E. Brock was seen as an effort by the Administration to soften the blow of President Reagan's refusal last month to grant any import relief for the shoe industry.

Reagan ignored a unanimous finding by the International Trade Commission that the domestic footwear industry had been seriously injured by imports and that quotas were necessary to prevent further damage.

Since 1968, mounting imports of shoes have wiped out 120,000 U.S. jobs and forced the closing of 500 American shoe factories. Imports now account for 77 percent of U.S. retail shoe sales.

The Administrations program would provide an average of less than $2,200 a year for those workers expected to be laid off in the next 18 months because of unrestrained foreign competition.

"Even if the fund was adequate, which it is not, most shoe plants are located in areas with high unemployment and few jobs," Food & Commercial Workers Vice President Sam Delfino said. "In addition, many of the workers are older and are unlikely to be hired by new employers even if the jobs exist."

Action needed

Calling the scheme a "cruel hoax," Delfino said "training is no substitute for a job, and an underfunded training program is no substitute for real action to protect American shoe worker jobs from uncontrolled foreign imports."

Arthur Gundersheim, assistant to the president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, said previous job training for shoe workers has been ineffective because of the shortage of jobs in shoe-producing areas.

Since 1979, he said, an estimated 22,000 shoe workers have been eligible for help under the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act, but fewer than 500 have completed training, and less than 250 have been able to obtain new jobs.

"These programs only work when there are real jobs available," Gundersheim said.

The AFL-CIO pointed out that the Administration "has cut back substantially on all training and trade-impact funds, and this isn't going to accomplish very much; $5 million doesn't go very far."

Brock said the program would be targeted at the 16 states that employ most of the nation's 110,000 remaining shoe workers. He called on governors of shoe-producing states to join in setting up retraining programs.

The program will concentrate on Missouri, with 15,200 shoe workers; Maine, 14,400; Tennessee, 10,500; Pennsylvania, 10,300; Massachusetts, 7,300; New York, 6,900, and New Hampshire, 6,400.

The Administration said the $5 million is in addition to $2.8 million spent in the last 20 months to aid 3,000 shoe workers left jobless because of the torrent of imports. from low-wage countries.

Scott Hoyman retires, ACTWU names Sallee

Scott M. Hoyman has retired as executive vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers and director of the union's textile division. The ACTWU executive board named Charles Sallee to replace him.

Sallee, who was an ACTWU vice president and director of its midwest region, had been assistant director of the textile division.

Rubber Workers hail founders, mark union's 50th anniversary

Akron—Rubber Workers marked the union's 50th anniversary with a special celebration and a noon march through city streets to the old Portage Hotel, site of the union's founding convention.

Some 600 URW members and retirees paraded through the downtown area, stopping in front of the now-closed hotel for a brief ceremony and a chorus of "Solidarity Forever," before continuing past URW headquarters.

Three of the 49 original delegates to the founding convention on Sept. 12, 1935, were honored at the morning session, as speakers recalled the union's past and planned for its future.

Founding members John House and Walter Kriebel of Akron and E.L. Gray of Albertville, Ala., took part in the event. Only five of the 49 original delegates are living.

URW President Milan Stone praised the union's founders for their courage "in going to that convention in the first place and laying their jobs on the line." Stone said all URW members could take great pride in their union as "one of the most democratic institutions in the world."

House recalled that "back in those days, we knew what we wanted, had the determination to have it, got together and did it."

Mine Workers President Richard L. Trumka applauded that spirit and told the retired members their "efforts and willingness to struggle improved the lives of hundreds of thousands of workers" in the country.

Other speakers included Chemical Workers President Frank D. Martino, Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel and URW President emeritus Peter Bommarito.

Senate shifts on farm labor, votes new 'bracero' scheme

it said any immigration reform legislation must meet: workable employer sanctions, protection against discrimination, generous amnesty for those who entered the country illegally but have now put down their roots, and no weakening of existing programs dealing with temporary foreign workers. The Senate version of the bill, Denison said, measures up only on the issue of employer sanctions.

As the Senate limped toward final passage of the immigration measure, there were these other developments on Capitol Hill:

● The Senate Finance Committee voted to raise the federal debt ceiling to $2.079 trillion—more than twice the limit when President Reagan took office in 1981. The higher borrowing capacity is needed to deal with the skyrocketing budget deficits racked up by the Administration.

● At the same time, the committee continued wrestling with a deficit-reduction package, voting a one-third hike in monthly Medicare premiums for the elderly effective in 1988, raising them from the present $15.50 to $20.80, and approved a one-year freeze on Medicare payments to physicians who refuse to follow Medicare fee schedules. The panel also voted to let the federal revenue-sharing program expire next year.

● Senate and House leaders conceded there was little chance for action this year on tax reform legislation. Although Speaker Thomas P. (Tip) O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) said he expected the House to pass a tax bill before adjourning around Thanksgiving, Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-(Kan.) said it was highly unlikely the Senate would have time to act before next year.

● Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Labor Committee, launched a concerted drive for passage of a sense-of-the-House resolution opposing taxes on employee benefits. The bipartisan drive, which has already garnered 100 cosponsors, is aimed at blocking Reagan Administration efforts to tax health insurance, unemployment insurance, workers' compensation and black-lung benefits.

● The Senate Finance Committee unanimously approved a bill aimed at forcing Japan and other countries to open their markets to American-made telecommunications equipment, or else face the prospect of being barred from sending their equipment into the United States.

● The House Labor Committee approved a measure to raise from $2.60 to $8.50 the premium single-employer pension plans pay to the government-run Pension Benefit Guarantee Corp. The bill also reduces from 90 to 60 days the period for notifying unions and workers of proposed plan terminations.

● The Senate voted to create a new program to cope with the kind of toxic chemical disaster that killed more than 2,000 people last year in Bhophal, India. It would require the Environmental Protection Agency to identify extremely hazardous substances, and mandate industry to let states and communities know of the presence of such chemicals on their premises so that contingency planning could be undertaken to protect against acute hazards.

● A House Labor subcommittee approved a bill outlawing the use of polygraphs in private sector employment. The bill would bar employers from using so-called lie detectors in pre-employment screening, or to discharge or discipline employees. It provides a $10,000 fine for violators, and permits employees and prospective employees to sue for reinstatement, promotion, back wages and liquidated damages.

Dues increased

Industrial Workers vote organizing funds

Pittsburgh—A major organizing effort supported by a special fund was approved by the 25th convention of the Allied Industrial Workers.

The 360 delegates and alternates voted to increase monthly dues by 50 cents, with half that amount going to the new special organizing fund. The increase raises the minimum dues for AIW members to $11.50 a month.

As part of the organizing program, the convention called for establishment of volunteer organizing committees, with representation from all locals, to help develop and define organizing targets, make contacts and provide other assistance for organizing staff.

AIW President Dominick D'Ambrosio called the volunteer committees the key to the success of the organizing program.

"Members are the best ambassadors of unionism and do a lot better job on a neighbor, a friend or a family member than any paid organizer," D'Ambrosio observed.

In his keynote address to the delegates, D'Ambrosio said he was optimistic about the AIW's future despite the loss of 112 locals since 1979 due to plant closings and the major challenges confronting the union.

Greater strength

"I see more dedication and greater enthusiasm for our union than ever before," he said.

The convention celebrated the 50th anniversary of the union's founding on Aug. 26, 1935, as the United Automobile Workers. The original charter, as granted by the AFL, was unveiled on stage to climax a stirring labor history program on the convention's opening day.

Reminding the delegates that the union's birth came just eight weeks after President Roosevelt signed the Wagner Act into law, D'Ambrosio said this underscores the importance of political action to the progress of the AIW and the labor movement. The convention approved a resolution that would strengthen the AIW's "People-to-People" program, which was developed during the Mondale campaign last year and is patterned after the AFL-CIO's "One-on-One" program.

Job drain

In an address to the delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue focused on the devastation of American jobs being wrought by the flood of imported goods from low-wage countries. Donohue noted that President Reagan lately has been using the phrase "fair trade" as well as "free trade." He saw this as a sign that Reagan is growing aware that "the American people are fed up" with his trade policy that gives foreign goods unrestrained access to the American market but does not insist on the same treatment for U.S. exports.

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams also addressed the delegates and pointed to the common origins of the USWA and the AIW in the Depression era. And he cited the common challenges they face today. Despite the dire predictions of its enemies, Williams said, the labor movement "is not diminished." The same "deep-seated fervor and hunger for industrial democracy" can still be found in the hearts of workers, he declared.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, who heads the Coalition of Labor Union Women, observed that while women workers have come a long way, "they still have a long way to go." She noted that women now make up about a third of all union members, but they total only 7 million with 40 million remaining to be organized.'

All affected

So-called women's issues in the workplace, she said, really affect all workers. Quality child care and worksites safe from chemicals that could damage the unborn "benefit both men and women," she stressed.

Rep. Charles Hayes (D-Ill.), a former vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers, noted that Congress is now considering legislation to ease the effects of plant closings on workers and their communities. He said that while there is little hope that a law will pass this session, "we have to at least try."

In major actions affecting the union, the delegates voted to strengthen its finances by diverting $1 of the current per capita payment from the strike fund to the operating budget, with 60 cents going to the regional offices and 40 cents to the international union. The payment will revert to the strike fund when that fund falls below $5 million and will again go into operating funds when the strike fund balance tops $5.5 million.

Among major resolutions adopted by the delegates were measures supporting:

● Effective programs to help contain the soaring costs of health care.

● Enactment of the Equal Rights Amendment and pay equity legislation to overcome wage discrimination against women and minorities.

● Coalitions linking labor and citizen groups on issues of common concern, including health care costs, occupational safety and health, the environment and women's rights.

● Improved school programs to inform young people about labor and its contributions to society, with particular support for Frontlash, the AFL-CIO's youth arm.

● The AFL-CIO call for strong U.S. sanctions against South Africa to bring pressure for the abolition of that country's racist system of apartheid.

Foreign debts eroding U.S. economic vitality

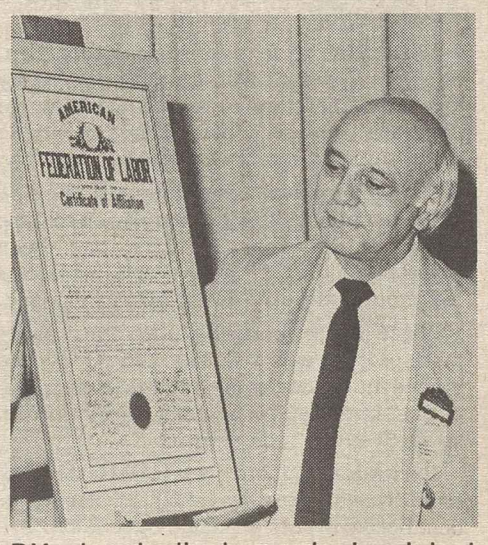
from an earlier estimated increase of 6.2 percent.



● The Fed reported that the operating rate of the nation's mines, factories and utilities was up one-tenth of 1 percent to 80.5 percent of capacity in August. The increase and a similar one-tenth of 1 percent rise in March have been the only increases this year.

There was better news from the Commerce Dept. on the housing industry. New starts rose 6.2 percent in August after declining 3.2 percent in July.

Similarly, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported prices at the wholesale level were favorable, declining three-tenths of 1 percent last month.

AIW convention delegates gather around "birthday cake" display commemorating union's 50th anniversary.

At right, President D'Ambrosio displays union's original charter as United Automobile Workers.

Victims of imports plead for overdue remedies

Clothing and garment workers from all parts of the country appealed to Congress for emergency legislation to rescue the textile and apparel industries from threatened destruction by a growing torrent of imports from other countries.

Some 46,000 American textile and needle trades jobs were wiped out by the import tide in 1984 and 66,000 additional jobs have been lost so far this year, the Congressional Textile Caucus estimates.

''If you let imports destroy the garment industry, where will people like myself find work?'' asked Wing Fong Chin at a recent hearing conducted by the caucus. ''How will we be able to feed our families?''

A member of the Ladies' Garment Workers employed at Futuristic Fashions in New York City, Wing said that except for the garment shops there are almost no places outside Chinatown where a non-English speaking immigrant can find work in New York City.

Other witnesses also cited the importance of the garment industry as a source of livelihoods for hundreds of thousands of immigrants since the mid-19th century. Anne Marazita, a sewing machine operator at Nancy Fashions in New Rochelle, N.Y., who has worked in the industry for 52 years, said it has been an ideal place for non-English speaking immigrants.

''It is a sad comment today,'' she said, ''that workers who only want to work cannot find this because our government allows countries who pay sub-human wages to dump their goods on our shores.''

Members of ILGWU and ACTWU tell Congressional Textile Caucus of devastating impact of imports on jobs in the apparel industry. They are Beverly Reed, Nilda Quintanilla, Anne Marazita, Elli Kuhns and Wing Fong Chin.

Marazita, who is president of the ILGWU's Lower Hudson District Council, said Westchester County, N.Y., once had 150 garment factories employing 5,000 workers. But thousands of jobs have disappeared in recent years as imports poured in from Taiwan, Bangladesh, India and other low-wage countries.

Needle trades jobs in other regions are suffering a similar fate.

Beverly Reed, a member of ILGWU Local 130 in Decatur, Ill., said the workers at the Decatur shop of R&M Kaufman Garment Co. granted a number of contract concessions to their employer, including a wage cutback to $4.60 and hour. But under the pressure of foreign competition, layoffs came anyway.

She said her company told the workers it ''could not compete with cheap imports and low foreign wages'' without help from the government. Garment shops throughout Illinois have been closing down since the 1970s, Reed noted.

''Imports have taken our jobs and our health,'' she said. ''They have taken our homes and our pride. Worst of all, they have taken away our futures and our dreams.''

The Congressional Textile Caucus heard similar reports from Elli Kuhns of the Clothing & Textile Workers, a former worker at the Arrow shirt plant in Elysburg, Pa., and Nilda Quintanilla, ACTWU chief steward at a Levi Strauss plant in McAllen, Tex.

Rep. Ed Jenkins (D-Ga.), caucus chairman, said the impact on American textile and apparel jobs is only part of the import problem.

''We hope to send the nation a clear signal that this domestic industry's losses cannot be self-contained,'' he said. ''Every American citizen will be affected.''

The caucus is pressing for enactment of the Textile & Apparel Trade Enforcement Act of 1985, which already has some 300 cosponsors in the House and 54 in the Senate. It would bring textile and garment imports down from the present penetration level of 50 percent of the American market to 38 percent. Imports from Far Eastern countries have grown about 19 percent a year instead of the 6 percent standard set by the Multifiber Agreement, which is up for renewal next year. They would be allowed to grow by 1 percent a year following the rollback to 38 percent.

Unions urge extension of aid under trade adjustment law

Extension of the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act beyond its Sept. 30 termination date is essential to provide some measure of protection to millions of workers suffering layoffs because of imports, labor told a Senate Finance subcommittee.

''At a time when the U.S. trade deficit . . . has reached crisis proportions, an effective trade adjustment assistance program is needed more than ever,'' AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Vincent Trivelli said.

Failure to reauthorize the program would ''be a second jolt to these unfortunate persons who lost their jobs due to U.S. trade policies and will now lose adjustment aid because of U.S. budget policies,'' Trivelli said.

''The commitments made to workers'' in trade adjustment legislation passed in 1962, 1974 and 1979, he said, ''must be honored, and effective assistance in the form of cash benefits, training, job search and relocation allowances be provided.''

Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers warned that, unless congressional action is forthcoming, ''workers will lose faith'' in the government's ability to deal with the nation's problems.

Bitterness growing

''There is building an undercurrent of bitterness and hostility that will not only destroy faith in our general economic policies but undermine our foreign policy through an outgrowth of hatred toward'' other nations, Sheinkman said.

Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan called TAA the only measure ''designed to assist workers, firms and communities to adjust to trade-imposed injury,'' adding:

''We are experiencing a 'trade shock' of mind-boggling size. Some can adjust easily to the shock; others can't. Investors can move their capital from a dying industry to growth industries overnight. Working people who have worked ten or 15 years in a plant have a deep investment in their homes and communities and have to start all over again.

''Their adjustment takes a long time because they have to begin it from within a deep hole. We hope that this proposal will give them a new lease on life and that the deep hole will not become a tomb.''

While the labor witnesses voiced support for legislation introduced by Sen. William V. Roth (R-Del.), they expressed concern about its requirement that workers be enrolled in job training programs before being eligible for benefits.

In many instances, Sheinkman said, displaced workers find no training available in their communities because some states have failed to fund local adult education programs. ''Fundamental to the success of any adjustment program is absolute assurance of income,'' he said.

''Clearly a worker who has lost a job needs income support while engaging in job search activities as well as while undergoing training,'' Trivelli said. ''Tying all assistance to training all but removes the concept of compensation.''

Sheehan pointed out that the linkage of assistance to job training ''assumes that all workers need training,'' when, in fact, many of them need only income maintenance to tide them over until they can make the transition to other employment.

The subcommittee was also urged to retain present provisions of law that continue trade adjustment assistance for 18 months. The Roth bill would reduce the aid period to only three months.

Rail pension tax proposal scored

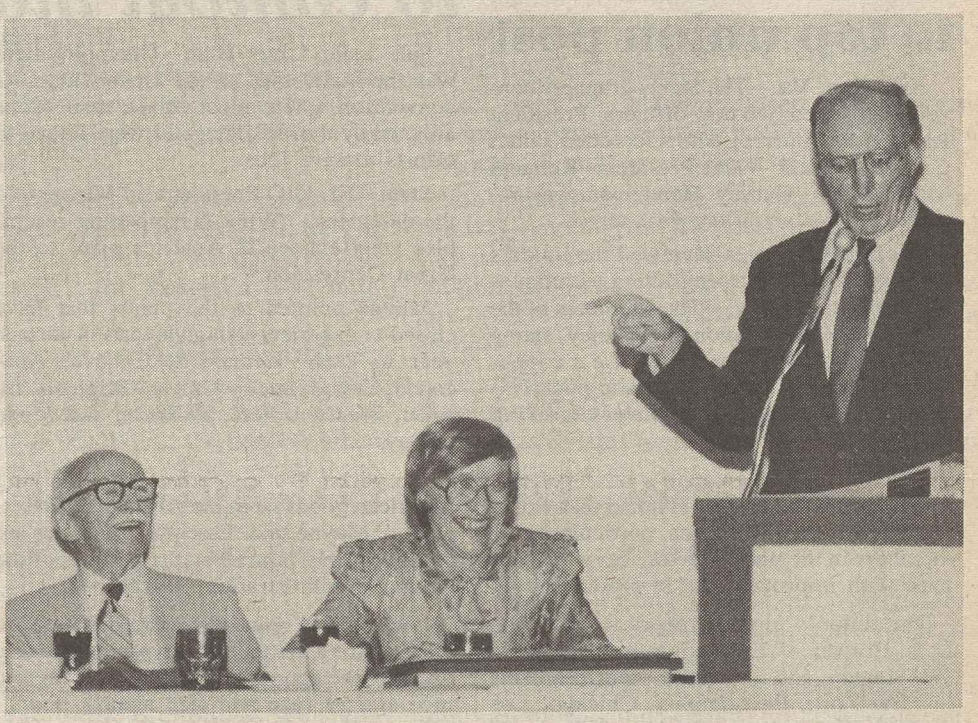
The AFL-CIO registered strong opposition to a scheme to levy higher taxes on railroad retirement benefits, warning it would have a harsh impact on 450,000 retirees, disabled workers and their spouses.

''There is no justification, equity or fairness in imposing . . . .a tax increase on a group of elderly citizens,'' AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said in a letter to members of the Senate Finance Committee.



Under the proposal, Tier I railroad retirement annuities would be treated like private pensions for tax purposes, rather than like social security.

Existing law applies a complex formula to railroad retirement and social security benefits, with only a portion of such income being subject to taxation. The new proposal would scrap this approach for railroad retirees, subjecting their entire annuity to income taxes.

It would take $161 million from the pockets of Railroad Retirement Act beneficiaries over the next three years, Denison, said.

He noted that railroad retirees have already been hard hit by three previous attacks on cost-of-living adjustments to which they were entitled. ''One was delayed, one wiped out entirely and the last one reduced,'' Denison said.

The AFL-CIO also objected to an amendment mandating Medicare and social security coverage for state and local public employees not currently covered by the Social Security Act. Labor is on record in opposition to such mandatory coverage, Denison said, warning that it could have ''a significant impact'' on public employees.

Thomas R. Donahue and new Connecticut AFL-CIO President Betty Tianti with retiring state federation leader John Driscoll.

Tianti succeeds Driscoll at helm of Connecticut Fed

New Haven, Conn.—Betty Tianti has been installed as president of the Connecticut AFL-CIO to succeed John Driscoll, who headed the state federation for 24 years.

Tianti, 56, was elected by acclamation to a two-year term at the State AFL-CIO convention. She had served as the state body's secretary-treasurer and legislative director since 1979. Earlier, she had been state COPE director and president of a Clothing & Textile Workers local in Danielson.

The 600 delegates also elected Barry Williams of the Teachers to a two-year term as secretary-treasurer.

At a dinner honoring Driscoll, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised the retiring 74-year-old state body leader as a ''dedicated, serious and tough trade unionist,'' who transformed ''a collection of disparate local unions into a unified state labor movement.''

Donahue cited Driscoll's long record of service to the union movement, noting that he had been an officer of the CIO or AFL-CIO state bodies for 47 years. He called Driscoll ''the architect and moving spirit of the Connecticut federation to the same extent that Sam Gompers was the architect of the AF of L.''

Donahue also scored the Reagan Administration's foreign trade posture, pointing out that Republican law makers have acknowledged Americans ''are fed up with the foreign trade practices of our so-called partners who have one set of standards for themselves while expecting us to live by another.''

He noted the growing alarm of congressional, academic and corporate leaders over the nation's trade deficit and observed that labor has been calling for fair trade practices for more than 20 years, only to be met with ''the scornful charge of protectionism.''

The delegates set in motion plans to strengthen the federation's legislative, organizing and political activities. The convention established a committee of 500'—union members recruited and designated by the federation's 45 vice presidents and officers to support the State AFL-CIO at hearings, rallies, strikes, meetings, and on picket lines throughout the state. Tianti said the group would become a network for building trade union activities throughout Connecticut.

Local bodies study

The convention also drafted a study plan to explore ways to strengthen the state federation's 15 local central bodies.

''We need to help the central bodies because they are the front line troops and we want to give them the tools they need for the job,'' Tianti said.

A study committee will report its recommendations to next year's convention.

The delegates adopted a political action program for 1986 aimed at electing legislators ''who are responsive to the needs of Connecticut workers,'' Tianti stressed.

Tianti and Williams were sworn into office by Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and an AFL-CIO vice president.

Visitors from Far East

A tripartite delegation representing Japanese labor, government and industry and headed by Labor Minister Toshio Yamaguchi, center, wound up talks on trade and other issues with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and International Affairs Director Irving Brown. The union delegation included, from left, President Akihiro Kawai of Japan's National Federation of Industrial Organizations; President Tadanobu Usami of the Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei); Yamaguchi; President Takeshi Kurokawa of the General Council of Trade Unions (Sohyo), and President Mitsuharu Warashina of the Federation of Independent Union.

Coordinated talks achieve gains for 4,000

The effectiveness of coordinated bargaining was proved by settlements with three major corporations over the past month providing substantial wage increases and improved fringe benefits for some 4,000 members of seven international unions.

The contracts were negotiated with GTE, General Signal and GAF in talks coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. IUD President Howard D. Samuel called the agreements "an encouraging sign that we may be coming to the end of the giveback days of collective bargaining."

The GTE settlement affects 2,900 workers represented by six unions at 10 of GTE's precision materials and lighting group facilities. Wage benefits over the three-year term include a 4 percent lump sum payment in the first year, either a 4 percent lump sum or a 4 percent pay increase (depending on location) in the second year, and a 4 percent increase in the third year.

In addition, the pension schedule was increased and early retirement provisions were improved to permit retirement with full pension at age 60 with 15 years of service. Supplemental benefits were added for workers choosing the early retirement option. Life insurance and sickness and accident benefits also were improved.

Union coalition

Unions involved in the GTE bargaining were the Machinists, Electrical Workers, Electronic Workers, Auto Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters and United Electrical Workers.

At General Signal, the IUE won an 8 percent wage increase over the next three years coupled with substantial improvements in pension, life insurance, accidental death and dismemberment and medical insurance benefits for 200 employees.

The GAF pact covers some 800 workers in four units of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Division of the Boilermakers. They make building products at plants in South Bound Brook, N.J., Tampa, Fla., Savannah, Ga., and Mobile, Ala.

The accord provides for 5 percent wage increases in each of the contract's two years, plus improved pensions and life, accident and health insurance.

Siderographers elect Warburton to top union post

Arlington, Va.—The Siderographers convention elected two new officers: President Richard Warburton, who succeeded James C. Small, and Vice President Kenneth Martin. Sec. Harvey Henderson was re-elected to his sixth two-year term.

The four delegates reviewed the union's efforts to modernize engraving techniques and update members' skills. Members of the small, 84-year-old union of currency, stamp and securities engravers now use a copper transfer press system and plastic plates instead of the older steel plate engraving method.

The convention agreed to continue efforts to modernize the craft, but noted that working conditions and salaries, particularly for members in the public sector, have not kept pace with improvements in productivity.

Delegates selected Ottawa as the site of the union's 1987 convention.

Utah delegates map plans to combat mounting layoffs

Salt Lake City, Utah—Unemployment was the main issue at the Utah AFL-CIO convention where most of the resolutions adopted by the 400 delegates were linked to efforts to save jobs.

State AFL-CIO President Ed Mayne told the delegates, "What is happening resembles what existed in America prior to the Great Depression."

Mayne pointed to the plants that have closed or experienced high layoffs in the past year in Utah—Kennecott, Geneva, Anaconda, Eimco, Sperry Univac, Brigham Apparel, Western Steel, Barbizon and Mode O'Day.

"Imports are systematically driving American goods from the American marketplace," Mayne said. Essential industries are being severely injured by the policies of the Reagan Administration, he said.

"We find an Administration dedicated to emasculating the federal government and to dividing the country, region against region, race against race and rich against poor," Mayne said.

The convention adopted resolutions urging the state legislature to help bring in new businesses to Utah, calling for legislation to stem the tide of imports that are destroying American jobs, and supported the state AFL-CIO's lobbying efforts to blunt the Utah legislature's attacks of workers.

Another resolution condemned the union busting tactics of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Steel Corp., which filed for bankruptcy in order to abrogate its union contract. Delegates called for stronger laws to prevent companies from using the bankruptcy courts to negate their labor agreements.

Industry's problems

Steelworkers Treas. Frank S. McKee told the convention the problems with the nation's steel and copper companies lie with economics, corporate power and politics—not the American worker.

McKee declared, "You can't roll over and play dead," when the employers are pressing for givebacks. No amount of give-ups will solve those companies' problems, he said.

McKee is co-chairman of the union's Non-Ferrous Coordinated Bargaining Committee. He noted that preliminary bargaining for the next contract with Kennecott will begin in October. The USWA and Kennecott had earlier agreed to concessions, but the company's copper division has still experienced cutbacks and closings.

The delegates had a choice between a pair of workshops, one on taxes and financial recordkeeping and the other on occupational safety and health. Robison, Hill & Co., an accounting firm, conducted the first workshop, while Butch Ploughman, director of the Rocky Mountain OSHA project led the second.

Clifford Green of Laborers Local 295 in Salt Lake City was re-elected vice president of the State AFL-CIO by acclamation.

Average wage gains barely cover COL rise

durable goods industries resulted in an average pay of $25,161. San Jose, Calif., was third with $23,703.

The BLS report, which covered the nation's 336 metropolitan areas, showed that wages declined in five areas from 1983 to 1984. The sharpest drop was in Richland-Kennewick-Pasco, Wash., where massive joblessness led to a 3.2 percent decrease in pay. In Bremerton, Wash., average pay fell by eight-tenths of 1 percent, while in Pascagoula, Miss., the decline was seven-tenths of 1 percent.

At the other end of the scale, the largest pay gains were recorded in Anderson, Ind., with an annual growth rate of 9.7 percent. Kokomo, Ind., was second with a 9.4 percent advance, and Hagerstown, Md., was third with a 9 percent increase.

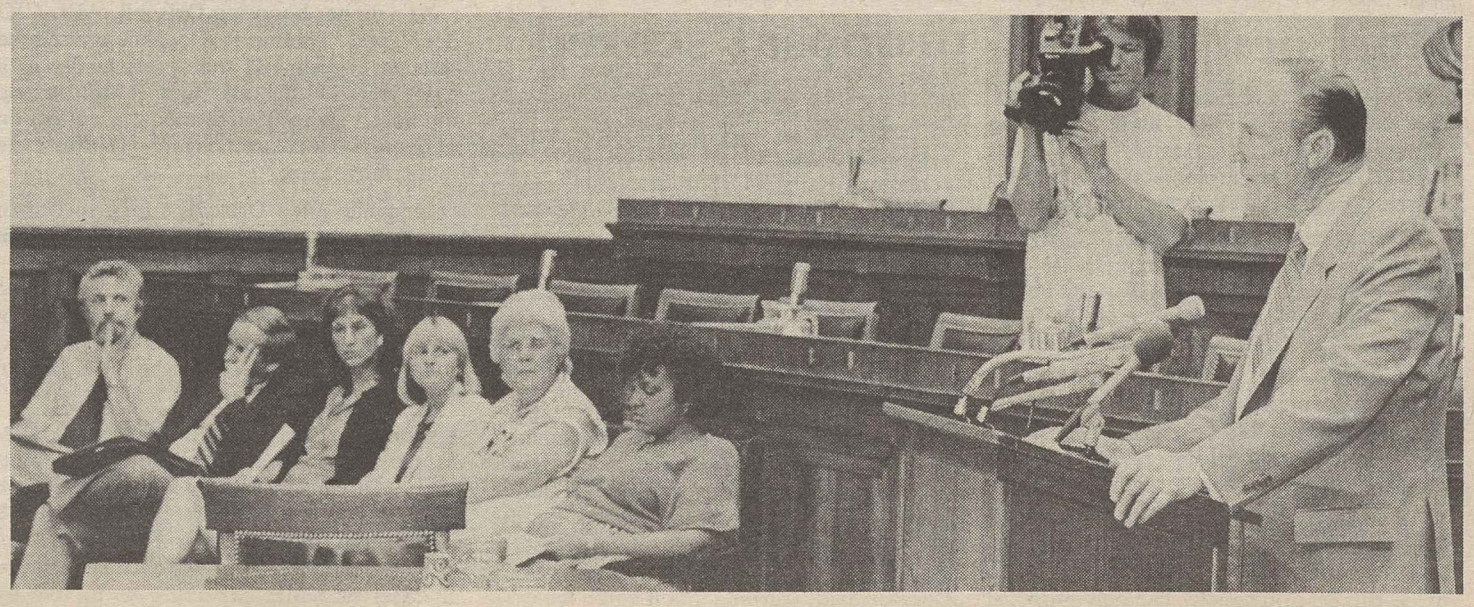
Plant-closing law called vital to ease impact on workers

Legislation giving workers adequate advance notice of intentions to close down a plant or assembly line is a "must," President William H. Bywater of the Electronic Workers stressed at a Capitol Hill press conference.

"It's a simple bill. And it's simple justice we're asking for," Bywater said of the proposed Labor-Management Notification & Consultation Act of 1985.

Bywater called the measure "a positive first step." The legislation, introduced by Rep. William Ford (D-Mich.) and cosponsored by 117 other House members, provides for a 90-day notice of a plant closing. A companion bill is to be introduced in the Senate soon.

Bywater released a report supporting the proposed legislation issued by the Full Employment Action Council, which sponsored the news conference.



The council's report, "Economic Dislocation & Structural Unemployment: The Plight of America's Basic Industries," challenges Reagan Administration statistics claiming improvement in the nation's jobs situation despite the shutdown of plants due to unfair trade advantages accorded imported manufactured goods.

"Careful analysis of economic data reveals that the so-called recovery has bypassed millions of workers," he said.

"Despite improvements in the overall unemployment rate since the depths of the 1982 recession, many of America's basic industries are in worse condition today than they were at the end of the last decade," Bywater declared.

"The erosion of the nation's industrial base has marked the 1980s as an era of abandoned plants, lost jobs, diminished earnings, depressed communities and shattered dreams."

The FEAC report, which surveys the job loss situation in major U.S. industries over the past five years, discloses that some 11 million workers have suffered economic dislocation since 1979.

IUE President Bywater calls for speedy action on plant-closing bill.

All's Well, He Says . . .

IN HIS MOST RECENT press conference, President Reagan gave his optimistic view of the American economy. He only failed to quote Pangloss in Candide: ''All is for the best in the best of possible worlds.''

Never mind the soaring trade deficit that has tossed tens of thousands of workers into the street. ''Free trade'' is the Panglossian answer.

Never mind the continued recession level of unemployment after two years of so-called recovery. ''More people are working than ever,'' is the blitheful response.

The cheerful rhetoric became confused when the question was asked about America becoming a ''debtor nation'' for the first time in 70 years. ''I think this has been exaggerated. And it isn't a case of us being a debtor nation,'' the President said.

The plight of the American farmer, facing a new season of bankruptcy, was ignored.

There are some substitute answers that working Americans understand for these questions, starting with the trade deficit.

Members of Congress who spent their late summer holiday talking to constituents returned to Washington determined to do something to prevent more American industries from being flooded out by the tidal wave of cheap imports.

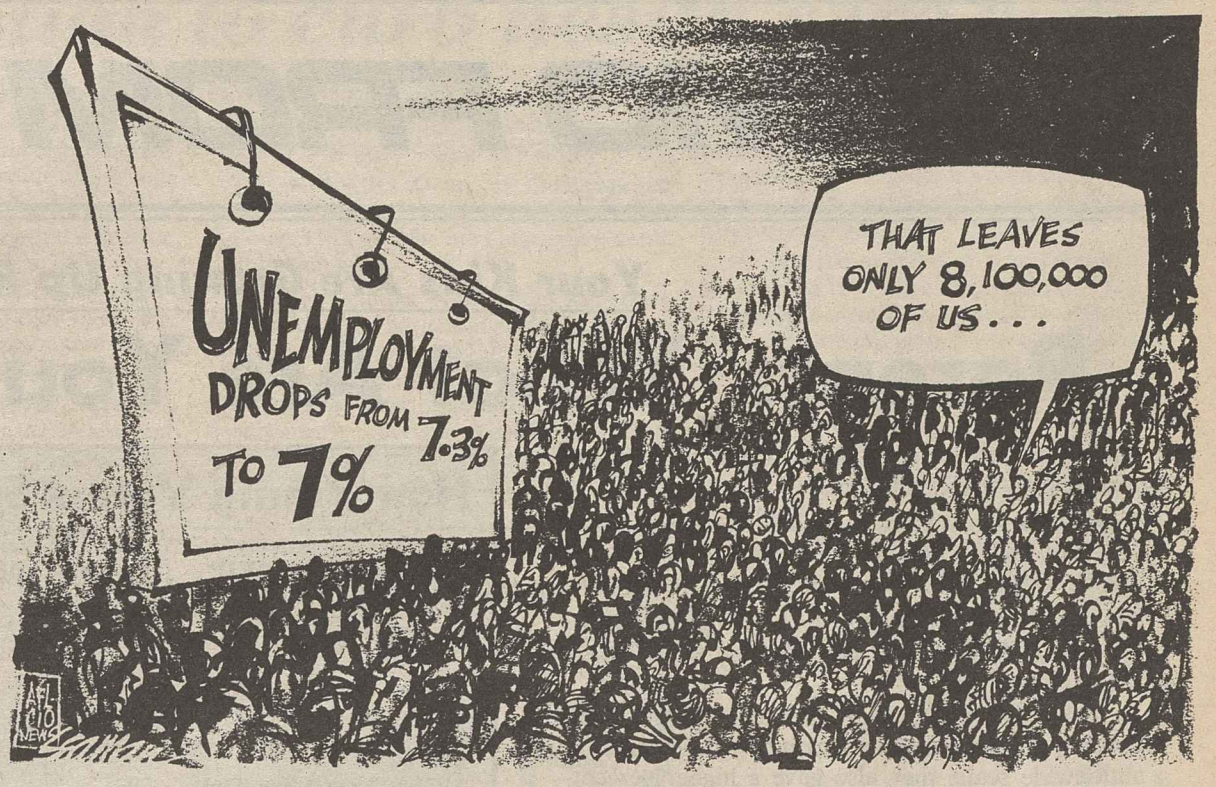
''The Maine shoemaker, the Ohio machinist, the Kansas farmer and even the so-called high tech worker in the Silicon Valley have all gained a keener appreciation of the realities of international commerce,'' President Lane Kirkland told the House Ways & Means Subcommittee on Trade. ''These lessons, however, were not learned from textbooks or endless international negotiations, but from lost jobs, lost income and lost dignity, with a massive ripple effect along every main street in America.''

IT IS TRUE that a higher proportion of Americans are working than ever before, but, as usual, the statistics hide some less encouraging facts. The proportion of men who are working has been declining while the proportion of women working has been rising.

Many of those women were forced to take some of those new service jobs that pay slightly more than the minimum wage after their husbands had been forced into retirement. Others are young women forced to work to support their children or to contribute to paying the high interest rates on their homes.

As for the debtor status of the United States, that is a simple matter of facts and figures. The balance of what America owes to foreigners and owes overseas has turned into red ink. At this rate, early in 1986, the United States will pass Brazil as the largest single debtor nation in the world.

Leading members of the House and Senate have recognized the facts of contemporary economic life; they are ignoring the sweet music from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue and are busy writing their own answers to the problems that beset us. Trade legislation has been given a higher priority than the President's version of tax reform.



These congressmen are realists—most of them have to face the electorate next year while the President does not have to run for office ever again.

. . . And Then Some

THOSE CRITICS who like to blame American wages for the country's failure to meet international competition might want to study a new report on executive compensation, worldwide.

American bosses, by far, are the highest paid compared with every other industrial nation.

The cash salaries and bonuses of American executives average twice those paid in Japan or France; slightly less than twice what is paid in West Germany, but nearly three times what is paid in Britain, according to a new study by Towers, Perrin, Forster Crosby, management consultants

Widening poverty gap traps 13 million children

By Press Associates, Inc.

The White House staff deserves high marks for manipulating public opinion into believing that President Reagan should get the credit whenever the sun comes out.

When the Census Bureau recently reported that the number of people in poverty declined by 1.8 million last year to 33.7 million, the White House called it a ''triumph'' for Reagan's economic policies.

What the White House staff ignored was the fact that the decline in the poverty rate to 14.4 percent followed five years of sharp increases in poverty. The Reagan recession, the deepest since the Great Depression of the 1930s, pushed the nation's poverty rate to a record 15.3 percent in 1983.

At 14.4 percent, the poverty rate is still higher than when Reagan took office.

The bragging by the Administration seems premature with unemployment still in the 7 percent recession-level range after 33 months of ''recovery.'' Worse, some economists see signs of a new recession shaping up, a predicament that will swell the numbers of poor in the absence of anti-poverty programs.

Distressing contrast

One of the most distressing aspects of this supposed good-news poverty report is that, for the tenth consecutive year, the gap between the number of children living in poverty and the rest of the population has widened.

From 1970 to 1983, the poverty rate for children under 16 rose from 15.5 percent to 22.8 percent. Over the same period, the gap between the overall poverty rate and that for children grew from a 2.9 percent difference to a 7.5 percent difference. In 1984, the gap edged up again to 7.6 percentage points, even though the poverty rate for that age group fell slightly to 22 percent.

For children under 18 years old, the poverty rate fell from 22.2 percent in 1983 to 21.3 per cent in 1984. The rate for white children fell from 17.5 percent to 16.5 percent.

The rates for black children and Hispanic children remained virtually unchanged at 46.5 per cent and 39 percent, respectively.

For children under the age of six, the poverty rate was even higher—24 percent in 1984, which was a drop of 1 percent over the year. Black children in this age group were poor at the record rate of 51.1 percent, up from 49.4 percent a year earlier.

According to Michael R. Lemov, executive director of the Food Research & Action Center, ''the United States remains the only industrialized nation in the world where children make up the largest segment of the poverty population.''

A new class of poor

In a report analyzing the data on poverty among children, FRAC warned: ''Children are the largest group of poor Americans; they are the victims of an economic generation gap that threatens our ability to substantially reduce the level of poverty in America for a new class of poor.''

The consequences, FRAC said, are ''long-term health risks for an entire generation of Americans. Poverty and its side effects among children can lead to poor physical growth, anemia, and poor behavioral development.'' Such problems translate into reduced abilities to perform well in school, it noted.

The Reagan Administration may consider it good news that more than 13 million children under 18 live in poverty, but most people who care about the long-term implications cannot welcome the development.

Especially, as FRAC pointed out, if there is increased unemployment during another recession. Less than one-third of the unemployed receive jobless benefits, and, coupled with cuts in social programs, the result could worsen the already disgraceful poverty level for children as well as adults.

MEMO FROM COPE

Your Kids Are Growing Up Republicans

Parents, What Are You Doing Wrong?

American parents are failing. Their children are growing up to be Republicans.

It would be convenient to be able to blame Doctor Spock, but he got blamed when they were growing up to be Democrats. You can't have it both ways.

Maybe there's no point in looking for scapegoats. The fact is the fact: The youngest voting group is going Republican.

In November 1984, voters in the age range 18-29 supported the Reagan-Bush ticket 59-40 percent. On a nationwide scale, they also gave a higher percentage of their vote to GOP candidates for U.S. House and Senate.

Since then, apparently they've had few second thoughts, as the accompanying chart shows. They're GOP over Democrat by 48-43 percent, according to CBS/New York Times polls, whereas over-30 voters split 49-42 for the Democrats.

How Young Voters Split

| PARTY FAVORED | 18-29 (percent) | 30 + (percent) |
|---|---|---|
| Republican | 48 | 42 |
| Democrat | 43 | 49 |
| REAGAN RATING | | |
| Approve | 67 | 60 |
| Disapprove | 24 | 29 |

* CBS/New York Times polls.

The revealing figure is how young voters break on the Reagan job rating. They approve the President's performance in office 67-24 percent.

This suggests, as other surveys have since the 1984 elections, that the popularity is the President's and that the party tags along in his windstream. In other words, the party's popularity has little impetus of its own. After all, Reagan's rating is 3-1 favorable; the party does only a bit better than break even.

In turn, this delivers the message that party allegiance of younger voters is still up for grabs. The fight is still in its early rounds. The GOP is ahead on points. But Democrats have no cause to throw in the towel.

If the GOP has a knockout punch, it's Reagan—and politically at least, in view of his lame duck status, his potency diminishes as what remains of his term in office shortens.

A second reason is young voters just don't seem to cotton to the Reagan-GOP-right wing fixation on the social issues. In fact, this is the judgment of Lee Atwater, himself a GOP political consultant with ties of his own to the "new right."

Atwater explains the poll figures as showing younger voters "think of themselves as Republicans, because that's how they voted in the last few elections" (since Reagan). But he does not think the GOP has them sewed up.

There is yet another reason—this one more down the road than immediate. The Reagan-Republican economic chickens are going to come home to roost, inevitably. The GOP has more of them than Holly Farms: (1) An ill-advised and lopsided tax cut that (2) helped create sustained and record-high budget deficits with (3) no fair-minded and serious presidential effort to grapple with them, only Reagan's inane and inaccurate PR thrusts at the "spend and spend, tax and tax Democrats" (4) along with a no-policy trade policy that continues to tolerate trade conditions and practices that wipe out huge numbers of U.S. jobs and undermine basic industries.

When the cumulative effect of these serious weaknesses begins to be felt in the economy, no amount of teflon will protect either the President or his party, and the younger voters now at least in the GOP hallway will pack up and leave home.

A major question is: Will the Democrats have enough smarts to make their house an attractive alternative? There is, of course, no assurance of that.

Odds 'n Ends

RIGHT-WING MEGA-DOLLARS boosted Reagan re-election bid last year, recent Federal Election Commission report shows. Ultra-conservative PACs shelled out $15.8 million in independent expenditures for Reagan, while pro-Mondale PACs could pony up only $804,000. Biggest independent spending was by National Conservative PAC at $10.2 million, $9.8 of it for Reagan, $290,000 against Mondale, and another $116,000 against 14 other Democrats and GOP Sen. Lowell Weicker (Conn.). Weicker wasn't even up for election, but he's just the kind of Republican right-wingers don't want in their party.

'CHE' GINGRICH and rightist House GOP colleagues who conduct guerrilla war against Democratic members for benefit of late afternoon cable TV are tame stuff. In other nations, members of legislatures really go after one another, as recent Washington Post photo showed. There in Ecuador legislature, a Liberal Party member was photoed landing hard-right to jaw of an opposing party member. Act of throwing punch hoisted his jacket above pants belt. There, under belt, he was packing a pistol.

RIDICULE OF WOMEN'S movement and issues is response of some GOP House members to serious concerns of many Americans of both sexes, among those concerns pay equity. Recently, Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) introduced bill for study of comparable pay rates in federal jobs. GOP members went haywire, introducing more than 150 amendments in one day. Some of amendment titles deliberately demeaned proposal and pay equity issue, among them: The Sexist Socialism Act, Feminist Folly, Being Railroaded Through on a Greased Track, Let's Soak the Taxpayer Again. Carrying the ball for the funny folk were GOP Reps. Richard Armey (Texas) and Danny Burton (Ind.). Nation is fortunate to have such wags in Congress.

PACS LEVEL OFF at exactly 4,000 as of July 1 this year, Federal Election Commission reports, down from an all-time high of 4,009 at end of 1984. Major categories: 1,687 corporate PACs, 694 trade group PACs, 393 labor PACs, and approximately 550 right wing committees.

TALK ABOUT SURPRISES, it turns out that, right now, among core backers of President Reagan, Vice President Bush runs way ahead of Rep. Jack Kemp in this early stage of the 1988 GOP presidential nomination chase. Bush enjoys favorable-to-unfavorable ratio of 12-1 to Kemp's 6-1. VP's advantage over New York congressman in name recognition is lop sided, too, 98 percent to 56 percent. This is big change for Bush since early days of Reagan-in-office, when he was vilified by right-wingers.

The Fact-Fleeing President

(President Reagan's habitual flight from information as if it is a communicable disease has been remarked by many commentators. Few have written as scathingly on the matter as David Broder. Excerpted below is Broder's Washington Post column as the President returned to the White House from his ranch.)

It is going to be so good to get President Reagan back to Washington, D.C. Not only will the city be brighter, he may be too.

Where many of its residents flee Washington in August to "get back in touch with reality," even if that reality is just a stretch of beach, this president pulls the plug on contact with the real world as soon as he leaves.

Reagan, as everyone must know by now, is the living refutation of Francis Bacon's aphorism that "knowledge is power." Reagan has flourished in politics by demonstrating that "conviction is power." He knows what he thinks and has the power of his own beliefs. But he treats knowledge as if it were dangerous to his convictions. Often it is.

When someone approaches Reagan bearing information, he flees as if from the leper's touch. . . .

The occasion for all this sarcasm is the latest, but surely not the last, sorry display of presidential ignorance—namely, the comments from the sky ranch on improving conditions in South Africa.

I don't know what is more discouraging: Reagan's lack of understanding or the convolutions of the people who work for him (and incidentally run our government) as they invent explanations and try to cover up for what he didn't know.

I have a good deal of sympathy for those people. How would you like to be explaining the terrifying prospects for South Africa and the difficult policy choices that situation poses for the United States to a man who believes that "they have eliminated the segregation that we once had in our own country . . ."? That cannot be easy work.

The task of watering the arid desert between Reagan's ears is a challenging one for his aides, even . . . in the White House (where) he can't hide.

Ed Meese was probably the smart one when he decided, back in 1981, to let the vacationing Reagan sleep through the dogfight between the U.S. Navy planes and Libya's fighters, rather than disturb his rest . . .

A year ago, you may recall, the president was so relaxed (on vacation) that he tested the microphone for his weekly broadcast by saying, "My fellow Americans, I'm pleased to tell you today that I've signed legislation that will outlaw Russia forever. We begin bombing in five minutes."

That remark was clearly intended to be more humorous than his comments on South Africa, but the two betray a common pattern that is important to understand: at heart, Reagan is a man of his convictions, and those convictions never change.

Reagan, for instance, has never accepted the reality of racism. Just plain won't recognize it. He said at one point in his presidency that he was unaware of racism, growing up in a family that he says taught him to treat every person the same.

Many of us grew up in that same kind of family. But you would have to be a creature from another planet not to be aware of pervasive racism in the Midwest of his or my own youth.

But Reagan never recognized the reality. So, conveniently, he never had to acknowledge the importance of the struggle to overcome racism. He opposed the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the California open-housing law. Even when he was persuaded before the 1984 election to sign the bill commemorating Martin Luther King Jr.'s birthday, he could not resist making a wisecrack about King, for which he apologized to his widow.

So it really was not surprising that as soon as his advisers stopped reminding him that the South African regime was racist, Reagan reverted to form and declared it "reformist."

That is so typical. Reagan always is inclined to put his ideology ahead of any contrary information, because his ideology is comfortable, and information often is not. Inside the White House, there is a constant battle between those who want to supply Reagan with real-world information and those who prefer to reinforce his comfortable ideology. When Reagan is in Washington, there is a chance that information will win out; when he's away, ideology always prevails. . . .

Labor drafts legislation to curb health care costs

The AFL-CIO has developed model cost-containment legislation for states to curb runaway health care charges and is mobilizing state and local central bodies to push for passage in 1986 legislative sessions.

The measure would put a lid on the annual rate of increase in hospital revenue, while providing fair treatment for the wages and benefits of non-supervisory hospital employees. It also focuses special attention on safeguards for workers who might be displaced as the result of health-planning decisions.

The proposal to restrain unnecessary outlays for medical care was unveiled by the AFL-CIO Ad Hoc Committee on Health Care, which supervised its development by technical experts from a number of international unions, assisted by outside health care specialists.

John J. Sweeney, president of the Service Employees and chairman of the committee, said the proposal for state action is ''essentially an extension of the activity in collective bargaining in which many unions have been engaged over the past few years.''

For the past two years, the AFL-CIO has advocated passage of cost-containment legislation introduced by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Rep. Richard Gephardt (D-Mo.), which would provide incentives to states to develop their own guide lines for placing a cap on healthcare costs.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security described the model bill as ''the next necessary step'' in this campaign.

Sweeney said that while unions have been successful at the bargaining table in achieving some containment of costs through second-opinion surgical programs, preventive health care programs and pre-hospitalization review procedures, ''they have been frustrated because the system itself, has such high costs built into it.''

The new federal program for financing Medicare and the Reagan Administration's cutbacks in funding health care for the poor over the past five years have shifted the costs to union-negotiated health insurance plans, Sweeney noted.

He said the model cost-containment bill, if enacted by state legislatures, would ''greatly restrict, and virtually eliminate, that cost-shifting phenomenon.'' And this, Sweeney said, ''would be of direct benefit to union trust funds and union-negotiated insurance plans.''

The AFL-CIO said that ''all unions would

Reagan trade plan rejects remedies on job-killing imports

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan's new proposals for ''free and fair trade'' won't bring back American jobs or restore import-devastated industries.

That's the judgment of the AFL-CIO, members of Congress from both parties and leading economists.

Reagan's White House speech promising more vigorous action to open up foreign markets to American products had been touted as an alternative to congressional action to curb job-destroying imports. The early indications were that the effort fizzled.

Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole did suggest that the President's call for ''a more open trading system'' would ''cool the protectionist fires in Congress.'' But a bipartisan majority of the House Ways & Means Committee sent a different message.

The committee approved an Administration-opposed bill to reduce clothing and textile imports from low-wage nations that have made American-manufactured goods an endangered product. The measure is a top legislative goal of both the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers.

A companion measure, which would include relief for the import-devasted shoe industry and its workers, is ready for action in the Senate.

Passage conceded

So strong is the support, so broad the sponsorship, that the Administration has virtually conceded its passage. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige indicated to reporters that the fallback goal is to muster more than one-third of the Republican-controlled Senate to sustain a presidential veto. He said he ''thinks'' a veto would be sustained.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified at Sept. 17 House hearings for emergency legislation to repair the nation's trade imbalance by turning to a more realistic trade course. And the House Democratic Caucus gave a big push to the legislative drive two days later by adopting a resolution calling on the Ways & Means Committee to report a comprehensive trade bill by the end of October, clearing the way for action by the full House.

Congressional support for legislation to remedy the one-way flow of trade has mounted as plant closings and layoffs have

Richmond, Va.—The AFL-CIO welcomed a unanimous appellate court decision upholding the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's hearing conservation amendment, but stressed that the agency must now press employers to reduce permissible noise levels through engineering controls.

The court ruling ''sets the stage and groundwork to proceed to an improved standard,'' said Margaret Seminario, the federation's occupational safety director. The decision ''is important as the amendment does provide some worker protections, but no one should be fooled into believing that it does

Pioneering role urged for public sector unions

By Gene Zack

Gerald W. McEntee, president of the State, County, & Municipal Employees, assumed the presidency of the 3-million-member AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. with a pledge to make government workers at all levels the ''new pioneers'' in the federation's drive to deal with changing conditions in the workplace.

McEntee took over the PED helm from Kenneth T. Blaylock, president of the Government Employees, under the provisions of a new departmental constitution adopted in 1983, which calls for rotating the presidency between the federal/postal division and the state/local division every two years.

More than 200 delegates from 32 affiliated unions elected Blaylock secretary-treasurer, and named four executive vice presidents: Albert Shanker, president of the Teachers; John J. Sweeney, president of the Service Employees; Vincent Sombrotto, president of the Letter Carriers; and Angelo Fosco, president of the Laborers.

In his acceptance speech at the seventh biennial convention of the depatrment, McEntee called on government employee

Wage-hour rollback bid assailed

Unions representing America's public workers asked Congress not to backtrack on an extension of the federal wage-hour law that was enacted in 1974 and is scheduled to go into effect Oct. 15 as a result of a Supreme Court ruling.

The management side of the public sector—organizations speaking for mayors and governors—is trying to persuade Congress to repeal or revise the extension of coverage. They're arguing, as they did more than a decade ago, that it would be a financial burden to pay employees for working overtime. The Reagan Administration is cheering them on, and more than a dozen bills have been introduced in the House and Senate to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act.

At hearings of the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards, two panels of union representatives refuted management claims and urged Congress to let the extension of coverage go into effect.

Public agencies may not like the concept of overtime pay any more than private employers did when the wage-hour law was enacted, the panels of union witnesses observed.

Illogical opposition

But that's not a valid reason to deny public workers the protection that private-sector and federal employees have long had, they stressed.

The union lineup included national and local leaders of the Service Employees, Fire Fighters, the State, County & Municipal Employees, Police Associations—and the San Antonio local of the Transit Union that initiated a court case resulting in a rare Supreme Court turnabout that restored the 1974 law.

The Supreme Court had first adopted a states' rights interpretation that blocked extension of wage-hour standards to persons employed in traditional government functions.'' But early this year, also by a 5-4 vote, the high court reversed itself on the issue and reinstated the extension of coverage. The Labor Dept. said it wouldn't start enforcing the law until Oct. 15 to give the public agencies time to come into compliance.

750,000 petition Congress on corporate tax loopholes

The American people are fed up with loopholes that allow the nation's giant corporations to avoid some $90 billion a year in federal taxes, delegates to the seventh biennial convention of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. told Congress.

In a dramatic presentation, 20 preschool youngsters, drawing little red wagons, brought tax reform petitions signed by 750,000 individuals to the convention floor, where they were presented to Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), chairman of the House Ways & Means Committee.

The public wants to put an end to tax "handouts to corporations" and put corporate America "back on the tax rolls," David Wilhelm, executive director of the labor-supported Citizens for Tax Justice, told Rostenkowski.

Wilhelm said there is something basically wrong with the system when the 50 largest corporations, which racked up combined profits of $57 billion during the first four years of the Reagan Administration, "not only didn't pay a dime in taxes, but actually got $2.4 billion in tax refunds."

The wagon-trainload of petitions, gathered by Citizens Organized to Restore an Effective Corporate Tax (CORECT), was the public's way of saying that "we object when corporations pay less taxes than the secretary who types their letters and the janitor who washes their floors," Wilhelm said.

Accepting the petitions from the youngsters he called "tomorrow's taxpayers," Rostenkowski acknowledged the "appeal for fairness and balance from a nation of frustrated taxpayers."

'The people care'

Although the news media say that "the public doesn't give a damn about tax reform," the Ways & Means chairman said, the petitions prove that "the American people do care."

Rostenkowski said he shares the PED's concern, and that of the signers of the petitions, "about the erosion of the corporate tax, about the shift in the tax burden to working Americans, and about the mounting deficit" racked up in the first four years of the Reagan Administration.

The goal of tax writers in the House, he said, is to produce a bill which is a "significant improvement" over the present income tax system. Rostenkowski warned that "we're not going to achieve perfection," and that reaching a compromise is "the price of democracy."

The congressman said that "no one will get everything he wants" in the new tax bill, adding that the negotiations on Capitol Hill will be similar "to what you face in collective bargaining." He predicted that "we will give some in order to get some."

turned large sections of the nation into an industrial wasteland.

Against this backdrop, Reagan's only concrete proposal was to set up a fund for low-interest loans to facilitate sales of American products abroad when a competing product has an advantage stemming from another country's export subsidy.

Otherwise, the President merely promised an effort to hold down the value of the dollar in relation to foreign currencies and further negotiations to overcome artificial barriers to trade.

"These proposals would make no visible dent in the nation's current $150 billion trade deficit," the AFL-CIO said.

The federation termed Reagan's trade remedies "too little and too late. They fail utterly to come to grips with the specific problems of workers in the clothing, textile and shoe industries, the auto industry and the telecommunications industry."

In a crisis that demands "immediate action," the AFL-CIO said, Reagan proposes only "further study" and "additional trade negotiations, which all our experience tells us would drag on for years."

Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams welcomed the Administration's belated awakening to the problem of unfair trade policies, but said workers whose jobs have been wiped out over the past five years are understandably cynical about Reagan's "instant conversion."

On Capitol Hill, there was a comparable reaction to the President's newly professed enthusiasm for "working with Congress" on "any necessary legislation," coupled with a threat to veto any bill departing from free trade principles.

As House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., put it, "These are not the words of someone taking action but of someone trying to stall for time."

unions to mount coordinated organizing campaigns, instead of engaging in "senseless, self-defeating competition for small pockets of the unorganized."

Cooperation on the organizing front, McEntee said, is the best way to bring younger workers into the trade union movement. The PED's goal, he added, "is to make certain that the house of labor shelters new generations of American workers and their families."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue hailed the PED's "determination to organize collectively," pointing out that establishment of "a mechanism to eliminate competitive organizing is in line with the renewal of the trade union movement which we all seek."

The AFL-CIO has conducted experiments in coordinated bargaining, Donahue said in his keynote address to the luncheon session, and recommended that the department explore either geographic cooperation, as was done by unions in Houston, or targeting specific employers, as was the case with the Beverly Nursing Home chain.

Age-old goal

"The solidarity necessary to coordinated organizing drives is the same goal of unity" labor has sought during its 104-year history, he said.

Reaffirming the federation's support for public sector workers' rights, Donahue said: "It makes no sense for the crew paving the street to be subjected to a different set of rules than the crew paving the parking lot in the shopping mall across the fence. "The job, the hours, the safety risks are identical," and public employees should not be disadvantaged simply because of "an accident of employer."

In his opening remarks to the convention, Blaylock lashed out at the far right which, he said, is trying to play off "male against female, black against white, North against South," when the real struggle is between the "rich and the greedy" on one side, and "workers and the needy" on the other.

'Dollars don't vote'

Charging that the right wing is trying to buy its way into control of Congress as well as the White House, Blaylock reminded delegates that "dollars don't walk into the polls and pull the handles, people do." He urged affiliated unions to continue to motivate people on behalf of "dignity and human rights."

Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women, sharply criticized those who, in attempting to stifle the movement toward pay equity, "try to sell the line that what women want is to take dollars away from blue-collar workers."

The labor movement and the women's movement have forged a "close alliance" on the pay equity issue. "Our goal is to not only to eliminate sex discrimination," she said, "but also to put an end to the cheap labor pool" made possible by wage discrimination against women and minorities.

Delegates unanimously adopted a resolution calling for "steps to eliminate pay discrimination and achieve pay equity," vowing to fight not only on the legislative front but also on the collective bargaining front. The convention endorsed pending legislation mandating a study of federal pay and classification systems "to determine the extent of race and sex-based wage discrimination within those systems."

In other actions, the convention put its stamp of approval on resolutions to:

- Achieve "equitable and responsive" state and local tax systems which would rely on progressive personal income taxes and corporate taxes, exempt necessities from sales taxes, and get rid of "economic development" tax breaks for business.
- Fight against ill-conceived "tax revolt" proposals which have resulted in arbitrary cuts in state and local tax revenues and led to broad-based rollbacks in government services.
- Battle Reagan Administration proposals to eliminate the deductibility of state and local taxes from federal income tax returns.
- Work against Administration plans to tax employee benefits, warning that such taxes would increase the federal deficit by creating new federally funded programs to deal with the financial risks that accompany disability, old age and death.
- Support efforts by affiliates to negotiate safeguards against the contracting out of public services to private, profit-oriented sources.
- Win passage of legislation providing the same health and safety protections for public employees now enjoyed by workers in the private sector.
- Force the Environmental Protection Agency to issue regulations spelling out what asbestos hazards exist in public buildings and requiring abatement of the danger in a safe and complete manner.

Workplace Health Fund opens first local office

The first local chapter of the Workplace Health Fund opened its office in Washington.

The chapter was formed to raise money for a national research program and for local education, referral and service programs on occupational safety and health.

President Howard Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. heads the national fund. The new local agency is chaired by Donald M. MacIntyre, a vice president of the Government Employees.

Support grows to block benefits tax

At least 175 House members—with the number rising daily—have cosponsored a labor-backed resolution opposing the taxation of employer-paid job benefits.

The resolution, initiated by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), sends a strong bipartisan message to members of the Ways & Means Committee as they prepare to vote on the ingredients of a tax reform bill. It expresses "the sense of the House of Representatives that employee benefits not be taxed."

Its intent is to squelch a Reagan Administration proposal to tax workers on part of the value of their health insurance coverage and comparable provisions of other "tax reform" bills being considered by the Ways & Means Committee. These include measures to end the tax-exempt status of such job benefits as life insurance, child care, educational assistance and legal services.

The resolution was introduced by Hawkins with 165 co-sponsors, including 37 Republicans, and quickly picked up additional sponsors. (See list on Page 8.)

The Ways & Means Committee, which is trying to get a tax reform bill to the House floor by late October, is expected to reshape an Administration package that the AFL-CIO protested falls short of its proclaimed goal of making the tax system more equitable. It would make big winners of the wealthiest taxpayers, those who profited most from earlier rounds of tax cuts. But it would leave many two-earner working families worse off.

Constituents polled

Many of labor's concerns were echoed in responses to a questionnaire that 44 House members sent to their constituents as part of a poll coordinated by the Democratic Study Group.

The constituent opinion poll, covering 26 states, brought these responses:

- More than two-thirds of those polled opposed taxation of any part of employer-paid health insurance, and majorities opposed taxing compensation payments for work-related injuries or further taxing unemployment benefits.

Nearly three-fourths opposed the Administration effort to end deductions for state and local taxes. Those opposed included 61 percent of persons who do not itemize deductions and therefore would not be directly affected.

- A solid majority opposed taxing capital gains profits from investments at a lower rate than wages and salaries. And more than three-fourths of the respondents opposed lowering the top income tax bracket, which is 50 percent for joint returns over $175,000.
- An overwhelming 87 percent said the oil and gas industry shouldn't receive more favorable tax treatment than other industries and 83 percent opposed any tax cuts—even for themselves—that would result in a higher federal deficit.

Under the Adminstration plan, the top tax bracket would drop from 50 to 35 per cent and the lost revenue would be recouped by increases elsewhere. Despite a strong presidential push for priority on the congressional agenda, final legislation is not likely this year.

Congress pressed to retain wage law coverage

As Subcommittee Chairman Austin J. Murphy (D-Pa.) noted at the start of the hearings, Congress had considered and rejected the arguments against coverage raised by the city and state governments when it passed the 1974 legislation. And when New York Mayor Edward Koch appeared as a spokesman for the League of Cities and Conference of Mayors to urge that public workers be excluded from overtime protection, Murphy noted that Koch had voted for extension of coverage as a member of Congress in 1974.

Koch said city employees don't need wage-hour coverage because they are well represented by unions. But the top negotiator for a large portion of New York's municipal employees—Executive Director Victor Gotbaum of AFSCME District Council 37—was on hand to challenge the mayor's reasoning.

To tell the 20 percent of the workforce employed in the public sector that they can't have the protections accorded other workers is to "denigrate them," Gotbaum said. If collective bargaining has protected the rights of the organized public workers, the cost of adjusting to federal overtime pay requirements would be minimal, he noted.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney, whose union represents more than half-a-million local and state workers, stressed that "no worker should be asked to work long hours for low pay in order to subsidize any employer, whether that employer is engaged in private business or in government business."

Unions are prepared to work with Congress to deal with any fine tuning that experience with the law proves necessary, Sweeney said.

But "the law should be given a chance to work," Sweeney stressed. Congress should not legislate on the basis of "imagined difficulties."

Standards eased

Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon noted that Congress had responded to concerns of local governments by providing more lenient overtime standards for fire and police personnel.

Thus, fire fighters would not be entitled to premium overtime pay under the law until they had worked 212 hours in a 28-day work period—the equivalent of a 53-hour workweek.

With such flexibility, he said, cities and states have been "grossly exaggerating" the cost of compliance.

Local governments have already had "a 10-year reprieve" from compliance with the law and any further delay can't be justified, Gannon said.

At wage-hour hearings, Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon, AFSCME District 37 Director Victor Gotbaum, SEIU President John J. Sweeney.

Compliance met

The president of a Fairfax County, Va., local of the Fire Fighters gave first-hand testimony to the ability of public agencies to comply with the law without disruption.

In a county with more than 1,000 fire fighters, Local 2068 President Eric S. Lamar testified, compliance with the law was achieved well before the deadline with cooperation by labor and management in rearranging schedules and without additional cost to the government.

Milwaukee Police Association President Gary J. Brazgel told the subcommittee that a number of law enforcement groups consider the option of compensatory time important because of the long hours some times required. But the union's interpretation of the law, he said, is that the ceiling on hours that applies to police officers allows up to three hours a week of agreed-on "comp times."

The Supreme Court case that restored wage-hour coverage for public workers was brought in the name of Joe G. Garcia, a San Antonio bus driver and vice president of Local 694 of the Amalgamted Transit Union.

The San Antonio local was represented at the hearing by its president, Robert Thompson, a co-worker and friend of Garcia, who traced the union's long struggle for enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

"For myself, for Joe Garcia and others," Thompson testified, "the court's ruling merely recognizes that we, no less than other transit workers, are entitled to receive fair compensation for our work under the same standards which have, for decades, been applied to this country's private transit employees.

"We see no reason for this Congress to pass legislation to repeal, amend, delay, or in any other way, overturn the results of this constitutional litigation."

Panel of witnesses includes Eric Lamar of Fairfax, Va., Fire Fighters, Transit Union lobbyist Robert Molofsky, Robert Thompson of San Antonio Transit Union and Gary Brazgel of Milwaukee Police Association.

Study finds education goals endangered by blunders in assignment of teachers

Millions of students may be sitting in classes staffed by teachers unfamiliar with the subjects in which they are giving instruction, the Teachers and the Council for Basic Education charged.

AFT President Albert Shanker said the practice, under which as many as 200,000 teachers could be working in areas they are not qualified to handle, is "education's dirty little secret." He called the situation "a problem that shames us all."

Declaring that the statistics are "not a pretty picture," Graham Down, CBE executive director, warned that the misassignments of teachers could have "dire" consequences.

Shanker and Down released a 50-state study entitled, "Making Do in the Classroom: A Report on the Misassignment of Teachers," which documented what it called "a scandal in the making."

The report said that "individuals originally certified in English may be assigned to teach science. A vocational education instructor may teach a social studies class."

Shanker said that the misassignments are "a betrayal of the meaning of education. The message it sends is that bureaucratic convenience takes precedence over academic standards and that the school's custodial role is more important than its intellectual mission."

Varied practices

The survey said that the practice of assigning teachers to work out of their own fields varies widely from state to state, with six states permitting unrestricted out-of-field assignments, and 15 others putting some limitations on the misassignment of teachers.

It cited such examples as:

- Arizona, which has no restriction at all on out-of-field teaching.
- Maryland and Michigan, which allow teachers to go out of their certified areas for two periods a day.
- Alabama, which permits teachers to spend up to 49 percent of their day out of their own fields, and Massachusetts, where the limit is 20 percent.
- Georgia, where nearly 80 percent of those teaching math and science are improperly assigned.

"How much confidence should the public have," Down asked, "in a profession that routinely allows, as a matter of policy, a certain percentage of its work to be done by unqualified practitioners."

Shanker said that the practice of giving teachers entry-level competency tests, providing internships and certifying them to enter the classroom has convinced the public "that we are raising standards." He added: "What's the point of giving a prospective English teacher an English test and then assigning him to teach physics?"

The joint AFT-CEB study noted that most states "literally don't know how much out-of-field teaching goes on," pointing out that while three-quarters of the states have explicit policies deeming the practice unsound, none has made it illegal and few go to the trouble to measure whether or not misassignments are actually occuring.

Film unions ratify 3-year contract covering 30,000

Los Angeles—A three-year contract that provides pay increases totaling $3 an hour for 30,000 film and television workers has been ratified overwhelmingly by members of 23 Hollywood-based locals of the Stage Employees in a mail referendum. The IATSE locals represent some 24,000 of the union members covered by the agreement negotiated with the International Alliance of Motion Picture & Television Producers. Five other craft unions had already approved the settlement.

The new agreement also improves pension benefits for workers in an array of film industry occupations. The contract includes work rules changes agreed to by the unions to help maintain southern California as a major center of film production.

The 6,000 workers not in IATSE locals are in crafts represented by the Electrical Workers, Laborers, Plasterers, Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

In addition to the $3-an-hour pay increases over the three-year term, pension benefits will rise 25 percent for future retirees and 10 percent for those already retired. The pension improvements will be funded in part by a revised formula for employer payments based on revenue from the sale of videocassettes.

In the two-step ratification procedure, the contract was approved by a 9,344 to 742 margin in the mail vote and by a 232-0 vote by delegates from the 23 IATSE locals.

FAST rigs a 'golden parachute'

The AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. has launched a trend-setting drive to give workers a version of the "golden parachute" protection which insulates nearly half of the nation's corporate executives against the adverse effects of corporate takeovers.

FAST is seeking to amend the bylaws of Delchamps, Inc., a supermarket chain based in Mobile, Ala., to create a new "contract of employment" for all employees except officers or directors.

If adopted, the plan would guarantee workers one year's average salary and benefits if they are terminated as the result of any takeover.

Robert F. Harbrant, FAST president said the effort to protect the economic status of employees of the non-union supermarket chain constituted "the first effort to provide workers with substantial protection if their employer is taken over" by another firm.

"We believe the recent rash of hostile takeovers and tender offers has devastated the job security of millions of Americans," he said.

FAST contended that non-managerial employees are "acutely vulnerable to changes in control" of a corporation because their status gives them "little leverage" to negotiate "the types of securities and benefits that executives normally receive."

The AFL-CIO department noted that 48 percent of the firms on the Fortune magazine list of the 1,000 largest corporations protect their senior executives with "golden parachutes," which contain specific triggers in the event the corporation changes hands.

Better pensions

Union-negotiated pension plans provide higher monthly retirement benefits than other plans, a study by the National Bureau of Economic Research reported.

The advantages of collectively bargained plans range from 50 to 109 percent above non-union plans, according to the study, entitled "Unions, Pension Wealth, and Age-Comparison Profiles."

Not only do beneficiaries of union-negotiated plans receive larger monthly annuities, they also receive larger increases in their benefits after retirement, and retire at an earlier age, the study noted.

Wheeling Steel's new management to resume talks

Pittsburgh—Negotiations between the Steelworkers and Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. leaders will resume Sept. 30 as the two sides work to end the 10-week-old dispute at the steelmaker's plants in Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

USWA negotiators met briefly with Wheeling-Pitt's new management and pledged "an all-out effort to save the company." The union maintained that a key factor in its agreement to renew negotiations was the company's decision to turn its financial records over to the union for inspection, a request former chairman Dennis Carney had refused.

Carney resigned Sept. 20, under pressure from Wheeling-Pitt's largest stockholder, Allen E. Paulson. Paulson was elected chairman, while George Ferris, a former Ford Motor Co. executive, was named chief executive officer and vice chairman.

Striking steelworkers considered Carney's abrasiveness and tough talk a major stumbling block in resolving the dispute as rallies and parades in steel towns throughout the Monongahela and Ohio Valleys carried the message, "Carney's gotta go."

Nearly 8,600 USWA members at Wheeling-Pitt's nine plants have been idled since July 21.

Labor pushes cost controls in health care

benefit from this legislation which puts a lid on the rate of growth in total health-care costs,'' adding that it would be of particular help to ''small unions and unions with a large number of older workers or those in high-hazard industries, all of whom find it difficult to negotiate with insurers and health care providers.''

The model bill, which state and local central bodies will seek to introduce in the next session of their legislatures, puts particular emphasis on meeting the needs of workers who may be displaced by reductions in excess hospital capacity.

It would require each hospital to meet certain conditions before instituting a reduction in the workforce. If a cutback in employment is the only choice, hospitals must provide for alternative employment in neighboring hospitals, as well as any necessary retraining.

This provision is patterned after success ful programs already in place in Maryland and New York to deal with hospital closures or the conversion of hospitals to institutions providing less intensive care.

The measure would also combine the rate-setting mechanism and the health planning functions which used to be separate at the federal level and are now being wiped out by the Reagan program.

Sweeney hailed this provision in the model bill, pointing out that ''it sets up for the first time an integrated system of both planning and funding health services.''

Other key features of the legislation include:

- A statewide pool, financed by a surtax on hospital revenues, to fund uncompensated care provided to the uninsured, including jobless workers.
- A state loan-guarantee program to bring needed capital into facilities that treat a disproportionate number of low-income people.
- Establishment of criteria to monitor the quality of inpatient care.
- Inclusion of labor in the annual process of adjusting hospitals' gross patient revenue, which will give unions an opportunity to protect the wages and benefits of non-supervisory hospital employees.

More mothers at work

Economic necessity is driving more mothers into the workforce, with the Bureau of Labor Statistics reporting the figure hit 20 million as of last March, up almost half a million over the previous year.

Nearly 62 percent of all mothers with children under age 16 are now in the job market, the BLS report said.

The number of children with mothers in the labor force climbed by 5.8 million between 1975 and 1985, reaching a record high 33.5 million. This means that nearly 60 percent of all children under 18 have working mothers, compared with less than 50 percent a decade earlier.

Reflecting the way in which the economic slow down has affected women, BLS said 80 percent of divorced mothers and 60 percent of widowed women are working fulltime outside the home.

Among mothers living with their spouses, 61 percent are in the job force. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research said this is largely the result of the worsening economic situation.

In some instances, women seek employment because their husbands are hit by layoffs or cutbacks in manufacturing industries, the AFL-CIO said, while in other cases the cause is the failure of their husbands' incomes to keep pace with rising living costs over the past decade.

Women whose children are six years old or younger continued to move into the labor force at a significant pace, BLS said, reaching 8.2 million, an increase of 300,000 over the year.

Half of all mothers of children under three were either employed or looking for jobs last March, up from one-third a decade earlier. For those whose youngest child was between ages 3 and 5, the proportion working was 60 percent, up from 45 percent in 1975.

The BLS report showed that black mothers continue to be more likely than white mothers to be in the labor force, although the gap is narrowing. The participation rate for black mothers with preschool children was five percentage points higher than for white mothers, while ten years ago, the gap was 13 percentage points. The participation rate for Hispanic mothers remained well below those of whites and blacks.

Sheet Metal union elects Bassett as Clay steps down

Lonnie A. Bassett was elected by the Sheet Metal Workers executive council to succeed Cecil D. Clay as secretary-treasurer. Clay, 69, who has held the post since 1981, is retiring Oct. 1.

Bassett, 58, has been the SMW's director of organization since 1970. Prior to that, he served as president and business manager of SMW Local 21 in Baton Rouge, La.

He was appointed an international organizer in 1961 and a year later made a SMW representative. In 1967, Bassett became assistant to the chief international representative in the jurisdiction department, and was appointed organizing director three years later.

Clay joined SMW Local 399 in Charleston, S.C., in 1947 and served as its business agent from 1959 to 1971 when he was elected a vice president of the SMW. He had also been president of both the South Carolina and Greater Charleston Building Trades Councils and had been an officer in the state and local AFL-CIO bodies.

Reagan's policies assailed as hostile to labor, blacks

Dallas—The harsh impact of Reagan Administration policies on the economy, the labor movement and the black community was the focus of some 800 black trade unionists participating in the A. Philip Randolph Institute's 16th national conference here.

President Reagan's positions on foreign trade, South Africa, taxation of worker benefits, employment, the youth submininum wage, and the budget deficit became the focal points for workshops, panels and guest speakers.

''We find ourselves confronting an Administration that has been aloof and unconcerned, if not openly hostile to labor, to blacks and the poor,'' APRI President Norman Hill said in his keynote address. ''Black social and economic progress is low on its agenda, if it is there at all.''

Hill called for renewed effort by the black-labor alliance to elect candidates in next year's congressional and gubernatorial elections who are pro-labor and pro-black.

Nana Mahomo of the African-American Labor Center, who is coordinating the AFL-CIO's South Africa policy, was joined at a press conference by Hill, Burns Bonadie, a union leader from the Caribbean nation of St. Vincent, and Alvin Guthrie, a labor leader from Micaragua. They expressed solidarity with the labor movement in South Africa and called for expanded contracts between the labor movements in the United States and the Third World.

AFL-CIO Vice President Barbara Hutchinson, a Government Employees vice president, chaired a session of the conference at which William Julius Wilson, a professor of sociology at the University of Chicago, spoke on the black underclass. He cited black male joblessness as a major factor contributing to the disintegration of many black families.

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney, also an AFL-CIO vice president, keyed on the events in three cities—Washington, Beaumont, Tex., and Capetown, South Africa. In Washington, he said that ''events and human nature are bringing to an end the awesome power of the Reagan White House'' and there is a ''chance for change'' in the 1986 congressional elections.

He told the audience of the nine-week-old strike by some 200 SEIU members in Beaumont, Tex., against the A.W. Schlesinger Geriatric Center where the workers, mostly black women, had been pressured for a 10-percent giveback in their $4.10 per hour wages.

Participants contributed $2,500 to aid the Beaumont workers, three of whom attended the conference.

Sweeney also called attention to South Africa's system of apartheid and urged a boycott of consumer products from that country.

Among the guest speakers were Gov. Mark White, Agricultural Commissioner James Hightower, and Sec. of State Myra McDaniel, the first black woman to hold that post.

More poverty

National Urban League President John Jacob warned the conference that ''America is going to have to rediscover poverty'' because of the Reagan Administration's dismantling of important civil rights and social programs that benefit the minorities and the poor.

A panel discussion, chaired by Actors & Artistes President Fred O'Neal, explored strategies to combat poverty in the black community. Velma Hill, SEIU's director of human rights and international affairs, said that workable federal programs for job development and assistance are needed to augment self-help initiatives in reducing black unemployment.

At an awards banquet, former Texas Congresswoman Barbara Jordan was presented the A. Philip Randolph Freedom Award and AFL-CIO Region IV Director Walter Waddy received the A. Philip Randolph Achievement Award.

GNP gain too weak to cut joblessness

Administration projections of a 2.8 percent economic growth rate in the third quarter—far below the rosy forecasts emanating from the White House as recently as two weeks ago—point up what labor called the ''continued failure'' of the economy to bounce back from the recession.

The ''flash estimate'' released by the Commerce Dept. dimmed whatever slim hopes remained for any brisk economic upsurge in the last half of the year.

President Reagan had predicted earlier this month that the growth rate would reach the 5 percent level in the second half of 1985, to offset the modest 1.1 percent growth rate in the first half of the year.

The Administration had pinned its economic hopes on an overall gain in the gross national product this year of 3 percent. After the dismal start recorded thus far, reaching that target would require a fourth-quarter jump of 7.1 percent in the GNP—an achievement that most economists now dismiss as impossible.

Mixed reaction

The Administration sought to put the best possible face on the news, with White House Press Secretary Larry Speakes referring to it as further proof that the nation is going through its ''strongest postwar recovery,'' and with Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige declaring that the nation ''is emerging from the doldrums of the past year.''

However, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald viewed the latest developments in a far grimmer light.

''This is just another example of the continued weakness of the economy,'' Oswald said, blaming the lack of any vigorous growth on, among other things, the mounting deficit in the nation's balance of trade.

''The 2.8 percent increase in the GNP is insufficient to reduce recession levels of unemployment,'' he pointed out.

Most private forecasters had expected a better performance in the third quarter, with GNP bouncing back by 3.5 to 4.5 percent. Not only did the economy fail to grow at the faster rate, even the 2.8 percent pace was suspect, with many analysts calling it the result of temporary factors, including a late surge in automobile sales, which can not be sustained for the balance of the year.

Prices inch up

Meanwhile, the consumer price index for urban wage earners inched up two-tenths of 1 percent in August, putting the inflation rate for the first eight months of the year at 3.3 percent.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said August housing costs climbed one-half of 1 percent, while electricity prices advanced three-tenths of 1 percent and the cost of telephone service went up six-tenths of 1 percent. These increases more than offset declines in the prices of used cars, grocery store food, fuel oil and natural gas.

BLS also reported that medical-care costs rose one-half of 1 percent in August, the same as July, while physicians' fees advanced seven-tenths of 1 percent and hospital room costs went up three-tenths of 1 percent. Since August 1984, medical care costs have gone up 6.5 percent—the largest 12-month rise for any major CPI component.

In another development, BLS reported that real earnings of nonfarm production or nonsupervisory workers advanced by one-half of 1 percent last month.

Despite the modest improvement in earnings, which was the same as the one recorded in July, real average pay is four-tenths of 1 percent below the level of a year ago. BLS blamed ''sizable drops in hours worked'' for the depressed earnings level.

In other economic developments:

- Under pressure from Congress to do something about the record-smashing trade imbalance, President Reagan reversed himself and moved to cut back overvalued American dollar. Although it declined sharply the next day, the dollar began to bounce back on the international money markets almost immediately.

The long-range success of any effort to take the fat out of the American currency was uncertain, because of the Administration's refusal to face up to the underlying problems of soaring deficits and the flood of foreign-made goods into the U.S. market.

- The Consumer Federation of America charged that consumers are paying banks tens of millions of dollars in ''excessive interest'' each month despite the fact that rates paid by large borrowers have fallen 50 percent since reaching an all-time high level four years ago.

Citing statistics compiled by the Federal Reserve Board, CFA said consumers have reaped few benefits from the decline in the prime rate from its peak of 20.5 percent in 1981 to its present level of 9.5 percent.

Credit-card rates ''continue to hover at record levels,'' CFA said, climbing from an average of 17.8 percent in August 1981 to 18.74 percent today.

''Contrary to bankers' claims,'' the consumer group said, ''consumer interest rates do not respond to market changes. (They) are a function of the unequal relationship between lenders with the power to set rates and consumers who are forced to accept those rates or do without credit.''

Service Employees win court's approval to sue California on pay equity

San Francisco—A federal judge here ruled that the Service Employees may proceed with a pay equity suit against the state of California on behalf of 37,000 state employees in female-dominated jobs.

U.S. District Court Judge Marilyn Hall Patel rejected the state's argument to have the case thrown out.

The suit, filed by the SEIU-affiliated California State Employees Association, was certified as a class action—the largest ever brought under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Judge Patel said that "the suit is particularly appropriate for class action treatment because the allegations of discrimination involve a state-wide civil service system in which decisions and policies regarding hiring, compensation, and promotion are likely to be highly centralized and uniform."

The judge held that the issues in the California case are different from those in a landmark Washington state case that was overturned by a U.S. appellate court panel earlier this year. The Washington state case had been brought by the State, County & Municipal Employees.

"The decision is a critical victory," SEIU President John J. Sweeney said. "Anyone who thought wage discrimination cases were dead after the Washington State decision better think again."

"Sex- and race-based wage discrimination is wrong, it's illegal and we will take whatever action is necessary to end it," Sweeney added.

No effect

The judge said the ruling by the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in the Washington State case "does not foreclose the application of Title VII to wage disparities between job classifications" held primarily by women and those held primarily by men where a discriminatory attitude is shown, even though the pay scales may have been the result of market forces.

"Judge Patel reaffirmed that wage disparities between male and female jobs may be a product of unlawful discrimination even if the jobs being compared are not substantially equal," explained Winn Newman, attorney for the SEIU, CSEA and the 10 members listed in the class action.

Efforts by the State of California to cut off SEIU's right to collect evidence to prove its case were thwarted by a court order to produce the information requested during a six-month discovery period.

The SEIU claimed a victory on extension of the period covered by the suit. The judge had ruled earlier that it would include only individuals who worked in female-dominated jobs with the state beginning in 1978—when state employee Nancy Shaw filed a discrimination complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Extended coverage

Under Title VII, however, all employees who worked for the state in female-dominated jobs since 1976—two years before Shaw's complaint was filed—become parties to the suit.

Judge Patel rejected the state's argument that the court should not consider the class action claims of intentional sex discrimination in job classification, recruiting, promotion and training because individual EEOC complaints were limited to sex bias in wages only. The judge held the issues raised in the Title VII suit are "reasonably related" to the EEOC complaints.

The court decision limited the class action to only women workers in the female-dominated job classifications, excluding men in those jobs from participation in the suit.

Despite the appellate court's overturning of the landmark decision in the Washington State case, the State, County & Municipal Employees and the state are negotiating to eliminate the pay disparities, as the legislature there appropriated $41.6 million to settle the pay discrimination case the union brought in 1982.

Red Cross team aids relief effort for Mexico City

An American Red Cross emergency team has returned from Mexico City, spending a week there opening shelters, providing medical care and assisting in evacuation efforts after two major earthquakes struck the city Sept. 19 and 20.

Mitzi Rodriquez, AFL-CIO Community Services representative for Los Angeles and a member of Office & Professional Employees Local 30, worked with the Mexican Red Cross to set up the disaster operation and establish a working communications system to field calls from anxious relatives and friends trying to locate Mexico City residents.

Rodriquez said communications are still a major problem and that most messages from Mexico City are sent by ham radio operators or carried by travelers and airline workers leaving the country.

Locating relatives

David Oliver, director of Labor Participation for the Red Cross, said union members seeking information about relatives and friends in Mexico should contact their local Red Cross chapter and their questions would be channeled into the volunteer ham radio system.

Rodriquez said the Red Cross continues to make search and rescue efforts and emergency aid its top priority. She noted that many areas hard-hit by the earthquake have not yet reported casualties and damage but added, "fortunately, not all of Mexico City was destroyed." Early estimates indicate several thousand people were killed and 400 out of nearly 200,000 buildings were severely damaged or destroyed, many of them government agencies.

Life of scab-hating Jack London subject of public television drama

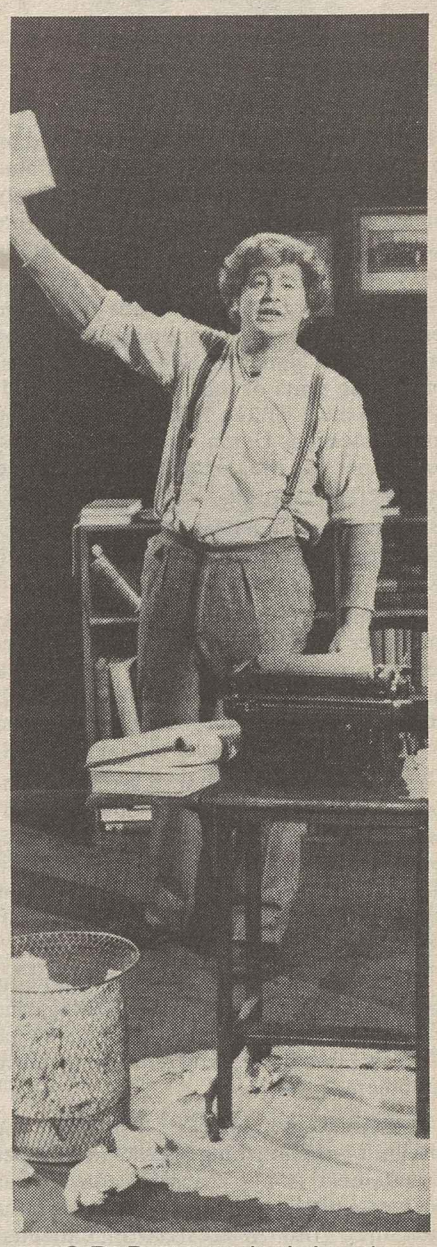
Jack London—writer, adventurer and political activist—is the subject of a one-man television play to be aired on public television Oct. 27.

"Yours for the Revolution," funded for television by the Auto Workers, the Michigan Council for the Arts and the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, has been performed for many union groups since opening in New York in 1979.

The play features Chuck Portz and opens with London's teenage years on the San Francisco waterfront.

London was well known for his belief in unions. His description of a strikebreaker is still widely quoted:



"After God had finished the rattlesnake, the toad and the vampire, he had some awful stuff left with which he made a scab.

"A scab is a two-legged animal with a corkscrew soul, a waterlogged brain and a combination backbone made of jelly and glue. Where others have hearts, he carries a tumor of rotten principles.

"Judas Iscariot was a gentleman compared to a scab. For betraying His Master he had the character to hang himself—the scab hasn't. There is nothing lower than a scab."

London wrote more than 48 books, reflecting his adventures in Alaska, his march east with "Coxey's Army," and his work as a war correspondent in Mexico and Japan. His best-known works included "Call of the Wild" and "The Sea Wolf." He died in 1916 at the age of 40.

London considered himself a worker and rejected characterizations of himself as a scholar or philosopher. "Before people had given me any of these titles," he declared, "I was working in a cannery, a pickle factory, was a sailor before the mast, and spent months at a time looking for work in the ranks of the unemployed. I was born in the working class."

C.R. Portz as Jack London.

Trade adjustment bill gains in face of Reagan opposition

Committees of both the House and Senate have approved measures to renew the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act, which provides training and modest income support for workers whose jobs have been wiped out by imports.

The Reagan Administration has sought to kill off the program, and the President's budget proposal would have ended all funding. But both the House Ways & Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee have included renewal of trade adjustment assistance as part of budget reconciliation bills, although in different forms. And in a letter to the Finance Committee, Labor Sec. William E. Brock indicated that the Administration is now rethinking its once adamant opposition to any extension of the law beyond its Sept. 30 expiration date.

While Congress won't meet the Sept. 30 deadline, it has already passed a resolution to allow temporary funding of government programs through the first weeks of the new fiscal year, which starts Oct. 1. Most agencies have not yet received their fiscal 1986 appropriations.

The Administration also was rebuffed in its proposal to end federal subsidies for Amtrak, the national passenger train system.

Amtrak vote

A bill to reauthorize Amtrak operations passed the House by a 290-128 vote and was sent to the Senate. The $603.5 million authorized by the bill, a cut of about 15 percent from present levels, was included in an appropriations bill the House passed the previous week.

In other developments:

- The Senate completed action on a bill that was supposedly intended to curb illegal immigration. But it was badly marred by adoption of a labor-opposed amendment opening up the nation's borders to an influx of "guestworkers" for seasonal agricultural jobs. The amended bill passed on a 69-30 vote. The next step is up to the House.

- Despite Administration opposition to key provisions, the Senate moved toward passage of a bill renewing and expanding the Superfund toxic waste cleanup program. It would impose an excise tax on manufacturers to fund the program—a provision that has led to White House warnings of a possible presidential veto. But the Senate voted 49-45 to delete a section authorizing a small-scale experimental program to compensate victims of exposure to toxic wastes.

- A 79-20 vote in the Senate and unanimous approval by a House subcommittee sent a strong message that Congress is planning to remove social security from the federal budget—and end the ploy of seeking cutbacks in benefits in order to show a smaller federal deficit. Social security taxes currently bring more revenue to the Treasury than is paid out in benefits.

The Senate instructed its Budget and Finance Committees to bring legislation to the floor by early November. And the House panel approved a bill making the Social Security Administration an independent agency and separating its old age and disability fund from the federal budget.

New York teachers get 20% pay raise

New York—Pay increases averaging 20 percent for the city's 59,500 teachers and 6,000 other school employees form the basis for a new three-year contract, retroactive to Sept. 1, 1984, awarded by a special arbitration panel.

The binding settlement is weighted heavily in favor of starting teachers, who will receive an immediate $4,000-a-year boost to $18,500, with a raise to $20,000 by September 1986. This represents a 38 percent increase over the three-year life of the contract.

For the most experienced teachers, the panel approved a 20-percent increase that will raise their present annual salaries from their current level of $34,076 to $40,700 next year. Pay for other teachers will be increased from a current $25,719 to $29,834 in 1986, a 16-percent improvement.

Teachers President Albert Shanker praised the panel for granting major increases to starting teachers. He warned that even with the new pay scales, city teachers would continue to lag behind those employed in neighboring suburban school districts.

"What you have here," Shanker said, "is something that is attractive in terms of bringing people in, but is not attractive in keeping them."

Give and take

In approving the pay increases, the arbitrators offset part of the cost of the package by making some reductions in paid sabbaticals and by increasing administrative duties for present and future teachers.

Meanwhile, teachers in Pawtucket, R.I., ratified a new three-year contract, to end a 13-day strike during which 53 union members were jailed and fined.

Only 166 AFT members still remain on strike as the union reported the beginning of this year to have had the lowest number of work stoppages in recent years. The unsettled dispute involves members of Peters Township AFT local in Washington County, Pa., who went on strike Sept. 3.

The AFT's Pawtucket agreement provides pay raises over three years totaling 19.5 percent—6 percent the first year, 6.5 percent the second and 7 percent the final year.

The Pawtucket strike was the 10th strike in the city since 1946. Rhode Island law forbids strikes by teachers.

Superior Court Judge Corrine Grande found 53 teachers in contempt of court for ignoring a back-to-work order. They were jailed and fines of $500 a day were levied against the teachers and $10,000 a day against the union.

The teachers were released from jail on ratification of the agreement. A court hear ing is set for Sept. 30 on whether the teachers and the union will have to pay about $76,000 in fines.

Philadelphia news strike in 4th week

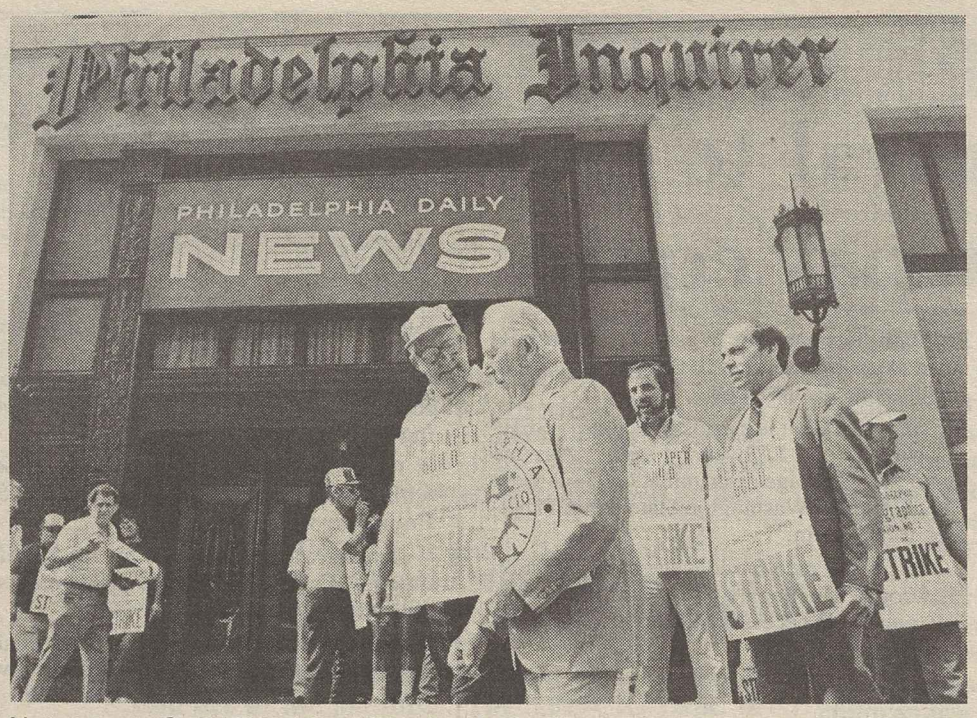
Philadelphia—With agreement reached on all non-economic items, the leaders of nine local unions turned their attention to hotly contested economic issues, as the strike against the Philadelphia Inquirer and the Daily News entered its fourth week.

The joint bargaining on wages and fringe benefits is being conducted by the Philadelphia Council of Newspaper Unions, comprising units of the Newspaper Guild, Typographical Union, Machinists, Graphic Communications Union, and the unaffiliated Newspaper & Magazine Employees and Teamsters.

The strike, which began Sept. 7, involves 4,700 employees of the newspapers, which are part of the giant Knight-Ridder chain.



The unions could face protracted negotiations over economic issues, since management's pre-strike offer of a $90-a-week package over three years for all unions fell far short of their joint goal for wages and benefits totaling $200 over the same period.

The Guild was the first to settle its non-economic issues, winning "substantial adjustments" in pay rates for several female-dominated jobs, plus company agreement to withdraw its petition to the National Labor Relations Board seeking the exclusion of 110 workers from TNG coverage.

The last to settle its non-economic items was the unaffiliated Newspaper & Magazine Employees, which reached agreement on the staffing of new automated mailing equipment.

The joint council is exploring the possibility of publishing a strike newspaper if settlement is not reached soon. It has received a pledge of assistance from unions publishing the Wilkes-Barre Citizens' Voice, a 50,000-circulation daily launched in a 1978 strike.

The current negotiations mark the second time that Philadelphia newspaper unions, whose contracts have a common expiration date, have joined in coordinated bargaining.

Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., and Philadelphia AFL-CIO President Edward F. Toohey join the members of nine local unions on strike against the city's two daily newspapers.

Vermont legislative agenda stresses strong safety laws

Mt. Snow, Vt.—Strengthening the state's labor laws and improving safety and health in the workplace are key items on the agenda of the Vermont AFL-CIO for the coming year.

Delegates to the state federation's 30th annual convention voiced their concerns about job safety and health, especially for workers in Vermont's granite, asbestos and gravel mines. The convention called for strengthening of the Mine Safety & Health Administration's programs and hit proposals to reduce the agency's funding.

The delegates called for improvements in the state workers' compensation system, including a guarantee that injured workers will have a job to return to after recovering from their injuries. The convention also urged the state legislature to ensure that injured workers receive their benefit payments without delay.

Other resolutions passed by the delegates called for improvements in the state's unemployment compensation system, support for a state equal rights amendment to be included on the November 1986 ballot, early notification to workers, communities and the state of plant closings, and a "little Davis-Bacon" prevailing wage bill for state funded construction projects.

Ralph Crippen of the State, County & Municipal Employees was elected executive vice president to succeed Maurice Fortier who did not seek re-election. President Robert E. Clark and Sec.-Treas. Wendell Pelkey were re-elected without opposition.

Legislative successes

Gov. Madeleine Kunin (D) told the delegates their efforts were instrumental in the passage of a state "right-to-know" law on hazardous substances which she said will benefit every community in Vermont. She also thanked the state federation for help in winning an increase in the state's minimum hourly wage, scheduled to reach $3.65 by July 1988.

Senators Patrick Leahy (D) and Robert Stafford (R) and Rep. James Jeffords (R) also addressed the delegates during the three-day convention.

A workshop session sponsored by a special tri-state project of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration covered hazardous substances, electrical safety, and other job-related health concerns and focused on ways local unions could establish similar programs.

Other speakers included Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services; Community Services Director Frank Emig; AFL-CIO Region VIII Director John F. O'Malley; Al Barkan, retired national COPE director; John E. Mara, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Eastern area VIP Director Ruth Colombo of COPE; Madeline Matchko, Region VIII COPE Director, and John Brown, legislative director of the Operating Engineers.

Miller re-elected to third term in Florida convention contest

Miami Beach, Fla.—Florida AFL-CIO President Daniel J. Miller was re-elected to a third four-year term in a spirited contest at the state federation's annual convention here.

In a weighted vote by the 500 delegates, Miller defeated Donald G. Resha, executive vice president for the last eight years, 49,797 to 39,987. Miller's running mate, Sec.-Treas. Joe Martin, was elected executive vice president over Frank Ortis of the Machinists, who campaigned with Resha.

Susan Wilson, an Electrical Workers' local business agent who also ran on Resha's slate, was elected secretary-treasurer over James McClellan, a local business representative of the Carpenters.

Miller and Resha, both IBEW members, likened the election contest to "a family fight between two brothers."

In other convention action, delegates endorsed a proposed state constitutional amendment to set up a lottery to aid in funding education programs.

Gov. Bob Graham (D) expressed concern that the Reagan Administration's move to abolish low-cost housing loans in a threat to the construction industry and to low- and middle-income families.

Food & Commerical Workers Vice President Don Cash urged convention delegates to remind their local members not to buy Marvel turkeys.

A national boycott against the Virginia-based firm remains in effect, Cash said. Some 400 UFCW members are on strike against Marvel.

Sen. Joseph R. Biden, Jr., (D-Del.) scored President Reagan's poor performance in reducing the budget and trade deficits and for not living up to his campaign promises.

Chuck Johnson, AFL-CIO community services liaison with the Red Cross, presented IBEW Local 915 with an award for being the first local involved in the AFL-CIO/Red Cross Coastline Disaster Project. Four other locals were honored at the convention for their participation in the project.

Letter campaign yields safety training measure

Albany, N.Y.—A letter-writing campaign spearheaded by the New York AFL-CIO and 40 affiliates led to the enactment of a $2-million state fund to provide grants for unions and other qualified groups to conduct occupational safety and health training.

State Federation President Edward J. Cleary said, "The bill will more than pay for itself by minimizing hazards on the job."

The landmark program will be funded by an assessment on workers' compensation contributors.

Noise standard goals advanced by court ruling

the full job and that labor is satisfied with it."

The regulation, one of the few adopted under the Reagan Administration, was reviewed by the full eight-judge 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals at OSHA's request after the court's three-judge panel had declared the rule invalid. The AFL-CIO had filed an amicus brief in support of the Labor Dept.'s case.

In reversing the panel's split decision, the court rejected the Forging Industry Association's challenge to the amendment.

The panel held that since workers could be exposed to harmful noise levels outside the jobsite, OSHA could not hold employers responsible for hearing protections.

The court decision, written by Judge James M. Sprouse, strongly refuted the employer group's argument that OSHA was trying to regulate "non-occupational hearing loss." Judge Sprouse had been the lone dissenter on the review panel's finding.

Judge Richard F. Chapman, who had written the opinion, reversed himself in agreeing with the full court decision.

Authority upheld

The court held that OSHA had authority to amend the standard and that it provided considerable scientific evidence that workers' hearing was being impaired under the previous regulation.

The court said, "The amendment does nothing more than ensure that a hearing-endangered worker is provided with protection in the workplace in order to decrease the risk of hearing impairment."

Since its inception, OSHA has regulated noise levels in the workplace. Its standard set a maximum exposure limit of 90 decibels averaged over an eight-hour period.

Following nine years of hearings and studies, OSHA issued a hearing conservation amendment in March 1983 as a temporary measure while it explored the need to reduce the exposure limit.

The decision noted that the amendment is concerned with noise in excess of 85 decibels. "Non-occupational noise of that intensity sustained over a period of eight hours each day is hard to imagine," the decision said.

PBS to air documentary on South Africa unions

"Leading the Way: Black Trade Unions in South Africa" is the newest television producion of the AFL-CIO's Labor Institute of Public Affairs to be aired on Public Broadcasting System stations.

A special segment of the America Works program, the documentary focuses on the problems of non-white workers under the South African system of apartheid and the support of the American labor movement for the struggling black unions.

The production will be beamed by satellite to PBS stations for their use by the end of the year. The premiere showing in the Washington area will be Sept. 29 at 10:30 p.m. on Channel 32.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer 10 institutes, workshops and programs during October and November. The schedule:

Right-to-Know: Make It Work, Sept. 30-Oct. 1—A two-day program for union staffers who train local union members in using right-to-know laws to monitor employer compliance.

Television: The Cool Medium, Sept. 30 Oct. 3—A four-day workshop to coach union officers before TV cameras and working with TV reporters.

Computers for Local Unions, Oct. 6-10 & Nov. 24-27—An introductory course for unions thinking of buying computers or upgrading existing systems.

Effective Speaking, Oct. 6-11—A workshop to coach union leaders on how to select, prepare and deliver the message.

Discipline & Discharge Arbitration, Oct. 20-24—An institute to examine standards applied in arbitration hearings on discipline and discharge cases.

Contract Administration: Life without Arbitration, Oct. 27-31—A program to explore speedier and low-cost alternatives to arbitration.

Union Administrator & Business Agent, Nov. 3-8—A class for full-time officers on office management, budgeting, contract administration and reaching members.

Using Microcomputers in Negotiations, Nov. 10-15—An institute for staff members on how to use microcomputers in contract negotiations.

In-House Opinion Polling, Nov. 24-27—A seminar on polling techniques, membership survey methods and setting up survey offices.

An institute on Advanced Arbitration Techniques will be held at the University of Oregon campus in Eugene, Nov. 3-8.

Three AFL-CIO affiliates will use the campus for their own training programs during October: Industrial Union Dept., Sept. 29-Oct. 2; Utility Workers, Oct. 16-18, and Communications Workers, Oct. 28-31.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will have 40 Latin American trade unionists on campus Oct. 6-8 to study management of cooperatives.

The African-American Labor Center will bring union leaders from 16 African countries on campus Oct. 20-Nov. 8 to study union structure and management, industrial relations and economics.

More information on these and other labor studies courses is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; Tel. 301/431-6400.

Little and Late

WHITE HOUSE officials, showing a most unusual reticence, decided not to seek or allow television coverage of President Reagan's recent speech on trade policy.

The no-television decision was made by Treasury Sec. James A. Baker 3d, according to press reports. His reasoning, it seems, was that television coverage might somehow suggest the existence of a "crisis."

But of course the out-of-control trade deficit has reached the crisis stage, and the tragedy is that the President and his advisers still refuse to recognize it as such.

The small steps President Reagan says he is prepared to take could and should have been taken long ago. At best, their impact will be marginal and delayed. Meanwhile, some 3,500 U.S. jobs are being wiped out each day. Surely that is a crisis.

We are told that the White House free-trade ideologues and the so-called pragmatists battled mightily over the approach the President should take.

In the end, there was strong rhetoric for "free trade" and equally strong rhetoric for what the President termed "fair trade."

President Reagan announced that he has already acted to eliminate unfair trade barriers—by asking the U.S. trade representative to investigate "a Korean law that prohibits fair competition for U.S. insurance firms" and "Japanese restrictions on the sale of U.S. tobacco products."

What more could any steel, textile or shoe worker ask?

The President invited Congress to join his trade team. But he made it clear that any legislation to "diminish international trade" faces a veto.

Republicans have complained that the Democrats are making political hay with the trade issue. But to the extent that may be the case, the remedy is obvious. It consists of listening to their constituents and voting accordingly.

The folks back home know there is a trade crisis, even if the word hasn't yet reached the cloistered President.

The Winning Formula

WHEN TIMES are bad, collective bargaining is often at its best. That's not really a contradiction, even though the thrust of the trade union movement is a continuing quest for a higher standard of living and a more humane workplace.

Obviously, pay raises, higher pensions, longer vacations—the traditional products of union-management negotiations—are most likely in times of prosperity. But the same process that achieves these gains in good times can reconcile the concerns of workers and management in times of retrenchment.

The AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work stressed in its report earlier this year the flexibility of collective bargaining—as a process "shaped by the times, the circumstances and the interplay between particular employers and employees."

We saw that in the depths of the Reagan recession—which unfortunately is not over for all of American industry—when some employers genuinely needed concessions to preserve jobs and stay in business.

The smart managements put their cards on the table, allowed unions to verify the legitimacy of the need, and explored jointly a wide range of options. Since bargaining is a two-way street, unions often were able to gain important protections for their members and assurance of an opportunity to recoup when business conditions improved.

Not all such efforts had a happy ending, of course. There are industries and companies whose survival cannot be negotiated at the bargaining table.

But given a management that looks on its workers as men and women with a stake in the company, the flexibility of the collective bargaining process remains the best formula yet devised for business survival.

Reagan distorts history to muddle trade issue

By Press Associates, Inc.

The specter of the 1920s is hovering over America of the 1980s. President Reagan is beginning to look more like a composite of Harding, Coolidge and Hoover.

The parallels have been developing for years, but the atmosphere on Capitol Hill on the trade issue has made it perhaps a little clearer than ever.

Legislators came back from the August visit to their constituencies alarmed over the trade deficit and the worsening condition of the nation's industrial base.

Mills and factories of America are shutting down week after week, in town after town, in region after region. Low-wage imports have been devastating jobs and communities for years, wiping out an estimated 3 million jobs since 1980.

Suddenly, with the 1986 elections providing a sobriety test, members of Congress are rushing to catch up with the American people.

Always one to put off unpleasant realities as long as possible, Reagan tried to scare Congress and the public with another history-mangling story.

Hatcheting history

"A mindless stampede toward protectionism will be a one-way trip to economic disaster," Reagan told a televised press conference. "That's the lesson of the Smoot-Hawley tariff in 1930, which helped to trigger a worldwide trade war that spread, deepened and prolonged the worst depression in history."

It is hard to rectify such a distortion of history, disseminated over TV and spread on all the front pages across the nation.

But to historians, the 1920s prepared the way for the Great Depression. Early on, steelworkers, underpaid and averaging a 69-hour workweek, struck for an eight-hour day and their strikes were broken. During the decade, the use of injunctions crushed strikes and the American Plan of organized employers spread the open shop and cut union membership to 3.6 million.

There was a surface prosperity to the era, but most of the population lived below the poverty line. With a growing maldistribution of wealth, the purchasing power of the mass of people could not buy the goods they produced. Speculative activity increased until the stock market crashed in October 1929.

As for tariffs on imports, the decade opened with Congress passing and Harding signing the emergency tariff of 1921 to protect U.S. farm products. More important, historians say, was the Fordney-McCumber tariff of 1922 which raised duties on imports by as much as 50 percent.

Overplayed part

The so-called Smoot-Hawley tariff bill was signed by President Hoover in 1930 over the protests of 1,028 economists, as Reagan noted. However, the Great Depression already was under way. Hawley-Smoot, the correct name of the bill, didn't help matters, but it was hardly the major factor in history portrayed by Reagan.

There are other parallels from the 1920s. While Harding died a broken man, betrayed by appointees who took bribes in the Teapot Dome scandal, today's corporate wheeler-dealers were smarter. They raided the U.S. Treasury legally through Reagan's tax cuts of 1981, depriving the government of an estimated $750 billion in revenues and helping to create the record budget deficit. As budget chief David Stockman said of Reagan's business allies, things got out of hand and "the hogs were really feeding."

It is said that history can repeat itself, though not in exactly the same way. The myth of benevolent capitalism in the 1920s has been replaced by the myth of "free trade."

As organized labor and affected industries seek some recognition of their problems from Congress, the growing debate should not obscure what is really at stake. And that is the need for a strong, balanced economy to enable this political democracy to preserve freedom in a still dangerous world.

Lugar Lifts One For The Gipper

What do you do in the Senate when you want to make sure a bill or motion on a bill cannot come up for a vote? Why, "pilfer" it, of course.

According to a UPI article published in The Washington Post, Senator Richard G. Lugar (R-IN), chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, wanted to prevent the Senate from taking any further action on the South Africa sanctions bill.

In order for a bill to be considered, it has to be physically present in the Senate chamber. According to the UPI report, "Without the knowledge of the Democrats, Senator Lugar went to the desk at the front of the chamber and took physical possession of the bill. Then he left."

Senator Edward M. Kennedy (D-MA) complained about Lugar's lifting one for the Gipper (President Reagan opposed the bill) and described Lugar's action as "trickery."

Senate Majority Leader Robert Dole (R-KS), however, claimed that he had checked with the Senate Parliamentarian and had found "precedents for it in other administrations."

It's Late September, Do You Know Where Your Congressman Is?

Do you know where your congressman stands on this year's important worker issues? If you don't, now is the time to schedule an appointment to see him in person.

It's easy, just call or write the AFL-CIO Legislative Department and you will receive a host of materials that will enable you to become an effective grass-roots lobbyist. These include in-depth lobbying reports on each member of Congress, tips on how to conduct your meetings, fact sheets and much more. The tools are available, now all you have to do is use them.

Handful of Reps. Hold Swing Vote In Tax Committee

The 36 members of the House Ways and Means Committee have become the key players in the struggle over fair tax reform. Mark-up of the White House package that contains a tax on employee benefits and other dangerous provisions has already begun.

Examination of each member and their opinions reveals they fall into one of four categories: those who are with us and will vote right, those who are leaning right, those who are leaning wrong and those who are wrong. It's the handful of "leaning" votes that will likely decide the fate of worker supports.

According to letters, personal contact and reports from back home, the break-down of committee members as the Alert went to press was as follows:

Right -- Rangle, Dorgan, Kennelly, Ford, Stark, Pease, Donnelly, Jacobs, Heftel, Coyne, Crane, McGrath, Daub, Frenzel and Guarini.

Leaning Right -- Jenkins, Downey, Fowler, Russo, Flippo, Duncan, Schulze, Gregg and Vander Jagt.

Leaning Wrong -- Rostenkowski, Gephrdt, Matsui and Anthony.

Wrong -- Gibbons, Pickle, Jones, Archer, Moore, Campbell, Thomas and Gradison.

At this critical time, any contact with a committee member, be it a card, letter or personal visit, could make a big difference in the fight for tax fairness, particularly those members who are still uncommitted.

Tax Reform: Major Areas At Stake As Committee Considers Package

| Issue | Reagan Proposals: | AFL-CIO Position: |
|---|---|---|
| Benefits Tax | Up to $300 per year in new taxes for family health insurance and full taxation of unemployment, worker's comp. and death benefits. | No new tax on the health and other life-support protections. |
| Tax Rates | Limit of only three tax brackets, that cut tax on wealthy to only 35 percent. | More than three tax brackets are needed, so the wealthy will pay their fair share. |
| State And Local Deductions | Present deduction for state and local taxes paid eliminated, placing burden on middle class taxpayers to make up difference. | Present system of deduction prevents double taxation and is fairer to locales that finance schools and public services. |
| Personal Exemption | Personal exemption raised to $2000 per person, discrinating against middle class and small families. | A credit would be fairer to all. Deductions for personal exemption would give wealthy $700 per dependent, but give low income taxpayer $300 per dependent. |
| Corporate Taxation | Loopholes remain, allowing many huge corporations to pay little or no taxes. | Lawmakers should look here to close loopholes on wealthy and tax-avoiding corporations, |
| Revenue Neutrality | Tax bill would raise taxes on some, cut on others but total package would take in same revenue as presently. | Tax neutrality means less likelihood of raising funds from wealthy and prevents any reduction of deficit -- the main fault of tax code today. |

Fairness key to tax reform

No bargain for consumers

Do imports mean lower prices for the American consumers?

A closer look at the costs of imported and American-made shirts shows who really profits from low-wage foreign imports.

Three foreign-made shirts get the same $18-price-tag as an identical American-made garment, meaning big profits for retailers and no savings to consumers.

In another example, the Clothing & Textile Workers compared the costs of men's long-sleeve broadcloth shirts manufactured in America and overseas and then reviewed the price tags set by a major retailer.

The wholesale cost of the made-in-America shirt at $6.50, plus the retailer's 100 percent markup, made the total retail price $13.

The cost of the same shirt made in Korea was $4.25, including labor, shipping and tariffs. The retailer added a 206 percent markup of $8.75 and sold the shirt for $13.

For every imported shirt sold, the retailer made an extra $2.25. On an annual basis, the union found, the retailer imported 250,000 dozen shirts for a total additional profit of $6.75 million.

Imports may be cheaper to make, particularly in Korea where wages average 79 cents an hour, or China, where clothing workers earn 16 cents an hour, but they're no bargain for American consumers and workers.

Imports have wiped out 300,000 apparel and textile jobs since 1980, and over the next five years 2 million more jobs will be lost unless imports are controlled, apparel unions estimate. Last year textile and clothing imports grew 32 percent. They have doubled since 1981 and now control over 50 percent of the U.S. market.

Organized labor has urged Congress to adopt the Textile & Apparel Trade Enforcement Act to limit imports.

Kirkland hits proposals as anti-worker

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on the House Ways & Means Committee to break free of the ''parameters'' set by the Reagan Administration and make fairness the thrust of tax reform legislation.

Kirkland's letter to Commitee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) expressed labor's concern that the starting point for shaping a tax bill to be brought to the House floor is far distant from the goal of tax equity.

Both the Administration proposal and the starting draft of the tax bill being marked up by the committee would impose new taxes on workers to recoup revenue losses resulting from another huge tax cut for persons in the highest income brackets.

The top tax rate—which was 70 percent when President Reagan took office—would be slashed from its present 50 percent level to 35 percent. But workers would face new taxes on employer-provided benefits and the two-earner tax deduction for working couples would be eliminated.

Loopholes remain

Under both versions, there would be only a modest shift of the tax burden from individuals to corporations. Business tax loopholes that could be used to reduce the deficit would be left open or only partially closed. Both versions accept President Reagan's insistence that the tax changes be ''revenue-neutral.''

Any tax reform bill locked into those boundaries is destined to fail the test of fairness, Kirkland protested.

Kirkland urged the committee to reject all proposals to tax workers on employer-provided benefits. He also strongly opposed efforts to end the existing deduction for state and local taxes, and those proposals that would abolish the two-earner and child-care tax credits.

The House committee's draft bill would tax employer-paid premiums above $120 a month for individuals and $300 for families. The President's latest plan would tax a portion of every worker's health insurance.

But the committee's draft bill would also end the existing tax exemption for group life insurance, death benefits, education assistance, group legal services and even van pooling. The Administration had originally proposed taxing a broad array of worker benefits but backed off somewhat under a storm of protest. However, it still wants to

'85 trade deficit tops $91 billion and still growing

The U.S. foreign trade deficit grew by $9.9 billion during August, deepening concerns that this year's shortfall is certain to eclipse 1984's record-smashing $123.3 billion.

The trade gap for the first eight months of 1985 stood at $91.1 billion, the Commerce Dept. said, up sharply from the $83.9 billion deficit racked up during the same period last year.

The figures show that the nation's international trade accounts are ''hemorrhaging,'' AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said, blaming the imbalance between exports and imports for a recession level jobless rate of 7 percent, and the

House majority opposes assault on job benefits

A majority of the entire House of Representatives is cosponsoring a labor-backed resolution opposing taxation of employer-paid job benefits.

The tally of sponsors reached the goal of 219 on Oct. 1 and had mounted to 232 a day later, with further additions likely. Sixty-two Republicans joined 170 Democrats to send a bipartisan message to the House Ways & Means Committee as it began the process of putting together a tax reform bill.

Both President Reagan's tax plan and the version the Ways & Means Committee is using as a starting point would impose new taxes on worker benefits. The resolution initiated by Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) expresses ''the sense of the House of Representatives that employee benefits not be taxed.''

In other congressional developments of importance to workers and their unions:

- The Senate gave a 53-42 bipartisan endorsement to a labor-supported, Administration opposed bill to curb textile and apparel imports and reserve 40 percent of the U.S. shoe market for American-made shoes.

The legislation was offered as an amendment to an unrelated, Administration-sought bill involving a military agreement with Micronesia. The 53-42 vote defeated a motion to table and thus kill the import amendment. The Senate Republican leadership then set the bill aside, putting off a showdown until a later date.

- Congress continued the trade adjustment assistance program beyond its Sept. 30 expiration date by including a 45-day extension of the law in a bill signed by President Reagan that also continued the existing federal cigarette tax. A longer-term continuation of the program is expected to clear Congress before the end of the session.

- A compromise partly defused an attempt to deny federal wage-hour protection to state and local government employees whose coverage under a 1974 law was upheld earlier this year by the Supreme Court. Although the coverage is in effect, the Labor Dept. had said it would not start enforcing it until Oct. 15.

Mayors and other public employers had pressed for an exemption from overtime pay requirements, and the issue was expected to

For earthquake victims

The AFL-CIO has set up a Mexican Earthquake Relief Fund to aid victims of the disaster that recently struck Mexico City, causing thousands of deaths and injuries. The federation's Executive Council has approved a $25,000 contribution to the fund.

In a letter to affiliated unions and state and local central bodies, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that while the immediate needs of the suffering Mexican people are being met, ''additional aid to the victims as well as long-term rehabilitation programs are matters of great concern.''

Mexican officials estimate the earthquakes caused nearly 5,000 deaths, with another 2,000 persons still missing. More than one million workers have been left unemployed.

Persons wishing to join in the assistance effort can send their donations to the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurer, marked for the Mexican Earthquake Relief Fund.

AFL-CIO President Kirkland tells New York rally that Solidarnosc, not Gen. Jaruzelski, speaks for the Polish people.

Kirkland hits Jaruzelski's 'bloody' rule

New York—Poland's Gen. Wojceich Jaruzelski came to this country ''with blood on his hands,'' AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged as he renewed American labor's support for Solidarnosc, the outlawed Polish trade union movement.

Kirkland told a crowd of more than 3,000 that Premier Jaruzelski, who participated in ceremonies marking the 40th anniversary of the United Nations, was ''waging a relentless war of state thuggery, of water hoses, clubs and prison cells'' against his countrymen.

''It is a war of lies and intimidation and murder,'' he said, which has left the Polish communist leader with ''the blood of Solidarnosc (and) the blood of the Polish nation'' on his hands.

Speaking at the rally only a few hundred yards from the Polish mission to the UN, Kirkland charged that Jaruzelski also came to America to ''con our bankers and businessmen into granting new credits'' by convincing them that ''life has returned to 'normal' in Poland'' following the declaration of amnesty in July.

Continuing oppression

Since then, ''more than 300 Solidarnosc activists have been arrested,'' Kirkland said, ''and Bogdan Lis, Adam Michnik and Wladislaw Frasnuik have been jailed following show trials reminiscent of the Stalin era.''

Despite the state's crackdown on the union, he declared, ''Solidarnosc lives—though underground,'' adding:

''The official company unions are spurned by the workers. Countless thousands of Poles risk their lives every day to sustain a vast network of trade union organizations, independent newspapers, publishing houses, educational and cultural societies—all independent of the state.

''They, and not Jaruzelski, speak for Poland.''

Other speakers included Mayor Edward Koch; Aloysius A. Mazewski, president of the Polish American Congress, and Habibullach Mayar of the Free Afghanistan movement.

OSHA levies fine on Union Carbide for safety breach

The Union Carbide Corp. has been cited for a half-dozen ''willful and serious'' violations of federal safety standards relating to the Aug. ll release of a toxic cloud from the company's plant in Institute, W.Va. The escaping gas injured 135 area residents and six workers, including five members of the Machinists.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration proposed penalties of $32,100 against Union Carbide, which said it will contest the citations.

''Union Carbide willfully violated their own company procedures, standard industry practice and federal health and safety regulations,'' Acting OSHA Administrator Patrick R. Tyson said.

The company was criticized strongly after the accident for its delay in notifying citizens about the hazard. Suits seeking more than $85 million have been filed against Union Carbide by residents who were exposed to the fumes.

Negligence charged

OSHA accused the company of willful violations that involved negligence in exposing the six workers to the hazard of an uncontrolled toxic release, failure to follow company operating procedures in the transfer and storage of a toxic material, as well as emergency procedures, and failure to provide sufficient, accessible emergency respiratory equipment.

The serious citations included failure to provide respiratory equipment to workers temporarily assigned to the pesticide production unit, failure to provide adequate written operating procedures for emergency use of respirators, and electrical violations.

The OSHA citations were the result of a three-week investigation of the accident. The agency is currently conducting ''wall-to-wall'' inspections of all 19 divisions of the Institute facility, an action that should be completed by the end of the year.

Trade blunder erodes jobs in telecommunications field

Unions representing telecommunications workers urged Congress to repair a five-year-old trade blunder that has cost the United States thousands of jobs and threatens further destruction of an industry in which this country should be a world leader.

Legislation being considered by the House Commerce Committee should compel presidential action to counter unfair trade practices, both the Communications Workers and the Electrical Workers stressed at House hearings. Discretionary authority for presidential action has been ineffective, the unions noted.

Since the breakup of the Bell System and the separation of the AT&T equipment manufacturing arm, foreign imports have flooded the U.S. market. But an agreement with Japan that was supposed to have opened the way to large-scale purchases of U.S. equipment by that country's telephone and telegraph system hasn't done so.

Familiar pattern

It was against that backdrop of an increasingly familiar one-way flow of trade that CWA Executive Vice President Barbara J. Easterling and IBEW Research Director Robert B. Wood pressed for the strongest feasible legislative remedy.

The hearing was held by the two subcommittees concerned with the issue. Their chairmen—James J. Florio (D-N.J.) and Timothy E. Wirth (D-Colo.)—have cosponsored a measure that seeks to identify and counter barriers to U.S.-made telecommunications equipment. Following the joint hearing, both subcommittees cleared the bill for action by the full Energy & Commerce Comittee.

Wood testifying for IBEW President Charles H. Pillard, noted that from 1981 to 1984 the Japanese purchased only $61 million in telecommunications equipment from the United States, continuing to give preference to Japanese manufacturers. But under America's open trade policy, Japanese firms sold $1.9 billion in telecommunications equipment to the United States.

U.S. trade representatives in both the Carter and Reagan Administrations had worked, Wood said, and the time for remedial action is overdue.

Easterling said the CWA welcomed the approach taken by a bill sponsored by Sen. John Danforth (R-Mo.), which was recently approved by the Senate Finance Committee. It would restrict telecommunications equipment entry to U.S. markets from any country that denies U.S. equipment equally free access to its home markets.

A somewhat different approach, involving enforcement through the Federal Communications Commission, is provided in the Florio-Wirth bill.

The union witnesses welcomed the thrust of the legislation and urged a number of tightening amendments, which the subcommittees adopted, to make the bill more effective.

Especially important, they said, is the need to assure that there is no loophole that would exempt from import restrictions products produced abroad by U.S. companies.

Washington unions launch coordinated organizing drive

Kelso, Wash.—A drive toward coordinated organizing was launched here by enthusiastic delegates to the Washington State AFL-CIO convention.

More than 400 delegates—a record high attended the convention and ratified a resolution calling for the mobilization of all available resources to facilitate organizing efforts.

The resolution established a committee to assist in the process, and called on local unions to pool information about union-busters operating in the state, and to share successful organizing tactics and strategies.

The convention was marked by the retirement of President Marvin L. Williams, who had held that post since 1980 and had been an officer for 21 years.

A statewide referendum is currently under way to fill the council's top positions. The Washington state federation is one of only a few state bodies which elects its officers in this fashion.

Contending for the presidency are Lawrence Kenney, Newspaper Guild, the council's outgoing secretary-treasurer, and Ralph Burnett, Woodworkers, currently board vice prisident. Campaigning for the secretary-treasurer's post are Al Brisbois of the Teachers and Richard Bever of the Plumbers.

The mail ballots will be tallied in December.

Former Rep. Brock Adams (D), considered a likely challenger in 1986 for the seat now held by Sen. Slade Gordon (R), received a convention ovation. A resolution was adopted urging him to run for the Senate post.

Gov. Booth Gardner (D) spoke out sharply against an initiative petition now being circulated which would permit private firms to write workers' compensation insurance, now handled exclusively by a state fund. The initiative, which would be on the 1986 ballot if it gathers enough signatures, would ''destroy benefits'' for injured workers, Gardner said.

The convention went on record against the initiative, and passed a resolution establishing a labor committee to monitor the way in which the state administers the insurance fund.

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, told delegates that their drive toward coordinated organizing was in line with the AFL-CIO report on ''The Changing Situations of Workers and Their Unions,'' which recommended a series of possible actions to broaden and strengthen the labor movement.

Issue of justice

Young termed the pay equity issue that the State, County & Municipal Employees have been pressing for state workers ''an issue of basic justice.'' He pledged the AFL-CIO's ''total commitment and full support'' to the effort.

Delegates attended workshops on labor's changing role, the privacy issue raised by drug screening tests, asbestos removal and safety programs, and worker's compensation.

Among the three dozen resolutions adopted by the convention were calls for:

- Health insurance for unemployed workers.
- Homeowners insurance for day-care facilities, many of which are facing cancellation by private insurers.
- Inclusion in collective bargaining agreements of a clause allowing parental leaves of absence of up to six months without loss of seniority or benefits.

Expanded toxic hazard rule sought to protect all workers

The Food & Commercial Workers called on the Labor Dept. to expand coverage of its hazard communication standard to all workers, including barbers and beauticians who face high risks from exposure toxic substances.

UFCW President William H. Wynn expressed his concerns for not only the 40,000 UFCW members in the two trades, but also for the consumers who may be at risk of injuries ranging from cancer to serious skin disorders.

In a letter to Labor Sec. William A. Brock, Wynn noted that manufacturers of cosmetics and hair care products are not required to list product ingredients, some of which are known carcinogens, on the containers.

Wynn pointed out that various studies have shown that beauticians are at a higher risk than the general public of getting uterine and ovarian cancers, suffer higher rates of breast, digestive and respiratory cancers and are more prone to miscarriages and premature deliveries.

The attractive scents of shampoos, hair sprays and cosmetics hide the dangers of the toxic chemicals they contain, Wynn said. Methylene chloride is a common hair spray ingredient known to cause cancer in animals, and ethyl methacrylate used in many sculptured nail applications can cause neurological damage.

The AFL-CIO and the Steelworkers had successfully challenged the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's decision to limit coverage of its hazard communications standard to just manufacturing industries.

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Philadelphia has directed OSHA to reconsider the standard and extend it to all workers, unless it could show why doing so was not feasible.

Kirkland lists fairness as labor's top priority for shaping of tax bill

tax workers' compensation payments and the full amount of unemployment benefits.

Kirkland noted that two-earner families are fast becoming the norm in the United States, and said abolition of the second-earner deduction amounts to a tax increase for working families.

While Reagan wants total elimination of the present federal income tax deduction for taxes paid to state and local governments, the House committee drafts would allow a partial deduction for state and local income and real estate taxes.

Kirkland noted that the AFL-CIO's testimony earlier this year proposed a comprehensive overhaul of the tax code. He included in his letter to Rostenkowski a short list of labor's priority recommendations.

Needed changes

In addition to opposition to new taxes on worker benefits, they included:

- A 45-percent tax bracket, which would apply to the portion of a joint return income over $100,000. Both the Administration and the committee bill would drop the top tax rate from 50 to 35 percent. With other modifications, labor's plan would add more than $4 billion a year in revenue.
- A modification of the higher personal exemption proposed by the Administration so that the tax savings would be more equitably shared.
- Reducing the exemption from taxation of capital gains income from the present 60 percent to 40 percent. The committee bill also would raise the effective rate of capital gains taxation, in contrast to the Administration version.
- Opposition to the Administration's proposal to give corporations a $6-billion tax windfall by allowing a 10-percent deduction on the dividends they distribute. The committee draft would phase in the Administration giveaway over 10 years.
- A lesser drop in the top corporate tax rate, which relatively few firms actually pay. The Administration proposed to cut the top rate from 46 percent to 33 percent. The committee draft has a 35-percent top, and the AFL-CIO proposal is for a 41-percent corporate tax ceiling.
- A minimum tax for both corporations and individuals with large tax exemptions that closes loopholes more adequately than the Administration plan. The committee draft bill moves in that direction.
- Giving corporations a tax deduction—not a tax credit—for taxes paid to foreign governments. This reform alone would add $10 billion in revenue, the AFL-CIO estimated.

Kirkland expressed concern to Rostenkowski that conformity to the Administration's concept of revenue neutrality could result in a bigger deficit and a further tilt of the tax structure to reward wealth.

"A fair tax system is one which is based on ability to pay and which raises sufficient revenues to meet the needs of society," Kirkland stressed.

First step

"Removing the distortions from the current code—which could result in a net increase in revenue—would be a good first step in narrowing the budget deficit and bringing equity to our tax system," he urged.

Kirkland challenged the Administration's rationale in proposing legislation that would give 25 percent of the tax savings to the one-half of 1 percent of the population with incomes over $200,000.

"The head of U.S. Steel testified that the bill would reduce his personal tax bill by $168,000," Kirkland noted. "Surely those who are in such a position can afford less reduction," he suggested.

Proposals to tax established worker benefits such as health insurance stand in stark contrast to the bill's over-generous handouts to the wealthy, Kirkland pointed out. These life-support benefits, he stressed, serve a national purpose in providing needed protection to "a broad segment of the population which otherwise would be unable to afford it."

Message to Congress

Coalition fighting toxic hazards collected one million signatures on petitions demanding a strengthened Superfund to clean up hazardous wastes. They were brought to this Capitol Hill rally along with samples of toxic wastes from dump sites in 100 communities. The Senate passed an expanded Superfund bill, 86-13. John O'Connor, coordinator of the National Campaign Against Toxic Hazards, joined by members of Congress, urged the House to adopt a stronger measure, citing concern over the thousands of toxic waste sites.

Moore appointed IBEW secretary as Leigon retires

Jack F. Moore was named secretary of the Electrical Workers to fill out the unexpired term of Ralph A. Leigon, who retired Oct. 1. The appointment made by IBEW President Charles H. Pillard was approved by the union's executive council.

Moore had been the 11th District vice president since 1976, a post to which he was appointed after having served in various offices in IBEW Local 453 in Springfield, Mo. Moore also had served as president of the Springfield AFL-CIO and on the executive board of the state labor federation.

Leigon, who was named secretary emeritus by the executive council, had been secretary since 1976. He also served as a vice president and executive board member of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

IBEW Rep. Ray Edwards was appointed to serve out Moore's unexpired term as 11th District vice president.

New 'guestworker' schemes draw Farm Workers' fire

There is no agricultural labor shortage for employers paying fair wages and providing decent working conditions, the Farm Workers testified at House hearings on immigration legislation.

UFW Vice President Dolores Huerta strongly condemned both the "guestworker" program included in the Senate-passed immigration bill and a modified version backed by the Reagan Administration. The clear intent, she charged, is to set back union organization among agricultural workers by assuring employers a steady supply of cheaper foreign labor.

"There is not a shortage of workers," Huerta told a House Judiciary subcommittee. There is a shortage of workers who are willing to be exploited by nonunion employers, she said.

Huerta charged that a chief Administration witness for the labor-opposed program was himself a large California grower with a sullied record as an employer.

Her target was Deputy Agriculture Sec. John Norton, one of a panel of officials who testified that the Reagan Administration supported the "principles" of a temporary guestworker program even though it hadn't yet agreed on the specifics of legislation.

Filthy conditions

Huerta said that Norton, the former president of Western Growers, had headed a company that had been found guilty of firing entire crews of workers because they were union supporters and had housed workers in a Salinas labor camp without mattresses or bedding, and with filthy and stopped-up toilets. Workers are charged $60 a week for their board, she said.

Republicans on the Immigration Subcommittee objected loudly to Huerta's "defamatory" attacks on a government official, but Democrats responded that she had every right to speak to a matter of "public policy." A spokesman for Norton said later that accommodations for the Salinas lettuce workers were provided by a contractor, not directly by the Norton Co., and that the meal charge to the workers was $56 a week.

The "statement of principles" the Reagan Administration officials presented in their earlier testimony held that growers should be able to bring in crews of foreign workers to harvest "truly perishable crops." The growers have contended that existing law, which requires certification by the Labor Dept. that there is a shortage of domestic workers before foreign workers are allowed, is too cumbersome.

Huerta told the subcommittee that there are more than 220,000 unemployed farm workers already in the United States.

Donahue cites role of unions as force for social change

Cambridge, Mass.—America's trade unions constitute "a vital, powerful and effective movement," working toward creating a society in which workers and the people hold more social power than government and corporations, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said.

Speaking at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, where he delivered the 1985 Jerry Wurf Memorial Lecture—named for the late president of the State, County & Municipal Employees—Donahue said workers are engaged in a "struggle to achieve full participation" in society.

Organized labor, he said, "is a movement with faith in the nation and with faith in its own ability to make that nation more responsive to the needs of workers and those of all the people."

Persistent struggle

Donahue reminded his audience that today's unions are "the net product of over 150 years of development, of successes and failures, and they reflect the fact that for all those years they have existed in struggle."

Employers have never welcomed unions, and communities have often been hostile to them. As a result, "the pages of U.S. labor history are filled with the sacrifice, and in some cases the blood, of workers," he asserted.

Those struggles and sacrifices, Donahue said, "continue today in southern textile mill towns, in western mining communities, in major cities and country towns where hospital and health care workers struggle for recognition, and wherever pickets walk."

Today's unions, he went on, "are the inheritors of all that history, the bearers of all those scars."

Although the past "holds great values for the lessons it can teach," Donahue said, it is no substitute for meeting the problems of the present. "In a world which changes as rapidly as ours, activists and leaders must learn from the past but must focus their attention on today and tomorrow."

For those who still "speak of the decline and death of the labor movement," he stressed that they "overlook the fact that (labor) is not merely a collection of institutions but is a movement, an idea, a philosophy, a piece of society."

The concept of unions, Donahue told the Harvard audience, "has existed and survived in one form or another ever since human beings first found themselves in the position of having to earn their daily bread by working for others, and it will exist as long as that arrangement continues."

Donahue added:

"Unions have no life of their own, apart from their members . . . and they change in every generation in whatever way the needs of those members dictate."

Boycott rallies slated against Coors, Armour

Union members, students and consumers are targeting stores that sell Coors beer and Armour hot dogs for a nationwide protest on Oct. 10, sponsored by the Food & Commercial Workers.

The demonstrators will distribute balloons and handbills telling shoppers why the managements of Coors and Armour Processed Meats are unfair employers and urging consumers not to buy their products.

Members of AFL-CIO unions have been invited to join in the demonstrations.

Bricklayers vote to broaden process of decision making

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the Bricklayers' convention approved a plan to enlarge the union's governing structure and make more local officers part of the decision-making process.

The convention also adopted another key recommendation of a ''blueprint for growth'' proposal—a five-year, $7.5-million organizing program to bring new members into the union.

Both actions had been urged by the Project 2000 Committee, made up of 28 local union officers who had worked for 18 months to chart long-term goals.

As approved by the delegates, the Executive Council will be enlarged through regionally elected vice presidents. The enlarged council will in turn develop specific plans for further regionalization of the union's structure, President John T. Joyce told the delegates.

The organizing program will seek to increase the 103,000 masonry craftsmen and allied workers the Bricklayers now represent rather than seek members in unrelated industries. It will be funded by a $10-a-member annual assessment for three years, and after that by dues income from new members.

Guide to future

Both proposals were approved by big majorities and Joyce said other recommendations of the Project 2000 Committee will be a guide to the union's actions in the years ahead.

Some of its recommendations that did not require convention action included promotion of masonry construction and exploration of new services that can be provided for members.

Joyce, who has headed the Bricklayers since 1979, was re-elected to a new five-year term. He defeated by a 53,550-to-24,385 vote a challenge by a former president of the union, Thomas F. Murphy.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in an address to the convention, welcomed the ''healthy system of self-examination'' displayed in the blueprint for growth.

''Throughout the labor movement,'' Kirkland said, ''our unions are examining proposals for structural changes to broaden and strengthen all of our organizations. They are looking at changes in organizing techniques, changes in the categories of union membership and changes in the range of union services.''

Charting a course

There are no ''all-purpose blueprints or sure-fire solutions,'' Kirkland said. ''The officers and members of the Bricklayers, like those of all our affiliates, will formulate their own goals, choose their own path and set their own pace.''

But throughout the labor movement, Kirkland stressed, ''I don't hear the voice of retreat. I hear the call to move forward.''

Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., urged local unions to closely monitor their pension fund investments to assure that assets don't end up funding non-union construction projects.

Delegates also heard a pledge of solidarity from the president of the unaffiliated Mine Workers, Richard Trumka. ''Your picket line will be our picket line,'' he affirmed.

In other elections, Executive Vice President L. Gerald Carlisle defeated Cleveland Business Agent F.H. Jones for secretary-treasurer. Incumbent Edward M. Bellucci did not seek re-election. Carlisle's post as executive vice president will be filled by Thomas Uzzalino of Ridgefield Park, N.J., who was unopposed. All other incumbent officers were re-elected.

The union presented its Louis Sullivan award for architecture to Ben Thompson of Cambridge, Mass., and made a posthumous award to O'Neill Ford of San Antonio, Tex.

More bad news

Runaway trade deficit expands to $91 billion

decline of 1.6 million jobs in manufacturing since 1979.

''The continued deterioration in the U.S. trade balance,'' Oswald said, ''demonstrates the need for immediate congressional action to defend American industry and American jobs.''

''The timid measures announced by President Reagan will serve only to disguise the enormity of our problem and will do little to reverse America's international economic position,'' he added.

While the overall trade deficit declined slightly from July's $10.5 billion, there was more bad news for U.S. shoe and steel industries, where the Reagan Administration had earlier rejected recommendations from the International Trade Commission for strong action to safeguard American jobs.

Commerce Dept. figures showed shoe imports continuing their onslaught on the U.S. market. In August, 69 million pairs of shoes entered this country, compared to 68.7 million in the same month last year. Imports are 8.4 percent higher than 1984's record-breaking levels, and now account for 80 percent of the domestic market.

Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn called the latest statistics ''a national tragedy,'' and assailed President Reagan's ''callous disregard for the welfare of the domestic shoe industry and its workers.''

The situation ''amounts to a death sentence on an entire industry,'' Wynn said. ''Thousands of American shoeworkers have watched in frustration as their jobs are shipped overseas, while the Reagan Administration sits on its hands and spouts rhetoric about 'free trade.'''

President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers called the report ''disheartening,'' and said it was ''another piece of the mounting evidence that President Reagan's trade policies are bankrupt.''

Administration inaction

The jobs of millions of American workers in many industries ''are being buried in an avalanche of imports,'' Finley declared. ''Since the Reagan Administration has refused American workers any meaningful protection from imports, we now look to the Congress to save our industries and the jobs they produce.''

August steel imports surged 29 percent over the previous month, setting up what Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan called ''the first critical test'' of the Administration's ability to curtail imports through negotiated trade agreements with 14 steel-producing nations.

At the time he rejected ITC recommendations to deal with the problem, Reagan claimed his alternative would hold imports to a roughly 20 percent share of the U.S. market.

''To achieve that goal,'' Sheehan said, ''the Administration will have to hold imports substantially below current levels for the next several months. The President will have to make sharp cutbacks in steel imports if his import-restraint program has any hope of success.''

The August reduction in the overall trade deficit was fueled by a $234-million decline in petroleum imports, the result of a decrease in the volume of oil coming into the country, and a 95-cent-a-barrel drop in the price of oil due to the ongoing price war being waged within OPEC.

Even so, imports totaled $27.3 billion in August, while exports inched up only seven-hundredths of 1 percent to $17.4 billion. It took increases in oil and agricultural shipments to achieve that slight upturn, because there was a $115.8-million decline in the export of manufactured goods.

Economists pointed out that, while Americans slowed their purchases of foreign goods, other nations continued to resist the import of American-made goods into their markets.

UAW wins fight for white-collar unit in Michigan

Lansing, Mich.—Some 10,000 Michigan state human services employees chose the Auto Workers as their bargaining representative shedding their representation by the unaffiliated Michigan State Employees Association.

The UAW polled 3,985 votes to MSEA's 2,709 and 716 for neither. It was the largest white-collar representation vote in UAW's history.

In another MSEA unit of 11,000 administrative and support employees which voted on Sept. 25, the UAW won 3,936 votes to MSEA's 2,906 and 1,906 votes for no representation. Since the UAW did not get a majority of the votes, a runoff election will be held after Nov. 10.

In Ohio, some 13,700 state employees in six units voted on the unions to represent them recently, and ballots will be mailed Oct. 15 to 13,500 workers in four other units.

The Hospital & Health Care Employees won representation of some 1,800 social service workers. NUHHCE was placed under Article XX sanctions by the AFL-CIO for not withdrawing from a representation campaign at the Ohio State Mental Health and Mental Retardation Institutions.

Top vote-getters

The Communications Workers and the State, County & Municipal Employees were the top vote-getters in a three-way contest for some 5,600 maintenance workers, where a runoff election will be held.

In the vote to represent 1,500 state liquor and lottery office workers, the Food & Commercial Workers received half the ballots cast and must win one of the 10 challenged votes to win the election.

In three uncontested elections, AFSCME won the right to represent 3,300 state inspectors and regulatory officers; the unaffiliated National Education Association will represent 800 teachers and librarians, and the unaffiliated Federation of Police Officers will represent 700 law-enforcement officers.

Ballots will be mailed Oct. 15 to workers in four other units. The State Employment Relations Board said it will tally the votes Nov. 6.

Most Americans favor import curbs

Most Americans, concerned about imports wiping out U.S. jobs, want federal action to halt the worsening trade imbalance, and reaffirmed their confidence in the quality of U.S.-made products, according to three nationwide surveys.

A Los Angeles Times poll of 1,967 people across the country showed strong support for legislation to curb imports by a 51-percent to a 37-percent margin.

Not surprisingly, those surveyed tended to blame foreign countries for the trade imbalance, rather than President Reagan's trade policies or internal problems. They also cited cheap labor abroad as the reason for the success of imports in the American marketplace.

Reagan's action to allow the voluntary quotas on Japanese autos to lapse was opposed by 58 percent of those surveyed.

By better than a 2-to-1 ratio, the respondents in the L.A. Times poll favored restricting imports to keep jobs, rather than keeping open markets that would provide consumers with lower prices.

Three out of four of those surveyed said they felt that the new U.S. status as a debtor nation—meaning it owes other countries more than they owe us—is a ''serious problem.''

A Washington Post-ABC News poll found a 49-percent to 43-percent majority favored the imposition of taxes or quotas on imports to save U.S. jobs, ''even if it means higher consumer prices.'' Additionally, 79 percent said they were very concerned or somewhat concerned that they or their family will be affected personally by the record U.S. trade deficit.

The Post-ABC poll also reported 38 percent of the 1,512 persons surveyed pay ''a great deal'' of attention to where the products they buy are made. Another 27 percent said they pay ''a fair amount'' of attention to the country of manufacture label.

American consumers still have a high degree of confidence in American-made products, according to a new Gallup Poll.

Gallup said the number of Americans who expect a higher quality from U.S. goods over imports was nearly four times greater than the number who said they prefer foreign-made items.

A majority rated the quality of U.S. products at eight on a scale of one to ten. There were exceptions, Gallup noted, as consumers said they favored foreign-made televisions and other home entertainment items. Foreign cars trailed U.S. autos slightly, the survey said.

come to a head when the House took up an appropriations bill including funds for the Labor Dept. The Appropriations Committee had rejected by only a one-vote margin a labor-opposed amendment to delay enforcement an additional six months.

Meanwhile, behind-the-scenes efforts continued to work out an agreement on clarifying language that would address some of the complaints raised by the mayors without depriving workers of the law's protections.

To allow more time for the negotiations, the House agreed to a one-month postponement of enforcement although the coverage remains in effect.

- Both the House and Senate have voted funds that would avert the sharp and immediate rise in postage rates for publications of non-profit organizations that the Postal Service had scheduled. The Reagan Administration has sought to end the subsidy and charge non-profit mail for full commercial rates.

'Talking union...one-on-one' keeps solidarity alive

By Gene Zack

They're "talking union . . . one-on-one" in the pilot states of Georgia, Missouri and Idaho—and, for good measure, in Arkansas, Illinois and Iowa, as well—and they've generated evidence that labor solidarity is alive and well.

Even in the face of massive layoffs, union members in Idaho are pitching in, ignoring their own plight in order to get the message to their fellow workers that labor has a big stake in what's happening in their state capitol and in Washington.

The One-on-One program involves the development of a cadre of labor activists to meet systematically with every union member and thus mobilize greater individual involvement in labor's activities.

The goal, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said after the project was approved by the Executive Council in May, is to "reach out to the membership in face-to-face conversations," giving them information about the trade union movement and its goals, advising them about labor issues, and enlisting their support.

Signing up

Following training sessions for local officers, stewards and activists, canvassers have begun talking with their fellow unionists on the job and when the day's work is done, soliciting their signatures on forms to be sent to appropriate public officials registering their position on issues of deep concern to working people.

In Georgia and Missouri, workers are signing messages to senators and congressmen opposing Reagan Administration proposals to tax health insurance, workers' compensation, unemployment and black-lung benefits. The Idaho effort is concentrated on a right-to-work referendum which will be on the ballot in November 1986.

The One-on-One project's initial success was summed up well by Thomas Fagan, COPE director of the St. Louis Central Labor Council, where 14 locals have already become involved and where the potential exists to reach some 34,000 members.

New feeling

"The response has been tremendous," Fagan said. "The people here have been hungry for information about the issues and they've been hungry for a way to communicate with their leaders. For the first time, many of them feel like they're part of what's going on in their union."

Business Manager John Durham of Electrical Workers Local 1439 in St. Louis, whose canvassers have already gotten the signatures of 85 percent of the local's 1,700 members—including hundreds employed by public utilities in the neighboring states of Arkansas, Illinois and Iowa—said: "This program really works. It's revitalizing our local."

Canvassing activity in the St. Louis area is also well under way in Service Employees Local 50, whose 6,000 members work in public and private nursing homes, and in the 1,600-member Transit Union Local 788.

In nearby Columbia, according to One-on-One coordinator Drew Anderson, more than half of the 1,400 members of Laborers Local 45 have already signed petitions. The local represents custodial workers at the University of Missouri, Pin Oaks Nursing Home, the county's road and bridge department, and Northeast Missouri State University at neighboring Kirksville. A new drive is being planned to deal with a strictly local issue: a change in workers' parking facilities at the university which would raise the monthly fee its members must pay.

State, County & Municipal Employees Local 1810, representing 900 workers in the medical, mental health and correctional fields in Columbia, has gotten one-third of its members to register their opposition to taxing workers' life-support benefits, and the drive continues.

Joint canvassing

In the recession-ridden ten northern counties of Idaho, canvassing activities are being conducted by locals of the Food & Commercial Workers, Steelworkers, Woodworkers, Communications Workers and Paperworkers, according to AFL-CIO Field Rep. William Domarotsky.

The most impressive job is being done by the 1,200-member IWA Local 3-364 in Lewiston, where 800 of its members are on permanent layoff from Potlatch Corp.

"In spite of the economic blow they've sustained," Domarotsky said, the Woodworkers' activists are "out there every day, carrying the message to their fellow workers that we face another fight on right-to-work next year." The response, he added, has been "most encouraging."

One-on-One could be the means of holding the local together, he added, because it offers a continuing means of communication between the union and members whose jobs have been shot out from under them.

Program underway

Training sessions have already been held for organizers and canvassers in Boise, Nampa and Burleigh in southern Idaho, involving locals of the IBEW, Laborers, CWA, UFCW, SEIU, Sheet Metal Workers, Letter Carriers and Grain Millers, with a combined membership of 5,000. Canvassing efforts are now in progress.

In Georgia, training sessions have been completed for 100 officers and stewards from the Graphic Communications Union, ATU, CWA and Plumbers, with more classes scheduled. Canvassing is just starting and the campaign will get a big boost when delegates to the State AFL-CIO convention meet later this month.

The One-on-One campaign goes to the heart of recommendations on membership participation made by the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work. As Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said when the program was launched, it is "one of the vehicles for the resurgence of the American trade union movement."

The initial reports from the field indicate that, in meeting with rank-and-file members face-to-face, activists are demonstrating that "talking union" pays big dividends.

Transport Workers to seek safeguards for airline jobs

Las Vegas, Nev.—A two-pronged political action drive to protect the jobs of airline employees battered by deregulation and to blunt Reagan Administration efforts to undercut workers' safeguards in public transportation was launched by delegates to the 17th constitutional convention of the Transport Workers.

John E. Lawe, elected to his first full four-year term as president of the TWU, pledged to "reverse the employment and safety nightmares caused by airline deregulation." Since government regulation of the industry ended in 1978, he said, some 40,000 airline employees have either lost their jobs or been displaced.

Lawe also lashed out at what he called the "vendetta-like campaign" being waged by the White House against union safeguards in the Urban Mass Transportation Act. The Administration is seeking to repeal a section of the act guaranteeing collective bargaining for workers when privately owned transit systems are turned over to public operation, even in right-to-work states which ban bargaining by public employees.

Results of deregulation

In his address to the delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland also focused on the airline deregulation issue. Calling himself a "white-knuckled frequent flier," Kirkland said that deregulation "has taught us what we already knew—that if the profit motive is their sole guide, airlines will cannibalize each other to the detriment of their employees, the passenger public and the national interest."

California AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning told the convention that the labor movement "is facing a collective assault from the right, to which we must respond with a collective defense," and meet these attacks head on.

New York State AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary assailed the "Reagan media illusion of prosperity," and issued a call for all trade unionists to "raise the conscience of America . . . to deal with the reality of unemployment and poverty in our nation."

The only speaker not from the labor movement was Al Della Bovi, deputy administrator of the Urban Mass Transportation Administration. Bovi, a Regan appointee, was booed by delegates when he sought to justify the Administration's attempt to renege on labor-protective provisions and to subsidize private entrepreneurs to compete against publicly held transit systems.

Relief for Mexico

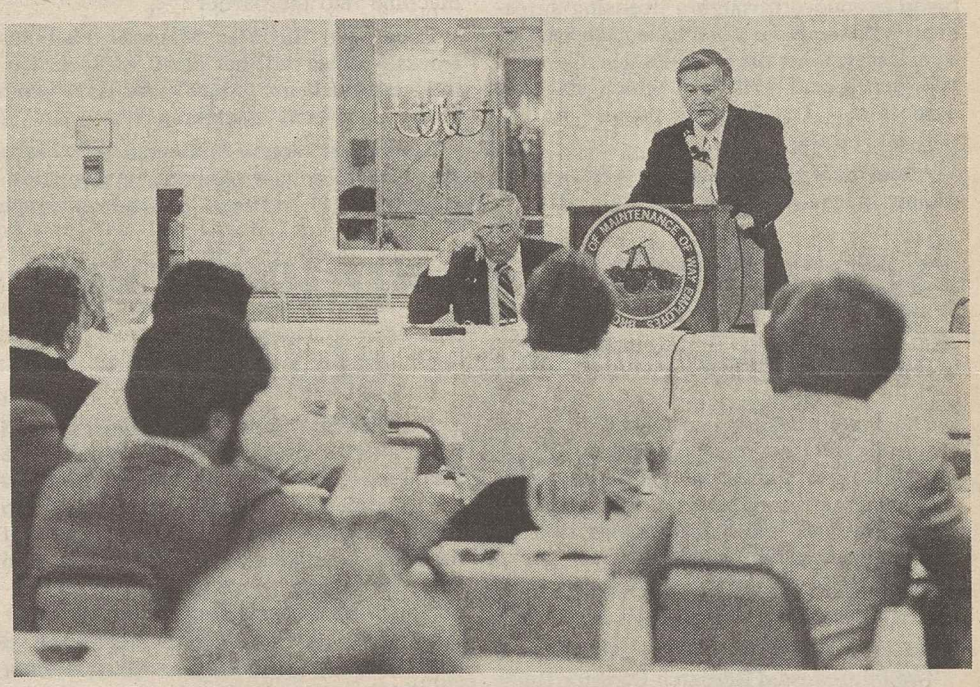
Following adoption of a resolution supporting Red Cross relief efforts in the Mexican earthquake, delegates passed the hat and collected nearly $1,000 in cash for the quake victims. The chair responded by more than matching the delegates' contributions.

Other major resolutions called for:

- "Much stronger action" by the Administration, including a ban on U.S. investments, "to register our nation's protest against the genocidal policies" of South Africa.
- U.S. intervention to force the British government to halt its "barbaric treatment" of minorities in Northern Ireland.
- Congress to reregulate the airline industry "to meet operating, training, maintenance and safety standards."
- An end to the Administration's "archaic" trade policies and adoption of four labor-backed trade bills now before Congress.
- Continuation of federal support for operating and capital assistance to mass transit and Amtrak.
- Opposition to any efforts to tax the life-support benefits of American workers.
- Raising from the present 51 percent to 85 percent the domestic content of rolling stock and replacement parts purchased by public transit authorities in order to qualify for federal funds.
- Support for the sale of Conrail through public stock offerings as proposed by Morgan Stanley & Co., the New York investment bank.

Lawe, a former New York City bus driver and president of TWU's largest local, had been serving as interim president since the death of William G. Lindner in May.



Delegates also elected former New Jersey bus driver George E. Leitz as executive vice president and former New York City trolley car operator and motorman Charles Faulding as secretary-treasurer.

Hal Banks dies at 76, headed Canadian SIU

San Francisco—Hal C. Banks, former president of the Seafarers of Canada, died of heart disease here Sept. 24. He was 76.

An organizer of the SIU-affiliated Sailors Union of the Pacific, he went to Canada in 1949 when President Truman enlisted the SIU's support to end the strike of the communist-dominated Canadian Seamen's Union which was blocking Marshall Plan shipments to Europe.

Banks headed the 15,000-member SIU of Canada until his retirement in 1964.

Legislative track

State legislative representatives of the Maintenance of Way Employees get a first-hand report on contract negotiations and congressional issues from President O.M. Berge. The three-day conference in Washington included briefings on issues affecting railroad unions and lobbying missions to Capitol Hill.

Tentative settlement reached in UTU talks with railroads

Negotiators for the United Transportation Union and major U.S. railroads reached tentative agreement on a four-year contract, six days after an emergency presidential panel called for the elimination of the jobs of some 8,000 firemen through attrition.

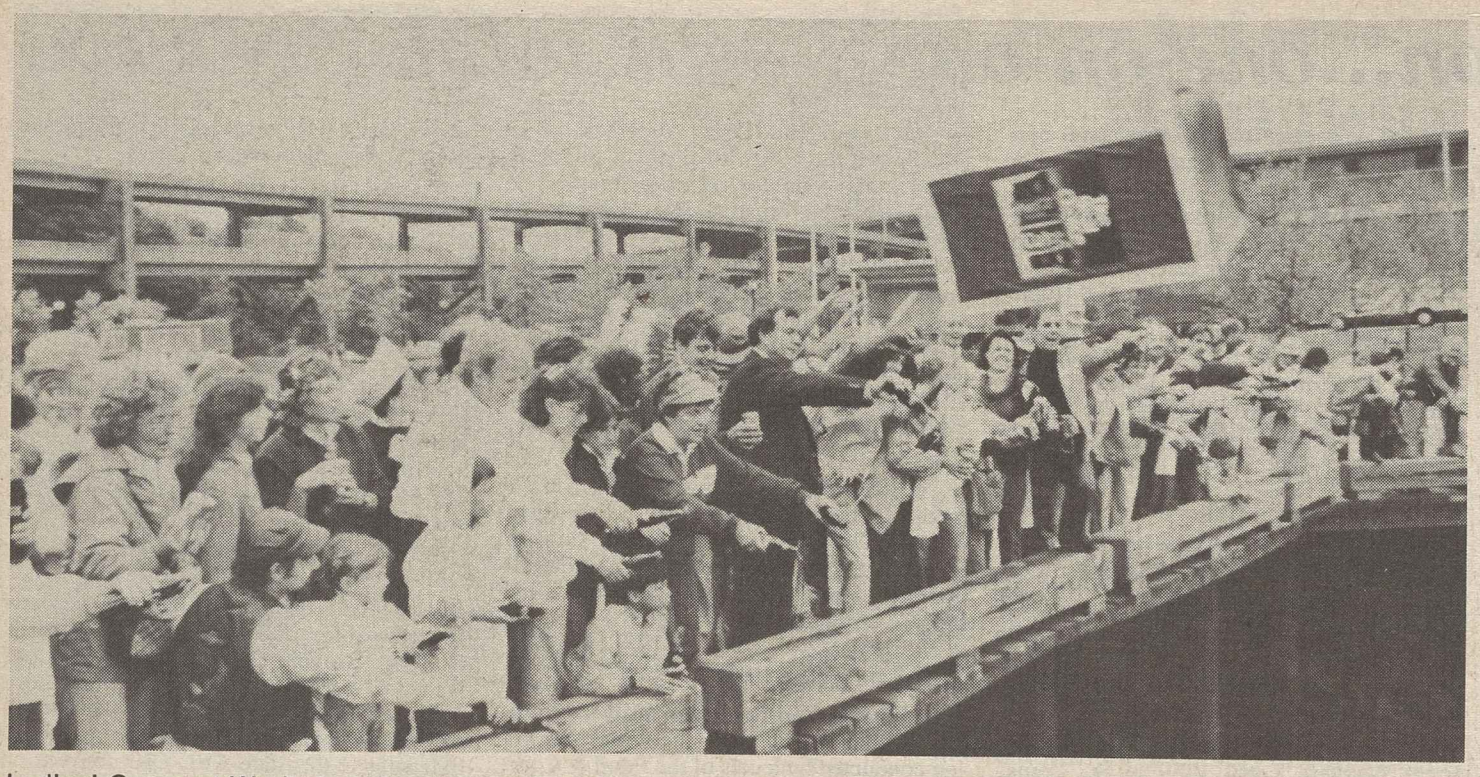
The new contract, if approved, would run from July 1, 1984 through June 30, 1988.

Although details of the settlement were withheld pending ratification, UTU President Fred A. Hardin described it as "a reasonable agreement in line with the recommendations of the board."

The three-member panel sent its nonbinding recommendations to President Reagan on Sept. 25, clearing the way for UTU's 68,000 members in the railroad industry to walk off the job on Oct. 26 in the absence of a new contract.

The emergency board was created in August to forestall a walkout, after a tentative agreement between the union and the carriers—reached after contract talks stretching back to early 1984—failed to win ratification under a union procedure requiring the unanimous approval by all eight crafts involved in the negotiations.

Hardin said it would require three to four weeks for the ratification process, taking the union beyond the strike date. If the tentative pact is rejected, Hardin said, the union would then begin selective strikes against the carriers.



The future of firemen in the railroad industry has been at the heart of a long-running dispute between the union and the carriers, dating back to 1930 when railroads began phasing out steam locomotives as they switched to diesel power.

In 1972, a manning agreement was reached with the carriers establishing a training program to qualify firemen for promotion to locomotive engineers. It was amended in 1978 to give seniority to firemen on the promotion ladder.

Reagan's emergency panel, however, declared that in the period since the manning settlement was reached, "changing conditions, such as deregulation and increased competition," justified reneging on that agreement.

Other issues addressed in the tentative contract between the UTU and the cariers include wages, work rules, and health and safety provisions.

Federal mediators expected the settlement, if ratified, to set a pattern for a dozen other unions still involved in negotiations with the industry. Like the UTU, they have been bargaining with the carriers since 1984.

Ladies' Garment Workers protest Coca Cola Co.'s clothing imports by dumping Coke into Battleship Cove.

On Hong Kong clothing

'Tea party' sends Coke a message

Fall River, Mass.—There's union-made Coke in cans and bottles, but the Coke that you can wear is made in Hong Kong and American apparel workers don't like it a bit.

The Coca Cola Co.'s new line of clothing, being produced through a licensing agreement with the New York-based Murjani International, drew the ire of Ladies' Garment Workers Local 178 here which staged a modern-day Tea Party to protest the imported clothing.

About 50 ILGWU members—five clad in Indian garb—gathered on Fall River's waterfront to dump cans of Coke into Battleship Cove. Four of the Indian "braves" paddled out into the cove to help Chief Little Horse, a retired textile worker and an American Indian, toss a facsimile of a Coke machine into the harbor.

Local 178 Business Manager Nicholas Roussos observed that the Coca Cola Co. is asking workers "to buy its products while at the same time it's taking their jobs."

Roussos and Aaron Mittleman, who heads the New England Apparel Association, staged the "Coke Party" to send a message to "attempt to raise the consciousness of those marketing guys."

Many apparel locals have acted to protest Coca Cola's imported clothing, mainly by removing Coke machines from their buildings and by asking others to do so.

An ad run in a North Carolina newspaper called the new line of clothing "all American." About 30 union officials protested to Coca Cola executives who promised to ask that more of the clothes be made domestically. Murjani was founded in Hong Kong and has factories in the Far East.

Economic pickup welcome, but growth rate still lags

The government's barometer of future economic trends rose seven-tenths of 1 percent in August, indicating that the economy is picking up momentum slowly after an anemic growth rate of just over 1 percent during the first half of the year.

The AFL-CIO called the growth rate report "welcome," but added a cautionary note.

The figures, said Research Director Rudy Oswald, are "another signal that growth is much too weak to reduce unemployment or develop the momentum needed to solve the basic problems caused by runaway trade and budget deficits."

Underscoring the failure of the upturn to create new job opportunities, the Conference Board reported that its help-wanted advertising index plunged 6 percent in August. The statistics show "no signs that the demand for labor in increasing," Ken Goldstein, Conference Board economist, said.

At the same time that it released the index of leading indicators, the Commerce Dept. revised its figures for the two previous months, adjusting the July figure upward by three-tenths of 1 percent, and the June figure downward two-tenths of 1 percent.

Economists say the index has a spotty record of charting business conditions, partly because some of its components only indirectly relate to developments in the real economy, and partly because of the pattern of frequent, and often large, revisions in the data.

A survey of 350 leading economists revealed that they anticipate only a modest pickup in the economy before the nation slips into another recession in either late 1986 or early 1987.

The study, released by the National Association of Business Economists, also showed that 30 percent of the companies surveyed cut their employment during the third quarter of 1985, while only 16 percent increased it.

A significant part of the August growth was attributed to cut-rate automobile financing—with some rates running as low as 7.5 percent—as major auto makers try to move stocks of 1985 cars before the start of the new model year. Some economists said that the incentive program merely encouraged consumers to buy cars now, rather than later, and expressed concern that it would result in reduced growth in coming months.

Six of the 11 indicators available in August contributed to the improvement. They included money supply, building permits, a slight increase in the average workweek, net business formation, manufacturers' new orders for consumer goods and materials, and average weekly initial claims for state unemployment insurance benefits.

Sagging signs

Four of the indicators were on the down side—stock prices, deliveries from vendors, changes in sensitive materials prices, and changes in outstanding credit.

In a separate report, the Commerce Dept. said construction spending rose 1.1 percent last month, to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of $344 billion, 7 percent higher than the level a year ago.

At the same time, the government announced a sharp revision in its construction spending figures for July. After previously reporting that spending went up 1.2 percent in July, Commerce said it actually declined 1 percent.

Meanwhile, machine tool orders slipped 8 percent in August from the seasonally weak previous month, reflecting the economy's continued sluggishness and the cautious buying attitude of durable goods producers.

Factory orders rose a moderate nine-tenths of 1 percent in August after plunging 1.2 percent the previous month, the Census Bureau said.

The Census Bureau also reported that new house sales declined a sharp 5.6 percent in August, although they remained well ahead of last year. The average price of a new house slipped $1,200 in August to $98,300—well below the record of $104,700 reached last April.

It was Communications Workers Vice President James E. Irvine who testified before a Senate subcommittee on access charges for long-distance telephone carriers, not James E. Levine, as reported in the Sept. 21 issue of the AFL-CIO News.

Unions challenge move to capture Frontier Airlines

Denver—Four unions at Frontier Airlines asked a federal court to bar the anti-union Texas Air Corp. from acquiring stock in Frontier Holdings, Inc., parent company of Frontier Airlines.

The suit urged the U.S. District Court here to rule that Texas Air and its president, Frank Lorenzo, have violated the Securities & Exchange Act by making false and misleading statements in documents that were submitted to the Securities & Exchange Commission.

Texas Air is the parent company of Continental Airlines, which filed a Chapter 11 bankruptcy in September 1983 and abrogated its union contracts.

The unions—Air Line Pilots, Flight Attendants, Transport Workers and the Air Line Employees Association—made a buy-out offer of $17 a share for the 12.4 million outstanding shares. Last August they agreed to wage concessions that will eventually allow the creation of an employee stock ownership plan (ESOP).

Texas Air's offer to buy seven million shares at $20 a share will have a negative impact on the agreement between Frontier and its workers and could lead to liquidation or bankruptcy of the airline, the suit charges.

N.C. delegates link job loss to import rise

Charlotte, N.C.—The North Carolina AFL-CIO endorsed a "buy union-buy American" campaign among the state's 150,000 union members and their families.

Calling the measure "good economic sense," the 400 delegates to the 28th convention of the State AFL-CIO launched the program to help stem the heavy loss of manufacturing jobs—especially in textiles and apparel—that has hit the state.

Delegates also called for defeat of proposals to tax workers' fringe benefits and urged the state's congressional delegation to fight the measure.

The convention urged legislation to aid workers and communities hit by plant closings and called for the continuation of trade adjustment assistance benefits.

Passage of a state comparative negligence law was endorsed as a major legislative priority, with North Carolina's current system of contributory negligence termed "a harsh and unjust all-or-nothing rule." A comparative negligence measure would allow accident and injury victims some compensation for damages caused by another person, if the victim's "negligence" was not greater than the defendant's.

Increasing participation

Other resolutions adopted by the convention urged support for black workers and trade unions in South Africa, called on Congress to implement a fair trade policy, and urged all unions to affiliate with local central bodies and the state federation.

The convention re-elected President Christopher Scott to a second two-year term, and elected James Andrews secretary-treasurer. Five new vice presidents were elected and 18 incumbents were returned to office.

Scott called the state federation strong and secure and applauded labor's role in winning a state "right-to-know" law requiring disclosure of toxic chemicals used in the workplace. He noted labor's continuing concern for both union members and the public interest and urged delegates "to communicate better with our own members, because if they are talking up our story, the whole world will hear it."

Justifiable pride

Barbara Hutchinson, an AFL-CIO vice president and director of women's affairs for the Government Employees, told the delegates that despite continuing attack by the Reagan Administration, federal workers can be proud of the work they do.

"No other government in the world provides the kind and quality of services that the United States does," she stressed. Hutchinson praised the AFL-CIO report, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," for fostering "enthusiasm and dedication among union brothers and sisters."

Charles Sallee, executive vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, charged in a speech to the convention that imports are threatening "the very existence of organized labor." He urged support for a measure now before Congress to limit textile and clothing imports.

Delegates presented folk singer Pete Seeger with a special award recognizing his 40 years of support for organized labor.

Price Tag on Congress

Millions of dollars will be raised and spent over the next 13 months in the campaign to elect a senator from the state of Maryland. And that's one reason incumbent Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., is not seeking a fourth term.

Mathias, a COPE-endorsed Republican who has often been out of step with the Reagan Administration, has long deplored the high cost of public office.

The Senate is in danger of becoming an institution in which membership would be limited to "youthful heirs to great fortunes or to elderly business executives of ample means who want to fill their twilight hours with indoor work that does not require heavy lifting," Mathias once complained.

At the news conference in which he announced his decision not to run for re-election, Mathias said the high cost of campaigns amounts to a "crisis of liberty."

That's not an overstatement. Last year, total spending on congressional campaigns came close to $375 million, an average of nearly $1 million for each contested election. Fueling this spending spree were thousands of political action committees set up by businesses and trade associations. Each election year, the PAC role in financing congressional campaigns has grown.

Perhaps because incumbents can most easily tap this flow of interest-group money, Congress has been reluctant to face up to the implications. Appropriately, it was a Senate committee headed by Mathias that last explored alternatives to financing of political campaigns. And the AFL-CIO testimony at that 1983 hearing remains, unhappily, just as pertinent today. These were some of the points emphasized:

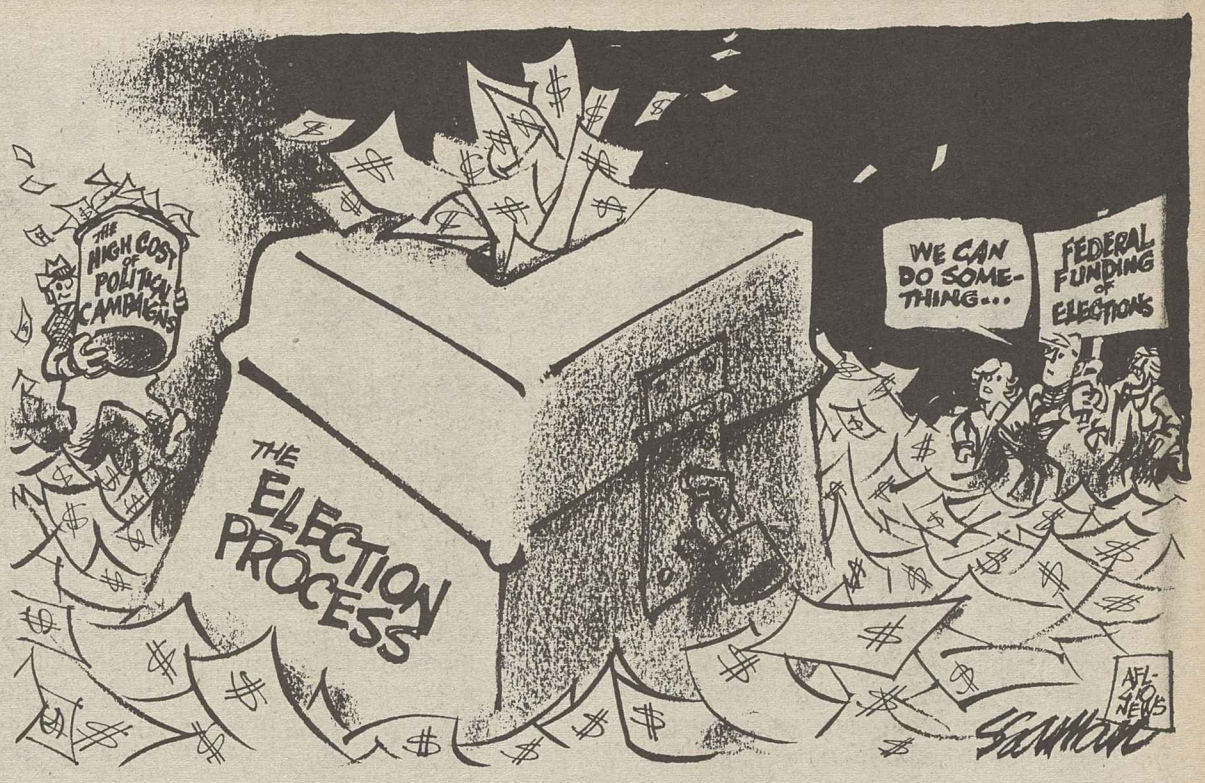
The influence of private money in elections must be curbed "in order to lessen the ever-growing pressure on candidates to spend more and more time raising more and more money, and to assure the public's confidence in the integrity of our electoral and legislative processes."

The most appropriate remedy—"an idea whose time is ripe"—is a system of public financing of congressional campaigns comparable to the successful federal funding of presidential elections.

If that is too bold a step to win approval, there should at least be "overall limits on the amount which a congressional candidate may accept in PAC contributions."

Such a contribution ceiling would apply equally to contributions from union as well as business political action organizations.

At best, political action committees enable large numbers of voters to pool small contributions so as to make an impact. That's a concept that COPE and its counterparts pioneered. But to the detriment of the political process, PACs have also enabled a relatively small number of wealthy individuals who have already directly contributed to a candidate the maximum amount allowed by law to further expand their influence.



Neither in Maryland nor in any other state should party nominations and election to Congress depend on which candidate is most adept at raising money from the largest number of interest groups. And that's the bottom line.

Underground Poland

In Poland, Solidarnosc lives—though underground. The official company unions are spurned by the workers. Countless thousands of Poles risk their lives every day to sustain a vast network of trade union organizations, independent newspapers, publishing houses, educational and cultural societies—all independent of the state.

They, and not Gen. Jaruzelski, speak for Poland. It is they who are sending irreversible ripples of freedom through the communist world.

Rosy economic 'recovery' bypasses basic industries

By Press Associates, Inc.

The condition of the nation's manufacturing sector is critical—a situation which the past three years of "recovery" is no longer able to mask. The American public has awakened to the crisis of industrial decline and is demanding government action, begining with unfair trade practices.

A description of what has been happening to U.S. industries, workers and communities can be found in a report by the Full Employment Action Council and the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"Despite improvements in the overall unemployment rate since the depths of the 1982 recession, many of America's basic industries are in worse condition today than they were at the end of the last decade," the report states. "The erosion of the nation's industrial base has marked the 1980s as an era of abandoned plants, lost jobs, diminished earnings, depressed communities, and shattered dreams," it continues.

Lost jobs

Employment in manufacturing, the report notes, is now 1.7 million below what it was in 1979. Thirty-five states have failed to recover all the jobs lost in manufacturing in the past five years, the report notes.

Since 1979, more than 11 million workers have lost their jobs due to plant closings, slack work or new technology. About one in four of these displaced workers remained jobless even after five years and one in seven dropped out of the labor force. Of those back at work, 45 percent are earning less than they did before, the report says.

Regarding specific industries, these are among the report's findings:

- In the automobile industry, employment declined about 28 percent, or 218,429 fewer jobs, between its 1978 peak and May 1985.

In Michigan, more than 100,000 auto workers were laid off between 1979 and 1982. Of those surveyed in the summer of 1984, 30 percent had not been recalled. Among those still on layoff, 47 percent had found new jobs; 43 percent were still unemployed or working part-time, and over 9 percent had given up looking.

- In farm equipment manufacturing, employment declined 53 percent from its peak in 1979 and April 1985. This represented a loss of 62,000 jobs.

- In the basic steel industry, employment plummented from 418,300 in 1979 to 187,000 in June 1985.

Since 1974, at least three steel companies went bankrupt, resulting in the shutdown of some 200 steel plants. In 1984 alone, Bethlehem Steel closed its Lackawanna plant, causing 7,000 layoffs, and U.S. Steel closed 71 facilities with 15,000 workers.

- In copper mining, smelting and refining, employment fell from 44,000 in 1979 to about 20,000 currently. About 50 percent of the nation's copper mines were closed between 1981 and 1984.

- In the electrical and electronics industries, the jobless rate is 86 percent higher than it was in 1979. Production jobs fell by 183,600 between May 1979 and May 1983.

- Since 1979, 420 textile plants have closed or partially shut down, displacing more than 92,000 workers, most of them in the South.

- Since 1981, 237 nonrubber shoe plants have closed, and 105 of these shutdowns occurred in 1984 as footwear imports surged.

- In the lumber and wood products industry, employment fell from 785,000 in 1979 to 688,200 in April 1985.

- Coal mining employed some 242,000 people in 1978, but only 160,000 in early 1985.

The evidence is plain. Congress must press forward in the areas of trade, trade adjustment assistance and retraining, and enact legislation requiring 90 days' notice of plant shutdowns and consultation with workers. These modest beginnings can be the foundation of an industrial policy to preserve the nation's industrial base and the jobs that depend on it.

MEMO FROM COPE

Retirements Boost Democrats' Chances for '86 Senate Gains

Three recent announcements increase—though they hardly clinch—the chances for Democrats to win numerical control of the U.S. Senate in 1986.

First, Sen. Paul Laxalt (R-Nev.) announced he's heading home to retirement from the Senate when his term ends. A month later—and within a week of one another—Sens. John East (R-N.C.) and Charles Mathias (R-Md.) said they, too, will pack it in, East for reasons of health, Mathias (see box) because he wants to get on with other things.

This brings to six the number of open Senate seats to be decided in 1986, out of a total of 34. Over the past year, Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.) and Democrats Tom Eagleton (Mo.) and Russell Long (La.) have said their current term is their swan song.

If you go by votes on issues, Democrats are ahead of the game already, even though they lose strong supportive voting records in Eagleton and, yes, in Mathias, whose AFL-CIO voting record is better than that of many Senate Democrats and who has been COPE-endorsed. As of the end of 1984, Eagleton was 87 percent "right" on the AFL-CIO scoreboard, Mathias 73 percent and Long 50.

Right-wingers, on the other hand, lose some of their most reliable supporters in Goldwater, Laxalt and East, respectively 91, 90 and 97 percent "wrong" on the AFL-CIO voting record. Even if Republicans were to hold all three seats, the newcomers wouldn't likely achieve the right-wing purity level of their predecessors.

While East was already one of the most vulnerable of GOP incumbents, chances are slight that the North Carolina party will nominate a candidate any stronger than he and pretty good that they'll wind up with one weaker.

In Nevada, the contest suddenly opens up as a possible win for Democrats. Had Laxalt run, he was expected to be a shoo-in.

Maryland now, too, appears a strong possibility for a Democratic gain. Mathias is the most popular Republican in what's been a heavily Democratic state, and has broad backing among Democrats, too. No one of his stature is available to his party. Democrats have several potentially strong candidates.

Conversely, Democrats in Missouri probably can't field a candidate as popular as Eagleton, but can put up a good campaigner with plenty of statewide support. Among those seeking nomination is Harriet Wood, who lost by less than one percent of the vote to incumbent Sen. John Danforth in 1982.

Arizona at this time is not expected to be a cakewalk for the GOP. Goldwater himself barely squeaked in with fewer than 10,000 votes last time.

Looking at the overall 1986 Senate picture, Democrats seem now—but be careful, it changes almost weekly—in good position to win enough seats to gain control. They defend only 12 seats, Republicans 22. Both parties have vulnerable states. The GOP has more of them.

Held by Democrats, but viewed as marginal right now, are Vermont and Colorado. In the former, Sen. Pat Leahy always has to fight like a tiger to win. In Colorado, Sen. Gary Hart is considered touch-and-go if he does run, and he might drop out, anyway, and announce he'll go for President again in 1988.

Republican seats under siege include Jeremiah Denton in Alabama (93 percent "wrong"), Paula Hawkins in Florida (70), Mack Mattingly in Georgia (93), Steve Symms in Idaho (97), Don Nickles in Oklahoma (97), James Abdnor in South Dakota (74). Several others are vulnerable as well.

From that list, and other open seats now GOP-held, Democrats need to score a net gain of four to win Senate control. Present split is 53-47.

A Class Act Closes

Retirement of most members of Congress is barely worth notice except by those lusting to succeed them.

Not so with Sen. Charles Mathias (R-Md.), who is stepping down after three terms.

He has been one of the true class acts in politics—a Republican widely admired, and supported, by Democrats; a lifelong fighter for civil liberties, civil rights and worker rights; a fighter within his own party against its take-over by right-wingers.

And always a gentleman.

What a contrast he has been to the claque of caterwaulers who represent Republicanism in the 1980s.

He'll be missed by all fair-minded Americans, but most of all by his own party, which now so badly needs his like.

Conservatism 'Animated by Compassion?'

Here's a Guy Who's in for a Really Big Disappointment

"If conservatism is not animated by compassion for poor people, it ought not to be the majority party in the United States."

The speaker is a Reagan appointee, counsel for the Office of Management and Budget. The quote appears in a four-part Washington Post series on how the "new right" stocked the Reagan Administration with its own at high and middle management-levels, and entrenched many where they are apt to stay long after this administration has departed.

The quote is the most poignant, and the only one reflecting such concern, among the dozens cited in the series. Other rightists quoted say things like "this isn't merely a Republican regime, but a conservative regime." Or they tout the "conservative agenda," or blast government ("Washington is evil," in the words of one quoted right-wing leader). Or they try to startle: "Like the radicals of the 1960s, our working motto is 'smash the state.'"

If it weren't for the certainty that the person first quoted meant what he said (he was a civil rights and liberal activist who crossed over) it would qualify as one of the great political one-liners of our times. Surely, it betrays a misreading of the ultra-conservative movement of today and its leaders and troops—most of them, anyway.

While he and a few other of its folks might be "animated by compassion for poor people," or others who can stand some help, not many of the movement's major figures got where they are by bleeding for the needy.

Of whom could the man be speaking? Who's he looking to for a little compassion for the poor?

Jesse Helms? Ed Meese? Jerry Falwell? Jim Watt? Dick Viguerie? Terry Dolan? Howard Phillips?

For that matter, Ronald Reagan?

No doubt, all of these might privately feel for the underprivileged—but they haven't grabbed fighting for the underdog as their big public issue, either.

They are all much more likely to exhibit excitement over taxes, or welfare (which they deplore), or "morality" as they see it, or "family issues" as they define them.

During the Reagan-Republican recession, they didn't lament hard times and their effect, or the policies that created or extended them. High unemployment left them unmoved, if you judge by the absence of public comment. Perhaps privately they felt it all too keenly, but were too macho to cry openly.

It is sad to anticipate the inevitable disillusion of those few among them—like the person quoted at the outset—who sincerely think the ultra-conservative movement is, or ever will be, "animated by compassion."

It will soon run out of steam partly because it isn't.

Odds 'n Ends

'WEST POINT OF POLITICS' is what Republicans are calling their planned training academy for campaign managers, finance directors and PR staff of GOP candidates. Party is shelling out $1 million, will pay "students" $300 a week to cover room and board while attending its Republican Congressional Campaign Academy.

PERSONAL WEALTH, more and more of it, requirement for Congress, comparison of recent election years shows. Average assets of 74 new members elected in 1978 were $41,358. Average of 43 elected for first time in 1984 was $251,292. Conclusion drawn by some: Running for office takes huge personal resources. For example, the 43 newcomers of 1984 spent an average of $50,329 of their own money. Eight spent more than $100,000 in personal funds. One shelled out $441,167, another $210,000. Fifteen of 43 in Class of '84 are thought to be millionaires. Class of '78 produced only one.

BATTLE OF TITANS of rightwing shapes up in North Carolina over GOP nomination for Senate seat being vacated by John East (see story this page). Jesse Helms' political money machine, National Congressional Club, backs ultra-conservative college professor and Reagan-appointed ambassador to Romania David Funderburk in GOP primary, pledges to pony up $5-$10 million. Fund for Conservative Majority, another major right wing PAC, throws its support to Rep. James T. Broyhill, claims he has "much better chance of winning" general election and "passes our litmus test" as conservative. It can't match Helms's money, but it can generate a good amount and provide substantial organizational know-how.

WITH CONGRESS back in action, lots of talk fills the air about deficit. Question remains: Will anything rational be done about it? One writer put problem this way: "If there ever was a sure thing, it is that no country can indefinitely spend $200 billion more than it takes in. Not even the United States. No matter how starry-eyed your belief in supply-side nostrums or Laffer curves, no matter how fervently you worship at the temple of growth, you have to concede that at a certain point the bills come due. . . . It is no longer a very interesting question whether such deficits stretching as far as the eye can see will bring ruin. The question is how a political system can look ruin so plainly in the eye and do nothing about it."

'DR. BORROW-AND-SPEND' is what New York Times editorial tabs President Reagan, who's supposed to be arch-enemy of budget deficits, but has run up biggest ones in history. Times recalls Reagan took office five years ago "denouncing the national debt" at time when it totalled less than $1 trillion. Points out we've reached $2 trillion in red ink, more than double total national debt when Reagan assumed command. Times cites way Reagan used to talk about his "dream" of day when government reduces debt "to prove to our kids that we're not going to dump it all on them." Well, says Times, "he won't see that day, and the kids had better watch out."

REAGAN CATCHES FLAK on deficit from sources other than Times, one of them upstanding member of his own party. Sen. David Durenberger (Minn.) joins some Democrats in suggesting Administration might have "some deliberate intention to use deficits . . . to get us to denationalize the financing of public services." Durenberger took Reagan to task, asking "Why is he on tax reform when he should be on deficits? Why does he undercut the (Senate) budget resolution?"

Shazzam . . . New Right Leader

"To set oneself up as a New Right pressure group, all that is required is a grievance, no sense of humor, a secretary, a mailing list, a photocopier, some rented office premises, and second-hand furniture. Call yourself the Committee to Reactivate American Patriotism—a nice acronym—name yourself executive secretary, and you're in business."

Factory jobs skid 110,000 in one month

Fueled by the loss of a staggering 110,000 manufacturing jobs—the largest one-month decline since the depths of the Reagan recession—the nation's unemployment rate moved upward to 7.1 percent in September.

The AFL-CIO blamed the Administration's ''wrong-headed trade and economic policies'' for the precipitous decline in factory employment reported by the Labor Dept.

''The Reagan Administration is twiddling its thumbs while unemployment continues at intolerably high levels,'' Research Director Rudy Oswald declared. ''Jobs are disappearing rapidly because of the continuing flood of imports and the Administration's misguided and foolishly ideological trade policies.''

Oswald said that, in the face of the torrent of imports which have wiped out 1.8 million jobs in manufacturing since 1979, Congress must take ''fast and decisive action on trade legislation to protect America's workers, industries and local communities from excessive and unfair imports.''

September's sharp decline in manufacturing employment was the steepest since November 1982, the low point of the Reagan recession. The largest losses were felt in the machinery, electrical equipment and automobile industries.

In addition to the 8.3 million officially listed as unemployed, the government counted 1.2 million ''discouraged workers''—those who want jobs but have given up looking for them.

15 million affected

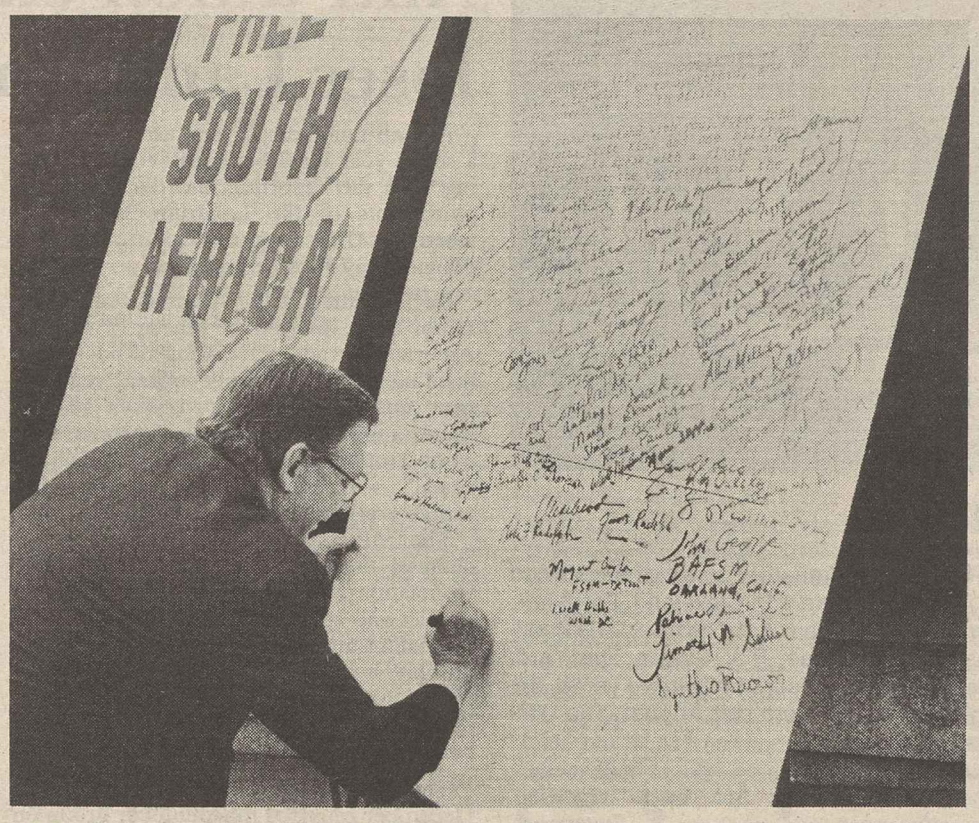
Adding in the 5.6 million others who are working part time because full-time jobs are not available, shows more than 15 million Americans suffering ''serious jobless, incomeless problems,'' the AFL-CIO said.

In every category except adult males—where the unemployment rate remained stuck at 6 percent for the second successive month—the report showed higher jobless rates, with black unemployment surging to 15.3 percent from August's 14-percent level.

The unemployment rate for teenagers rose half a percentage point to 17.9 percent, and for black teens from 34.4 to 38.3 percent.

The rates for Hispanic workers and adult women both inched up one-tenth of 1 percent, reaching 10.4 percent and 6.8 percent, respectively.

The report showed that 2 million jobs had been added to the economy so far this year.



The Administration hailed the figures showing a record 107.5 million Americans at work as evidence, in the words of White House spokesman Larry Speakes, that the economy ''continues to grow.''

But he ignored the Labor Dept.'s figures showing that manufacturing industries have recovered only 53 percent of the jobs lost during the Reagan recession.

House votes to restrict clothing, textile imports

'No' to apartheid

Apartheid is "a crime against the human soul," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said outside the South African embassy as he signed a "freedom letter" to Bishop Desmond Tutu affirming labor's support for an end to the "moral outrage" of racial bias. The drive seeks one million signatures to protest South Africa's oppression of blacks.

Move aimed at saving jobs of 1.8 million

By David L. Perlman

The House voted to limit imports on clothing and other textile products in order to prevent the wipeout of an industry employing 1.8 million American workers.

Its 262-159 approval of the labor-supported bill came in the face of heavy Administration pressure to sidetrack a measure the President has threatened to veto.

Passage of the legislation represented an acknowledgement that an international agreement on textile imports—known as the Multifiber Arrangement—had failed in its declared purpose of restraining imports that would harm a domestic industry.

Nearly 300,000 textile and apparel jobs have been lost since 1981, and 100,000 just in the past year, the bill's advocates told the House at the start of the debate. Its enactment, they stressed, would significantly reduce a merchandise trade deficit that leaped from $36 billion in 1982 to $123 billion in 1984, and is projected to reach $140 billion this year.

Coalition formed

Against this backdrop, the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers formed a politically potent coalition with industry trade groups and members of Congress from states where textile and apparel manufacturing is important to the economy.

The bill that eventually won the sponsorship of a majority of the House and Senate would set stringent quotas on ''major exporting countries,'' principally Taiwan, South Korea, Hong Kong, China and Japan. It would also expand the definition of textiles subject to quota to include a range of man-made and natural fibers not covered under existing restrictions. Mexico, Canada, most Common Market countries and Caribbean Basin nations would be largely exempted from new restrictions.

Retail trade associations, seeking to preserve the higher profit margin from bigger markups on imports from low-wage nations, lobbied heavily against the bill. Every congressional office was delivered a pair of Hong Kong or other foreign-made jeans to emphasize a claim that consumers would have to pay higher prices if the bill became law.

Senate budget plan puts social programs in peril

House Democratic leaders will try to stop a political stampede that resulted in a 75-24 passage by the Senate of a balanced budget plan that would compel the dismantling of domestic programs and threaten a serious weakening of the nation's military strength.

If enacted into law, it would require the President to cut government programs whenever Congress falls short of a timetable to end budget deficits within six years. Only social security, interest on the national debt and expenditures the Office of Management & Budget designates as ''relatively uncontrollable'' would be exempt from across-the-board slashes.

Reagan, who has never proposed to Congress anything remotely close to a balanced budget, was gleeful. Now, he said, there's no excuse for anyone ''screaming'' about deficits.

Twenty-seven of the Senate's 47 Democrats joined with all but four Republicans in hopping on what they saw as a political bandwagon, giving a bipartisan stamp to the measure.

It was left to House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., to draw the line and brand the Senate-initiated plan ''a fraud.'' House Republicans are expected to press for rubber-stamp approval of the Senate bill soon after Congress returns from its Columbus Day recess on Oct. 16.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed labor's concerns about the balanced budget measure when it was first proposed as an amendment to a debt ceiling bill necessary to enable government actions to continue to function.

Lax wage law enforcement scored

By Gene Zack

Every year, bosses try to cheat millions of workers out of hundreds of millions of dollars in wages by violating the minimum wage and overtime pay provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

This is the conclusion reached by the General Accounting Office, which told a House Labor subcommittee that employers often get away with shortchanging workers because the Labor Dept. is not enforcing the law adequately.

The GAO said the department's own data showed that more than half a million workers are gouged to the tune of more than $100 million each year.

The figures on wage-hour violations are ''just a drop in the bucket,'' the AFL-CIO charged, because they are based solely on ''identified back wages'' that employers owe workers.

''Under the Reagan Administration,'' John Zalusky, an economist in the federation's Dept. of Economic Research, said that ''the Labor Dept. has abandoned random checks or continued monitoring of repeat violators and relies solely on employees with enough courage to file complaints.''

Partial payback

The result, Zalusky said, is that only a fraction of the violations come to light. When they do, the Labor Dept. ''compromises away what the employees are due, usually settling for less than half the actual back wages the workers have coming to them.''

To make matters worse, he said, many of the workers who have been cheated ''never get even the small amount which the employer finally agrees to pay, because poor record-keeping makes it impossible to locate the injured parties by the time settlement is reached.'' Whatever back wages are due thus often end up in the U.S. Treasury.

Zalusky was critical of the Reagan Administration's handling of FLSA violations. While the law requires the Labor Dept. to report annually to Congress on wage-hour compliance, he said, ''they haven't filed a report in two years, and the last report was sent to Capitol Hill only after Congress complained.''

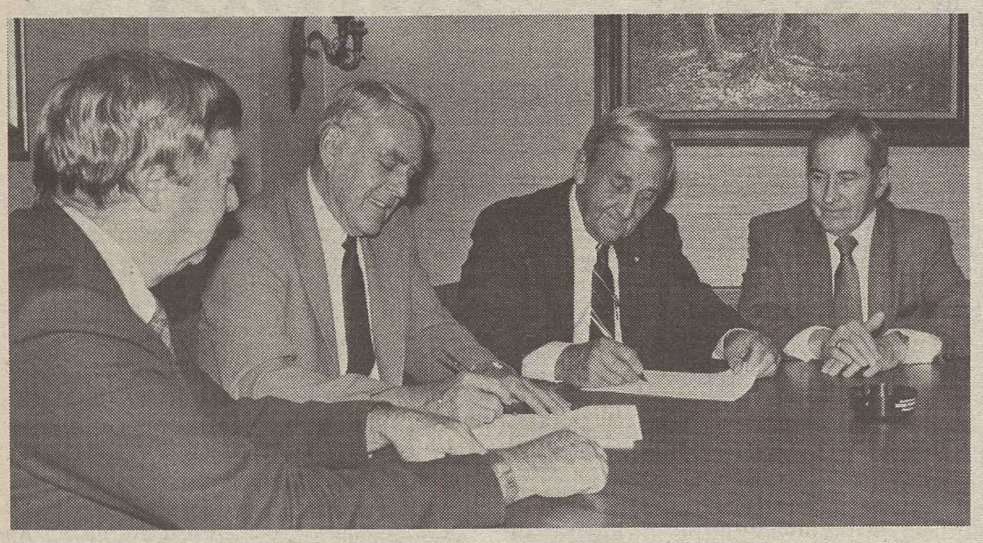
The GAO called noncompliance with the wage-hour law a ''serious and continuing problem,'' and faulted the Labor Dept. for ''not seeking the maximum compensation for employees who were due wages'' as a result of these violations.

The study, which updated a 1981 investigation of wage underpayments, was made at the request of Rep. Austin Murphy (D-Pa.), subcommittee chairman.

It sharply criticized the Labor Dept. because firms that previously violated FLSA ''were not being monitored and reinvestigated'' because of what department officials called a ''lack of staff.''

The federal watchdog agency told the subcommittee that ''most of the problems'' it cited in 1981 ''still exist, but the number of staff-years devoted to the act's enforcement has decreased'' from 587 in 1980 to 474 last year.

The report showed that compliance officers spend only slightly more than half their time on wage-hour enforcement, while a third of their time is devoted to such activities as training and vacations.



The GAO said the Justice Dept. often turns a blind eye to breaches of the FLSA because the penalties for wage-chiseling employers are too light.

''The maximum penalty for a first violation—a fine of up to $10,000—is not considered to be severe,'' the agency said, ''and because of higher priority work, Justice is unlikely to prosecute FLSA violations.''

In the absence of criminal prosecution, the GAO said that the Labor Dept. should focus on civil remedies by asking for liquidated damages, as well as back pay and interest charges, ''as a means of compensating employees for delayed payment of back wages.''

The report was critical of the department's procedure which allows each regional office to make the decision on whether or not to seek these additional damages. Regions that viewed liquidated damages as a way to punish employers were less likely to ask for them than were regions that saw such payments as employee compensation.

To help correct the situation, the report recommended that the government routinely seek heavy damage payments in addition to back wages from employers who break the law.

Rail union compact

Bankers target pension fund as Wheeling talks resume

Pittsburgh—Negotiators for the Steelworkers and Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel returned to the bargaining table in an effort to end a disputed lockout that began July 21, as the company's creditors went into bankruptcy court seeking termination of the decades-old pension plan.

Union negotiators and new management officials, named after a top corporate shakeup, exchanged proposals to end the 12-week-old dispute which has idled nearly 8,600 USWA menbers at nine plants in Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

Paul D. Rusen, the union's chief negotiator, said contract talks had reached a ''critical stage,'' but noted that two external forces were working against the negotiations: the torrent of steel imports and the attitude of the banks holding $397 million of the company's $514 million debt.

The company and the stockholders all want to get the company moving again and out of bankruptcy, Rusen said. But ''the banks are saying they don't want the workers to have a decent wage'' and are willing to ''liquidate the company'' rather than allow both sides to resolve their differences, he said.

The bankruptcy court scheduled a hearing next week on the petition from Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co. and 10 other banks to replace the pension plan with a sharply reduced one in order to reorganize Wheeling-Pitt's debt.

The banks' move brought angry responses from the USWA, the company and the federal Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp.

Rusen said the assault on the pension fund ''jeopardized negotiations,'' and he accused the company's creditors of having ''attempted on a number of occasions to indirectly influence'' contract talks.

He invited bank representatives to attend a ''face-to-face meeting'' with USWA negotiators to discuss the pension question, but officials of Manufacturers Hanover rejected the offer.

The company's chief negotiator, William J. Miller, Jr., also expressed displeasure with the banks' effort to renege on the pension plan. ''We'd rather it didn't happen so we could continue to negotiate a settlement,'' Miller said.

The PBGC moved to have the issue transferred to U.S. District Court here, arguing that the bankruptcy court had no jurisdiction over the pension plan.

UAW negotiators set Chrysler strike date

Detroit—Auto Workers at Chrysler Corp. plants voted to strike the nation's third largest automaker if negotiators cannot reach a satisfactory agreement.

More than 70,000 UAW members are covered by contracts that expire Oct. 15.

The strike authorization was approved by 89 percent of the voting members, but negotiations may continue past the Oct. 15 deadline without a work stoppage.

Job security is a major bargaining issue, with the UAW concerned over Chrysler attempts to move work to non-union plants.

Anti-union employer group loses Landrum-Griffin fight

An anti-union employers' association lost a seven-year legal battle to avoid complying with the reporting and disclosure requirements of the Landrum-Griffin Act when the U.S. Supreme Court closed the door on any further appeals.

Back in the Carter Administration, the Labor Dept. ordered the Master Printers of America, a trade association of non-union printing firms, to comply with the registration and disclosure provision of the Landrum-Griffin Act because it functioned as an employer agent in seeking to ''persuade'' workers about matters of union representation.

The MPA lost a court round when it claimed the law didn't apply to a trade association and then lost in both federal district and appellate courts when it raised a constitutional claim that the disclosure requirement would have a ''chilling effect'' on its free speech rights by subjecting its member firms to intimidation and harassment.

The U.S. 4th Circuit Court of Appeals last December rebuffed the employer group on all counts. It described the organization as ''unabashedly anti-union'' and scoffed at the notion that public disclosure would lead to reprisals against member companies. That decision upholding the Labor Dept. registration requirement became final when the Supreme Court refused to review it.

The Supreme Court did agree to an employer's request to review a 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals decision affecting arbitration of labor-management disputes.

Layoff dispute

The Court of Appeals had held that a district court had properly declined to rule on whether a layoff dispute was subject to arbitration under the union contract because to do so would have ''entangled'' the court in ruling on the merits of the grievance.

Instead, the district judge ordered the issue of whether the dispute was subject to arbitration to be submitted to an arbitrator.

The dispute arose out of a grievance filed by a Chicago local of the Communications Workers involving a layoff at Western Electric Co.—now known as AT&T Technologies.

At issue in the Supreme Court review is the fine tuning of what the 7th Circuit decision termed ''the general rule that the arbitrability issue is for the courts to decide.''

In this case, the appellate court noted, an exception was justified because ''the collective bargaining agreement contains a standard arbitration clause, the parties have not clearly excluded the arbitrability issue from arbitration, and deciding the issue would entangle the court in interpretation of substantive provisions of the collective bargaining agreement and thereby involve consideration of the merits of the dispute.''

In seeking Supreme Court review, AT&T contended that the decision conflicted with rulings of other circuit courts in comparable cases. A CWA brief said the specifics of the Chicago case properly required arbitration because otherwise federal courts would become entangled ''in a full arbitration-like hearing on the substantive merits of the grievance,'' which would be ''at odds with the national labor policy eschewing judicial involvement in contract disputes.''

Soup lines get longer

Soup kitchens and other nongovernmental emergency feeding operations are serving an ever-growing number of hungry Americans, because of sharp budget cutbacks, administrative errors and delays in federal programs.

That's the conclusion reached by Bread for the World, a Christian citizens' movement, which reported that private agencies are serving 16.25 percent more people this year than in 1984.

The organization's study of 36 metropolitan areas showed that private providers have been put under ''intolerable pressure'' by Reagan Administration cuts of $7 billion in food stamp outlays since 1981. As a result, the report said, private agencies are not fully able to meet the needs of the hungry.

The private agencies are ''staggering under the burden of caseloads totally inappropriate to their resources,'' the report said, as they try to help those who exhaust inadequate federal benefits before the end of each month.

Citizen groups, the U.S. Conference of Mayors and other local and state government agencies contend that hunger is growing in America. But a presidential task force insisted recently, without providing any statistics, that hunger is not ''rampant'' in the United States.

Bath shipbuilders ratify new accord to settle walkout

Bath, Me.—A strike by some 4,500 members of Marine & Shipbuilding Workers Local 6 against Bath Iron Works, Maine's largest employer has ended with ratification of a new three-year contract.

An Oct. 7 secret ballot was held at the Augusta, Me., civic center, about 40 miles north of the shipyard. The final tally of the 3,140 votes cast was not released.

The agreement, ratified on the 99th day of the strike, freezes wages for the term of the contract, but also provides $2,000 in bonuses. Half that amount was to be paid upon ratification of the package, with $500 Christmas bonuses to be paid in 1986 and 1987.

A key issue in the strike was the concessions sought by Bath Iron Works, which it claimed were necessary for it to be competitive in bidding on Navy contracts. The firm said it had bid low on its latest government contract in anticipation of getting concessions from its workers.

Bath Iron Works, a subsidiary of the privately owned Congoleum Corp., has facilities in three Maine locations: Bath, Portland and Brunswick.

Two-tier scale

A two-tier pay scale was included in the agreement, with new hires receiving $3 per hour below the current starting rate. The new hires will be able to reach that level in three years through annual $1 per hour increases. The top wage rate under the contract is $11.57 per hour.

Sick leave will increase from three to four days, and there will be a $200 bonus for each six months of perfect attendance. The shipbuilders will have to pay a portion of their medical insurance, and life insurance coverage will increase from $14,000 to $15,000.

The lump-sum payments will apply also to the union's 300-member sister Local 7, made up of clerical workers which settled its strike on Sept. 22. The Local 7 contract included provisions for matching any economic gains won by Local 6. The clerical workers had struck the company in mid-April.

Average pay of workers in open-shop states lags far behind national level

By any yardstick—per capita income, average hourly earnings or annual pay—workers in the nation's 20 ''right-to-work'' states fare worse than do those in the 30 states and the District of Columbia where union-shop agreements can be negotiated.

That's the conclusion of an AFL-CIO study based on 1984 statistics compiled by the Labor and Commerce Depts.

The compulsory open-shop states also lag behind the rest of the nation when it comes to fair employment practices laws, equal-pay laws for women, state minimum wage legislation, and spending on public school students.

In the free collective bargaining states, the average per capita income is $13,356, significantly above the national average of $12,789. The ''right-to-work'' states, by contrast, lag far behind at $11,692.

Manufacturing rates

The average hourly earnings of production workers in manufacturing were $8.32 in compulsory open-shop states, compared with $9.58 in the free states. The national average was $9.17.

The AFL-CIO report indicated that the annual average pay of all workers, including both supervisory and nonsupervisory personnel, stood at $18,350 last year, with 95 percent of the ''right-to-work'' states below that level, while 42 percent of the rest of the nation was at or above that figure.

All free collective bargaining states prohibited discrimination in employment, compared with only 60 percent of the compulsory open-shop states.

Equal pay laws for women were on the books in 87 percent of the free states but only 60 percent in the ''right-to-work'' states. While 97 percent of the union-shop states had minimum wage laws, only 60 percent of the open-shop states put a floor under workers at the bottom rung of the economic ladder.

As far as education is concerned, the national average per-pupil expenditure for the school year which ended June 30, 1984, was $3,173. In the 20 ''right-to-work'' states, the average was $2,693, while in the 30 states and the District of Columbia where trade unionism is allowed to flourish, the figure was $3,440 or $267-per-pupil higher than the national level.

State comparisons

The AFL-CIO study offered this perspective on per capita income in the 20 open-shop states:

Alabama—When it passed ''right-to-work'' in 1953, it was $658 below the national average; by 1984 it was $2,797 below.

Arizona—Per capita income was $140 below the national average when it passed ''right-to-work'' in 1947; last year it was $948 below.

Arkansas—It was $547 below the national figure when it enacted ''right-to-work'' in 1947; by 1984 the gap had widened to $2,410.

Florida—When it passed compulsory open-shop legislation in 1944, it was $90 below the national average; things have improved since then, but it's still $26 below the national level.

Georgia—It put ''right-to-work'' on the statute books in 1947, at a time when its per capita income was $427 less than the national figure; now its workers are $1,238 in the hole.

Iowa—The state has slipped from $102 below the national average in 1947 to $629 below in 1984.

Kansas—When it passed ''right-to-work'' in 1958, it was $6 below the national average and remained below until 1973; by 1984 it had moved to $459 above the nationwide figure.

Louisiana—Since it passed compulsory open-shop legislation in 1976, at a time when it was $1,012 below the national average, the situation has worsened and it's now $1,981 below the line.

Mississippi—Things have gone from worse to awful. The state was $866 below the national average when the law was passed in 1954; today the gap has widened to a staggering $4,012.

Nebraska—In 1947 it was $61 below the national average, and stayed beneath in all except a few years since. In 1984 it was $359 below.

Nevada—This is the only ''right-to-work'' state that has been consistently above the national average. When it passed its law in 1951, it was $531 above the average, and it remains at $531 above today.

North Carolina—When it passed ''right-to-work'' in 1947, it was $419 below the national average; in 1984 it was $1,939 below.

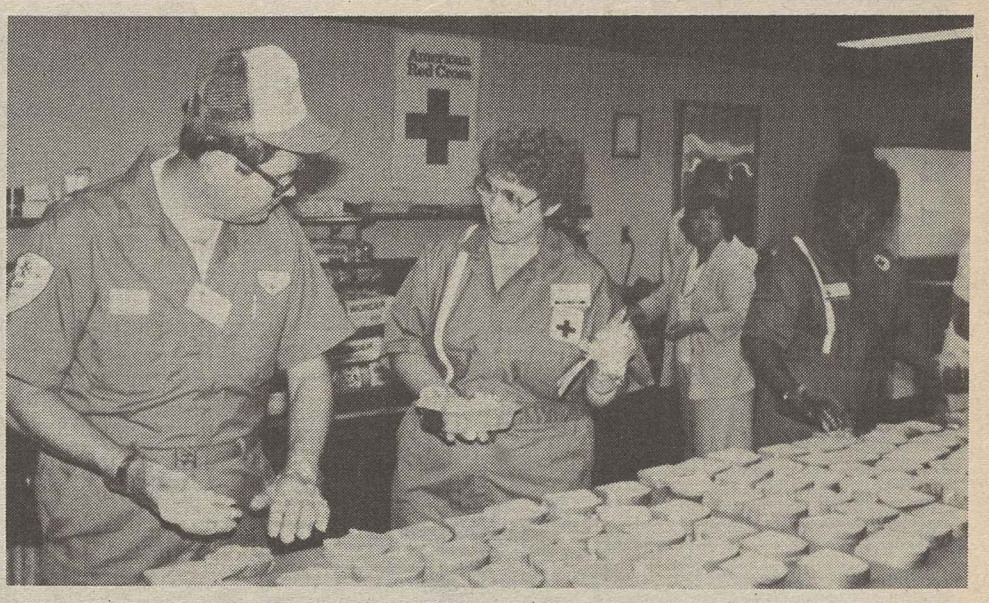
South Carolina—In 1954 when it made the open shop compulsory, it was $637 beneath the national average; 30 years later it was $2,673 below.

South Dakota—It was $48 below the national average in 1947, and by 1984 had skidded to $1,720 below.



Tennessee—It went from $431 below the national average in 1947 to $2,370 below last year.

Texas—When ''right-to-work'' was passed in 1947, it was $181 below the national average; last year it was $217 below the mark.

Utah—It made the open shop compulsory in 1955 when it was $255 below the national average; by 1984 it had plunged to $3,056 below.

Virginia—In 1947 it was $312 below the national average, and remained below until 1981. By 1984 it had risen to $465 above the national figure.

Wyoming—It passed ''right-to-work'' in 1963, at a time when its per capita income was $9 above the national average. The figure has fluctuated widely since then, but by 1984 it was in the minus column, $565 below the national level.

A union-hall haven

Relief workers man the sandwich lines at Electrical Workers union hall on Long Island, N.Y. For 11 days, IBEW Local 25's hall served as communications and administrative headquarters for Red Cross workers after Hurricane Gloria slammed into the New York coastal areas. Local 25 participates in the AFL-CIO/Red Cross Coastline Disaster Project, and has specially installed communications equipment to aid in Red Cross disaster relief.

House beefs up food stamp, cargo preference programs

The House voted to repair some of the rips in the food stamp safety net and rejected attempts to cut back the scope of the cargo preference requirement that half of all government-generated agricultural exports be shipped on American-flag vessels.

Both issues were involved in a many-sectioned farm bill that the House debated for most of two weeks. As passed by the House, it maintains farm support programs the Reagan Administration wants to eliminate but lacks a production control mechanism that family farm organizations had strongly urged and the AFL-CIO had endorsed.

Many of the battles that engaged the House will be refought when a companion bill comes before the Senate later this month, including the provisions of special importance to labor.

On food stamps, the House bill would have the effect of making more low-income households eligible for food stamps and increasing the amount of assistance for those eligible. It would make more households eligible by allowing higher deductions from the income ceiling for shelter and child care costs. And it would raise the benefit level by providing a quicker adjustment for increases in the cost of the government's ''Thrifty Food Plan,'' on which food stamp allotments are based.

Fighting hunger

In a letter to House members before the vote, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that ''the bill's modest increases in the food stamp program are necessary to offset the deep cuts that this program has suffered during the past few years which have hindered the battle against the continuing problems of hunger.''

The chief attempt to delete the food stamp improvements was beaten by a 238-171 margin.

But even if the House-passed improvements stayed in the final version of the bill and became law, the food stamp program would be more restrictive than it was before the heavy cutbacks made during President Reagan's first year in office.

The House Agriculture Committee had sought to confine the cargo preference requirement to the giveaway ''food for peace'' program. That would have eliminated coverage of farm export sales involving government subsidies and credits. The Merchant Marine Committee strongly defended the labor-backed cargo preference provision, and the House agreed by a 245-179 vote.

In another area, the House came close to writing into the farm bill a requirement that farmers receiving government aid who employ 10 or more workers provide drinking water, hand-washing facilities and toilets in their fields. It would have been a big step toward the field sanitation requirements on which the Labor Dept. has postponed action.

The House initially adopted the labor-supported amendment offered by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) on a voice vote. But on a later rollcall, it dropped the provision by a 227-199 vote.

Postal rate hike delayed for union publications

The Postal Service's Board of Governors postponed a sharp postage rate increase for non-profit mailers following congressional approval of a continuing funding resolution which will expire Nov. 15.

The board, dominated by Reagan appointees, had set the rate boosts of some 30 to 40 percent for Oct. 1, 1985, by accelerating the planned phase-out of subsidies for non-profit mailers. Publications produced by trade unions, charities, religious and education organizations would have been hit hardest by the increase in second- and third-class rates.

The Administration has pressed to end subsidies for non-profit mailers, proposing to charge them full commercial rates.

House approves labor-backed import remedies

One of the bill's supporters, Rep. Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio), had the answer to that claim. She brought to the House floor identical shirts, like those pictured in the Oct. 5 issue of the AFL-CIO News. They had been purchased in the same store at the same time. The price was exactly the same for the American-made and foreign-made shirts. Nor was there any difference in the U.S. and foreign-made children's sleepwear purchases that she also displayed.

Other House members from districts across the country spoke of the impact of closed plants in their communities and the loss of manufacturing jobs generally.

A version of the House-passed bill is pending in the Senate as an amendment to unrelated legislation involving Micronesia that the Administration wants enacted. Republican leaders put off further action on the Micronesia bill after the Senate refused by a 53-42 vote to kill the trade amendment. The Senate measure, which has bipartisan sponsorship, would limit quotas to the Asian nations that are the chief exporters of textiles to the United States. It would curb shoe imports as well as textile products.

In another area of major importance to labor, the House Ways & Means Committee made some tentative decisions on tax legislation affecting workers' paychecks and benefits.

On the positive side, from labor's viewpoint, it rejected the Reagan Administration proposal to tax workers' compensation payments and black lung benefits.

But it voted to tax all unemployment benefits as income, a labor-opposed feature of both the Administration bill and the measure proposed by Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.). Present tax law excludes jobless benefits if the total of benefits plus other income for the year comes to less than $12,000 for an individual or $18,000 for a couple with a joint return.

The committee did vote to continue the system of allowing taxpayers to earmark a dollar of their tax payment for presidential election funding. The Administration had sought to abolish it.

It continued the existing child care tax credit and rejected proposals to end the present tax-exempt status of employer-provided child care facilities. But it placed a $5,000 limit on the tax-exempt status of job-related child care.

The committee has yet to face the issue of continued tax exemption for employer-provided health insurance, the most common job-related benefit. The AFL-CIO has stressed in a nationwide campaign that imposing new taxes on workers' paychecks amounts to a pay cut.

The committee also put off a decision on deductibility of state and local taxes, an issue which affects public services at all levels of government.

Committee actions are all subject to reconsideration when the panel starts matching anticipated revenues against tax losses. President Reagan has threatened to veto any bill that seeks to use tax reform revenues to reduce the federal deficit instead of further cutting the top tax rate for the very wealthy.

One of the few areas on which a consensus seems to have formed within the Ways & Means Committee is that the lowest-income households should be given a significant tax break. But under both the Administration proposal and the alternative put forth by Rostenkowski, the biggest tax savings would go to the people with the highest incomes.

Made in the USA

North Carolina union members say "no" to imports at a demonstration in Charlotte during the State AFL-CIO convention. The 400 delegates marched through city streets to protest the heavy loss of manufacturing jobs in the state—especially in textiles and apparel. Delegates launched a "buy-union, buy-America" campaign among the state's 150,000 union members and urged limits on clothing and textile imports.

Bishops reaffirm call for policies to eliminate 'scandal' of poverty

By Candice Johnson

The Roman Catholic bishops of America renewed their call for national economic policies to eliminate "the social and moral scandal" of povery.

In the second draft of their pastoral letter on the U.S. economy, the bishops affirmed that the "poor and vulnerable have a special claim on our concern and on the conscience of the nation."

"The impact of national economic policies on the poor and the vulnerable is the primary criterion for judging their moral value," the pastoral letter says. "Being a citizen of this land means sharing in the responsibility to shape and implement such policies."

The document stresses that economic decisions must be judged on whether they help all people. It views economic rights "as essential to human dignity as are the political and civil freedoms granted pride of place in the U.S. Constitution."

Beliefs reaffirmed

Despite criticism from conservative Catholic, business and political groups, the bishops reaffirmed their "strong conviction that more can and must be done" to fight poverty and unemployment.

"There has been no backing down," said Archbishop Rembert G. Weakland of Milwaukee, chairman of the drafting committee.

The initial draft of the pastoral letter was praised by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland as calling for a society that gives workers, farmers, the poor and the elderly "a positive role in economic decision-making and new hope for for a 'life with dignity.' "

Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Economic Research Director Rudy Oswald and Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez were among those who made presentations to the bishops' drafting committee which began work on the document in July 1981.

The new draft reaffirms the church's view of the dignity and importance of work, building on Pope John Paul II's description of work as "probably the essential key to the whole social question."

"Because work is this important," the letter continues, "people have a right to employment. In addition, in return for their labor, workers have a right to wages and other benefits sufficient to sustain life in dignity."

The document notes that some employers have great power over their workforce, often offering workers a choice "between an inadequate wage and no wage at all."

"But justice, not charity, demands minimum guarantees" including health care, security for old age or disability, unemployment compensation, safe working conditions, rest and holidays and reasonable security against arbitrary dismissal, the pastoral letter asserts.

The bishops placed strong emphasis on the rights of workers to organize unions, declaring that "no one may deny the right to organize for purposes of collective bargaining without attacking human dignity itself."

Union busting is strongly condemned, as the bishops criticize "the use of threats and intimidation to break existing unions and prevent workers from organizing." American labor law must be reformed to help workers find remedies for these unfair practices, the document declares.

The bishops also urged organized labor to continue its discussions and strategies focusing on the economy of the future.

With full employment "the foundation of a just economy," the bishops viewed the most urgent priority in domestic ecomonic policy to be the creation of new jobs with fair pay and decent working conditions.

"We must make it possible as a nation for everyone who is seeking a job to find employment," they stressed.

Terming high unemployment "morally unacceptable," the pastoral letter calls for a national commitment to achieve full employment with the following recommendations:

- Coordination of fiscal and monetary policies to make full employment the nation's number one goal.
- Increased investment in private-sector job training and retraining where workers have been affected by plant closings.
- Increased support for public job-creating programs, particularly to help the long-term unemployed.

The bishops' letter cites the strong link between poverty and unemployment, noting that millions of Americans are poor because they have lost their jobs or work at low-wage jobs. Terming the existence of poverty in America "a social and moral scandal in a nation of vast wealth," it calls for a full employment economy as the first line of attack against poverty. Other measures advocated to reduce poverty include:

- Aggressive steps to end discrimination against minority workers and women.
- Tax reform to ease the burden on the working poor.
- Greater access to quality education.
- Major welfare reforms, including a national minimum public assistance benefit.

Conservative critics of the document contend that it depends too heavily on government intervention in the economy. But Archbishop Weakland cited the bishop's position that "the government has a positive and necessary role to play in the search for economic justice."

A major change in the second draft of the pastoral letter calls for a reduction in the nation's $300 billion annual defense expenditures.

"Defense policies must be evaluated and assessed not only in terms of economic and political criteria, but from a moral point of view," the letter urges. "When this scrutiny of weapons systems and military strategies shows they make questionable contributions to security, peace, and justice and are also certain to cost large sums of money, then the funds in question should be used for more pressing social goals."

The new draft was distributed to the more than 300 American bishops. They will discuss the document at the November meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops. The final draft will be released next spring and submitted to the conference for approval in November 1986.

'Good-faith bargaining'

Chicago—Joseph Cardinal Bernardin of Chicago appealed "in the spirit of the Catholic Bishops' Pastoral Letter on the U.S. Economy" for the Chicago Tribune and three newspaper unions to resume negotiations to end the nearly three-month old strike.

Printers from Typographical Workers Local 16, pressmen from Graphic Communications Local 7 and mailers from Mailers Local 2 struck the paper July 18 after management refused to honor its agreement on job security.

Communities across the country will apply and interpret the bishops' letter differently, "depending on local circumstances and local problems, both short-term and long," Cardinal Bernardin observed in a pastoral letter of his own to the Chicago diocese.

In the case of Chicago, he said, the chapter titled "A New Experiment: Partnership for the Public Good" is particularly relevant to the current dispute at the Chicago Tribune.

The cardinal said he is convinced that the Tribune and its union workers can find a solution to the current impasse "by bargaining in good faith, around the clock if necessary, in a sincere effort to settle their differences."

House girds for battle on budget setup

Raising revenues through tax reforms would be a good start toward deficit reduction, Denison indicated in a letter to senators. But "it is not in the country's best interest to legislate a binding process for bringing the budget into balance without regard for its impact on people and programs."

Denison acknowledged the legislative steamroller forming on the issue, but urged that any mandatory balanced budget plan include a revenue-raising feature.

It would be cruel to ask those who depend on the nation's already battered social programs to pay the major cost of deficit reduction when wealthy individuals and profitable corporations pay little or no taxes," he insisted.

Impact on poor

Programs serving the elderly and the unemployed should be exempt from mandatory cuts, he said. While "exempting social security is essential," Denison said, the impact of the Senate bill would still fall heaviest on the unemployed, the elderly and the poor.

Except that it would not be enshrined in the Constitution, the rigidity of the Senate-passed balanced budget requirement would be comparable to the perennial constitutional proposal that the Senate has several times passed with the assurance that it would be sidetracked in the House.

The Senate bill, cosponsored by Phil Gramm (R-Tex.), Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.) and Ernest F. Hollings (D-S.C.) would allow Reagan to veto any tax increase, as he has repeatedly threatened to do and compel Congress to make drastic and politically unpalatable slashes in "controllable" government programs—or turn the responsibility over to the President. It is uncertain under the legislation's vague definitions what share of the defense budget would be immune to mandatory cuts.

Marine Engineers elect C.E. DeFries as Calhoon retires

C.E. DeFries was elected president of the Marine Engineers by the union's executive committee to succeed Jesse M. Calhoon, who retired Oct. 1 after holding the post for more than 20 years.

DeFries, 57, is president of MEBA District 1—Pacific Coast District. He has served as MEBA's secretary-treasurer since 1977, following 14 years as an international vice president. He has been a member of the union since 1951.

Calhoon, 62, was first elected president of the 16,000-member union of shipboard engineers and radio officers in 1963.

Clyde E. Dodson, executive vice president of District 1, was elected to succeed DeFries as secretary-treasurer, and Karl Landgrebe, the Seattle branch agent for District 1, will fill the executive vice president post, succeeding Dodson.

Former secretaries agree

Labor law inadequate for changing times

The half-century-old National Labor Relations Act needs a massive overhaul to resolve problems caused by changing economic, technological and political trends, according to two former secretaries of labor.

Speaking at a three-day Washington conference sponsored by Southern Methodist University School of Law, John T. Dunlop, labor secretary under President Ford, called the current system "destructive of our economic future," while F. Ray Marshall, who held that post under President Carter, said the present law "does more to protect employers' interests than to help unions or workers."

Emphasizing that the relative strength of unions has been weakened by the way the NLRA has been enforced, Marshall, now a professor at the University of Texas, asserted:

"Even before the Reagan board tilted NLRB decisions more against unions, employers' interests were much better protected . . . than those of workers or unions.

"The board and the courts have been much more effective in restricting such union self-help activities as secondary boycotts than they have been in restricting such employer practices as boycotting union contractors, helping each other during strikes, discharging workers for union activity or stonewalling during contract negotiations.

"Moreover," he added, "expensive legal maneuvers and weak penalties for violations all bias NLRB procedures against unions and workers."

Weighing public interest

Marshall said that unions "probably would be better off" without the present law, but added that "it would not be in the public interest to return to the law of the jungle."

He insisted that national labor relations policy should be "neither pro-union nor pro-employer, but pro-worker," and called for "strengthening the workers' right to timely decisions" about union representation. The right to representation, Marshall said, has "been compromised by the board's inability or unwillingness to hold timely elections and prevent unfair labor practices, especially the discharge of workers for union activity."

Dunlop, now a professor at Harvard University, agreed with Marshall's view that the legal framework of industrial relations must be made more compatible with changes which have occurred in the 50 years since the NLRA became law.

He was critical of the way in which "various agencies of government with shifting personnel and ideology, largely without practical experience in industrial relations, have sought constantly to reshape collective bargaining in their graven images."

Dunlop opposed efforts by regulatory agencies and the courts to apply uniform concepts and rules to labor-management relations, declaring that this emphasized "process over substance."

The "great virtue of collective bargaining," he said, "is the capacity to write and enforce provisions appropriate to separate markets, technologies and localities." The board's attempts to apply single rules across a complex society amount to a "straitjacket," he added.

Cooperative efforts

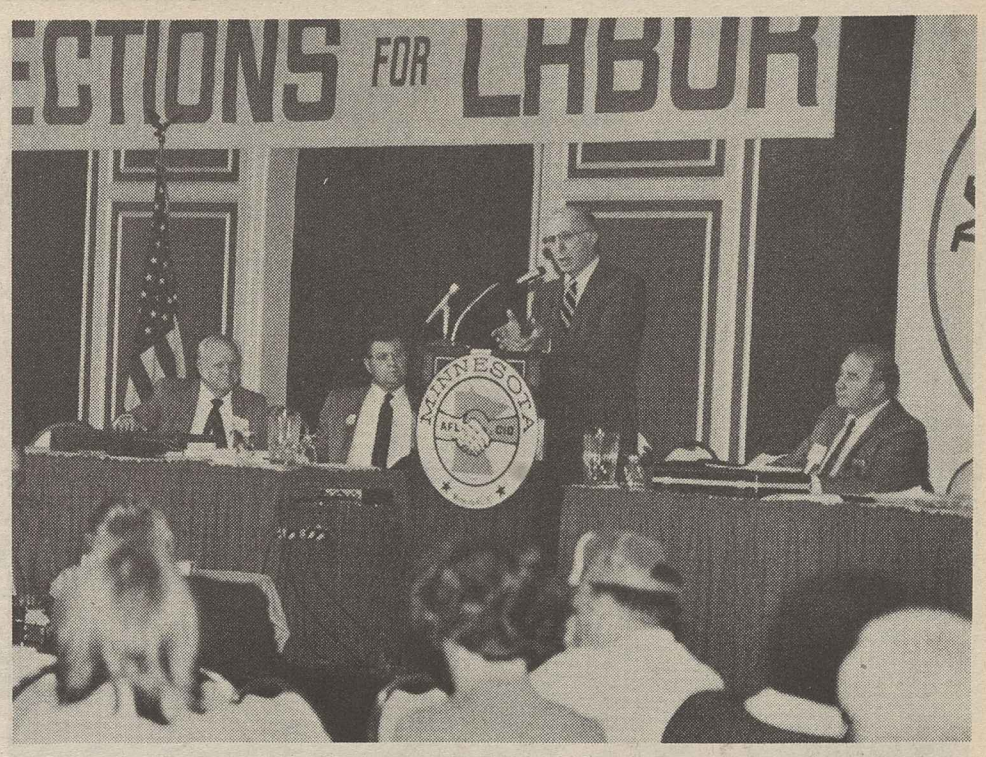
Dunlop called for joint labor-management efforts to increase productivity and make U.S. industry more competitive in world markets. But without cooperation from management, he said, "no package of proposals is very likely to get beyond formal positions."

Howard Jenkins, a former NLRB member, criticized the way in which opinions of administrative law judges that stand "no chance" of being overturned can still be appealed to the board. This wastes time that could be better devoted to more careful drafting of decisions which are going to the courts for review, he said.



Elliot Bredhoff, general counsel to the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., said that the NLRA—often described as labor's "Magna Charta"—initially played a major role in the establishment and expansion of workplace rights for millions of workers, but declared that those goals have not been realized in recent years.

"The act has become a snare and a delusion," Bredhoff said. "For thousands of workers, the freedom and security promised by the legal framework of our labor system have been replaced by fear, insecurity and deprivation.

"It is time to make substantial changes in our entire approach to regulating labor relations so that we can deal more flexibly and effectively with today's economic reality," he declared.

Robert J. Connerton, general counsel of the Laborers, was sharply critical of recent NLRB decisions restricting the scope of collective bargaining laws, and said the board "has made a joke of collective bargaining in the construction industry."

"By manipulating their workforce selection or corporate structure," Connerton said, "contractors can work either union or non-union as they choose," and unions "confront the ever-present threat that the employer will, with apparent board approval, walk away from bargaining obligations tomorrow, if not today."

Trade and budget policies draw Minnesota labor's fire

St. Paul, Minn.—The impact of President Reagan's trade and budget policies on farmers and workers wove a continuing thread through nearly every speech at the Minnesota AFL-CIO's convention here.

Delegates to the three-day convention backed legislation to save the family farmers by guaranteeing them a fair return on production.

Seafarers President Frank Drozak, who also heads the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., told the 729 delegates that farmers and the merchant marine "are not in disagreement over foreign trade issues," despite attempts by the Administration and some members of Congress to drive a wedge between them.

National Farmers Union President Cy Carpenter joined Drozak in a press conference to announce a compromise on the U.S. cargo preference law for shipping American food overseas.

Delegates viewed a new video presentation on the AFL-CIO's report, "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions." It was produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the federation's television unit.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, who chaired the committee that produced the report, urged unions to implement its recommendations for innovative approaches to the challenges facing labor. "We have to find new links and avenues of communication, and we have to involve all of our members more deeply in the trade union mission," Donahue declared.

He warned delegates that the nation faces a shortfall of nearly eight million jobs.

"Don't let anyone tell you that the solution to the food surplus is to send farm families into the job market—and unemployed workers to God knows where," he said. "The trade crisis is striking at every point in the economic spectrum—high tech and low, labor intensive industries and capital intensive industries—it's hitting farmers and steelworkers, hardware and software, right across the country."

Pilot program

In response, the delegates backed four trade bills pending in Congress and approved a pilot program to utilize displaced union workers on COPE committees, in job search activity, organizing and strike assistance.

State AFL-CIO President Dan Gustafson also won approval for a committee to devise ways to circulate labor video presentations and to provide a labor newspaper to those union members not receiving one. The committee will have representatives from the Duluth, Minneapolis and St. Paul central bodies.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, told the delegates that the major cause of the wage gap between men and women is sex- and race-based discrimination.

The convention adopted resolutions urging a minimum tax on corporations, repeal of the Hatch Act, equal pay for comparable work, plant closing legislation, and divestiture from companies with holdings in South Africa by the state and the University of Minnesota employee pension funds.

Other speakers included the state's U.S. senators, Rudy Boschwitz and David Durenberger, both Republicans, Lt. Gov. Marlene Johnson, Attorney Gen. Hubert H. Humphrey III, Rep. Bruce Vento (D) and AFL-CIO Region I Director Jim Freeman.

OMB hit for thwarting asbestos rule

By Arlee C. Green

Organized labor's initial fears that the Office of Management & Budget would abuse the regulatory review powers granted to it by President Reagan have been borne out by a congressional report detailing OMB's efforts to thwart a ban on asbestos.

The report, prepared for the House Energy & Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight & Investigations, "documents one of the grossest examples of OMB involvement in the Environmental Protection Agency's rulemaking process," AFL-CIO safety specialist Margaret Seminario said.

"The utility of this report is that it documents the level of OMB's involvement" in blocking federal regulations that are opposed by business, she said.

The EPA's six-year rulemaking effort on asbestos has been lengthened by OMB's intervention by at least one year, according to the report.

The agency planned to ban the manufacture and use of asbestos in a number of products, phasing them out over 10 years. The dangers of asbestos, which include lung cancer, asbestosis and other often fatal diseases, have long been known.

The OMB, through a series of meetings and telephone calls, persuaded EPA Deputy Administrator A. James Barnes to abruptly halt the agency's rulemaking and defer to OSHA and the Consumer Product Safety Commission for regulatory action. The OMB held that the Toxic Substance Control Act required EPA to do so.

Barnes's referral action last February was heavily criticized and prompted a congressional investigation. EPA reversed itself a month later.

Worker exposures

The AFL-CIO had objected to Barnes's action deferring to OSHA and the CPSC for rulemaking action on asbestos. Seminario reaffirmed the need for the EPA regulations, but also urged that OSHA act to reduce worker exposure to asbestos. She noted that even after production of the carcinogenic material is banned, it will still pose a danger in the many buildings in which it has been used.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. John D. Dingell (D-Mich.), said the "burgeoning evidence" of OMB's open door for special interests and its usurpation of agency authority revealed "a powerful agency out of control."

In a letter to other subcommittee members, Dingell called the OMB's regulatory interference "unlawful." The OMB's review authority, granted by Presidential Executive Order 12291, can circumvent congressional intent through "a review process which is shrouded in secrecy, unbounded by statutory constraints and accountable to no one," he said.

Seminario supported the report's major recommendations for legislation to prohibit OMB review of agency regulations and to insure that all communications between OMB and federal agencies relating to regulatory activities are made public.

The report strenuously objected to OMB's insistence on a cost-benefit analysis for the regulations which valued a human life at $1 million and then discounted its worth over the period of years following the exposure. The subcommittee called OMB's concept "morally repugnant."

The EPA "capitulated to pressure from OMB," the report found. It held that Barnes "compromised the integrity of EPA . . . and is directly responsible for the agency's ill-founded decision to refer asbestos regulation to OSHA and CPSC."

It suggested that EPA immediately publish its proposed regulations for public comment, that it reject formal cost-benefit analysis as a determinative factor in rulemaking and that it maintain public files of its written and oral contacts with OMB.

Paul Askew, labor veteran, dies at 73

Norfolk, Va.—Paul A. Askew, who had served on the staff of the Operating Engineers for 25 years, died here on Oct. 6 following a long illness. He was 73.

Askew, an IUOE Local 147 member since 1940, served as an international representative, regional director, administrative assistant to the president and director of organizing for the IUOE. He had been a vice president of the Virginia AFL-CIO and president of the Greater Tidewater AFL-CIO in Norfolk.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in letters to Askew's daughters, Judy Robbins of the International Labor Communications Association and Shirley Askew, that "the leadership he gave for so many years . . . was a priceless asset to the entire labor movement."

Funeral services were held Oct. 9.

'Child Alert'

Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto pledges his union's cooperation in a national program to help find missing children. The Letter Carriers magazine will carry photos of missing children in the hope that some union member making a mail delivery will spot one of the children. Signing the statement of cooperation are Sombrotto, Postmaster Gen. Paul N. Carlin and Jay Howell, director of the National Center for Missing & Exploited Children.

Lost jobs, hope, lives

Reagan trade policy yields bitter harvest

Lost jobs, lost homes, lost hopes—and, in some instances, lost lives—are the legacy of President Reagan's trade policies, a series of witnesses told a congressional oversight hearing.

The session came amid growing debate over the future of the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act. Due to expire Sept. 30, it was kept alive for 45 days while Congress wrestles with a way to minimize the damage caused workers and industries by unrestrained foreign imports. The White House has consistently favored scuttling the assistance program.

While the Administration "continues to espouse a free-trade policy, they refuse to deal with the consequences of that policy," Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), chairman of a House Government Operations subcommittee, said in his opening statement.

A series of witnesses agreed.

Double victim

Alma Lambert, a 47-year-old Baltimore worker, was a double victim of the Administration's trade policies. A member of the Ladies' Garment Workers, she said imports are taking away her job, and her 51-year-old Steelworker husband expects to be laid off soon for the same reason.

Lambert and her coworkers were reduced to part-time work last year when her plant shifted half its operations overseas. Now the plant is closing all its domestic production to concentrate on its foreign operations.

"My question is," she said, "where do we go? Do I sell my house? Where do we get help from?"

Frank told her the Administration believes "you would lose your incentive to work" if the government provided any kind of help.

"That's false," she replied. "I have been working since I was 14."

John J. Sheehan, Steelworkers' legislative director, told the subcommittee that when steel and copper workers lose their jobs, "we tumble down very far in our standard of living."

He reiterated labor's support for a strengthened and adequately funded trade adjustment program, with particular emphasis on income assistance for workers, but stressed that American jobs can best be safeguarded through sound trade and economic policies.

James F. Collins, executive vice president of the American Iron & Steel Institute, told of workers who have committed suicide because their jobs had been shot out from under them as a result of imports.

"People want jobs," Collins said, and cannot find them because of predatory foreign competition. Imports have wiped out about 240,000 high-paying steelworker jobs—a 53 percent cut in employment in the industry—he pointed out.

Despite the testimony about the victims of imports, the Administration continued to take a tough stand, with Marian Barell, deputy assistant U.S. trade representative, declaring that "although we have indeed seen job losses in certain sectors and have seen our trade deficit rise, it would be a serious mistake to draw a casual link between the two."

Under sharp questioning from Frank, she conceded there was a relationship, but said that any effort to restrict quotas to save jobs would lead to retaliation from America's trading partners.

Kirkland hits jailing of Chilean unionists

The jailing of two trade union leaders in Chile constitutes "an abridgement of the right of peaceful assembly and freedom of association," the AFL-CIO said.

President Lane Kirkland, in a sharply worded cable to Chile's President Augusto Pinochet, protested the arrests of Rodolfo Seguel, who heads the 25,000-member copper miners, and Manuel Bustos, a textile workers leader. Kirkland pledged American labor's continued "solidarity with the democratic trade unionists" in that Latin American country.

Seguel and Bustos, who head the National Workers Command—an umbrella organization of opposition leaders—were jailed for their continued protest against military rule in their country. They were charged with violating national security laws.

South Carolina convention focuses on political action

Charleston, S.C.—"We're fighting for the future," South Carolina AFL-CIO President Randy Kiser told some 250 convention delegates here, echoing the slogan on the red, white and blue banner behind him and urging increased political activism by union members in the 1986 elections.

"We're talking about politics," Kiser said. "We want you active in those legislative action committees" and in the voter registration drive the state federation plans before the next elections.

Kiser was followed by John Perkins, national COPE director, who urged that union members back candidates who are "friendly to labor" and donate funds to help get them elected.

The convention was held despite the threat of Hurricane Gloria which loitered just off the coastline and caused cancellations of several scheduled speakers.

Preventive actions

Chuck Johnson, AFL-CIO community services liaison representative with the Red Cross, updated the delegates on the location of the storm and reported the preventive actions being taken by the local unions that are members of the AFL-CIO/Red Cross Coastline Disaster Project.

The delegates were warned by Kiser that legislation may be introduced in the next session of the state legislature to weaken workers' compensation. State Sen. Isadore Lourie (D) urged labor to be there for the fight. "I want the voice of the employee to be heard with a thunderclap throughout the statehouse," he said.

Rep. Robert M. Tallon decried the Reagan Administration's economic and trade policies, telling the delegates, "We're going backwards...and every major policy decision in the past year has accelerated our slide."

Tallon called for an industrial policy to restructure and revitalize "our so-called sunset industries." If America can have "an agricultural industrial policy and a military industrial policy, why the hell can't we have an industrial-industrial policy?" he asked.

Kiser, Sec.-Treas. R.H. 'Buster' Harmon and nine members of the executive board were re-elected to office, and three new executive board members were chosen.

Delegates called for enactment of the Construction Security Act, sponsored by Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.), which would outlaw "double-breasting" in the construction industry, terming it a double-cross by management against unions.

Other resolutions backed the boycott of Continental Airlines and New York Air. The convention also urged state legislation permitting an assessment on "free loaders" when they use a union's services.

Other guest speakers included AFL-CIO Region V Director James Sala, and State Senators Herbert Fielding and Hugh Leatherman.

Wyoming labor maps fight for repeal of open-shop law

Casper, Wyo.—Repeal of Wyoming's compulsory open shop law was made the top legislative priority by the Wyoming AFL-CIO convention here.

The resolution calling for repeal of the 22-year-old state "right-to-work" law noted that workers "know firsthand its real effect of weakening their collective bargaining power."

The resolution urged increased efforts to mobilize Wyoming workers for the "election of our friends to the Wyoming legislature" so the measure can be repealed.

The 98 delegates to the two-day convention backed passage of federal tax reform legislation that fairly distributes the tax burden and relieves the "hardships placed on working Americans." State federation affiliates were urged to inform their members of the "unfairness" of the Reagan tax plan which heaps added tax breaks on corporations and the wealthy.

The convention criticized the weak federal standard on hazard communication and urged the Wyoming Occupational Safety & Health Commission to adopt and enforce a standard that will provide workers with the right to know workplace hazards.

The delegates called for improvements in unemployment compensation benefits to at least two-thirds of a worker's weekly wage up to a maximum of not less than three-quarters of the state's average weekly pay. In the adopted resolution, they urged a program of extended benefits and less restrictive qualifications.

Officers elected

State AFL-CIO President James A. Perkins and Vice President Dennis Goodwine were elected to full terms of office, after having been appointed to those positions last summer following the retirement of L. Keith Henning as executive secretary. John M. Faunce, who replaced Henning, was appointed to a two-year term as executive secretary.

Wyoming Gov. Ed Herschler (D) in an address to the delegates took aim at the Reagan Administration, pointing to the problems with free trade, the lopsidedness of the National Labor Relations Board and the efforts to subvert the Davis-Bacon Act.

Nebraska delegates elect Ken Mass

Grand Island, Neb.—Delegates to the Nebraska AFL-CIO's biennial convention here elected Ken E. Mass secretary-treasurer, replacing Victor G. Meyers who retired after nearly a decade in office.

State AFL-CIO President Gordon McDonald was re-elected to his second full four-year term of office.

Mass is president of Electrical Workers Local 1974 in Omaha.

Meyers, 65, held a number of offices with Meat Cutters Local P-47 in Omaha and was the state COPE director before his election as secretary-treasurer in 1977.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce D. Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, told the more than 200 delegates and alternates that pay equity—equal pay for jobs of comparable work—has "moved from being a women's issue to being a workers' issue, where it belongs."

Miller, a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, scored the Reagan Administration for the troubles that have been heaped on working class families over the past five years, and on working women in particular.

She pointed out that there are more poor children in America now than ever before, there are more female-headed households than ever before, and women's wages still average 35 percent less than men's. She blamed this on sex- and wage-based discrimination.

Jobs and justice

Gov. Bob Kerrey (D) praised the efforts of organized labor in seeking jobs and justice, urging trade unions to continue to fight conditions that are unjust or wrong.

He noted that for more than a century the labor movement has improved the quality of life for workers, bringing about such protections as unemployment and workers' compensation, health insurance, and child labor laws.

The state's attorney general, Robert Spire, stressed that citizens should expect the attorney general to uphold their rights, including laws to protect workers from discrimination. He credited organized labor for gaining enactment of such measures.

A workshop on the federal reporting and election requirements for local unions was held by representatives of the Labor Dept.

The delegates adopted resolutions opposing the Reagan Administration's scheme to tax workers' benefits, urging the restoration of fair corporate taxes, backing the repeal of the state's so-called right-to-work law, supporting legislation to halt corporate raids on employee pension funds and urging restoration of railroad workers cost-of-living adjustments.

Other resolutions backed full affiliation of local unions with the state federation, supported an expanded farm-labor coalition in Nebraska, and urged uniform application of minimum wage laws for all workers.

Tomorrow's Unions

AMERICA's unions today are the net product of over 150 years of development, of successes and failures, and they reflect the fact that for all of those years they have existed in struggle. They have never been welcomed by employers or well received by the community—but disturbers of the status quo, change agents in society, never are.

The pages of U.S. labor history are filled with the sacrifice, and in some cases the blood, of workers. And those struggles and sacrifices continue today in southern textile mill towns, in western mining communities, in major cities and country towns where hospital and health care workers struggle for recognition and wherever pickets walk.

Today's unions are the inheritors of all that history, the bearers of all those scars. I suppose it is because of pride in having overcome those substantial adversities that we tend to expect present participants to be inordinately grateful for what they inherited.

That past holds great value for the lessons it can teach but ought never be the vehicle by which anyone glides over current failure or inadequacies, nor can we ever allow it to be a substitute for meeting the problems of this day.

No activist or leader of this labor movement can merely preside over what was created in the past or use its past glories or accomplishments to justify tolerating the status quo. In a world which changes as rapidly as ours, activists and leaders must learn from the past but must focus their attention on today and tomorrow.

THOSE WHO speak of the decline and death of the labor movement overlook the fact that it is not merely a collection of institutions but is a movement—an idea—a philosophy—a piece of society.

It has existed and survived in one form or another ever since human beings first found themselves in the position of having to earn their daily bread by working for others, and it will exist as long as that arrangement continues.

Unions have no life of their own, apart from their members—they are, in fact, their members, and they change in every generation in whatever way the needs of those members dictate.

A Senate Blunder

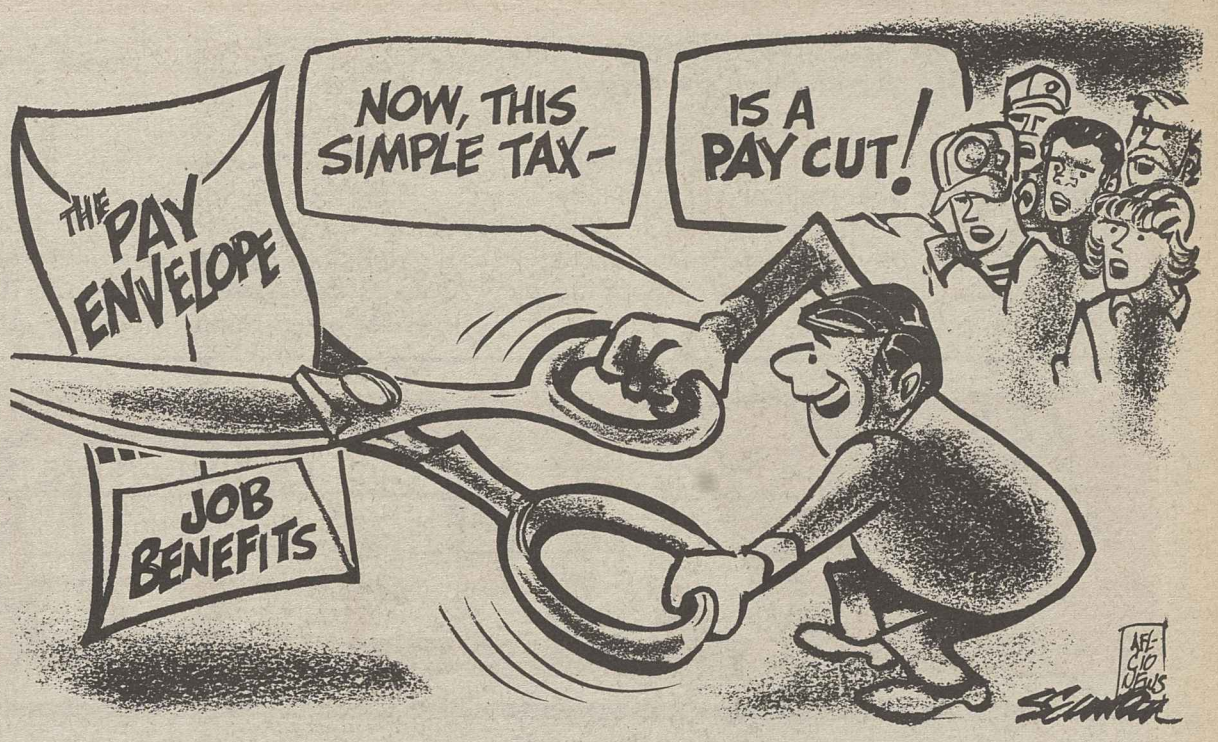
THE SENATE has sometimes been described as the deliberative body of Congress, where legislation passed in haste by the more unruly House of Representatives can be given more careful scrutiny.

Perhaps it's time to rewrite some civic textbooks. In the case of the ill-conceived, patchwork balanced budget legislation steamrollered through the Republican-controlled Senate, it is the House that will be called upon to provide the responsible scrutiny.



Some Senate Democrats who should know better excuse their vote with the lame reasoning that forcing unacceptable choices on the President is the only way to compel Mr. Reagan to accept the fact that the tax cuts he brags about, mostly to the wealthy, are the cause of the huge rise in the deficit.

Much more logical are the Reagan Administration ideologues who have never concealed their strategy that starving the government of revenue is the surest way to force a drastic shrinkage in the role of the federal government. They would in effect nullify the constitutional mandate to ''promote the general welfare'' as well as ''provide for the common defense.''

New Jersey's Sen. Bill Bradley had some sensible things to say about the deficit reduction gimmick so hastily sprung upon the Senate.

Congress doesn't need any new procedures if it wants to reduce the deficit, he said. ''If we truly want to see defense cut,'' the senator said, ''we should vote now to do so.'' And ''if we believe more revenues are necessary, we should vote a tax bill now.''

If Congress abandons its responsibility ''in a moment of irrationality and timidity,'' he warned, ''it will be an action that we will all live to regret.''

Ballfield's asbestos dust sparks toxic waste drive

Press Associates, Inc.

The Little League memories of John O'Connor could have been those of any typical American boyhood—the great slides into second base on the ballfield donated by a local company.

But O'Connor's Little League experience wasn't quite the stuff of which American nostalgia is made. When he and his teammates slid into second, they came up covered in white, metallic dust.

The O'Connor family lived about 200 yards from the Raybestos Co. brake liner plant in Stratford, Conn. Raybestos had generously built the ballfield on top of its asbestos tailings dump.

It wasn't until he was in college that O'Connor made the connection between asbestos, his teammates' cancer deaths, his neighbors' health problems and his own respiratory and skin ailments.

As a VISTA volunteer, O'Connor pioneered the organizing model now used in many communities with toxic waste problems. He later helped form and lead a coalition of labor, environmental and citizens' groups to victory on ''right-to-know'' about toxic hazards legislation in Massachusetts. In 1984, O'Connor cofounded the National Campaign Against Toxic Hazards, a coalition of 300 labor, environmental, and public health groups.

Superfund expansion

The National Campaign and other union and environmental groups are pushing for a stronger Superfund law to clean up toxic waste sites. The Environmental Protection Agency estimates that 2,000 sites around the nation may be eligible for Superfund cleanup money. Other estimates range as high as 10,000 sites, with $100 billion or more as the eventual cleanup cost.

Consequently, the groups are urging Congress to raise the Superfund to at least $10 billion for the next five years from its original $1.6 billion funding level and to strengthen cleanup standards.

The Reagan Administration has threatened to veto any such Superfund law. It proposed only some $5 billion in funds and has repeatedly opposed timetables and federal standards.

One of President Reagan's favorite methods of denigrating programs which he doesn't like, such as Superfund, is to portray the leaders of grassroots citizen groups as ''special interests'' whose primary concern is to protect their own jobs.

But American history is almost unique in the way citizens band together to solve common problems. Like O'Connor, these citizens are driven by personal, not selfish interests. Some examples:

- When Cathy Hinds and her family moved to East Gray, Me., in 1974, she couldn't understand why the family was suddenly stricken with headaches, blurred vision, breathing problems, rashes and numbness. After her infant son died, a physician linked the child's death to well water contaminated with benzene and other toxic chemicals from the nearby McKin chemical dump.

Hinds founded the Maine Coalition on Toxics, which later affiliated with the Maine People's Alliance, to push for cleanup of the site.

- Soon after Bonnie Exner's family moved to Aurora, Colo., they began to experience what Exner called a ''nightmare'' of respiratory problems, headaches and nosebleeds every time the wind from the 2,700-acre Lowry landfill blew toward her house.

Exner joined with her neighbors and the Colorado Citizen Action Network to fight attempts by the dump's operator, Waste Management, Inc., to expand the site to accept waste from other states. The coalition wants the dump closed and cleaned up before the contamination reaches the Arapaho aquifer, the main drinking water source for the eastern ridge of the Rockies.

- Persis Grover and her husband moved to Auburn, Me., just after her first healthy son was born. Her second and third children, however, were born with serious birth defects.

Grover eventually discovered that her new home was next door to the Auburn ash landfill, which is contaminated with dioxins and other deadly toxics. Grover, a leader in the Maine People's Alliance, is trying to get Auburn on the Superfund cleanup list.

20 Years In Prison For Strikers?

Victory For U.S. Workers; Panel Kills Anti-Picket Law

Fighting against tremendous odds, workers across the country won a major victory against the radical right in the U.S. Senate recently and killed for the present a carefully orchestrated plot to legalize the use of Federal troops to break up picket lines. The scheme, which would have revised the Hobbs Act, was the centerpiece of the new right wing agenda to strip workers of their basic rights. It is a major setback for the multi-million-dollar funded National Right-To-Work Committee.

The measure was killed in the Senate Judiciary Committee by a 9 to 9 vote. The revisions would have imposed up to 20 years in Federal prison and $10,000 in fines for even minor incidents of picket line violence, while not imposing any comparable sanctions upon management.

Present law gives authority over assault and property damage to state and local authorities where penalties are less severe.

Under Senate rules, it is still possible for the Hobbs Act revision to appear as an amendment to another bill, so workers must still keep their guard up against this threat.

Rambo Doll, Symbol Of Patriotism, To Be Made In Far East

Coleco Industries -- the Cabbage Patch Doll people -- have announced that they will soon produce a line of "Rambo" toys and dolls, based on the recent hit movie. The film portrays a make-believe American hero whose heroics rewrite the history book on the Vietnam War.

And where is Coleco going to manufacture this new symbol of patriotic America? In the Far East, of course, thereby taking real jobs away from real Americans.

Grassroots Lobbying Efforts Get Results In Nation's Capitol

American workers are making their opinions heard all the way from their congressional districts to Washington this year.

Working through Legislative Action Committees or through their own Central Labor Councils, members are meeting face-to-face with their congressmen and senators to find out where Legislators stand on the proposed tax on employee benefits and other important issues. And they are getting results.

Here are some of the significant developments due directly to worker grassroots lobbying this year:

o Plant Closing Legislation --Labor's drive in the House to move legislation to protect workers victimized by no-notice plant closings received a big boost when the Legislative Action Committee in the first district of Massachusetts convinced Senior Republican Rep. Silvio Conte to become the lead GOP sponsor on the legislation. Conte's cosponsorship gave the bill the prestige of a top-ranking Republican and the important bipartisan leadership support that helped push the bill out of the House Education and Labor Committee.

o Textile Trade -- Continued lobbying by the AFL-CIO network of 25 congressional Legislative Action Committees (LAC) resulted in 17 additional members of Congress cosponsoring the textile trade bill -- legislation to limit imports of textiles, which now has over 300 cosponsors.

o Banning Polygraphs -- Gathering cosponsorships is also a critical phase in the strategy to move legislation in the House to ban the use of polygraphs in private sector employment. With no members having signed on in the state of Indiana, the Legislative Action Committee visited Rep. Lee Hamilton, the state's senior House Democrat. He agreed to cosponsor and was soon joined by Rep. Peter Visclosky.

o Taxing Employee Benefits --Over half of the House members in the LAC network have cosponsored H.Res. 268, a "sense of the House" resolution opposing the taxation of support benefits.

CWA Urges Congress To Restore Service And Preserve Jobs

A petition drive has been launched by the Communication Workers of America as part of an effort to get Congress to clean up the mess caused by the break-up of AT&T.

Citing soaring telephone bills and the loss of union jobs in the telephone industry, CWA is urging Congress to isolate the problems and correct the damage. More than 40,000 people have lost jobs in the Bell System and AT&T alone since the break-up.

AT&T is now moving its manufacture of residential telephones to Singapore, where wages are one-eighth the level of AT&T's American workers. Meanwhile, local telephone rates have shot up 18%.

Besides signing the petition when it comes to you, all union members are urged to use only union-made telecommunications services and equipment.

A Return To Slavery?

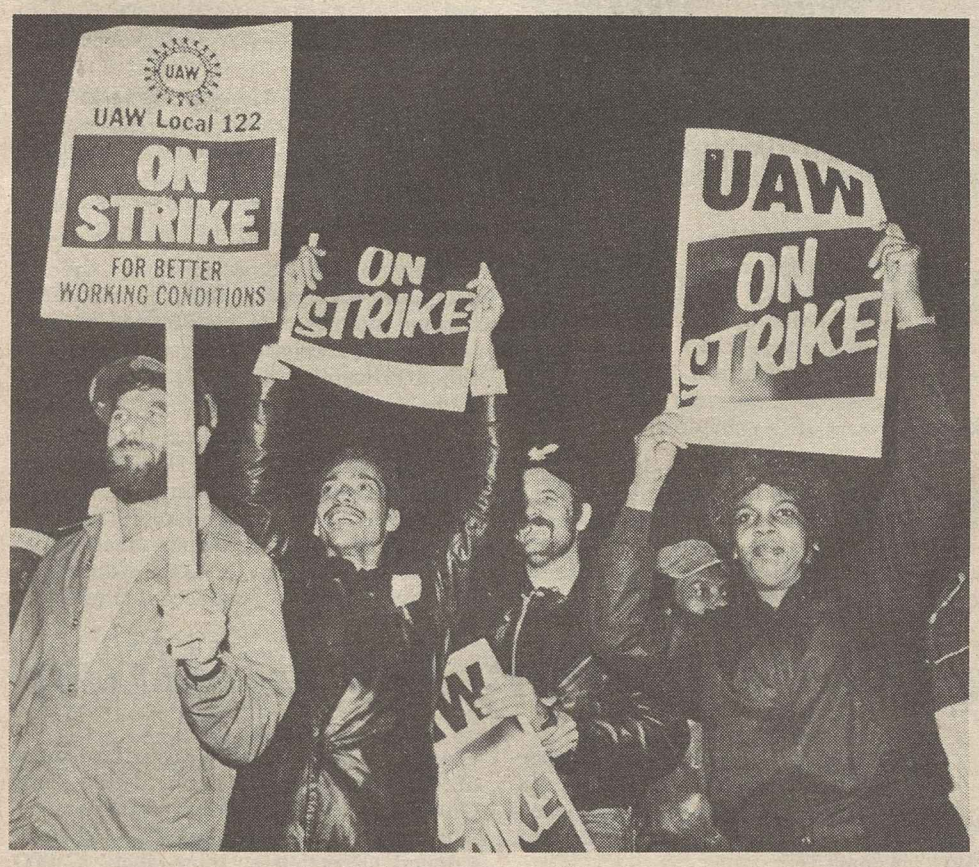
New "Bracero" Plan Spoils Immigration Bill

As Congress works on much needed legislation to control the flood of undocumented workers into this country, a provision sponsored by fruit and vegetable growers threatens to spoil the bill by opening U.S. borders to "guest workers" from other countries.

The so-called "bracero" program -- named for the discredited foreign worker program outlawed in 1964 was tacked onto S. 1200 the Simpson Immigration reform bill by Senator Pete Wilson, (R-CA) shortly before Senate passage on Sept. 19. The plan is little more than legalized slavery and would bring in a half-million non-Americans, giving them few protections, just so growers can have cheap labor.

The bill is now in the House Judiciary Committee but the Bracero plan, if made a part of the House bill could undermine its chances at a time when a law is desperately needed to stave off the flow of illegals into virtually every industry in this country, including construction, manufacturing and even high-tech.



Growers contend they need the program because Americans are not willing to do the work, but examination of the nation's successful lettuce industry, which now employes almost entirely U.S. citizens for harvesting, proves different. After years of fighting, the lettuce workers today are getting a decent wage and the industry is healthy. The only real difference is pay.

H.R. 3080, the Rodino immigration reform bill, is awaiting markup before the House Subcommittee on Immigration. Now is the time to contact your congressman to stop this legalized slavery before it becomes law.

UAW members walk the line in first Chrysler strike in 12 years.

Chrysler workers strike to reinstate UAW wage parity

Detroit—More than 70,000 Auto Workers walked out on strike at 50 Chrysler Corp. plants in 15 states after around-the-clock contract talks broke down over the issue of achieving parity with their fellow UAW members at General Motors and Ford.

The UAW said it would continue to push for a quick settlement of the strike, pointing out that company officials had conceded there was a need to address the issues of job security and training opportunities in the new contract.

"We deeply regret that the UAW is forced to strike the Chrysler Corp.," UAW President Owen Bieber said after the negotiations collapsed. "We believe every avenue has been explored, but the gulf separating us on key issues is simply too great for us to bridge at this point."

As union and company negotiators returned to the bargaining table, Bieber said the pace of the talks had "picked up a little." But, he added, some stumbling blocks remained. "There are some tough friction points," he said, because Chrysler has failed to address the parity issue.

The walkout, the first in 12 years at the nation's No. 3 automaker, came at a time when a resurgent Chrysler was reporting third-quarter net earnings of $386 million.

Workers' contribution

Five years ago, when Chrysler was on the brink of bankruptcy, UAW members made an estimated $1 billion in contract concessions and played a major role in securing $1.2 billion in federally guaranteed loans to help get the financially ailing company back on its feet.

Chrysler lost more than $3 billion from 1979 until its recovery took place two years ago. It earned a record profit of $701 million in 1983 and tripled that—to a new record of $2.3 billion—last year.

With the company well in the black again, the UAW went to the bargaining table this year asking that its members at Chrysler be put on an even footing with those at GM and Ford, where last year's successful contract talks won important gains in the areas of job security and training opportunities as well as economic benefits.

The UAW put particular stress on the need for adequate job security at Chrysler, where more than 60,000 jobs have disappeared in the past decade.

The union said much of the problem stemmed from outsourcing—the increasing use of outside sources to produce auto components, particularly at foreign plants and non-union suppliers—and asked for a company pledge to produce more components in-house if it could be done efficiently.

In last year's negotiations with GM and Ford, the UAW won agreement on setting up job-security "banks," funded at up to $1.3 billion over six years, to provide wages and retraining to displaced workers.

The UAW said that local plant issues were also involved in the negotiations deadlock. Chrysler workers have not renegotiated local contracts in seven years, as part of their effort to help rescue the company from economic collapse, the union pointed out.

Union role focus of Wheeling-Pitt settlement offer

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers and Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel reached tentative agreement on a new contract that will give the union an unprecedented role in the financial reorganization of the import-battered steelmaker.

The proposed settlement—approved by a 13-6 vote of the bargaining committee and now in the process of ratification by USWA members—provides $17 an hour in wages and benefits, $1 an hour for a new supplemental pension plan, and up to $1 an hour in bonuses if steel prices rise.

Agreement on a new contract would end the dispute, now in its 13th week, which led to the lockout of 8,600 USWA members at nine plants in Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania.

The key element was agreement to give the union two seats on Wheeling-Pittsburgh's board of directors, one of them with voting rights.

"What this means," said Paul D. Rusen, the union's chief negotiator, "is that we will

Overtime compact ends public sector dispute

A bipartisan agreement on overtime compensation for employees of state and local governments has defused an attempt in Congress to roll back the Fair Labor Standards Act and nullify a Supreme Court decision that reinstated wage-hour coverage for public employees.

Almost identical bills are being cleared for speedy action by both the House and the Senate.

Both bills incorporate the principles agreed to in discussions involving the AFL-CIO and its public-sector unions on one side and organizations of city, county and state governments on the other side of the table.

Time and a half

Under the proposed legislation, state and local governments will be able to substitute compensatory time off for the cash payments they complained they couldn't afford. But any "comp time" given instead of cash will have to be at a time-and-one-half rate. Thus, two hours of overtime work will entitle a public employee to three hours of compensatory time off.

The time-and-one-half principle was the key concern of the unions whose members would be directly affected. As AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison noted in a letter to members of Congress involved in shaping the legislative compromise, it "preserves the integrity of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which is so vital to the interests of employees, while addressing the concerns of public employers."

Both the House and Senate bills would put off overtime coverage for most public workers until Apr. 15, 1986, although any coverage resulting from a collective bargaining agreement would remain in effect. When the new law took effect, any collective bargaining agreement providing less than time-and-one-half compensatory time would be upgraded.

As under present law, most public workers would be entitled to premium compensation for overtime after 40 hours a week. Both bills provide a ceiling on accumulated compensatory time, after which payment must be made in cash. The Senate bill provides a 480-hour cap on comp time. The House version would require cash after a 180-hour accumulation for most workers, and after 480 hours for public safety employees. Neither bill affects the existing wage-hour coverage of private-sector workers or federal and postal employees.

With public employers and unions in basic accord, bipartisan action came quickly.

Hospital charges soar

Medicare 'savings' punish elderly

America's elderly will have to pay $92 more for a day of hospital care as of Jan. 1, and substantially more if they need long-term treatment.

That's the ironic and unintended effect of a cost containment law that changed the way the government reimbursed hospitals for treatment of Medicare patients. Instead of paying hospitals for their actual cost of patient care, the government now bases reimbursement on the medical diagnosis of the ailment. Thus hospitals have an incentive to make more money by treatment that reduces hospital stays.

They also, it seems, have an incentive to raise daily costs in order to boost profits. And the result, according to AFL-CIO health care specialist Karen Ignagni, has been that Medicare beneficiaries have been caught "in a classic Catch 22 situation."

The government saves money. The hospitals make money. And the elderly patients are the ones who are about to be hit—and hard, she noted.

Applying the formula set by law, the Dept. of Health & Human Services has announced a 23 percent increase in the patient-paid deductible, starting next Jan. 1.

First-day charge

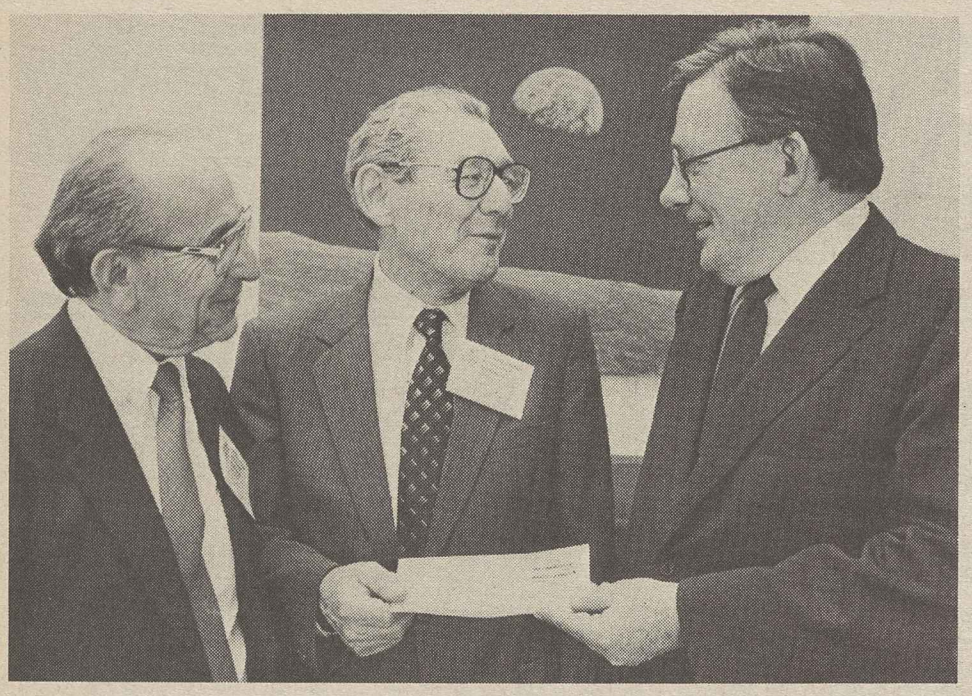
All Medicare patients pay for the first day of hospital care, with the charge based on the national average of all hospitals. This year, that first-day charge is $400. That figure will jump to $492 in January if the law is unchanged.

For longer illnesses, the daily co-payment for the 61st through 91st day of hospital care is scheduled to rise from $100 to $123. And applying the same percentage formula, the daily charge for nursing home stays of 21 through 100 days will go up from $50 to $61.50.

The Administration was quick to take credit for bringing Medicare costs under control as a result of the new system of reimbursing hospitals, Ignagni noted. The average length of hospital stay for people over age 65 dropped 7.5 percent last year, a significant cost saving for Medicare.



But there was no fanfare, merely a little-noticed announcement, when HHS disclosed recently the forthcoming sharp rise in Medicare deductibles.

The Medicare deductible formula is clearly in need of revision, Ignagni said.

Congressional committees concerned with the aging and Medicare issues are starting to explore the problem and bills have been introduced in both the House and Senate to set a cap on the increase in hospital care deductibles. But it will take some legislative shortcuts for Congress to act in time to block the Jan. 1 rise.

To perpetuate the memories of the six million Jews who perished in Hitler's death camps, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland presents federation's check for $10,000 toward the construction of a holocaust memorial in Washington to Miles Lerman, left, and Sigmund Strochlitz. The two survivors of Nazi genocidal policies are cochairmen of the "Campaign to Remember," which is raising $100 million to build the museum.

Community rallies aid for jobless Woodworkers

Lewiston, Ida.—Their jobs shot out from under them by competition from abroad and outdated facilities at home, 1,200 Woodworkers are taking part in a multi-pronged effort to find new employment in this recession-ravaged area of northern Idaho.

The IWA members lost their jobs in July when Potlach Corp., Lewiston's largest employer, announced the indefinite shutdown of its lumbering operations under the pressure of mounting imports of Canadian lumber.

To meet the crisis, Gov. John Evans (D) announced formation of a regional task force composed of union, business and educational leaders, working with federal and state agencies, to help workers deal with the disruption in their lives and to help the community come to grips with the economic consequences of the shutdown.

The IWA and Lewis-Clark State College immediately joined forces in establishing a "hot line" to provide dislocated workers with information on services offered by community agencies—food banks, health care and other forms of emergency assistance—to help them cope with the crisis.

Recognizing that the massive layoff would inevitably lead to major career changes for most of the dislocated workers, the union and the college also worked in tandem to inform IWA members of available educational opportunities.

With assistance from the IWA, the college developed profiles on 700 former Potlach workers. The computer base which was created showed that most of the dislocated workers needed to update basic skills to improve their employability.

The college developed a special program—Education and Training for Change—to help plug this skill gap. Special funding was received by the vocational division to bring basic adult education programs to the workers in their home communities.

A nucleus of community agencies joined with the college in seeking a $50,000 grant under the federal Joint Training Partnership Act to provide training in small business management and pre-employment skills. The IWA has applied for Trade Adjustment Assistance funds to augment this effort.

1986 contract negotiations will cover 1.3 million

Contract negotiations will have a new look next year when AFL-CIO unions go to the bargaining table to work out company-by-company contracts instead of industry-wide agreements in basic steel and telecommunications.

For more than half a million members of the Communications Workers and Electrical Workers, 1986 will mark the first time since the court-ordered divestiture of the Bell System that they will be bargaining separately with American Telephone & Telegraph, with the seven Bell regional operating companies, and perhaps with individual companies within the regions.

In basic steel, the Steelworkers will be bargaining with individual companies for the first time in 30 years. The last vestiges of the industry's united front collapsed earlier this year when the coordinated bargaining committee, its ranks thinned to only five steel producers, voted to disband.

The contracts for more than 1.3 million members of AFL-CIO unions will dominate the 1986 collective bargaining calendar in such widely divergent industries as aerospace, petroleum, containers, aluminum, glass, agricultural machinery, longshore, airlines, utilities, construction and service trades.

Merger impact

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, for example, could be in a stronger-than-usual position as it negotiates with the major oil producers for contracts covering some 50,000 workers if the proposed merger with the Paperworkers, already ratified by the OCAW membership, is approved. Merger would triple the union's size.

And the Machinists will open contract talks with the major aerospace companies with the knowledge that recent agreements in the industry have moved toward eliminating, or sharply modifying, wage concessions they were forced to make three years ago in the depths of the Reagan recession.

Compiled by the Bureau of National Affairs, the following is a list of major bargaining in 1986 involving federation affiliates and the month of contract expirations:

Aerospace—IAM, covering about 30,000 members at several Boeing Co. plants in October; 15,000 IAM members at Lockheed Corp. in Burbank, Calif., and Marietta, Ga., October; 3,500 IAM members at McDonnell Douglas Corp. in California, October.

Agricultural Machinery—Some 21,000 Auto Workers at Caterpillar Tractor Co. in Peoria, Ill., June; 26,000 UAW members at several John Deere & Co. plants, June.

Airlines—Nearly 2,500 IAM members at Republic Airlines, September; 6,500 Air Line Employees at Republic, December; 9,000 Flight Attendants at United Airlines, May, and 15,000 IAM members at United, October.

Communications—More than 24,000 CWA members at American Telephone & Telegraph's Long Lines Division, August; CWA's Bell Telephone operating company contracts expiring in August cover 32,000 members at Chesapeake & Potomac, 3,400 at Cincinnati Bell, 13,500 at Michigan Bell, 29,000 at Mountain States Telephone & Telegraph, 8,000 at New Jersey Bell, 31,000 at New York Telephone, 18,000 at Northwestern Bell, 27,000 at Ohio Bell, 64,000 at Pacific Telephone & Telegraph, 56,000 at Southern Bell, 70,000 at Southwestern Bell and 6,000 at Wisconsin Telephone; IBEW agreements covering 4,000 at Bell of Pennsylvania, 13,000 at Illinois Bell, 18,500 at New England Telephone & Telegraph, 12,500 at New Jersey Bell and 2,000 at Pacific Telephone & Telegraph, August; 21,000 CWA members at General Telephone Co. of California, March; 6,500 Musicians covered by the Phonograph Record Labor Agreement, November.

Construction—118,000 Carpenters, 15,000 Laborers and 4,000 Plasterers at Associated General Contractors in California, June; 7,000 Carpenters at AGC in St. Louis, April; 6,000 Laborers at AGC in New Jersey, February; 8,000 Operating Engineers at Constructors Association of Western Pennsylvania, December.

Electrical Machinery—Nearly 6,000 IBEW members at AT&T Techonologies, Inc. in Reading, Pa., August; 2,500 IBEW members at several RCA Service Co. installations, November; 3,300 Allied Industrial Workers at Whirlpool Corp. in Fort Smith, Ark., September.

Fabricated Metals—Nearly 7,500 Aluminum Workers and 7,600 USWA members at several Aluminum Co. of America plants, May; 4,000 USWA members at a number of plants of American Can Co., February; more than 8,000 USWA members at nationwide Continental Can Co. operations, February; 3,000 USWA members at National Can Co. plants, February; 5,600 Aluminum Workers and 7,000 Steelworkers at Reynolds Metals Co. plants, May.

Food—Some 3,000 Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco members at Hershey Chocolate Co. in Hershey, Pa., November; 4,500 Auto Workers at Pabst Brewing Co. in Milwaukee, June; nearly 11,000 BCT members at Philip Morris in Louisville, Ky., and Richmond, Va., January.

Lumber—Some 22,000 Woodworkers covered by the agreement with Western States Wood Products Employers Association, May.

Machinery—About 9,000 AIW members at Briggs & Stratton Corp. in Milwaukee, July; 8,000 USWA members at Timken Co. in Ohio, August.

Maritime—More than 50,000 Longshoremen covered by the pact with Atlantic and Gulf Coast shipping associations, September; 4,300 ILA members at New Orleans Steamship Association, September; 5,000 ILA members employed by members of the West Gulf Maritime Association, September.

Meat Packing—1,600 Food & Commercial Workers at George A. Hormel & Co. plants in September; 1,600 UFCW members at Oscar Mayer Food Corp. in Madison, Wis., August.

Paper—Some 6,000 IBEW and Paperworkers members at plants of International Paper Co., May; 1,000 UPIU members at James River Corp. in Kalamazoo, Mich., July; 2,500 UPIC at Scott Paper Co. in Alabama, June.

Petroleum—OCAW contracts covering some 50,000 workers at major oil companies expire in January, including 1,400 at Amoco Oil Co.in Texas City, Tex., 2,300 at several facilities of Atlantic Richfield Co., 1,900 at Gulf Oil Co. in Port Arthur, Tex., 1,500 at Mobil Oil Corp. in Beaumont, Tex., and 1,800 at Shell Oil Co. in Houston.

Primary Metals—Nearly 30,000 USWA members at plants of Bethlehem Steel Corp., 16,500 at Inland Steel Co. in East Chicago, Ind., 30,000 at plants of LTV Corp., and 48,000 at United States Steel Corp. plants, all in August.

Services—16,000 Service Employees at Associated Guard & Patrol Agencies, Inc. in Chicago, December; 52,000 Retail, Wholesale & Department Store members at the League of Voluntary Hospitals & Homes in New York, June; 4,000 SEIU members, also employed by the League, November; 20,000 SEIU members at New York Realty Advisory Board Inc., December; 6,000 Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees covered by a pact with the San Francisco Employers Association, August; 6,000 SEIU members at the Service Employers Assn. in New York, December.

Shipbuilding—More than 30,000 members of Metal Trades Council employed by Pacific Coast Shipbuilders, June; 4,000 Marine & Shipbuilding Workers at Todd Pacific Shipyards Corp. in San Pedro, Calif., July.

Stone-Clay-Glass—Some 3,000 Glass & Pottery Workers at plants of Anchor Hocking Corp., March; 3,000 Flint Glass Workers at Anchor Hocking, September; 7,000 Glass & Pottery Workers at various plants of Brockway, Inc., March; 2,000 Flint Glass Workers covered by the agreement with the Glass Container Industrial Relations Council, September; more than 12,000 Glass & Pottery workers at a number of Owens-Illinois, Inc., plants, March.

Textiles—More than 2,000 Clothing & Textile Workers at a number of Avtex Fibers, Inc., plants, August; 4,000 ACTWU members at Celanese Fibers Co. division of Celanese Corp. in Cumberland, Md., Rock Hill, S.C., and Narrows, Va., June.

Transit—Some 14,000 Transit Union workers covered by the national agreement with Greyhound Lines, Inc., October; 5,000 Transport Workers at Southeastern Pennsylvania Transportation Authority, Philadelphia, March.

Transportation Equipment—More than 2,000 USWA members at plants of Dana Corp., November; 9,000 UAW members at Dana, December; 3,500 UAW members at the Rouge Steel division of Ford Motor Co. in Dearborn, Mich., July; 5,000 UAW members at Volkswagen of America, Inc., in New Stanton, Pa. and South Charleston, W.Va., March.

Utilities—Nearly 16,000 Utility Workers and 600 IBEW members at Consolidated Edison Co., New York, June; 5,000 UWU members at Consumers Power Co. in Jackson, Mich., September; 8,000 IBEW members at Niagara Mohawk Power Corp. in New York, May; 6,000 IBEW members and 2,200 UWU members at Southern California Edison Co. in Rosemead, Calif., December; 7,000 OCAW and UWU members at Southern California Gas Co., March.

Wholesale & Retail—More than 18,000 UFCW members covered by agreement with Food Employers Council, Inc., of California, February; 18,000 UFCW members at Jewel Food Stores in Chicago, October; 5,000 UFCW members at Safeway Stores, Inc. in Washington, D.C., September; 7,000 UFCW members at Santa Clara County Food Stores in California, February; 5,500 UFCW members at Woodward & Lothrop, Inc. in Washington, D.C., February.

Tightfisted stance

Although they expect to be in the black this year, most bosses are planning a tightfisted approach to collective bargaining in 1986, according to a study by the Bureau of National Affairs.

Their goal will be pay increases averaging no more than 2 to 4 percent, a two-tier wage system, and a concerted drive against cost-of-living adjustments, the BNA survey showed.

Despite the continued efforts of unions to win job security provisions in their contracts, management is noticeably cool to such plans, and 80 percent of those responding indicated they would negotiate for the relaxation of "restrictive" work rules.

BNA mailed its questionnaire to 500 employers and received replies from 230. Responses from the manufacturing sector outnumbered those in nonmanufacturing by nearly three to one.

Wheeling-Pitt settlement bid gains support

be active participants in the reorganization of this company,'' which filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy to stave off creditors' suits while it tried to work out a new financing and operating plan.

''We will have a major voice in how the reorganization takes place and what the new (company) will look like,'' Rusen said. ''No other labor union has ever been able to do this.''

The new contract must be approved by the bankruptcy court which has presided over Wheeling-Pittsburgh's reorganization since April. It must also pass muster with the company's 11 creditor banks which hold $397 million of the steelmaker's $514 million debt.

The USWA agreed to the pension relief program, a union spokesman said, after the company moved in bankruptcy court to terminate the existing decades-old retirement plan under a threat by the banks to liquidate the firm.

Initial reports indicated that the banking consortium, led by Manufacturers Hanover Trust Co., was still not satisfied with the settlement, and might continue to pursue legal steps to challenge the reorganization plan and force liquidation.

Survival pact

The USWA and Wheeling-Pittsburgh remained optimistic, however, with both sides describing the contract as the last chance to save the company from being put out of business.

''This agreement represents the very best the negotiating committee could achieve, and the very best the company could offer,'' Rusen said.

''Approval by the membership will mean we have saved our jobs, we have saved our home town and, as we have promised, we have saved the company,'' the USWA official added.

If Wheeling-Pittsburgh can stave off the banks' efforts to force it out of business, observers said, the company could emerge from Chapter 11 bankruptcy by late 1987. Once reorganization is accomplished, the USWA contract would be subject to renegotiation.

Plant closing alert

At Capitol Hill briefing, Machinists President William W. Winpisinger talks to congressional staffers and House members of the need for legislation requiring advance notification of plant closings and major layoffs. The briefing was sponsored by the AFL-CIO and other groups supporting advance notice requirements as an opportunity to explore alternatives to plant closings and minimize hardships to workers and communities.

Labor unity theme sounded at Massachusetts convention

Boston—With the theme of ''solidarity now more than ever'' as its rallying cry, the Massachusetts AFL-CIO reaffirmed its support for a united labor front to meet challenges in the political, social and economic arenas.

More than 600 delegates to the biennial convention put their stamp of approval on a resolution recommitting the state's 267 local unions and their more than 168,000 members to labor unity in the face of a ''frontal attack'' from the Reagan Administration at home and the ''sabotage'' of cutthroat competition from abroad.

A major demonstration—featuring top officials from the Electronic Workers, Auto Workers, Steelworkers, Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers—driven indoors by a heavy rainstorm, focused on the debilitating effects of imports on ''bedrock'' American industries.

Waving a sea of American flags, delegates chanted ''Ronald Reagan, what do you say? Keep our jobs in the USA!'' They then proceeded to issue a call for a national effort to stem the rising tide of imports which has swept away 2.3 million factory jobs since 1979.

The resolution assailed the Administration's ''misguided trade policies,'' the over valued dollar, the skyrocketing federal deficit and tax breaks for runaway American firms which relocate in cheap-labor countries abroad—all of which, the convention said, have undercut America's economic base.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue applauded the convention's stand on the foreign trade issue, and pointed to a series of recent public opinion polls showing that the American people are ''fed up with foreign trade practices that are . . . stripping (the country) of jobs and industrial strength.''

Not only is competition from abroad undercutting such old-time Massachusetts industries as shoes, textile and apparel, he said, it also puts in peril such ''new-look, futuristic industries'' as the state's telecommunications equipment manufacturing operations.

Jobs shortfall

''We simply must stop the hemorrhage of U.S. jobs if we are to get back on the track toward a nation of full employment,'' Donahue said, warning that America faces a shortfall of 7.5 to 8 million jobs in the next five years.

Delegates cheered Boston's Cardinal Bernard Law, who defended the trade union movement and sharply criticized the news media for the way in which it ''mistreats'' organized labor.

''The media reports the strikes but not the peaceful settlements,'' the Roman Catholic prelate said; ''it reports the occasional violence but overlooks the good things that unions do every day.''

In a series of resolutions, the convention:

- Opposed efforts by General Dynamics to close the Fore River shipyard in Quincy, declaring that a concerted drive to build ships in America would save the jobs of 4,000 workers.
- Supported the state's prevailing-wage law, warning that efforts to ''gut'' this protection are being led by forces that would ''benefit from lower wages.''
- Pledged itself to fight off attempts to modify or repeal the Davis-Bacon Act.
- Opposed Reagan Administration proposals to tax workers' fringe benefits.

Union movement plays vital role in Central America

Central America's labor movement is engaged in a ''life-or-death struggle'' to preserve human rights and democratic principles, a group of nine U.S. trade unionists concluded after a two-week fact-finding mission to the region.

The trip, sponsored by the AFL-CIO, took the unionists to Costa Rica, Nicaragua, Honduras, El Salvador and Guatamala.

The hope for peace in that troubled region of the Americas, said President Daniel McVey of the Missouri AFL-CIO, ''depends on the willingness of the Sandinista government to allow the goals of the 1979 revolution to become a reality.''

Unless Nicaragua turns to ''democratic and plurastic rule,'' McVey said, ''the other countries of Central America will continue to be menaced by their brand of Marxist Leninism.''

Kenneth Gordon Flory, secretary-treasurer of the Louisiana AFL-CIO, praised the role of the Salvadoran trade union movement in developing democracy in that country.

Free trade unions are ''vital to the development of democracy in Central America,'' Tim Twomey, executive secretary-treasurer of Service Employees Local 250, said.

Other members of the delegation included Patsy Fryman and Henley Johns of the Communications Workers; Scott Courtney of the Nevada AFL-CIO; Oscar Sanchez of the Steelworkers; Dan Gustafson, president of the Minnesota AFL-CIO, and Ken Richardson of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Richard Schone dies, field representative

Salt Lake City—Richard H. Schone, an AFL-CIO field representative since 1978, died of cancer Oct. 11. He was 42 years old.

When he joined the federation staff, Schone was president of the Utah Building Trades Council. He had previously served as financial secretary, business agent and business manager of Laborers Local 295.

Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in a telegram to his wife Susan, praised Schone as ''a distinct asset in advancing the cause of working men and women.''

Rollcall on 'balanced budget'

The Senate on Oct. 9 voted 75-24 for a ''balanced budget'' proposal that would give President Reagan unprecedented power to cut government programs to bring the federal budget into balance. Labor opposed the plan as a reckless abdication of congressional responsibility.

Compact solves public sector dispute

Senate Labor Subcommittee Chairman Don Nickles (R-Okla.) had initially sponsored a bill to remove public employees from the overtime provisions of the wage-hour law. But he joined Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) in sponsoring the new legislation and getting immediate approval of the full Labor & Human Resources Committee in a telephone poll.

In the House Labor Standards Subcommittee, where Chairman Austin J. Murphy (D-Pa.) had presided at hearings that explored the issues, every member of the subcommittee joined in sponsoring the new bill. The full committee plans to bring the bill to the House floor before the end of the month.

Congress brought public workers under the wage-hour law in 1974, but the Supreme Court first held in a 5-4 decision that the extension of coverage to persons employed in ''traditional government functions'' was an unconstitutional infringement on states' rights.

Early this year, however, the Supreme Court reversed itself and reinstated the 1974 law, also by a 5-4 margin. Mayors and governors then launched a major lobbying effort to get Congress to rescind the wage-hour coverage.

House approves labor-backed study on pay equity

The House approved a labor-supported, Administration-opposed bill to initiate a pay equity study of the federal workforce in order to determine whether the government's job classification system discriminates against women and minorities.

The 259-162 vote for the bill reflected an Administration decision to make a partisan issue of a measure especially important to women's groups and strongly supported by the labor and civil rights coalition.

Last year, a similar bill passed by an overwhelming 413-6 margin. But that vote reflected the Administration's political embarrassment from public exposure of a "dirty tricks" memo in the Office of Personnel Management proposing tactics to split unions and "feminist groups." The House-passed bill was then bottled up by the Republican-controlled Senate until Congress adjourned. An attempt to resurrect it as an amendment to an unrelated government funding measure was rejected, 57-41.

This time around, 222 House Democrats and 37 Republicans voted for passage, while 139 Republicans and 22 Democrats were opposed.

Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio), the bill's principal sponsor, fought off an amendment by Rep. Joe L. Barton (R-Tex.) that would have deleted a provision barring the study panel from proposing to lower the pay of any worker to achieve pay equity.

Divisive tactics

Its passage would have furthered the divide-and-conquer tactics that opponents have sought to promote. The House defeated the Barton amendment, 276-148, and rejected other weakening changes by similar margins.

The House-passed bill would establish an 11-member commission to oversee and 18-month study of the federal pay and classification system, covering both hiring and promotion practices. The commission would include members representing Congress, the Administration, federal employee unions, women's groups and civil rights organizations.

Although the study clearly would be restricted to the federal civil service, business groups lobbied for its defeat, arguing that it sought to upset the concept of the market place as the determining factor in judging the value of jobs.

A National Association of Manufacturers official gloated after the House vote that the margin of passage was less than the two-thirds that would be needed to override a presidential veto.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed that pay equity is a "fairness" issue that is controversial only "to those who profit from wage discrimination."

He said the objections raised against it "are the arguments which were made during the debates on equal pay, minimum wage and child labor laws."

When the House first took up the bill this year, on the eve of the August recess of Congress, opponents used the threat of bringing up hundreds of amendments to get the legislation temporarily sidetracked.

In the resumed debate, they raised the specter of costly lawsuits against the government if the study should show the existence of pay inequities. And they portrayed the measure as an entering wedge for what they construed as "pay comparability," involving the matching of unlike jobs.

Outdated system

Oakar and other supporters of the measure noted that nearly all states are conducting or have conducted similar pay equity studies. They stressed that the private sector is not involved, and noted that the federal government's salary classifications system already ranks unlike jobs in pay classifications. But the classification system dates from 1923, when women and minorities made up only 5 percent of the federal workforce, they noted.

A Senate Governmental Affairs subcommittee has held hearings on a similar measure cosponsored by Senators Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) and Daniel J. Evans (R-Wash.), but has not yet acted on the legislation.

A $25,000 check for AFL-CIO's Mexican relief drive is presented to Sec.-Treas. Donahue by ILGWU President Chaikin and Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur, left.

Donations boost relief fund for Mexico's quake victims

In its first two weeks, the AFL-CIO's Mexican Earthquake Relief Fund raised more than $64,000 to aid victims of the two major earthquakes that struck Mexico.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council's initial donation of $25,000 was boosted by a matching contribution from the Ladies' Garment Workers. ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin said, "Our hearts go out to our brothers and sisters in Mexico. Continuing the long ILGWU tradition of coming to the aid of those who are in distress anywhere in the world, we present this check for $25,000 in the hope that it will alleviate in some small measure the suffering of Mexico's earthquake victims."

Thus far, donors include 10 international or national unions, two state federations, five local central bodies and many individuals, according to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services.

Nearly a month after the tragedy, the Mexicans are still digging out from under the rubble. More than a million workers remain unemployed because of the quakes.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that while short-term human needs have been met, the long-term rehabilitation programs are matters of great concern.

Those wishing to donate to the fund should send their contributions marked for the Mexican Earthquake Relief Fund to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue.

Painters challenge OSHA on toxic hazards standard

The effectiveness of government standards in protecting workers against poisonous chemicals used in the workplace was questioned by the Painters at a House subcommittee hearing.

Rodney D. Wolford, director of the Painters' safety and health department, testified that hazard communication regarding toxic materials "must be a right for all workers—not just those in manufacturing."

The standard set by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration limits coverage to workers in certain industrial classifications developed by the Bureau of Labor Standards. Wolford stressed that workplace hazards are not limited to "artificial classifications" that do not reflect "when and where hazardous substances will be found and to what degree."

Testifying before the House Science & Technology Subcommittee on Investigations & Oversight, Wolford pointed out that the more than 450,000 painters in the U.S. workforce are exposed to paints that contain 150 known or suspected carcinogens and a greater number of other toxins that are capable of killing or maiming workers.

Overexposure symptoms

Citing a 1975 study of painters, Wolford noted that 74 percent were found to have experienced neurotoxic symptoms, such as nausea, dizziness or fatigue. Workers often are led to believe that the signs and symptoms of overexposure are a natural part of being a painter, he said.

Wolford told the subcommittee that an unpublished study by the union had found a "statistically significant relationship" between worker-reported neurotoxic symptoms and the gallons of paint applied per year.

He suggested that chemical exposures for a wide variety of workers can be significantly reduced "just by accepting that neurotoxins may cause 'temporary or permanent impairment or harm' and pose 'significant risk' which must be controlled by assuring no worker is exposed" in doses or for periods that cause symptoms to be manifested.

In noting the shortcomings of the federal hazard communication standard, Wolford said it fails to require any evaluation of labeling effectiveness. While labels may warn users to avoid prolonged contact or not to breathe the vapors, they do not say that acute neurotoxic effects such as headaches and dizziness are serious symptoms of overexposure.

Without evaluation of labeling, he said, all that is accomplished with certainty by OSHA's hazard communication standard is the reduction of liability for manufacturers.

Wolford suggested that the standard include an evaluation of label and training effectiveness and that manufacturers share the hazard training responsibilities and costs.

Further, he urged that both manufacturers and employers be subject to strict legal liability for failure to warn and train effectively, and scored a proposed Senate bill that would reduce manufacturer liability.

Clothing Workers approve new pact covering 56,000

The Clothing & Textile Workers overwhelmingly ratified a new two-year agreement with the Clothing Manufacturers Association covering some 56,000 workers.

The association contract provides two lump-sum payments. Workers on the payroll as of Sept. 15, 1985, will get $500 this Dec. 15, while those on the payroll as of Oct. 1, 1985, will receive $600 the following Dec. 15. Prorated payments will be made to those hired between now and December 1986.

The new agreement also improves vacations, boosts surgical coverage by 36 percent, adds Martin Luther King's birthday as an 11th holiday, raises sickness and accident benefits to a $115 maximum, increases life insurance coverage to $4,000 and monthly pension benefits to $6 per year of service in 1986 and to $6.25 a year later.

The package follows closely the industry pattern set last month in an agreement covering 23,000 cotton garment workers. That agreement is for three years and includes a 25-cent-per-hour raise the third year.

The contract provides for the establishment of a tripartite commission to study the structural changes and competition in production and marketing of men's and boys' tailored clothing. The commission will include representatives of the union, the employers and "people of standing in the community."

The old contract expired May 31, 1985, but was extended four months until a new contract was ratified in early October.

17 unions link benefits to Conrail sale

Seventeen railroad unions have signed an agreement that would guarantee a $400-million package of employee cash and stock benefits if Conrail is sold to a group of investors represented by the Morgan Stanley investment company.

Last July, the unions tentatively endorsed Morgan Stanley's public stock offering plan to buy Conrail contingent on negotiation of a definitive agreement on employee stock holdings and deferred wages.

Under the terms of the agreement signed with Conrail and Morgan Stanley, employees would receive $200 million in cash payments for wage deferrals between Apr. 1, 1981, and June 30, 1984, when industry parity wage levels were restored. Employees would be offered $48 a share, or an estimated $190 million total, for their 15 percent ownership of Conrail under the Employee Stock Ownership Plan established in 1981.

Employees also would be given the opportunity to purchase up to $100 million in additional Conrail stock at the same $48 per share price Morgan Stanley would pay the federal government for its 85 percent ownership of shares.

In addition, the agreement provides for a labor protection program that would include supplemental unemployment benefits and health and welfare coverage, two seats on Conrail's board of directors for labor-appointed members, and labor support for the Morgan Stanley bid for Conrail.

Chief goal

Ole M. Berge, president of the Maintenance of Way Employees and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives Association, said RLEA's goal from the outset has been to "maintain Conrail as an independent, viable railroad" and to "seek justice for the employees" through a public sale of Conrail.

Berge said that while the RLEA still considers its original public sale proposal to the Dept. of Transportation to be the best offered, "we believe the Morgan Stanley plan and the new definitive agreement will achieve RLEA's objectives." The agreement will benefit shippers and the public, as well as Conrail employees, he said.

Joining in the agreement were 16 member unions of RLEA and the unaffiliated Teamsters. The United Transportation Union and its new affiliate, the Yardmasters, did not sign the accord, although they have expressed support for a public stock offering approach similar to Morgan Stanley's plan.

The Transportation Dept. has selected the Norfolk Southern Corp. as its preferred buyer. Both Norfolk Southern, which would merge Conrail into its current freight system, and Morgan Stanley, which would maintain Conrail as an independent carrier, have offered about $1.2 billion for the freight carrier.

Congress has the final word on whether to sell Conrail and to whom or to maintain it as a federally operated carrier. Congress created the Consolidated Rail Corp. in 1976 to salvage freight service in the Northeast after the collapse of the Penn Central and other bankrupt railroads.

Capitol Hill antics

House stumbles over balanced budget ploy

A House-Senate conference will try to agree on a procedure to achieve a balanced budget within six years.

That is what a hastily adopted Senate amendment to a bill raising the national debt limit purports to do. And the House, with even less consideration, instructed its conferees to bring back a measure that would achieve the same goal.

The Senate passed its version of a balanced budget requirement by a surprisingly large 75-24 margin, even though no one seemed very sure just how such a law would work (Rollcall, Page 3).

Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.), who strongly opposed the measure, sought the next day to find out how firmly committed the Senate was to a balanced budget. To dramatize what he termed the "irrationality" of the measure, Bradley proposed amendments designed to slash the military budget and raise the federal gasoline tax—by amounts that he said would be needed to comply with the first-year timetable for reaching the balanced budget goal. Both were overwhelmingly rejected.

In the House, Democratic leaders fumed at the Republican-launched bandwagon to steamroller the measure through Congress but decided that appearing to oppose the concept of a balanced budget would give GOP candidates too easy a target in the next election.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), who will lead the large contingent of House conferees, spoke scornfully of the "political games" that were being played. But "the game has begun and we are going to have to play, however reluctantly."

Setting goals

In the end, the House voted 354-15 to instruct its conferees to bring back legislation "which provides mechanisms for deficit reductions, including specific and mandatory budget goals for achieving a balanced budget within the next six years."

During the brief debate, various House members took the floor to explain their own, often varying, interpretation of the instructions to the conferees. The thrust was that balancing the budget was a worthy objective and a bipartisan effort should be made to find a way to achieve it. Some even stressed the need to consider increasing tax revenues as well as slashing already reduced federal programs.

In recognition of the fact that the House conferees will in effect be trying to shape new legislation instead of merely negotiating on differences between House and Senate versions, the size of the delegation was made unusually large.

It includes 14 members of the Ways & Means Committee, seven from the Rules Committee, six each from the Appropriations, Government Operations and Budget Committees and nine others named by Democratic and Republican leaders.

One byproduct of the conference will be to further delay the Ways & Means Committee's slow-paced markup of a tax bill, since most of the committee members will be participating in the balanced budget conference.

Stopped up

If the Senate Appropriations Committee has its way, the Labor Dept. won't be able to spend any money for new toilets or sinks in its offices until the Occupational Safety & Health Administration establishes field sanitation standards for farm workers.

The restriction was proposed by Sen. William Proxmire (D-Wis.) and approved by the committee as part of the appropriations bill for the Labor Dept. It was a response to Labor Sec. William E. Brock's decision to postpone any federal requirement for agricultural employers to provide water and toilet facilities for field workers. Brock said he hoped states would set their own standards.

An attempt to delete the Proxmire amendment is likely when the appropriations bill comes to the Senate floor. The House on Oct. 6 narrowly rejected an amendment to the farm bill that would have required field sanitation facilities in farms that get federal aid. (Rollcall, Page 6.)

Farmer-labor alliance

Officials of three family farm organizations meet with union lobbyists at AFL-CIO headquarters on farm bill issues before Congress. At head of table, from left: AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten and Director Ray Denison; Robert Denman, National Farmers Union legislative representative; Chuck Frazier, National Farmers Organization legislative director; David Senter (speaking), legislative director, and Wayne Meyers, California state president, of the American Agricultural Movement.

Maryland convention votes endorsement for governor

Baltimore—Maryland's trade union movement will take an early and active role in supporting the gubernatorial candidacy of Stephen H. Sachs in the Democratic primary next spring.

Sachs, who is Maryland's attorney general, received 91 percent of the votes cast by delegates to the biennial convention of the Maryland State & District of Columbia AFL-CIO. The convention heard all three principal candidates for the gubernatorial nomination before voting on the endorsement.

The federation did not vote on an endorsement for the U.S. Senate seat that will be at stake next year. Incumbent Republican Charles McC. Mathias, Jr., who has had COPE endorsement, announced shortly before the convention that he will not seek reelection. Both Mathias and Rep. Parren J. Mitchell (D-Md.), who is also retiring from Congress, received standing ovations when they addressed the convention.

Anti-worker campaign

Federation President Edward R. Lamon told the delegates that business attacks on labor at the national level are being paralleled by a Chamber of Commerce campaign to destroy state and local laws protecting workers.

Employer-sponsored legislation "would cut benefits to unemployed workers and disqualify people from receiving benefits," he reported. In workers' compensation, Lamon said, the Chamber has sought to delay payments to injured workers and has fought against giving workers access to information about hazardous chemicals in the workplace.

But in both Maryland and D.C., he said, attacks on labor have served to unify the trade union movement. Anti-union bills that have been beaten, Lamon said, include attempts to repeal prevailing wage laws and establish a subminimum youth wage.

"These fights are not over," he warned. "They will all come back."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the delegates that the shrinkage of unemployment insurance under the Reagan Administration, while joblessness remains at recession levels, is "a national scandal."

Unless action is taken to reverse the destruction of American industry and jobs, Donahue warned, the full employment goal will becomes so distant as to be out of sight.

A convention resolution expressed support for measures to hold down health care costs so as to make quality medical services affordable without exploiting health care workers.

Lamon, who was named president after the death of Thomas M. Bradley two years ago, was unanimously elected to a full four-year term. He is a member of the Electrical Workers and had been the state COPE director.

Re-elected without opposition were Vice Presidents Henry Koellein, Jr., and Joslyn Williams, and Sec.-Treas. Edward A. Mohler.

Delaware federation looks to 1986 election campaign

Dover, Del.—The Delaware AFL-CIO convention raised the state federation's per capita tax by 5 cents, earmarking 2 cents more for COPE to bolster labor's role in the 1986 election campaign.

The convention action sets monthly payments at 50 cents, effective next Jan. 1, with a nickel going to COPE, 2 cents to the educational fund and 43 cents to the general fund.

Delegates to the one-day convention expressed concern about America's mounting foreign trade deficit and called for federal action to reduce apparel imports to 25 percent of the U.S. apparel market. Such action would help restore more than 300,000 jobs that have been lost in this industry, the delegates noted.

Tax scheme

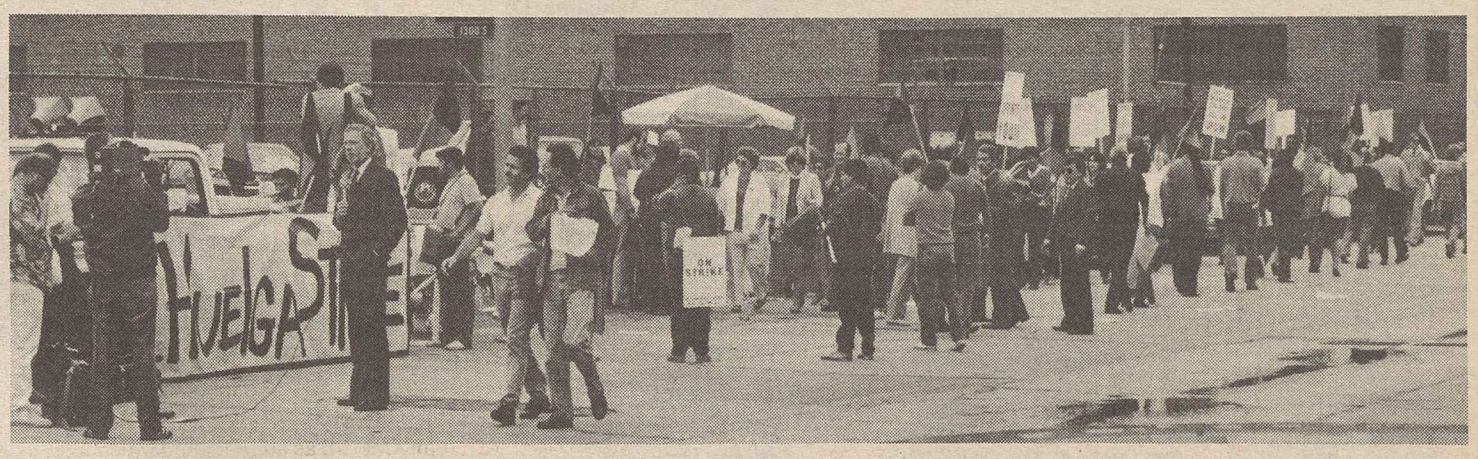
The Reagan Administration's scheme to tax workers on employer-provided benefits was scored as a move to boost the tax burden on the low- and middle-income workers.

In other action, the delegates gave unanimous support to unaffiliated Teamsters Local 326 in its strike against Rollins Cablevision for a new contract.

Seven newly elected executive board members will join 19 incumbents who were re-elected to two-year terms. The seven new members are Ralph Walsh of the Painters, Dominic DiStefano, Bricklayers; Edward Redmond, Food & Commercial Workers; Tom Archie and Larry Conway, Laborers; Raymond Ryan, Asbestos Workers, and Ron Hall, Boilermakers.

Lt. Gov. S.B. Woo, a member of the Teachers, told the delegates that the level of the U.S. trade deficit is "very scary," as it means the loss of some 4 million American jobs to other countries.

The concern for the size of the trade gap was shared by Rep. Thomas R. Carper (D) who noted that while the greatest imbalance exists with Japan, virtually every nation is contributing to the deficit.



Other speakers included AFL-CIO Field Rep. Tom Bradley and Regional COPE Director Frank McGrath.

Murray Latimer dies, union pension consultant

Murray W. Latimer, one of the architects of the nation's half-century-old social security system, died Oct. 1 of respiratory failure. He was 84.

In 1934 and 1935, Latimer served on the Committee on Economic Security, which produced the framework of the social security plan that President Roosevelt submitted to Congress.

From 1934 to 1946, he chaired the Railroad Retirement Board. After leaving the government, Latimer served as a pension consultant to the AFL-CIO and a number of affiliates.

No bed of roses

Fired for union activities, 37 members of Ladies' Garment Workers Local 512 in Los Angeles are joined by picketing supporters as a strike against Angel Echevarria Co., maker of Somma waterbeds, enters its ninth month. In February, the ILGWU won a National Labor Relations Board election at the plant, 113-48. Management challenged the results, claiming irregularities in the conduct of the vote. When its complaint was thrown out by the NLRB regional office, the company appealed to Washington where the case is still pending. Meanwhile, the firm proceeded to fire union activists at its four Los Angeles area plants, precipitating the walkout.

House votes on farm workers, imports

The AFL-CIO supported both a farm bill amendment requiring field sanitation standards, which the House defeated on Oct. 8, and the textile import bill it passed on Oct. 10.

Column I shows the 227-199 defeat of the farm bill amendment requiring large growers who get federal financial aid to provide sanitation facilities and drinking water for field workers. Right votes (R) for the amendment were cast by 189 Democrats and 10 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 168 Republicans and 59 Democrats.

Column II is the 262-159 passage of the bill to limit textile and apparel imports that are wiping out U.S. jobs. Voting right were 187 Democrats and 75 Republicans. Voting wrong were 97 Republicans and 62 Democrats.

Legislating Decency

THE CASE for plant closing legislation is so compelling that the most charitable explanation of the failure of Congress to act is that too few of its members are aware of the magnitude of the problem and the modest provisions of the bill that was approved by the House Education & Labor Committee last July.

The alternative explanation for congressional inaction is a knee-jerk subservience to business opposition to any ''infringement'' on management's right to close a plant for any reason, without notice to its workers and without regard to the impact on the community.

There is nothing that can be done about ideological intransigence, but the many concerned organizations supporting the legislation have been striving to overcome misinformation about what the bill requires—and does not require.

It requires companies employing 50 or more employees to give 90 days' notice of plant closings or mass layoffs.

If workers are represented by a union, it requires employers to provide information of the reason for the planned shutdown and to discuss possible alternatives.

It does not require employers to agree to any proposal or to postpone a shutdown beyond the notification period.

Its least contoversial provision is for a national commission to study plant closings and mass layoffs.

OVER THE PAST five years, 11.5 million American workers lost their jobs when plants closed. Communities were ravaged and lives wrecked. It is no coincidence that religious groups are in the forefront of the campaign for plant closing legislation. Their clergy have ministered to the victims of plant closings and their families.

No section of the nation has been immune, not the Sunbelt, not the high-tech enclaves.

In view of the magnitude of the problem, the proposed legislation is a small but important step that should have wider bipartisan support than has yet emerged.

Many employers already give reasonable advance notice of plant closings, put their cards on the table and explore alternatives advanced by community leaders and unions. Sometimes, there is no feasible alternative, but at least there has been advance warning to ease the shock and hardship.

Is such a common sense approach, if mandated by law, really the infringement on ''management prerogatives'' that business lobbyists claim?

Lest We Forget

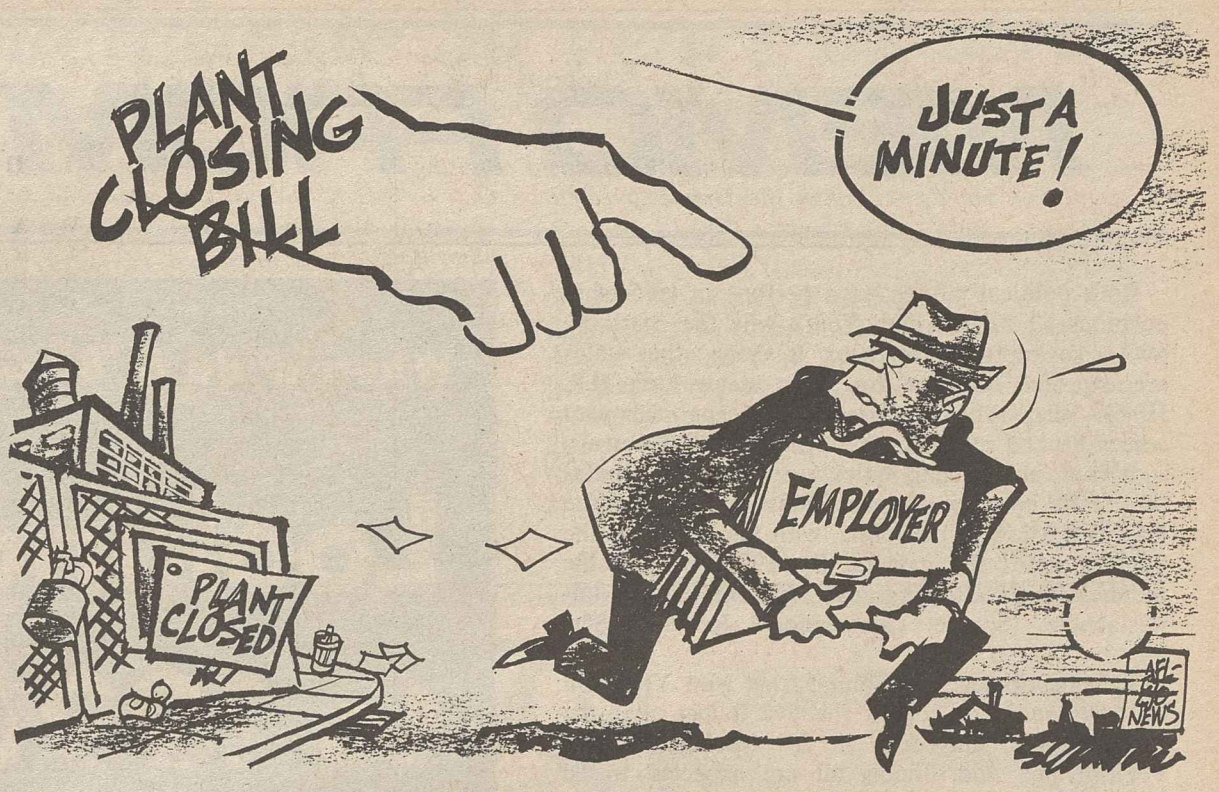
AFTER NEARLY five years in office, President Reagan is hard put to continue to blame all of the nation's economic ills on his predecessors.



It was Mr. Reagan, after all, who insisted that a mixture of heavy tax cuts—especially for the very wealthy—and a steep rise in military spending made economic sense.

Just over four years ago, the President signed a bill raising the debt ceiling for the first time over the $1 trillion dollar mark, and this is what he said:

''The $1 trillion dollar debt figure can stand as a monument to the policies of the past that brought it about, policies which, as of today, are reversed.''

That was on Oct. 1, 1981. The national debt reflected the accumulated obligations of nearly 200 years of constitutional government, including wartime expenditures.

Congress gave Mr. Reagan the economic program he sought, and the debt has now doubled to more than $2 trillion. Surely the solution isn't for Congress to cede still more budget power to the President.

America's spirit mocked by epidemic of hunger

By Press Associates, Inc.

The generosity of the American people shows itself over and over. Mass hunger in Africa, an earthquake in Mexico. When disaster strikes, Americans respond.

Why is it, then, that the growing epidemic of hunger at home goes ignored by many elected officials and most of the business community?

It can be admitted at the outset that this is the Reagan era. Business is in the saddle. The President himself believes in leaving most problems to be solved by ''the magic of the marketplace.'' The President and the rich and the powerful know how to exploit the traditional values of individualism and self-reliance.

When high unemployment persisted following the 1982 recession, the President advised the unemployed to look in the want-ads. When soup kitchens began proliferating, then presidential counselor Edwin Meese III dismissed the reports as ''anecdotal.'' There are always people looking for free meals, he said.

Yet the good people—in unions, in the professions, in civic groups, in religious organizations, in business and in politics—refuse to give up.

Perseverance

They refuse to give up because, in accordance with their beliefs, they cannot give up. They insist, in the old saying, on ''speaking truth to power.''

A new draft of a pastoral letter on the economy by the Roman Catholic bishops raises a basic issue: ''Every perspective of economic life that is human, moral, and Christian must be shaped by three questions—What does the economy do for people? What does it do to people? And how do people participate in it?''

The bishops are attempting to build ''bridges of responsibility'' between the poor and the middle and affluent classes. They expressed alarm that ''many working people and middle-class Americans live dangerously close to poverty,'' dependent on two or three incomes in a family, but called for special attention to the poor.

''That so many people are poor in a nation as rich as ours is a social and moral scandal that must not be ignored,'' the bishops said.

Bread for the World, a Christian citizens' movement, released a report on its ''Hunger Watch U.S.A.,'' which estimated that 1.5 million people are going hungry in 36 areas surveyed. The survey was carried out by a grant from the Ralston-Purina Trust Fund.

Voluntary aid

Margaret Lorber, chief author of Hunger Watch's ''Unfed America '85'' report, said volunteer agencies are ''staggering'' under the burden of feeding the hungry. Her report said private and voluntary emergency programs are serving 16 percent more people per month in 1985 than in 1984. Boston, Houston and Nashville showed the largest increases with 30 percent each.

The Bread for the World group said federal programs are falling far short of reaching eligible people. It noted that the Women, Infants and Children (WIC) program reaches only 3.1 million of more than 10 million eligible and urged that WIC be made an entitlement program. It also urged that Congress expand and increase the food stamp, school lunch and breakfast, and elderly nutrition programs. It noted that the food stamp program has been cut by $7 billion in the past four years, with 1 million people losing benefits.

Earlier this year, Harvard's Physician Task Force on Hunger in America reported that ''hunger is a problem of epidemic proportions across the nation.'' The physicians' field studies, funded by grants from a dozen foundations, concluded that, ''While no one knows the precise number of hungry Americans, available evidence indicates that up to 20 million citizens may be hungry at least some period of time each month.''

The bishops' pastoral letter appropriately quoted from Abraham Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg that there is ''unfinished work'' to be done.

MEMO FROM COPE

Where'd '86 & '88 Go?

Looking to 1990

Both political parties have persons in leadership positions who can count. That's why the chart below is so important to them. It shows what states are expected to gain, and what states lose, U.S. House seats when congressional reapportionment comes around in 1991, following the 1990 Census.

A look at the chart quickly reveals that population shifts once again make industrial states of the East and Midwest the losers, with the West and the Sunbelt states the gainers. By 1990, the specific numbers might change slightly, but the trend is unmistakable. (Source: Congressional Research Service.)

It is anticipated, for example, that New York will lose five seats, on top of the five it lost after the 1980 Census, and drop to 29. Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Illinois all are expected to be multiple losers.

Florida and Texas will each pick up four, California three and Arizona two.

In all, 19 seats are figured to shift from present locations, all but one each in Kansas and Iowa from traditional population and industrial centers.

Who's going to win these seats—for that matter, who's going to have the stronger hold on what's left in the losing states—in large part will be determined by who gets to do the reapportioning, who controls the state legislatures in 1991 as a result of 1990 elections.

The corollary is equally important—that in 1991 these same legislatures will redistrict themselves because of population shifts within the states.

While the political parties are going all out on 1986 elections, and positioning for the 1988 presidential run, both are looking beyond these to 1990. Republicans two years ago set up their "1991 Plan," described by them as a targeted program "to dramatically increase the number of Republican (state) legislative seats and governorships in preparation for crucial reapportionment."

Democrats have responded with "Project 500," which aims to "elect or retain 500 legislators in marginal districts and states," thus maintain a controlling voice in reapportionment and redistricting in most states.

As in all enterprises, Democrats will have to overcome an enormous GOP advantage in funding. Republicans are said to have $15 million to pour into their effort, probably an underestimate given the kind of money they pull in these days. Democrats hope to get $2 million for the 1985-86 election cycle, score well in 1986 state legislative elections, and build on this success in 1988 and 1990.

Reagan Rhetoric Ducks Deficit Responsibility

Of all the reverberating rhetoric generated around the recent proposal in Congress to mandate a balanced federal budget, President Reagan's boomed out from the rest like a howitzer beside a pop-gun.

More than any of his loyal GOP warriors in the Senate, Reagan fired off his heavy artillery in partisan fashion, zeroing in on Democrats as the single villain in the long ascent to $2 trillion in federal red ink.

"Republicans," he said "have swallowed hard every time we've had to vote for an increase in the debt ceiling. But these were forced on us by 50 years of deficit spending by the Democrats."

That's called demagoging it with a purpose.

The purpose is to pull a red herring across a trail that leads directly to Reagan's desk.

The fact is he's the biggest deficit spender in American history—the longest and loudest decrier of deficits—he's been at it more than 20 years now —but the all-time champ in running them up.

It took the 50 years leading up to Reagan to achieve $1 trillion in federal debt, and Republican Presidents collaborated in amassing it. In five years, Reagan has doubled government debt to $2 trillion.

This makes him 10 times better at going into debt than all his predecessors of the last 50 years combined. In fact, the present cost of interest alone on Reagan's debt — about $150 billion a year — is greater than total federal spending in Lyndon Johnson's day.

Sometimes, Those Who Change Parties in Midstream Drown

Lately, the chic thing politically has been to get elected as a Democrat then, sometime in the course of your term, announce you're jumping to the Republicans.

The Republicans rejoice and open their arms to the sinner reborn. And they draw the lesson that this is as it should be, because everybody belongs under Ron Reagan's loving roof.

Now and then, however, voters get annoyed. They figure they elected this person as one thing and now he goes and becomes something else. In Hawaii, recently, voters got so miffed they told three party-switchers to scram.

Three persons elected to the Honolulu city council last November as Democrats had bolted in June to the GOP, giving it control of the body.

The newly empowered GOP swiftly ousted the Democratic council chairperson, who happened to be former Rep. Patsy Mink. She and other Democratic leaders responded by launching a recall against the trio of defectors.

Republicans huffed and puffed and brought in the big guns. They ran a slick, costly radio/TV campaign for their embattled, recently acquired brethren. The campaign even featured their top box-office draw, President Reagan himself, appealing for support for his new-found friends. GOP spending: $250,000 for city council (in some areas, you can still run a U.S. House campaign for that.)

When the votes were tallied, all three of the Democrats-turned-Republicans-in-midstream were defeated, two on close votes, one in a rout.

President Reagan, in TV spots he did for the three, had told Honolulu voters: "The right to switch parties for principle is as American as the Stars and Stripes. I have done it myself."

He forgot to note his own switch did not occur while he occupied office, nor did he note that voters, of course, have the right to deal with the switchers in their own very democratic way, with their ballots.

At least in Honolulu, they sent the message that sometimes those who change parties in midstream drown.

What Happens When Rambo Marries Barbie

Mention was made in the AFL-CIO Legislative Alert on this page last week of Rambo, the roughest, toughest American patriot this side of Duke Wayne. A Rambo doll, the Alert revealed, is manufactured by an American firm in the Far East.

Perhaps the Rambo doll will waste Ken and hook up with America's sweetheart, the Barbie doll (made by an American firm in Mexico). The two can go through life together waving those little American flags they hand out for Fourth of July parades (made in Japan), and perhaps for decorative purposes in the house, even place on the mantel a small souvenir statue of the U.S. flag being raised on Iwo Jima (also made in Japan).

For exercise, Rambo can instruct Barbie in that most American of sports, baseball (bats and balls made by an American firm in Central America).

They can acquire their own little Cabbage Patch doll (made by an American firm in the Far East) and wheel it around in a four-on-the-floor pram (Volkswagen), dashing now and then to the neighborhood fast-food outlet whose hamburgers are made at some American rubber company's plant in Malaysia.

When they grow old, they can collect social security which by then will be . . . aw, forget it!

Right-Wing Glitz

You got $10,000 kicking around loose?

Or 10 pals with $1,000 each itching to put it up so they can rub elbows with Pat Boone and Ginger Rogers, and maybe even (we should all be so lucky) Jim Watt and Terry Dolan?

And, with a few breaks, perhaps crack a beer with Joe Coors (non-union beer, at that)?

If you can manage either the $10,000 or prevail on friends with $1,000 each, you can join those folks and other right-wing performers and leaders at the "1985 Las Vegas Gala" sponsored by the National Conservative Foundation for its own enrichment.

Better hurry, though. The event is scheduled October 26.

It aims to raise more than $1 million to help fund a National Conservative Convention next summer in Dallas, during which right-wingers will launch their bid to control the GOP presidential nominating process for 1988.

Surely, you want to help them do that.

If you hit it lucky and buy the right ticket, you can win a $100,000 floor-length chinchilla cape, or better yet the foal of a prize racehorse.

If you win 'em both, you can ride the foal to your worksite, dressed in your floor-length chinchilla (you, not the foal).

All this comes from a letter bursting with excitement, sent to rightists nationwide by Sen. Chic Hecht (R-Nev.), honorary co-chairman of this glitzy right-wing event.

America's unions celebrate 30 years of unity

By Henry C. Fleisher

The author had been director of publicity for the CIO and served as publications director for the AFL-CIO from 1955 to 1958.

It was a sparkling moment in American labor history. It was an assemblage gathered on a note of triumph to celebrate the laying aside of old conflicts and animosities, to recall the years of patient negotiations, and to savor an accelerated movement towards labor unity.

The moment was, of course, the first constitutional convention of the AFL-CIO—the new American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations.

The time, Monday morning, Dec. 5, 1955. The place: the cavernous 71st Regimental Armory at the corner of Park Avenue and 34th Street in New York. The scene was symbolic of new enthusiasm for labor unity. Behind the podium was a huge backdrop, brightly colored. Along its top were the words: ''All Trades—All Crafts—All Creeds—Together.'' Below the words were vertical red and white stripes and the new clasped-hands seal of the merged labor federation.

Just behind the podium, in a dramatic ''photo opportunity,'' George Meany of the AFL and Walter P. Reuther of the CIO held aloft a giant-sized ceremonial gavel. Reuther had brought it to New York from his Detroit UAW office for just such a purpose.

At the podium stood Harry Bates of the Bricklayers, the senior member of the joint Labor Unity Committee which had made the convention possible. Flanking him were the two secretary-treasurers—Jim Carey of the CIO and Bill Schnitzler of the AFL.

The two men who held the gavel were the kind of ''odd couple'' that historic events often bring together. George Meany was an Irish kid from the Bronx, a plumber and a plumber's union business agent; a president of the New York State AFL body with a distinguished record of getting bills passed in Albany; secretary-treasurer of the AFL since the late 1930s; and president of the AFL from 1952, following the death of William Green. Meany was tough-minded, practical, reared in the proud tradition of his skilled

Council charts new course

Convention report spells out organizing, bargaining goals

Anaheim, Calif.—New approaches to organizing and collective bargaining and continued commitment to social and political action are highlighted in the AFL-CIO Executive Council's report to the federation's 16th convention, which starts here Oct. 28.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in his opening section of the report, notes that the last five years under the Reagan Administration have been difficult ones for workers and their unions. But as the AFL-CIO marks the 30th anniversary of its formation through merger, he finds evidence of a renewed spirit and a strong sense of purpose among union members throughout the country.

Conceding that ''we have endured and are still reeling from the effects of the devastating Reagan Recession and inexcusably high unemployment,'' Kirkland says it has been heartening to see the enthusiastic response at all levels of organized labor to proposals advanced in the Executive Council's report on ''The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions.''

The resulting healthy debate and constructive dialogues within and between AFL-CIO unions ''are already producing results in organizing, in servicing members' needs and in collective bargaining,'' Kirkland points out.

Reviewing political developments, he observes that despite the outcome of the 1984 presidential election, the labor movement can be proud of its role in supporting Walter Mondale and Geraldine Ferraro. Whether or not the AFL-CIO determines to endorse a candidate in 1988, he adds, ''the more important issue is whether we continue with a process that has built solidarity within our ranks. Acting together, we may endorse one candidate or more, candidates from both major parties, or no candidates. The key point, vital to the labor movement, is that whatever the decision, we act in unity.''

'Crushing' deficits

On the economic front, Kirkland cites the AFL-CIO's demand for ''action to deal with the crushing federal budget deficits that are Ronald Reagan's legacy to this country.''

The answer, he says, as spelled out in the Executive Council's report to the convention, ''lies in limiting defense spending to reasonable levels, in policies to increase employment and thereby boost tax revenues and in restoration of some of the revenues

Auto Workers gain parity in Chrysler pact

Detroit—More than 70,000 Auto Workers won a new three-year contract at Chrysler Corp. giving them ''parity-plus'' with their counterparts at Ford and General Motors, as well as bonuses for their sacrifices five years ago when the automaker teetered on the brink of bankruptcy.

The settlement, reached after marathon negotiations stetching over a 42-hour period, paved the way for the end of the first UAW strike at Chrysler in a dozen years. Union officials said they expected prompt ratification of the agreement and a speedy return to work at the 50 struck plants.

UAW President Owen Bieber described the new contract—which runs until Sept. 14, 1988, a full year after current agreements

Flaming finale

Strikers burn picket signs to celebrate the end of a 46-day walkout by nine unions at Philadelphia's two daily newspapers, the Inquirer and the Daily News. Joint bargaining under the umbrella of a unity council maintained union solidarity and led to a settlement giving 4,700 workers wage increases of $37.50 a week in each year of the four-year agreement. (Story on Page 4.)

Flaws mark hasty plan to cut deficit

By David L. Perlman

The deficit reduction plan that was so hastily adopted by the Senate is hazardous to the nation's economic health, callous to human needs and constitutionally dubious, the AFL-CIO charged.

Labor's concern at the unexplored mine fields in the Senate's balanced budget timetable was echoed at the House-Senate conference that is now giving the measure its first close scrutiny. The first conference sessions were spent in a not always successful attempt to clarify the often conflicting interpretations of the Senate-passed bill.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison cited this confusion of interpretation in a letter urging members of Congress to carefully scrutinize a complex measure that would have a ''revolutionary impact'' on government.

Its provisions ''leave enormous leeway for interpretation,'' Denison said. And its shift of power from Congress to the White House raises ''serious questions'' about its constitutionality, he stressed.

No House hearings

The Senate bill was passed as an amendment to a routine House bill raising the debt ceiling, and Denison noted that it was never the subject of committee hearings. Its principal authors are Senators Phil Gramm (R-Tex.) and Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.). Gramm is the former ''boll weevil'' Democratic congressman who joined with House Republicans in 1981 to steamroller through President Reagan's legislative program.

As Denison noted in his letter, the huge rise in the deficit that the balanced budget proposal seeks to address stems directly from Reagan's ''incompatible priorities'' of reducing taxes and raising defense spending at the same time.

The Gramm-Rudman plan would require the deficit to be cut by $36 billion a year to reach the balanced budget goal by the 1991 fiscal year. If Congress failed to meet the target—even if the failure was caused by presidential vetoes—the President would be required to cut cost-of-living protections with Ford and GM expire—as a trend setter for the auto industry.

The Chrysler accord, he said, establishes "a full industry pattern" that will "move our entire bargaining process forward."

Bieber said that the agreement covered all the key areas at issue in the strike, "including job security, outsourcing, training (and) pensions," adding:

"This package is parity-plus."

Under the agreement, Chrysler workers will receive pay increases totaling 7.5 percent over the three years of the agreement—an immediate 2.25-percent hike, a lump-sum bonus of 2.25 percent of the previous year's base earnings in the second year, and an additional 3-percent wage boost in the third year.

Up-front bonuses

Although negotiators were unable to agree on how to replace the profit-sharing plan that the UAW gave up as part of its 1982 concessions, the contract calls for payments of $500 each in March 1987 and March 1988 in lieu of profit-sharing.

In addition, the contract provides up-front bonuses which Bieber said were "in recognition of the contributions of workers who saved Chrysler from bankruptcy and returned the corporation to health." This will mean payments of $2,000 to UAW members currently on the payroll, $1,000 to retirees and $600 to surviving spouses of Chrysler workers.

With Chrysler fully recovered from its brush with bankruptcy, the UAW went to the bargaining table this year determined to make up the estimated $1 billion in contract concessions it had made five years ago to help keep the financially strapped automaker afloat.

Union negotiators also emphasized the job security issue, pointing out that more than 60,000 Chrysler jobs had vanished in the past decade. While some of the employment loss resulted from foreign competition, a significant share was blamed on "outsourcing"—the use of foreign plants and nonunion firms to supply components.

The union also stressed the need for job security "banks," similar to those established in last year's GM and Ford negotiations with $1.3 billion worth of funding over a six-year period, to provide wages and retraining for displaced workers.

Although full details of the Chrysler contract were not made public pending the ratification vote, Bieber's comments concerning the tentative agreement indicated that these issues were resolved to the UAW's satisfaction.

The 10,000 Canadian auto workers reached agreement on a two-year pact after a five-day strike at Chrysler's six facilities in Ontario.

UFCW's Prudential accord brings wage, benefit gains

Some 16,000 members of the Food & Commercial Workers have overwhelmingly ratified a new contract with Prudential Insurance Co., giving them a package of wage and benefit increases worth nearly $65 a week over the next two years.

It was the first contract for the Prudential agents in 35 states and the District of Columbia since the Insurance Workers merged with the UFCW in October 1983.

Joseph Pollack, associate director of UFCW's Professional, Insurance, Finance & Health Care Division, said agents will receive pay increases of $25.91 in the first year and $16.91 in the second, with an additional $10.81 each year in improved benefits.

Agents will receive a $290 lump-sum payment as compensation for wages they would have gotten had the new contract been negotiated by Sept. 23, when the old agreement expired.

Although Prudential turned down a union-shop clause, it agreed to provide every agent with an application for union membership and a dues-deduction authorization card along with a copy of the agreement.

The new contract calls for establishment of a legal services plan, an optional long-term disability plan and a tax-free account, deducted from an agent's earnings, to cover the cost of day care for those children with working parents.

Pollack said that William Perraro, Prudential's senior vice president and chief company negotiator, had given union negotiators verbal assurance that he would put a halt to anti-union activity in district offices, end "abusive" interviews of agents, and improve the grievance procedure.

IUD's Carlin Allen retires, headed coordinated talks

Carlin Allen, director of coordinated bargaining for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. since 1959, retired Sept. 30.

Allen, 62, joined the CIO in 1948 as an organizer and moved to the IUD after the AFL-CIO merger in 1955.

Under Allen, the program has grown to include more than 60 coordinated bargaining committees. It provides a wide range of services from information exchange to joint bargaining on behalf of participating locals.

lost through loopholes opened up by the 1981 Reagan tax bill."

More important than to assign blame for the budget crisis, Kirkland stresses, is for the labor movement "to participate in the hard work of devising a solution that will help revitalize and restore hope to our nation."

In the Financial Report section, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue notes an increase in the federation's net worth of $9,563,283 in the 18-month period ended last Dec. 31. The continuing effect of plant closings and massive layoffs is reflected in average per capita payments of 13,109,000 over the two years ended June 30, 1985.

In the section of the 351-page document dealing with "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions," the council notes that the report issued last February has prompted self-analysis, discussion and planning at every level of the labor movement. Two of the report's recommendations—One-on-One programs to enhance membership participation and communications program to improve news-media relations—are already under way.

The council urges vigorous development of membership-benefit programs, training in new organizing approaches and establishment of multi-union organizing committees.

Other highlights of the Executive Council's report to the convention:

Organizing: Despite all impediments, worker interest in unions is widespread, especially in areas where cooperative organizing campaigns are located. Union-busting techniques orchestrated by "consultants" have inspired new creative organizing strategies, such as corporate campaigns. Because of the Reagan Administration's politicization of the National Labor Relations Board, unions are relying less on NLRB procedures and more on direct action by workers to gain organizing and contract victories.

Collective Bargaining: Spendable earnings continue to drop, but union wages and benefits far outpace those of unorganized workers. Many unions that gave concessions in 1981, '82 and '83 have begun to stabilize conditions, eliminate "two-tier" wage systems and restore lost wages. Emphasis on job security remains strong, and limits on plant closings are being negotiated. Litigation costs and delays in grievance handling led President Kirkland to appoint a national study group to develop procedures to cut costs, reduce delays and improve the quality of justice on the job.

Pension Funds: The AFL-CIO is operating a computer tracking project on stock holdings and other information on major multi-employer and state and local government pension funds. The council urges a range of actions to increase unions' voice in investment policies.

The National Economy: After comprehensive review of economic data, the Council concludes that the economy is in a "risky and uncertain condition" and that "economic and social mismanagement is reflected in four key deficits: the jobs deficit, the fairness deficit, the federal budget deficit and the trade deficit." To strengthen the economy, the Council recommends policies aimed at full employment; tax reforms that lead to a fair and productive tax system; lower interest rates to stimulate housing, small business, farming and public investment, and trade and industrial policies to achieve job-creating economic growth with balance and diversity, international competitiveness, national security and rising living standards.

The report presents detailed analyses of issues related to trade policy, tax reform and other areas, including monetary policy, immigration reform, state and local needs, housing, energy, the environment, consumer protection, transportation, farm policy and proposals for a constituional convention.

Worker Protections: Labor standards have been under attack by the Reagan Administration through legislation, administrative rulemaking and weak or divisive enforcement, the council declares, and the federal responsibility for health and safety on the job has been abrogated.

The council urges Congress and the Administration to restore protections of the Davis-Bacon Act, the Service Contract Act, the Walsh-Healey Act and the Fair Labor Standards Act. It calls for indexing the minimum wage at 60 percent of average hourly earnings in the private sector and for reduction of the standard workweek to 35 hours.

Occupational Safety & Health: Although OSHA has been committed to deregulation and nonenforcement of the law, the council reported that labor has largely succeeded in thwarting plans to weaken existing standards and has won important protection for workers at the bargaining table and at the state and local government levels. The council calls for renewed efforts and new initiatives to protect workers against job hazards.

Workers' Compensation: In the absence of a federal workers' compensation system, the council urges Congress to set minimum standards for state systems to assure prompt medical coverage and benefit payments to workers disabled by injury or disease at the workplace, while limiting employer liability and without raising the question of fault.

Unemployment Insurance: With seven out of ten jobless workers denied unemployment benefits and not a single state providing benefits to the long-term unemployed, the council calls on Congress to restore the system as a bulwark of protection for all jobless Americans.

Pensions: The council urges Congress to protect the retirement security of thousands of Americans in jeopardy because of spreading terminations of pension programs by companies to recapture "excess assets." It calls on Congress also to provide pension protection for new federal employees that is comparable to the existing Civil Service Retirement System and to require programs comparable to those in private industry for other public employees.

Social Security: With the social security program now on a sound financial basis, the council observes, this is the time to improve and strengthen it. The program should be removed from the unified budget and from the pressures of political appointees, general revenue funding should be introduced and inequities toward women should be corrected.

Health Care: Until a national health insurance program is adopted, labor will continue to work on all fronts to fight cutbacks in existing programs, to control costs and improve health services for all Americans, the council declares. At the bargaining table, in the community and in state legislatures, unions are making progress toward those goals.

Welfare, Food Stamps and Child Nutrition: Because of the Reagan Administration's policies, hunger in America has reached epidemic proportions and children and mothers are the nation's largest poverty group. The council calls for restoration of AFDC funding and food stamps to humane levels and urges unions, wherever possible, to establish child and dependent care services through collective bargaining.

Education: The council supports educational reform to provide rigorous, quality education for all students. It asks Congress to maintain support for preschool and compensatory programs and to resist cuts in aid for students in higher education. It urges unions to promote public funding of worker education programs and to seek representation on state vocational education advisory councils.

Civil Rights: The Reagan Administration is attempting to "tear away the foundations of civil rights laws and regulations, giving them the narrowest of interpretations or pushing to reverse them entirely," the council charges. It reaffirms the AFL-CIO's commitment to the elimination of all discrimination against women and pledges close cooperation with its traditional civil rights allies.

International Affairs: The council presents a detailed review of its relations with other national trade union centers and with the trade secretariats. It reports on its role in the anti-apartheid struggle in South Africa, both directly and through the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. It reports on activities of the Trade Union Advisory Council to the OECD and on the federation's own overseas arms, the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

Other topics covered in the council's report include Political Activities, Labor in the Community, State Legislation, and Labor and the Law. The council document also includes the biennial reports of the AFL-CIO's constitutional departments.

Real earnings back to level of last year

The real earnings of America's workers stagnated in the past 12 months, with modest gains being eaten up by inflation, according to figures released by the Labor Dept.

The government reported that the consumer price index for urban wage earners went up three-tenths of 1 percent in September, 2.7 percent higher than the same month last year. The inflation rate for the first nine months of 1985 stands at 3.2 percent.

At the same time, the Bureau of Labor Statistics announced that real earnings increased seven-tenths of 1 percent from August to September. Compared to a year ago, however, inflation and real earnings ended up in a dead heat, BLS said.

Declines in prices for gasoline, used cars and automobile financing kept the increase in the CPI to moderate levels, even though heating oil, gas and electric prices jumped sharply. Medical care costs rose one-half of 1 percent for the third straight month, and are now 6.6 percent higher than they were in September 1984.

Benefits adjustment

The CPI figures mean that the monthly checks of the nation's 16 million social security beneficiaries will go up 3.1 percent in January—the smallest increase since the government began linking benefits to the price index a decade ago.

The same 3.1 percent benefit increase will also be reflected in the January checks of retired federal workers.

The Internal Revenue Service also will make an upward adjustment of 3.7 percent in tax brackets, personal exemptions and the standard deduction to reflect the inflationary spiral.

Meanwhile, U.S. factory orders plunged a sharp 1.1 percent last month, due primarily to declines in primary metals, transportation equipment and defense-related industries. The Commerce Dept. said orders for durable goods totaled $106 billion in September, a drop of $1.2 billion from August.

FAST President Robert F. Harbrant calls for accelerated organizing activities.

Food-Service Trades endorse plan for stepped up organizing efforts

By Arlee C. Green

Anaheim, Calif.—Labor must bolster its organizing efforts to meet the challenge of a changed workforce, delegates to the fifth biennial convention of the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. said.

The convention also reaffirmed its stance against the widespread employment practices of polygraph testing and blood, urine and genetic screening.

FAST President Robert F. Harbrant urged the delegates to "seek new frontiers on behalf of workers—organized and unorganized."

He said the department's 15 affiliates should embark on a "new coordinated bargaining" program and "plan an organizing thrust like this country hasn't seen in 50 years."

"Can we ignore the blatant truth that there are 90 million unorganized workers out there?" he asked the delegates in pressing for joint organizing campaigns against targets preselected on the basis of "solid research by FAST and the unions' organizers."

The delegates responded with resolutions reaffirming the commitment to organizing, noting the "vital relationship between organizing tenacity and successful organizing," and calling for the development of volunteer organizing committees in every local union. The convention ordered expansion of FAST's comprehensive organizing program which utilizes information researched about a company's finances and markets.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in his convention address, strongly endorsed the organizing call. He pointed out that "clearly, there are workers out there who look to our unions for some kind of help who don't like what they see in the current context. We better take a look at this and shape the product to meet the needs of workers in new industries and new areas of the country and new jobs."

Different approaches

He pointed out that organized labor must develop "multiple models for representing workers." Donahue noted that the Seafarers and the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers represent their members differently. Labor must explore how best to attract workers in new employment centers and new jobs, he said.

A nationwide, joint organizing campaign in 1986 will target the insurance workers at Blue Cross/Blue Shield, Donahue said.

Don Gallin, chairman of the International Union of Food & Allied Workers' Associations, told the delegates that the member unions in Europe will begin a campaign in November against "one of the most powerful multinationals in the food industry—Unilever, for its job-destroying policies." A demonstration will be held at its headquarters in Rotterdam, Netherlands. And in Denmark, unions will jointly take on McDonald's Restaurants, "one of the most vicious, exploitative employers," Gallin said.

Jonathan Kolkey, author of a book on the New Right, told delegates that the New Right is made up of low- and middle-class citizens who have bought Ronald Reagan's social rhetoric and chosen to ignore how his economic policies are hurting them.

Over the past 20 years, there has been a severe decline in the standard of living in the United States, Kolkey said, stressing that the Administration has accelerated the pace.

This is due in part to the Administration's staffing of lower-level federal jobs with very conservative individuals. It has created an "attitude in Washington that union-bashing is all right," Kolkey said.

He called the labor movement the "last vestige of participatory democracy in America," and told the delegates that labor's challenge will be how to revive democracy in the nation, as the Democrats and Republicans alike "are paying homage to Corporate America."

Brian Freeman, a financial consultant who is working on the sale of Conrail, advised delegates how unions and their members can use their powers to combat the current waves of concessionary demands, plant closings and take-over attempts. He urged them to be more flexible and innovative in dealing with employers and to use the economic powers they have.

Four-year cycle

Harbrant and FAST Sec.-Treas. Rhonda Hillyer were re-elected by acclamation to newly extended four-year terms to coincide with the rescheduling of departmental conventions to every four years, instead of two-year cycles.

Delegates expressed their disdain for the Reagan-backed youth subminimum wage, and the scheme to tax workers' benefits—a measure "as injurious to the nation's health as it is to the nation's welfare."

Other resolutions opposed any new excise taxes on alcohol, condemned South Africa's apartheid, deplored hunger in America and called for improved U.S. trade laws.

The delegates supported reductions in federal defense spending, urged full funding for Amtrak and mass transit, and favored a public sale of Conrail, rather than the deal

Drive to strengthen unions backed by Michigan labor

Detroit—Union solidarity was at the top of the agenda at the 18th constitutional convention of the Michigan AFL-CIO, as more than 800 delegates came to grips with how best to strengthen the labor movement in the face of changing times and changing public attitudes.

"The Michigan labor movement is stronger, we are more united, we are better prepared to meet the challenges which face us than we have ever been before," President Sam Fishman said in his keynote address.

Challenging the Administration's claim that unions are a "special interest," Fishman declared: "Our interests . . . are the interests of all the working men and women of this state."

Expanding on the same theme, James Kennedy, administrative assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, told delegates that the recent report on "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions" is a tool to be used in evaluating and improving the labor movement.

"The central reality," Kennedy said, "is that a democratic nation cannot endure without the workplace democracy that results from a vibrant, democratic trade union movement. The issue is not whether the nation wishes to see American trade unions survive in good health but whether our democracy can survive if they do not. We obviously believe it cannot."

Delegates representing 47 different international unions approved resolutions calling for:

- Solidarity with fellow trade unionists in their struggles with management at Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel, Phelps-Dodge, Continental Airlines and Trojan luggage.
- Full support of the Auto Workers members whose strike against Chrysler Corp. began as the convention opened.
- Opposition to Reagan Administration proposals to tax such worker life-support benefits as health insurance, unemployment compensation, workers' compensation and black-lung benefits.
- Enactment of a strong Michigan right-to-know law to protect workers and community residents from toxic hazards.
- Formulation of fair trade policies that protect American jobs.

Newly elected Connecticut AFL-CIO President Betty Tianti told the convention that labor must be willing to experiment with new methods of meeting workers' needs. She cited the recent organizing victory of striking clerical workers at Yale University as an example of union solidarity and the use of innovative techniques to accomplish workers' goals.

Field staff organizer Jose Lopez dies at 53

New York—Jose Lopez, an AFL-CIO field representative, died of cancer here Oct. 18. He was 53.

Lopez, who came out of the Electrical Workers, joined the federation's national staff in 1967. In a series of assignments, he worked with the Farm Workers' organizing program in California and served with the American Institute for Free Labor Development in Central and South America.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a letter to his wife Gloria that many farmworkers "benefited from Jose's total dedication to their cause." They praised Lopez's "devotion to working men and women in the United States and abroad."

In addition to his wife, Lopez is survived by three children.

States get field sanitation role, but effective action unlikely

Labor Sec. William E. Brock's decision to turn over to the states the task of devising field sanitation standards carries no guarantee of safeguards for farm workers, the AFL-CIO said.

The Labor Dept. originally proposed federal standards in March 1984 but subsequently withdrew them. Under court order to come up with a plan insuring that field workers had portable toilets and clean water for drinking and handwashing, Brock announced "guidelines" for state action and gave legislatures 18 months to implement them.

When Congress passed the Occupational Safety & Health Act, said AFL-CIO job safety expert Margaret Seminario, "it did not envision a piecemeal, patchwork approach to the problem."

Farm workers, Seminario said, have been fighting for 13 years to pry a standard out of OSHA. Now, she pointed out, they are faced with "another delay, and with no assurance that the state legislatures will act."

The imprecise nature of the proposal came under fire from Charles Horwitz of the Migrant Legal Action Program.

"By being vague and unclear on just how many states would have to enact laws, Brock isn't letting us know what the ground rules are and he's hedging his bets," Horwitz stressed.

At present, 13 states have some form of field sanitation legislation on the books—California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Maine, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Texas—and action on similar measures is pending in Minnesota and Wisconsin.

In announcing the decision to turn the problem over to the states for resolution, Brock said that the states were "better able to regulate in this area" than the federal government, because they could "draw on their closer relationships with . . . growers and farmworkers" in devising appropriate standards.

Horwitz criticized this approach, declaring that "Mr. Brock might respect state lines, but diseases don't."

American labor marks 30 years of unity

craft. He'd helped install the plumbing in the Commodore Hotel, now the Grand Hyatt.

Reuther was the son of a gentle German-American socialist and trade unionist in Wheeling, W.Va. He came to Detroit as a young man, worked for a while for Ford Motors in Russia, returned to Motown and plunged into the task of organizing auto workers. During World War II he gained national attention with demands for conversion of auto factories to war production, which the industry had been resisting, and he frequently voiced broad-gauged plans to improve American life. In 1946 he was elected UAW president; and in late 1952 he succeeded Philip Murray as president of the CIO.

Leaders in harmony

But though their differences had been many, the first AFL-CIO convention found the two men in complete harmony. Reuther told the 1,487 delegates from 135 unions: "Together, united in the solidarity of human brotherhood, we shall go forward to build a labor movement and a better America . . ."

Meany, elected to the presidency of the new AFL-CIO 10 minutes before noon at the convention's opening session, talked of the "feeling of elation" among the delegates "over the end of these years of division, and of the inauguration of this new united movement."

The AFL's Schnitzler was elected secretary-treasurer of the merged federation. In the merger negotiations, the CIO had turned down a suggestion that it hold one of three top positions, presumably that of an executive vice-president. Instead, the agreement provided that the CIO would nominate the first director of organization; he was John Livingston, an officer of the UAW.

Bitter Years of Rivalry

The "years of division" to which Meany referred had indeed been long and bitter. The seeds of discord began to grow at the AFL conventions of 1934 and 1935 in a dispute over craft vs. industrial unionism. On Nov. 9, 1935, Lewis and seven other leaders of AFL unions announced the formation of a Committee for Industrial Organization to push their programs. From 1935 to 1938, relations between CIO and AFL became increasingly bitter. In November 1938, the CIO held its first convention and became the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

Working relationships between leaders of the two groups began to develop a bit more warmly during World War II, since wartime problems created the need for cooperation on a host of practical matters relating to governmental policy. But it was in the years after World War II that the notion of cooperation, if not full merger, between the two groups began to grow. There were five principal factors in this initially slow-moving trend toward unity:

The passage of time—The old industrial-craft union issue was starting to fade. The original and principal organizing goals of the CIO had been achieved. Craft unions, accommodating to new conditions and challenges, had begun to organize industrial union locals.

New leaders of unions—Many of the generation of union leaders who had participated in the harsh disputes in the years before and immediately after the creation of the CIO had retired from active duty. Their successors carried less emotional baggage from years past.

A moment in history as Meany and Reuther clasp hands beneath symbol of united labor movement.

The CIO's expulsion of communist-dominated unions— In 1949 and 1950 the CIO leadership brought charges, held hearings, and took final expulsion action against a dozen unions found to be Communist-dominated. The CIO took the action for its own reasons, but in doing so removed a major objection voiced many times by the AFL.

AFL action against corruption—The AFL took steps against a few unions charged with being controlled by corrupt elements. In doing so, it removed a symbol that had been anathema of the CIO leaders.

Jurisdictional disputes machinery—The CIO developed in 1951 a formal and pragmatic agreement governing the settling of jurisdictional disputes among signatory CIO affiliates. It provided that none of them would seek to organize workers represented by a union recognized by an employer, or which had been certified by the National Labor Relations Board as the collective bargaining agent for a group of workers. Nor, in organizing situations, was one union to make derogatory statements about another. Disputes within the agreement were to go, finally, to an impartial arbitrator.

Since much of the talk in previous AFL-CIO discussions had revolved around jurisdictional problems, the CIO disputes program, when it proved successful, suggested that the same principles could be adapted for use in some future negotiations between the federations.

Progress on the road to unity began to accelerate in the closing days of 1952. President Phil Murray of the CIO died in November, and was succeeded by Reuther. President William Green of the AFL died just a few days later, and was succeeded by Meany. Within a very short time, the two new presidents were talking—and talking about the possibility of unity in the labor movement. They agreed to reactivate the AFL and CIO unity committees.

The committees met on Apr. 7, 1953, and agreed that a no-raiding agreement between unions of the two federations would be an essential first step. With surprising speed, a tentative agreement was reached in June and formally adopted and signed in December 1953. It provided that any signatory union would respect, and refuse to undermine, the collective bargaining relationship of any other signatory union. By mid-1954, 65 AFL and 29 CIO affiliates had ratified the agreement.

Unity plan endorsed

In Washington in October 1954 the joint unity committee rallied to a suggestion of George Meany that unity be negotiated the "short way," by bringing all unions into the new body in a process "which will preserve the integrity" of each of them. That proposal was quickly and unanimously adopted.

In February 1955 the unity committee hammered out the basic principles of an agreement—which overnight were placed into appropriate language by the two organizations' general counsel, Arthur J. Goldberg of the CIO and J. Albert Woll of the AFL, respectively. It provided for the "integrity" of all union affiliates, as well as general acceptance of the no-raiding principle and machinery to handle disputes.

The next step was to draft a constitution, a process which many feared might be slow going. But Goldberg—later Secretary of Labor, Supreme Court Justice and Ambassador to the United Nations—together with Woll, soon had a document ready. The first draft was submitted to a subcommittee on Apr. 2, 1955; with a few minor revisions it went to the full unity committee on May 2. The CIO board approved it a few days later; the AFL council voted its final endorsement in August. The stage was set at last for the unity convention, now scheduled for Dec. 5 and 6.

Nationwide impact

To that convention, President Dwight Eisenhower —still at his Gettysburg farm recuperating from a heart attack—talked by telephone and hailed the merger as a "unique contribution to the general welfare of the Republic." And George Meany, closing the final session of the 1955 convention, "pledged to advance the cause of our country as something that is prerequisite to any improvement in the conditions of those we represent."

Ahead were years of change, of exhilaration and disappointment; the years of stimulation in the Kennedy era and legislative accomplishment in the Johnson years; of national disgrace in Nixon's Watergate; of disappointment in the Carter presidency; and of meeting the challenge of retrogression from social and economic goals in the Reagan Administration.

It was fortunate, indeed, that, on that December day 30 years ago, American labor responded to the challenge and brought unity to the community of labor.

7-week Philadelphia news strike ends, union solidarity credited for victory

Philadelphia—"Good old-fashioned union solidarity" was credited with ending the seven-week strike against the Philadelphia Inquirer and the Daily News.

The victory, which provides a total weekly wage increase of $150 over the next four years, was announced by the Philadelphia Council of Newspaper Unions, representing the 4,700 members of nine local unions who struck the newspapers on Sept. 7.

The unity council comprises units of the Newspaper Guild, Typographical Union, Machinists, Graphic Communications Union, and the unaffiliated Newspaper & Magazine Employees and the Teamsters.

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published Nov. 9, 1985, because of the federation's convention schedule.

That issue will contain detailed coverage of the actions of the AFL-CIO's 16th constitutional convention.

Hailing the settlement, which was ratified overwhelmingly by all nine locals, a unity council spokesman said the walkout was won because the unions stuck together.

While the contracts of each individual union are different, each provides an across-the-board increase of $37.50 a week in each year of the four-year agreements.

Longest news strike

This will bring to $821 the weekly pay of reporters with five years' experience, $660 for journeymen pressmen, $644 for mailers, $620 for delivery truck drivers and $433 for messengers.

The strike was the longest in the city's newspaper history, eclipsing the previous record set in 1958 when the unions shutdown the newspapers for six weeks.

In Chicago, meanwhile, a walkout of some 1,200 members of ITU Local 16, GCIU Local 7 and Mailers Local 3 at the Chicago Tribune entered its fourth month with no further talks scheduled.

At issue in the strike, which began July 18, are company demands for a three-tier wage structure, abandonment of the pension plan, an end to the grievance procedure, and major changes in the health care plan.

Charges by the unions that the Tribune is engaged in union-busting gained support when the State of Illinois granted strikers jobless benefits, retroactive to Aug. 31.

Down the street at the Chicago Sun-Times, Guild Local 71 reached tentative agreement on a new contract, retroactive to June 1, providing pay increases of 5 percent each year for the next three years.

The Guild pact, now in the ratification process, also calls for increased company health insurance contributions, improvements in pension credit provisions effective in June 1986, and higher payments toward auto insurance and vacation bonuses for long-term employees.

Earlier, ITU Local 118 and the Sun-Times negotiated a six-year contract retroactive to January 1983. It provides for guaranteed annual wage increases totaling $150 per week over the life of the agreement, plus added contributions to the union's pension and hospital plans.

Appeals court backs IUE on vacation claims

St. Louis—The 8th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has ruled that 160 former workers of Wagner Electric are entitled to vacation pay totaling $357,580 the company denied them when it shut down in December 1982.

The workers, members of Electronic Workers Local 1104, will receive checks averaging $2,000 covering the five or six weeks of vacation they had earned.

Wagner decided to permanently close its St. Louis plant and timed the layoff for December 1982. The company then argued that its workforce, with an average age of 55 and 30 years of service, did not qualify for vacation benefits, since the workers would not be on the 1983 payroll.

Arbitrator Harry Platt held that the workers were entitled vacation pay. "Management has the right to close its plants, but it may not evade obligations incurred prior to the closedown," he wrote.

But Platt's decision was challenged by Wagner and overturned by a federal district court. The IUE took the case to the appellate court which ruled in favor of the union.

Metal Trades convention calls for speedy action to save U.S. shipyards

Anaheim, Calif.—Legislation is needed quickly to ''save the ailing shipyard industry,'' delegates to the 62nd convention of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. warned.

In urging the development of a comprehensive maritime policy and passage of laws requiring at least 20 percent of domestic cargo to be carried on U.S.-flag ships, delegates said Congress and President Reagan should recognize that American merchant ships and private shipyards are vital to national defense.

Convention delegates also underscored the need to return to basics by focusing on the MTD program of ''Organizing, Political Action & Legislation'' (OPAL), to meet the challenges facing unions today.

Growing concern that Reagan policies have put many of the country's shipyards on the brink of economic failure was echoed by several speakers, who pointed to the current build-foreign stance of the Administration.

Reagan reneges

MTD President Paul Burnsky quoted from a 1980 speech. ''It is difficult for most Americans to conceive of the magnitude of our maritime decline. Today, the Navy is down to less than 500 ships; as for commercial shipping, the 500-odd ocean-going vessels flying our flag currently carry less than 5 percent of our own commerce. The availability of . . . foreign ships in time of crisis is problemmatical at best.'' This dire warning came from then-candidate Ronald Reagan, Burnsky told the convention.

Today, however, the figures are worse as there are only 400 U.S.-flag vessels carrying less than 3 percent of the nation's commerce, he added.

A confidential federal report, Burnsky said, shows the U.S. maritime industry has fallen below the ''minimum level of skilled manpower, engineering, management and component manufacturing capability needed to maintain a marine industrial base or to serve our country in a national emergency.''

Grassroots effort

By mobilizing members in grassroots legislative and political efforts, Burnsky said, labor can make a difference in the kind of legislation coming out of Congress and in the 1986 Senate races.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised the unions at Maine's Bath Iron Works where a 99-day strike showed how hard it is for workers just to keep even, as they fought an employer who conceded it was making money, ''but just not enough of it.''

The budget and trade deficits and the overvaluation of the dollar that makes it cheaper to build ships overseas and man them with foreign crews are the ''natural, predictable result of a trade policy, an industrial policy and a monetary policy devised and carried out by the Reagan Administration,'' Donahue said.

He stressed that the solution to the problems of ''America's plain people'' is not going to come from the Oval Office, but rather must come from the efforts of labor to advance the goals of workers.

Seafarers President Frank Drozak, head of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., urged cooperation between the two departments to pressure Congress and the Administration to set a national maritime policy. ''We do not now have a maritime policy, nor do we have a positive national commitment to putting more cargoes on U.S.-built, U.S.-flag vessels,'' he told the delegates.

Drozak pointed out that U.S. shipbuilders have lost 270 ships to foreign builders under the Reagan Administration.

Rep. Glenn M. Anderson (D-Calif.) called the status of the nation's merchant marine and shipbuilding industries ''deplorable.'' He warned that America is at a crossroads ''where we either have to act quickly or face the severe and irreparable decline of our maritime industries and our shipbuilding capacity.

M. Lee Rice, president of the Shipbuilders Council of America, told the delegates the primary questions for the nation are ''whether we will accept the path down which the present maritime policy is taking the nation, and will we accept the major decline in our nation's security which inevitably results? The answers must be 'No.' There has been a ''major reduction in the overall capability of the industry and in the facilities available to it,'' he said.

Membership role

As part of the OPAL program, the delegates called for MTD members to become more involved in organizing, that targets be more carefully selected and that unions experiment with more effective techniques.

In other resolutions, the convention voiced opposition to: taxation of worker benefits, contracting out of federal work, cutbacks in the railroad retirement system, amendments to the Hobbs Act that would allow federal intervention in labor disputes, and permitting foreign-built vessels to fly the U.S. flag under the Jones Act.

Delegates expressed support for the Phelps-Dodge strikers and for efforts to prevent repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act. They urged passage of legislation to eliminate double-breasting in the construction industry and condemned South Africa's system of apartheid, suggesting compulsory disinvestment there by multinational corporations, a ban on investments and on the sale of the Kruggerand.

MTD President Burnsky spells out action plan to save U.S. shipyards.

New Colorado leadership pledges legislative initiative

Denver—In the first change in leadership in ten years, the Colorado AFL-CIO has elected Eldon Cooper of the Laborers as president and Ann Sutton of the Machinists as secretary-treasurer.

In balloting at the 16th biennial convention, Cooper, who is 58, defeated incumbent President Norman Pledger, 56, by a margin of 46,201 to 24,933, while Sutton bested Bob Knapp of the Rubber Workers to succeed Zelda Bransted, who retired after 11 years as secretary-treasurer.

A longtime lobbyist for the federation and a former state legislator, Cooper promised to open lines of communication with Republican party leaders in the House and Senate, reminding the 260 delegates of Samuel Gompers' credo that labor should ''reward its friends and punish its enemies,'' regardless of party affiliation.

Train young leaders

The newly elected president also said that one of labor's highest priorities should be to train the next generation of union leaders.

Elected along with the two top officers were 16 new members of the 29-member executive board.

Delegates approved a constitutional amendment raising the per capita tax 5 cents to 50 cents a month to cover the financing of several programs.

The keynote speaker, Norman Hill, executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, told delegates that labor's detractors are ''staging a funeral without a corpse.''

The challenges which confront today's unions, Hill said, ''are not unlike the challenges which the labor movement faced in our formative years.''

Get involved

The goals of the labor movement, he said, are to increase its membership, tell its story to the community and get involved in politics. ''You only get what you take,'' Hill said, quoting Randolph, ''and you keep only what you can hold.''

Angered by an anti-union editorial cartoon in the Denver Post, depicting an overweight union member wearing an American flag upside down on his overalls, delegates marched to the newspaper to register their protest.

The convention approved resolutions supporting:

- A new public relations program.
- Labor's Community Agency which runs the state federation's social programs.
- The state AFL-CIO program to train jobless and dislocated workers.
- The state's Human Resources Development Institute.
- Existing workers' compensation and unemployment insurance programs.

Flaws mark hasty plan to cut deficit

other than social security benefits and make across-the-board cuts in ''discretionary'' government programs.

With the President adamant against tax increases, Denison noted, such a budget requirement would threaten such programs as job training, education assistance, mass transit, medicaid, and the array of construction grants.

Denison acknowledged the political appeal of deficit reduction legislation, which enables members of Congress to tell their constituents that they voted for a balanced budget.

The AFL-CIO, too, supports deficit reduction, Denison said. But ''we continue to oppose legislation which determines the future of federal spending before we know the future of human need in this country.''

Labor's objection, he stressed, is to a rigid process that that would subordinate consideration of the nation's changing needs to a mechanical deficit reduction formula.

But if Congress chooses to redesign the Gramm-Rudman measure, not just tinker with its provisions, Denison urged these guidelines:

- Flexibility to respond to a recession. Otherwise, as economic decline pushed deficit estimates higher, Congress would be forced to cut spending further or raise taxes sharply, thus pushing the economy into a worse downturn. Any deficit reduction plan ''must account for the effects of recession and allow reasonable opportunity for recovery in its timetable.''
- Revenue contributions to deficit reduction. ''It would be cruel to ask those who depend on the nation's already battered social programs to pay the major cost of deficit reduction when wealthy individuals and profitable corporations pay little or no taxes.'' Fairly applied revenue increases would contribute significantly to a reduced deficit.
- Broad-based spending cuts. If Congress chooses to apply across-the-board spending cuts to achieve its goals, the broadest possible base apart from social security should be used. Defense procurement should not be exempt.
- Strict limits on the power of the President to determine where cuts shall be made. Congress must clearly spell out its intent and narrowly define the presidential role.

Because the House never considered a comparable bill, which would normally be the case to bring about a House-Senate conference, it sent an oversized delegation of 31 Democrats and 17 Republicans to negotiate with the nine-member Senate contingent. After the opening meetings, the House delegation broke up into task forces to consider aspects of the legislation.

Veto threat

Ironically, even as Republicans were trumpeting the virtues of balanced budget legislation, the White House was threatening to veto a deficit reduction package already approved by the Senate.

A letter from White House Chief of Staff Donald T. Regan to Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) termed the bill ''not acceptable,'' largely because it would bring in revenue as well as impose spending cuts.

''If some of the bill's provisions are not deleted,'' Regan said, ''the President's advisers will recommend that he not sign it.''

The provisions that upset the White House would keep the deficit down by making permanent the present temporary 16-cents-a-pack federal tax on cigarettes, pay the cost of toxic waste cleanup through a broad manufacturing tax, and authorize a new import fee to pay the cost of an expanded trade adjustment assistance program to help workers whose jobs have been wiped out.

A companion budget reconciliation measure is now before the House.

Layoffs trigger CWA strike vote

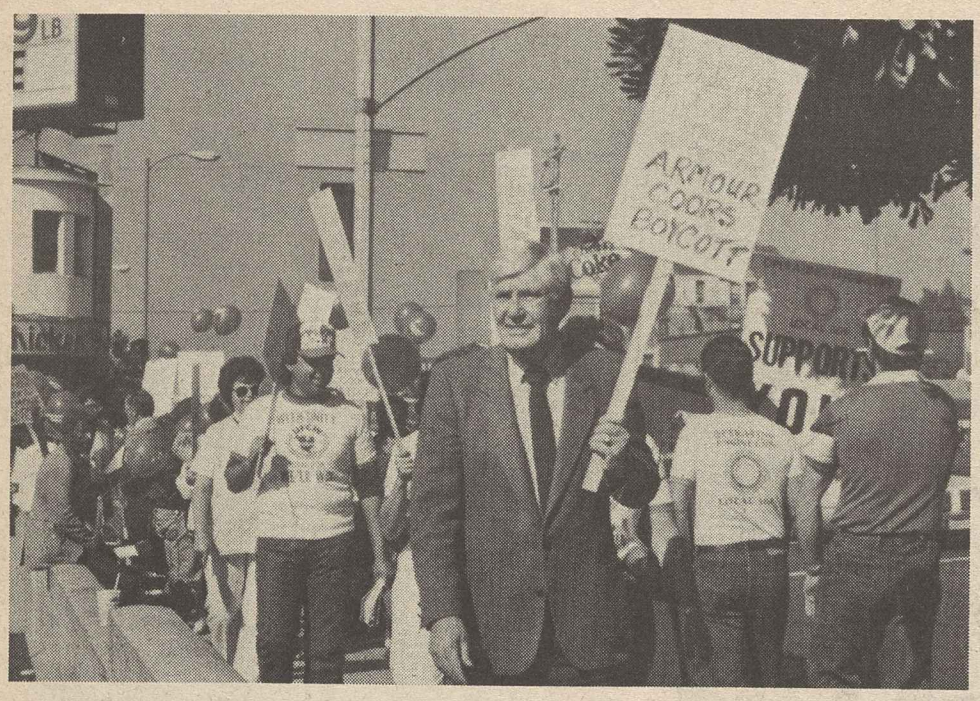
Anaheim, Calif.—The Communications Workers executive board unanimously backed a strike authorization vote against AT&T Information Systems division.



The CWA charged that the company violated its collective bargaining agreement when it continued to contract out work and announced plans to lay off nearly 24,000 workers, including 17,000 CWA members.

The referendum would authorize a walkout as early as Oct. 31.

The CWA noted that a letter of agreement from AT&T guarantees that union workers will not be laid off because of subcontracting or the company's divestiture in early 1985. The union proposed that AT&T's refusal to adhere to the agreement be subject to arbitration, but the company has refused, offering to arbitrate individual contracts only. CWA has 22 contracts covering workers at AT&T's Informations Systems unit which expire in Aug. 1986.

Citing the company's 1984 and 1985 profits, CWA President Morton Bahr called the planned layoffs unconscionable ''in the face of such profits and an extraordinary level of both overtime and contracting out.'' Bahr expressed little hope that AT&T would accept the arbitration plan, but noted ''neither side will benefit from a strike at this time.'' Bahr also noted that AT&T will be facing an increase of $100 million in unemployment compensation costs with the layoffs.

Some 50,000 CWA members will vote by secret ballot at polling places across the country. Ballots will be counted Oct. 30 and a strike date set no later than the first week of November.

No sale

Southern California union members, led by Los Angeles AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. Bill Robertson, protest unfair practices of Armour Processed Meats Co. and Coors Brewery. Consumers, workers and students across the country held demonstrations at stores carrying Coors beer and Armour hot-dogs on Oct. 10—about the same time Coors uncapped its Masters beer.

Now it's 'Masters'

Coors tries new label to skirt beer boycott

By Candice Johnson

Coors is taking another crack at the beer market, this time under the "Masters" label.

In an attempt to broaden its appeal, Coors got Molson Breweries of Canada and Kaltenberg Castle Brewery of West Germany to lend their names to the formation of the Masters Brewing Co.

Masters beer will be brewed at Coors's Golden, Colo., plant, where members of Brewery Workers Local 366, an AFL-CIO directly affiliated union, struck the brewer in 1977 over human dignity issues and set in motion the successful Coors beer boycott. Initially, the beer will be available in Boston, Miami, Columbus, Ohio, and Washington, D.C.

Masters becomes the fourth Coors product which does not bear the Coors label. David Sickler, AFL-CIO National Coors Boycott coordinator, pointed out that the success of the union-organized boycott has forced Coors to reconsider its advertising and marketing strategies.

Sickler noted that before the strike and boycott 1976 was a record year for Coors, with the brewer selling a record 14 million barrels of beer in 11 states. It also had the lowest advertising budget of any brewer in the business.

Flooding the market

But by 1984, while Coors had expanded sales to 46 states, it could only distribute 13 million barrels. Its advertising budget jumped to $139 million, the largest of any beer producer in the world. Sickler pointed out that the 13 million barrels doesn't reflect actual sales, but Coors' attempts to flood the market.

In California, where Coors once held 50 percent of the market, it now has slipped to around 16 percent. Even in its own backyard, Coors is losing ground, as Colorado sales that topped 47 percent of the market in 1977 now lag at around 20 percent.

Sickler said the tremendous success of the boycott is due to the widespread support of women, black and Hispanic civil rights groups, students and the elderly who oppose Coors' anti-union and anti-civil rights attitudes. Coors has increased efforts to clean up its image with minority groups, but has not been effective, with most of its plans dismissed as "window dressing."

Boycott hurts sales

Even Coors officials have admitted the boycott has had an adverse effect on sales, especially in California, and in 1981, the company filed an antitrust suit to stop the boycott. The lawsuit, which named Sickler and northern California boycott coordinator Howard Wallace as defendants, was dismissed by a U.S. District Court judge in 1984.

The boycott began in 1978 after Local 366, on strike for more than 20 months, was broken by scabs crossing the picketline and voting to decertify the union.

In the 1977 bargaining sessions, the two sides had, for the most part, resolved economic issues. But Coors, which was requiring pre-employment lie detector tests and routine exams for workers already employed, was demanding sweeping changes in workers' rights on the job. Coors often used polygraphs as a substitute for arbitration, although supervisors were never required to take the tests and workers were asked questions about their finances, politics, even their marriages and personal lives.

West Virginia hikes funding for COPE, communications

Charleston, W.Va.—Delegates to the 15th constitutional convention of the West Virginia AFL-CIO voted overwhelmingly to raise per capita dues by 10 cents per month, effective next Jan. 1.

The increase brings the monthly per capita to 60 cents, with 3 cents of the increase earmarked for the COPE Fund and 7 cents for an intensified communications program.

Republican Gov. Arch A. Moore, Jr., broke openly with the Reagan Administration over foreign trade and told cheering delegates that he disagreed with the President's rosy assessment of the job picture.

What the country needs in dealing with other nations is a program that will protect the jobs of American workers, Moore told the 350 delegates.

It was the first time in history that the state federation was addressed by a Republican chief executive.

Figures touted by the Administration showing that employment is rising in this country, the governor said, are faulty because most of the gain in jobs has occurred in the fast-food industry. "It takes five fast-food jobs to make up for one industrial job," Moore said.

In a call for a new spirit of labor-management-government cooperation in the state, the governor pointed out that West Virginia has led the nation in unemployment for longer than any other state in history. He added: "If we don't have jobs in this state, we ain't got nothing!"

Rep. Bob Wise (D) called for a campaign to rebuild West Virginia and America, and said that organized labor must be in "the vanguard of economic development," while Rep. Nick Joe Rahall II (D) assailed the White House for ignoring the problem of unemployment while fostering bigger and bigger defense budgets.

Delegates put their stamp of approval on resolutions calling for:

- Equity in tax legislation to close loopholes and relieve the tax burden on the poor.
- Passage of pending legislation to restrict plant closings.
- An end to the racist policies of the South African regime.
- Enactment of a law giving West Virginia public employees the right to organize and bargain collectively.
- Outlawing the importation of strikebreakers into the state during labor disputes.

President Joseph W. Powell and Sec.-Treas. Jack R. McComas were re-elected to new four-year terms without opposition.

Delegates elected three new vice presidents—Kenneth Purdue of the Sheet Metal Workers; Jan Courts, Communications Workers, and Harold Joyce, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

Labor Dept. sets task force study of plant closings

Labor Sec. William E. Brock has appointed a 21-member task force to conduct a 13-month study of plant closings and consider proposals to deal with the problem.

The panel, to be headed by former Under Sec. of Labor Malcolm Lovell, includes six union representatives as well as members from management, universities and other fields.

Supporters of plant closing legislation see no contradiction between a study and the pending legislation requiring employers to give 90 days' notice of a shutdown or major layoff. The bill awaiting action by Congress also includes provision for an in-depth study by a bipartisan commission.

The labor members are Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch, Industrial Union Dept. President Howard Samuel, Clothing & Textile Workers Vice President Joyce Miller, Auto Workers Vice President Don Ephlin, Food & Commercial Workers Vice President Jay Foreman, and Tom Hickman, director of the manufacturing department of the Electrical Workers.

The task force was asked to complete its study by December 1986. In announcing the appointments, Brock said a changing economy will inevitably result in some worker dislocations. He said the panel will examine "causes and effects," and evaluate what is being done in this and other nations to deal with the problem.

Kansas delegates elect Moore, press for wider political action

Topeka, Kan.—Delegates to the Kansas AFL-CIO convention here elected Dale Moore president, to succeed Tom Pierce, who did not seek re-election.

Executive Sec.-Treas. Ralph McGee and Wayne Maichel, executive vice president, were returned to office for four-year terms.

In other business, the 200 delegates launched a campaign to encourage union members to join in political activities on behalf of COPE-endorsed candidates, and attended workshops on election law and campaign finances. The state federation's "back to basics" campaign will develop grass-roots organizing techniques for the 1986 elections.

A legislative seminar that included members of the state legislature gave delegates an opportunity for question and answer sessions. A similar panel on farm and labor issues was held by the state farm-labor coalition.

Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch urged the delegates to continue their political education campaign and called for a renewed organizing effort throughout the labor movement.

Delegates called for Congress to enact the Textile & Apparel Trade Enforcement bill, which would limit imports of clothing and textiles. The convention also endorsed a "buy American campaign" and urged members to purchase union-made goods and unionized services.

Other resolutions strongly opposed attempts to tax workers on employer-provided benefits.

Convention speakers included Gov. John Carlin (D) and AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer 11 institutes, workshops and courses during November and December. The schedule:

Union Administrator and Business Agent, Nov. 3-8—A class for full-time officers on office management, budgeting, contract administration, reaching members and avoiding legal troubles.

Using Micro Computers in Negotiations, Nov. 10-15—An institute on using micro computers by union staff specializing in collective bargaining.

In-House Opinion Polling, Nov. 24-27—A seminar on polling techniques and membership survey.

Advanced Arbitration Techniques (at University of Oregon, Eugene), Nov. 3-8.

New Staff, Dec. 1-13—A two-week orientation for newly elected union officers and new staff members.

New Developments in Collective Bargaining, Dec. 8-10—A two-day briefing cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research on key developments and trends in recent settlements.

Representation Procedures before the NLRB, Dec. 9-13—An institute on basic Labor Board rules and decisions on jurisdiction, appropriate units representing elections and related activities. Participants will prepare and handle a simulated board election hearing.

Television: The Cool Medium, Dec. 15-18—A three-day workshop to coach union officers on facing TV cameras and working with reporters.

Organizing in the Construction Industry, Dec. 15-20—An institute cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. on techniques of "salting" jobs, leafleting and picketing campaigns, unfair labor practice strikes and recruiting programs.

Advanced Arbitration Techniques, Dec. 15-20—A course on grievance arbitration cases, focusing on examination and cross examination of witnesses, preparation of briefs and researching issues.

Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation Techniques (at University of Illinois, Champaign), Dec. 8-13.

Four AFL-CIO affiliates will use the center's facilities for their own training programs during November: Teachers, Nov. 3-8; Flight Attendants, Nov. 12-15; Railway & Airline Clerks, Nov. 17-22; Service Employees, Nov. 17-22.

The Asian-American Free Labor Institute will sponsor a seminar for union editors from 12 Asian countries Nov. 3-27.

The African-American Labor Center has 18 union leaders from 16 African nations on campus until Nov. 8 for studies on trade union administration, comparative industrial relations and collective bargaining.

Forty trade union leaders from 18 Latin American countries, guests of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, will complete a five-week program Nov. 8.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Information will conduct a labor-management symposium for media reporters, Nov. 12-15.

More information about these or other labor studies is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Tel. 301/431-6400.

Continuing Challenge

WE HAVE ENDURED and still reel from the effects of the devastating Reagan Recession, and unemployment remains inexcusably high.

But the prevailing mood we have met throughout the AFL-CIO regional meetings has not been despair or hopelessness, but rather a determination to defend the principles in which this great movement for social justice and human dignity is anchored.

It has been heartening to see the enthusiastic response at all levels of organized labor to the latest report of the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work, ''The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions.''

The report is the subject of healthy debate throughout the structure of the AFL-CIO. Those constructive dialogues are already producing results in organizing, in servicing members' needs and in collective bargaining.

Elements of the report are being creatively adapted to their own needs by national and international unions and their local affiliates. Many of the report's recommendations will be considered, debated and acted upon at this convention.

THIS YEAR, 1985, is one of many anniversaries. Some are cause for celebration, some for concern.

At this 16th biennial convention, the AFL-CIO marks with pride the 30th anniversary of the merger of the two great federations. The success of that merger through both calm and stormy waters proves the truth of the refrain from ''Solidarity Forever.'' This union has indeed made us strong.

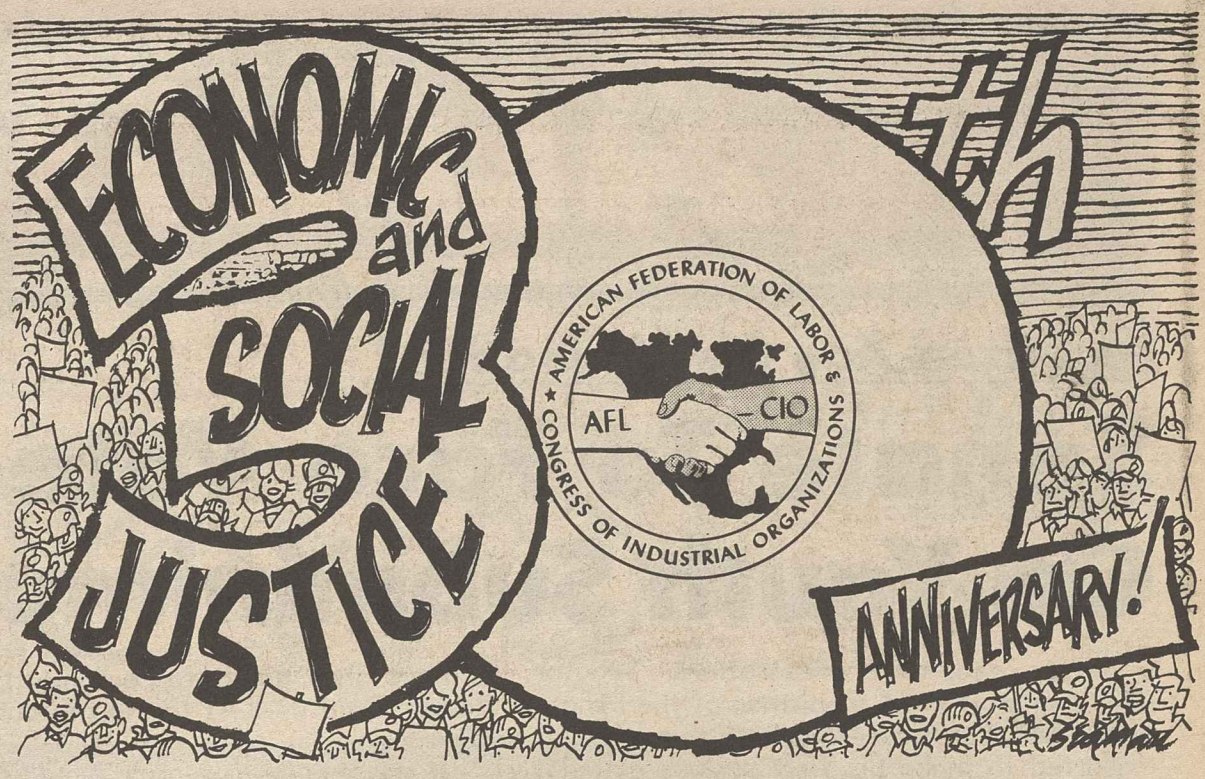
This is also the 50th anniversary of the passage of the Social Security Act, and the 20th anniversary of the law creating the Medicare program.

Twenty years ago this year, organized labor was cheering the passage of an array of progressive new bills—to aid elementary and secondary, vocational and higher education; to provide housing, create jobs and establish health programs; to clean our air and water, guarantee voting rights and stimulate economic development in the most depressed rural and urban areas.

Today, we see those programs gutted by this Administration. We are fighting to keep human programs from disappearing forever under the weight of the $200 billion deficit inflicted on this nation, not by ''social spending'' as President Reagan contends, but by his own Administration's unfair budget and tax policies which have robbed the federal government of needed revenues.

It is also the 50th anniversary of the Wagner Act. But it is difficult to summon up any joy when we see the national labor relations laws abused and misused under the Reagan Administration and a flagrantly pro-management National Labor Relations Board that apparently regards its mission as the destruction of labor's Magna Carta in favor of a return to employer feudalism.

The AFL-CIO has demanded action to deal with the crushing federal budget deficits that are Ronald Reagan's legacy to this country. The answer lies in limiting defense spending to reasonable levels, in policies to increase employment and thereby boost tax revenues, and in restoration of some of the revenues lost through loopholes opened by the 1981 Reagan tax bill.



AS WE STRIVE to meet the challenges that confront us at home, we have also expanded our international work, mindful that in today's politically unstable and economically interdependent world, no easy separation can be made between our domestic and foreign problems.

The animating force in our international activities continues to be the defense and promotion of freedom of association, not only as the bedrock of free trade unionism but as the operating principle of democracy itself.

We know that in the absence of freedom of association, the people are powerless to defend their human rights against assaults by the state or by powerful private interests.

The American trade union movement is working to build international trade union solidarity . . . to strengthen workers' institutions, and thereby the foundations of democracy itself.

Many willing to work, but lack job programs

Press Associates, Inc.

There is one thing the United States has in abundance and that is people able and willing to work.

The official jobless rate of just over 7 percent is a conservative measure, counting only those actively seeking and failing to find work. It represents 8.3 million unemployed. In addition, 1.2 million have dropped out of the workforce altogether. Another 5.6 million are on part-time involuntarily. Thus some 15 million people are unemployed or underemployed.

The Labor Dept. recently reported 1,448 areas as ''labor surplus areas.'' That means they averaged at least 10 percent jobless for two calendar years, 1983 and 1984. This qualifies them for preferred status in winning federal contracts. The idea is to steer work into areas with high structural unemployment.

The workers are there, yet high-level unemployment persists. It can't be the dole, because only one-third of the unemployed receive benefits. Alarms used to sound when unemployment exceeded 4 percent, but no longer. A ''labor surplus area'' used to be one with 6 percent or more jobless, but some manner of tolerance has raised this to 10 percent.

Support lacking

Action by Congress on job creation requires bipartisan support, but that is lacking in the present conservative climate.

''At the heart of the conservative opposition to federal job creation initiatives lies the suspicion that the poor and unemployed are morally different from the rest of Americans,'' observed Sar Levitan, director of George Washington University's Center for Social Policy Studies. ''All this tells us a story of loose labor markets where millions of people cannot find full-time work. Clearly, unemployment is not due to the failure of the idle to seek work, as President Reagan asserts, but because jobs are not available for all whose who desire work.''

There are modest efforts, to be sure, but federal resources are extremely limited because conservatives look on federal programs as spending rather than investments. So the focus today is on job training and placement.

Labor Sec. William Brock recently hailed the restructured federal Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) as ''a significantly effective tool for putting people in jobs and a model for human resource programs.'' Brock said that 68 percent of the 1.1 million youths and adults enrolled in the basic state programs who completed their training in the past two years had been placed in jobs.

Reagan cutbacks

Instead of expanding JTPA, Reagan's budget request to Congress reduced it to $2.8 billion for fiscal year 1986 from the last year's budget level of $3.7 billion.

When the Reagan Administration sought to abolish the very successful Job Corps, a part of JTPA, its defenders in Congress saved the program because it works.

In a policy statement of the National Council on Employment Policy, a non-profit research group, Levitan and Peter Carlson found ''encouraging signs'' in the new JTPA, but also raised critical questions.

They said observers of JTPA are ''near-unanimous'' in charging that the Labor Dept. ''has virtually abandoned its responsibilities as a partner (with the states) in managing JTPA.'' Thus, each state has its own interpretation in implementing the program, they said, a situation apparently in conflict with congressional intent. Moreover, they said, there is no national audit guide on spending nor national technical assistance plan.

Levitan and Carlson stressed the need for federal leadership and the importance of the JTPA's Private Industry Councils at the grassroots. The success of a nationwide training and employment program depends on unions and employers becoming directly involved in helping dislocated workers and the disadvantaged become trained for worthwhile jobs.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Legalized Age Discrimination?

Senate To Face Vote On Youth Subminimum

After year-long preparations, Senator Orrin Hatch (R-UT), Chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee, is expected to make his first serious attempt at enacting a youth subminimum wage law. The scheme, backed by the White House, would take jobs from older Americans and legalize age discrimination in the job market.

Hatch is expected to offer the measure as an amendment to H.R. 1534, a bill that makes permanent a temporary program of flex hours for federal workers.

With important budget, tax reform and other considerations pending, the Senate will be pressed for time to complete work. Members of the Senate are expected to filibuster the Hatch proposal if necessary -- a move that could force Majority Leader Robert Dole (R-KA) to step in and kill the measure.

If enacted, the program would encourage employers to fill their seasonal jobs by displacing youths over 19 and older workers from the jobs they depend on and replacing them with youths at $2.50 per hour rather than the present $3.35 per hour minimum wage.

We Told You So!

Caribbean Scheme Backfires, Worsening U.S. Import Crisis

As the AFL-CIO predicted back in 1982, the Caribbean Basin initiative is backfiring in the face of its chief proponent, the Reagan Administration. Sold to Congress as a program to help Latin American countries prosper and turn away from Communism, the plan gives islands like Jamaica preferred importer status into U.S. markets.

However, the program has made them attractive sites for other opportunistic countries like Taiwan and Hong Kong to relocate factories and make further inroads into U.S. clothing markets. The U.S. presently has quotas restricting the number of garments these strong industrial countries can import into the U.S. as a safeguard for American industries and jobs.

"We were attracted to Jamaica because there are no quota restrictions on this country's garment exports to the U.S.", says S.K. Wong, Director of Esquel Enterprises of Hong Kong. Besides Esquel, about two dozen apparel makers from Hong Kong, South Korea, Taiwan, and Singapore over the past two years have opened factories through out the Caribbean Basin.

Imports Save Money, But Not For Consumers

Savoring their huge profits from selling low-wage imports, retailers are attempting to kill trade legislation by claiming that imports cost consumers less. But the facts speak otherwise.

According to John Meinert, Vice Chairman of Hartmax clothing manufactures in the U.S., "The high margins available on imported goods benefit those who import them. The differential is retained by the importer-seller, and the American consumer does not receive lower prices".

The Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union (ACTWU) has documented many instances where retailers today are selling American-made items along with imported "copies" under the same label, for the exact same price.

More Bosses Cheat On Wages, Feds Look The Other Way

More employers than ever before are cheating their workers out of overtime or paying them below the required minimum wage, a recent Government Accounting Office (GAO) study reveals. And government agencies are looking the other way.

In a recent report to a House labor subcommittee, the government watchdog agency said that the Departments of Justice and Labor have been deliberately ignoring violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

According to a recent New York Times article, the maximum penalty of $10,000 for a first conviction is not considered significant by officials in the Justice Department. Therefore, they are reluctant to prosecute violations. This has caused the Labor Department to refocus its efforts on milder civil remedies, rather than criminal actions.

The GAO went on to say that recent Reagan Administration cuts in the Labor Department's staff and a Supreme Court ruling last February that expanded the F.L.S.A. to cover state and local government employees could worsen the situation.

269 Representatives Take Stand Against Tax On Worker Supports

Signatures of 269 Representatives have been put to the "Don't Tax Employee Benefits" resolution in the House.

Meanwhile, the House Ways and Means Committee is in the middle of shaping the President's tax package and Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-IL) is seeking new ways to fund the measure. This means employee life supports are still vulnerable.

Signing the resolution by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA) are 15 chairmen of key committees, 4 GOP House leaders and 49 of 70 Democratic House leaders. If your representative is not on this important resolution, contact him or her today.

Gutting Of Executive Order 11246 Would Cripple Affirmative Action

A 22-year-old cornerstone of this country's equal opportunity efforts is under attack from elements in the Reagan White House. If successful, they could set the country's affirmative action efforts back a decade or more.

Executive Order 11246, issued by President John F. Kennedy in 1963, prevents federal contractors from discriminating on the basis of race, color, religion, sex or national origin. Its provisions require employers with contracts valued at more than $50,000 to examine their rosters and develop clear goals toward hiring more women and minorities if their workforce does not compare with the general availability of these workers.

The proposed change would eliminate the requirement that contractors set goals and timetables for hiring women and minorities. White House proponents are hawking it as a chance to eliminate an undesireable "quota" system.

However, E.O. 11246 does not impose any strict numerical requirements upon companies. Nor do contractors lose federal contracts if they fail to meet these goals, provided they demonstrate good faith efforts. Its actually a fair and flexible system that since 1963 has helped open the doors of opportunity for millions of minority Americans.

Poll Shows Americans Favor Actions Against Import Flood

Pressure is growing across the country for lawmakers to stop the flood of imports and the economic havoc they are wreaking on U.S. industries and families. A recent poll taken by Lance Tarrance & Associates among Americans who voted for Ronald Reagan shows that over half now favor stepped up U.S. government efforts in the areas of competitiveness and trade.

When asked if the federal government should be more or less involved in protecting U.S. economic interests from foreign competition, a sampling of 1000 Reagan voters said we should be:

Convention gears up drive for union growth, renewal

AFL-CIO news

VOL. 30, NO. 44/45
SATURDAY
NOVEMBER 9, 1985

Endorsement process gets new mandate

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO will consider an early endorsement of a presidential candidate before the 1988 primary season gets under way, seeking a consensus within the trade union movement based on the desires of union members across the country.

That's the path that was followed in the last presidential campaign and there was strong support for its continuance.

Convention debate on the issue found overwhelming agreement that the high degree of membership involvement in the decision to endorse Walter F. Mondale for the Democratic presidential nomination had been good for the labor movement—and for the nation.

As was the case two years ago, a decision to endorse will require a two-thirds majority.

If there is such a consensus, the AFL-CIO and its state and local central bodies will participate actively in presidential primaries, caucuses or other forms of delegate selection. Whether or not there is an AFL-CIO endorsement, affiliated unions make their own decisions on the nature and extent of their political involvement.

The thrust of the resolution, and of the case made for its passage in the floor debate, was that the process itself had proved its worth in the last election.

''That process is based on membership involvement and consultation,'' the resolution stressed. ''It produced increased political education and participation within our ranks, solidarity among our affiliated unions, and a stronger, more effective labor movement.''

Benefit concept adopted

Programs reach out to wider membership

By David L. Perlman

Anaheim, Calif.—If the promise of the AFL-CIO's convention is achieved, the years ahead will bring trade union growth in fields of employment now barely tapped. There will be new and more enduring links between workers and unions, greater participation by members in union activities, and extra cash value in a union card.

Key resolutions and the floor discussion that highlighted their significance coupled the traditional trade union goal of ''organizing the unorganized'' with a commitment to new forms of outreach to today's workers—and tomorrow's.

The convention gave a green light to the AFL-CIO to put together a package of membership benefits—including low-cost insurance and consumer services—that unions could offer to their members.

Savings generated by the pooled buying power of millions of workers would make union membership immediately valuable. A convention resolution viewed the program as especially useful in building a proposed new category of associate members—union supporters not presently covered by a collective bargaining agreement.

Associate memberships, the resolution suggested, could include persons who leave a job in which they were represented by a union, who are victims of plant closings or layoffs, or who have supported the union in an unsuccessful organizing drive.

Feasibility study

The feasibility study that backed the concept of ''providing direct services and benefits to workers outside of a collective bargaining structure'' was conducted by a staff drawn from the AFL-CIO and 23 affiliates.

One of its facets was a poll of members of AFL-CIO unions that found widespread support for the establishment of a benefits

Actions focus on 'challenge of the future'

By John M. Barry

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO broke new ground at its 30th anniversary convention, pointing America's trade union movement to a path of solidarity and growth.

The federation's 16th convention followed through on the recommendations of the landmark report of the Executive Council—The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions—by approving innovative organizing strategies and a package of benefits ''to strengthen the bond'' between unions and their members.

The need for growth through organizing and adaptation to change was a central theme of the four-day convention, Oct. 28-31, as expressed in its slogan, ''Meeting the Challenge of the Future.''

Federation President Lane Kirkland noted in his keynote address to the delegates that ''we do face a great challenge, but not for the first time.'' He pointed out that the words of the convention slogan were drawn from the language of the merger constitution.

Organizing potential

Kirkland acknowledged that overall union growth has been ''stymied'' in recent years by changes in the workforce, but he declared:

''The good news is that we have a hell of a lot more people to organize—and we do mean to organize them.''

The federation will do that, Kirkland said, in spite of the barriers and hurdles raised by the current ''yellow-dog'' National Labor Relations Board and the hostility of the Reagan Administration, which have ''drained the life'' from a national policy of encouraging workers to exercise their right to union representation.

''Of one thing I am certain,'' he said. ''We must do it by offering to the working men and women of America, not what this Administration wants, not what politicians want, not what their bosses want, not even what some of us may think they ought to want, but what they themselves really want from us.''

The 782 delegates also gave major attention to Administration economic and trade policies that have left a wake of devastated industries and continuing high rates of joblessness. It called for action to achieve the goal of full employment and ''reverse the disastrous decline'' in the nation's balance of trade.

The job-destroying impact of unrestrained imports was detailed by delegates representing workers in a cross-section of American industry. They took the floor in a steady stream to support the call for an overhaul of American trade policy.

Organizing takes 'highest priority'

By Gene Zack

Anaheim, Calif.—New approaches are essential to organize the unorganized and to counter the union-busting industry, AFL-CIO delegates concurred.

Declaring that organizing is ''a continuing obligation and challenge of the highest priority,'' a convention resolution called for:

- Flexibility in approaching new groups of workers.
- Developing job issues and contract proposals responsive to employees ''who may have values and needs different from those of current union members.''
- Developing new research techniques and new strategies and tactics for organizing both small shops and major units.
- Developing comprehensive corporate campaigns to help affiliates deal with recalcitrant employers, particularly multinational corporations.
- Training staff members to deal with organizing problems in such special sectors as white-collar, clerical and professional fields.
- Providing affiliates with information on union-busting consultants and studies of the impact of their methods.

The convention deplored the emergence of ''high-priced consultants, lawyers and others whose wares consist of cynical overt and covert strategies to coerce workers to turn against unions.''

''The goon squad, the club and the labor spy of the 1930s have been replaced by the modern union-busters' sophisticated and manipulative techniques,'' the resolution declared.

Such techniques, the resolution asserted, are equally ''destructive of free worker choice on union representation.''

The Reagan-appointed National Labor Relations Board administers existing law to make it ''an impediment to organizing efforts,'' the resolution said, calling for ''a thorough overhaul'' of federal labor laws to

Kirkland, Donahue get new terms, four new council members elected

Anaheim, Calif.—Convention delegates re-elected AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue to new two-year terms. Twenty-nine incumbent and four new vice presidents were also elected by acclamation.

The 33 vice presidents and the federation's two general officers make up the Executive Council, the AFL-CIO's governing body between conventions.

Newly elected AFL-CIO vice presidents are Larry Dugan, Jr., president of the Operating Engineers; Robert A. Georgine, president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Milan Stone, president of the Rubber Workers, and Gene Upshaw, president of the Federation of Professional Athletes and executive director of the National Football League Players Association.

Those leaving the council include its senior member in terms of service, John H. Lyons, who has been seriously ill and stepped down earlier this year as president of the Iron Workers. Lyons had been an AFL-CIO vice president since 1967.

The others leaving are J.C. Turner of the Operating Engineers, a council member since 1977; Robert F. Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, who was elected to the council in 1977, and Kenneth J. Brown of the Graphic Communications Union, elected in 1983. All recently retired as presidents of their unions.

Kirkland and Donahue are both starting their fourth terms.

Kirkland, 63, was the AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer for 10 years before he was elected to succeed George Meany at the 1979 convention.

"What you see is what you get," Kirkland told the delegates with a grin after the ovation that greeted his re-election.

He said he doesn't consider himself a "neoconservative or a neoliberal," just an "unreformed" and "unreconstructed" New Dealer who doesn't "list to either port or starboard."

Kirkland told the delegates that as a youngster growing up in South Carolina he was "nourished" by the New Deal era National Youth Administration and by the Merchant Marine Act. He earned his union card in the Masters, Mates & Pilots as a World War II merchant marine officer.

Donahue, 57, was a vice president of the Service Employees before becoming executive assistant to Meany in 1973. He served as Assistant Secretary of Labor in the Johnson Administration.

Leading the way

"Whatever our problems have been," Donahue said, "this trade union movement remains the single most powerful force in this nation seeking the improvement of the human condition."

He said he will seek to assist Kirkland "in every way" and conserve the AFL-CIO's resources "to strengthen this movement and to improve the life of its members."

New vice presidents

Larry Dugan, Jr., 55, succeeded Turner as president of the Operating Engineers in June after having served as a vice president since 1979. He came to Washington from Phoenix, Ariz., where he had been business manager of IUOE Local 428, and an officer of the city and state building trades councils and of the Arizona AFL-CIO.

Robert A. Georgine, 53, has headed the 15-union Building & Construction Trades Dept. since 1974 after having served as its secretary-treasurer for three years previously. He is a former president of the Lathers, which since has merged with the Carpenters. Georgine earned his journeyman's card in Chicago.

Milan Stone, 58, usually called "Mike," has been president of the Rubber Workers since 1981. He joined the URW in 1956 in Eau Claire, Wis., after World War II Navy service. Stone's first union office was shop steward, and he went on to become a field representative, district director and URW vice president. He is also a former president of the Eau Claire AFL-CIO central body.

Gene Upshaw, 40, has been president of the Federation of Professional Athletes and executive director of the National Football League Players Association since 1983. He was a union stalwart during his 16-year playing career with the Oakland (now Los Angeles) Raiders, as player representative for his team, first vice president and then president of the NFL Players Association. As an athlete, he was team captain, a nine-time selection as All-Pro offensive guard, and has three Superbowl rings.

Delegates set high priority on organizing

achieve their original goal of facilitating organizing.

In floor discussions, Vice President Leon Lynch of the Steelworkers urged unions to "pledge people, as well as finances, in order to pay for organizing expenses."

He said the task of reaching out to the unorganized is labor's prime objective.

President John J. Sweeney of the Service Employees said it's "harder to organize" in the present climate than it was a decade ago, but that an "organizing resurgence" could overcome the obstacles now in labor's path.

From 1982 through 1984, he said, the SEIU "brought only 80,000 people into the family of labor—less than half the number we organized from 1974 to 1976. And today we represent less than 10 percent of the workers in the service sector, where 90 percent of job growth is occurring."

Sweeney hailed the joint organizing drive being coordinated by the AFL-CIO among thousands of Blue Cross-Blue Shield employees, calling it "only a start" on the road to expanded efforts to bring union protection to more workers.

Sandra Feldman of the Teachers pointed out that management is spending more money to keep unions out "than they would have to spend if they let the union in."

Employers aren't just worried about their profits she said. "They are doing this because it is their ideology, because they want to keep the power to themselves, because a strong labor movement becomes a force for social and economic justice, for spending money on health programs, on programs for the aged, on education, for preserving social security.

Labor's goal

"The last thing that these people want is economic justice," she said, "and the first thing that labor is about is economic justice."

Other floor speakers included Albin Gruhn, president of the California State AFL-CIO; Helen Verhage of the Somerset County, (N.J.) AFL-CIO; Vincent Sirabella, organizing director of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, and James J. Norton, acting president of the Graphic Communications Union.

The resolution also called on help for affiliates in established bargaining units that face concerted union-busting assaults. It cited in particular the "vicious, anti-union activities" of the Chicago Tribune, where 1,200 members of the GCIU and the Typographical Union have been on strike since July 18 because of management's intransigent demands for a three-tier wage structure and contract givebacks that would force abandonment of the pension plan, an end to the grievance procedure, and major changes in the health care plan.

Delegates also called on affiliates to cease informal alliances with unaffiliated law enforcement associations, pointing out that the existence of these groups thwarts legitimate organizing efforts.

Bid to stifle unions spurs call for Hatch Act changes

Anaheim, Calif.—The convention called for political freedom for federal and postal workers and assailed the use of the Hatch Act to harass public employees and their unions.

Three union presidents are facing Hatch Act charges because of their active support of the Democratic presidential ticket last year—Moe Biller of the Postal Workers, Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees and Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers. Charges were brought even though all three are on leave without pay from their civil service jobs.

The resolution adopted called for a renewed legislative effort to amend the 46-year-old law which was intended to insulate career federal employees from political pressures.

During the discussion, John F. Leyden of the Public Employee Dept. charged that the case brought against the three union presidents was intended as a "not-so-subtle message" to "chill" political participation by federal and postal workers and their unions.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland noted the "irony" that a law originally passed as "a good government move to protect the integrity of the civil service from the corruption of politicians" is now being used "to protect rotten politicians from the workers."

In other resolutions, the convention:

- Protested the repeated denial to federal employees of the pay comparability with private sector jobs that is supposed to be provided by law. In this and previous Administrations, presidents have regularly cut back the salary adjustments.

  Congress should tighten the law so as to make comparability pay standards mandatory if the President continues to flout the law, the convention said.

- Called for major changes in the federal labor relations law and urged that government workers be given "the clear right" to negotiate wages and working conditions. The resolution said the intent of the labor relations law has been "perverted" by the agency set up to administer it.

  In discussion, John N. Sturdivant of the Government Employees stressed that "whether you work for the public or the private sector, a worker is a worker."

- Spelled out the objectives to be sought in legislation establishing a supplemental retirement plan for federal and postal employees. Bringing the civil service under the social security system wasn't intended to diminish benefits for federal workers, the resolution noted.

- Asked legislation to require federal agencies to investigate alternatives to layoffs of workers and the closing of government installations. Federal employees and their unions should be brought into "a meaningful bargaining process" when cutbacks are being considered, the resolution said. It urged that seniority be reestablished as the deciding factor when reductions in the workforce are necessary.

Federal ban urged on strikebreakers

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO placed high priority on passage of legislation to bar employers from hiring permanent replacements for striking workers to restore the National Labor Relations Act's goal of assuring "good faith bargaining between equals."

Discharging workers amounts to "industrial capital punishment," delegates said in a convention resolution. It asserted that inflicting "that extreme penalty on employees because they seek decent working conditions makes a mockery of the promise in the NLRA to protect the right to strike."

President William H. Bywater of the Electronic Workers told the convention that although "strikebreaking has been going on for a great many years," this form of union-busting has reached an all-time high since President Reagan came to power.

When Reagan broke the strike of the Air Traffic Controllers, replacing them with new workers, employers took this as a signal that this was a path they could follow, with the result that "we are seeing strikebreaking like never before," Bywater said.

The resolution pointed out that the NLRA sought to achieve "a more balanced approach of good-faith negotiation between equals," and that it is "the possibility of an effective strike that makes the employer and his employees equal."

Whenever employers "permanently replace their acting employees," the resolution noted, "that equality, and the very right to strike, are mere illusions. The result is less good-faith employer bargaining, fewer fair agreements, and more industrial strife fought out in the harshest terms."

In addition to calling for legislation to correct the situation, delegates approved a campaign to make the public aware of the evils of strikebreaking, and pledged all-out aid and assistance to striking workers whose bosses seek to hire permanent replacements.

Convention spurs union resurgence

Wide-ranging action plan keyed to organizing needs

The convention re-elected Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue along with 29 vice presidents. Newly elected as vice presidents to fill Executive Council vacancies created by retirements were Presidents Larry Dugan, Jr., of the Operating Engineers, Robert A. Georgine of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Milan Stone of the Rubber Workers and Gene Upshaw of the Professional Athletes.

Constitutional changes were approved raising the annual salaries of the president and secretary-treasurer and clarifying the relationship of the federation to its various constituent bodies.

A highlight of the convention was the presentation of the George Meany International Human Rights Award to Ernesto Herrera, general secretary of the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines, for his courage in fighting repression of workers' rights.

In another major action, the convention voted to continue the consensus-seeking procedure adopted two years ago on endorsement of a presidential candidate. This will keep the door open for a pre-primary endorsement in the next presidential election if an early consensus is achieved.

In all, the convention approved a record 105 resolutions on a broad range of labor's concerns, including civil rights, women's rights, social welfare, labor standards, energy and environment, international affairs, and other issues.

Throughout the proceedings, the key resolutions were dramatized through video presentations by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, a mark of the AFL-CIO's coming of age in the use of electronic media. Giant video projection screens were positioned in the convention hall for delegates.

The major issues confronting the labor movement also were highlighted in speeches by public figures, including Labor Sec. William E. Brock, House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.), Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), Representatives William Gray (D-Pa.) and Esteban Torres (D-Calif.), Missouri Lt. Gov. Harriett Woods, and Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley.

Other major speakers included Mine Workers President Richard Trumka and NAACP Executive Director Ben Hooks.

Foreign affairs

International concerns were addressed in speeches by John Vanderveken, general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions; Jerzy Milewski, international representative of Solidarnosc, Poland's suppressed trade union organization, and the fraternal delegates, William Sirs, a member of the general council of the British Trades Union Congress, and Dick Martin, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The convention was attended by 782 delegates from 85 national and international unions, eight departments, 47 state bodies, 179 local central bodies, three directly affiliated local unions and two fraternal organizations. Ten of the delegates also had been delegates to the AFL-CIO's first convention, in 1955.

Proceedings were covered by a news media contingent of 250, and 97 foreign visitors observed the sessions.

Delegates adopt clarification on ties of affiliates

Anaheim, Calif.—The convention approved constitutional amendments raising the salaries of the executive officers and clarifying the relationship between the AFL-CIO and its constituent bodies.

The pay increases, recommended by the Executive Council's finance committee, are the first since 1977 and represent about half the rise in the cost of living since then. They bring the president's salary to $150,000 a year and the secretary-treasurer's to $125,000.

The clarifying amendments:

- Make clear that national and international unions are autonomous organizations while organizing committees, trade and industrial departments, state and local central bodies and directly affiliated local unions are subordinate bodies of the federation.
- Bar from affiliation in the AFL-CIO, or any of its subordinate bodies, any affiliate that becomes part of an unaffiliated organization.
- Give merged unions credit for the per capita membership of each in determining voting strength at the next AFL-CIO convention and, when affiliates divide, give each credit for an appropriate share of the total membership.
- Establish an appeals committee to hear and decide appeals filed by central bodies and DALUs.

Another amendment makes it clear that payments to the officers on retirement are pensions for past service.

At federation's helm are Sec.-Treas. Donahue and President Kirkland.

Gramm-Rudman proposition branded disaster for nation

Anaheim, Calif.—The Senate-passed Gramm-Rudman balanced budget legislation would be a national disaster, the AFL-CIO convention warned.

It would turn the next recession into a depression, abdicate constitutional powers of Congress to the President, and demolish essential government programs that have already been sharply cut back.

The resolution adopted by the convention pointed up the reliance of the Gramm-Rudman approach solely on spending cuts to achieve deficit reduction, and warned of the consequences.

"There is no provision in Gramm-Rudman to raise additional revenues by closing tax loopholes," the convention noted. "Thus, wealthy individuals and profitable corporations would continue to pay little or no taxes, while the disabled, the elderly, veterans and the poor all would suffer."

Programs especially vulnerable to further deep cuts include education, transportation, highway construction, mass transit, job training and postal services, the resolution warned.

Labor's assessment of the plan's dangers wasn't altered by the Senate's second-round of voting on the balanced budget proposal, which took place after the AFL-CIO convention.

The House had rejected the Senate's original plan and substituted a less destructive Democratic version. A deadlocked conference then caused the Senate to take a second look at the legislation it had so hastily passed as an amendment to a bill raising the federal debt ceiling.

But the Senate didn't blink. To the applause of the White House, it turned down changes that would have exempted some programs for the poor and elderly from new cuts. Ironically, even as Reagan was cheerleading the Senate version, Defense Sec. Caspar W. Weinberger and Sec. of State George P. Shultz were reportedly warning Reagan bluntly that the rigidity of the balanced budget measure threatened the national security.

Reagan's deficit

In convention discussion of the resolution, President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees questioned why Congress would want to turn over new budget authority to President Reagan, as the Gramm-Rudman plan would do.

Would Reagan use this power to help the poor, the disadvantaged or the elderly, McEntee asked. "What will the President do to educational programs?" he asked. "What will the President do for the wealthy?"

Reagan "created this deficit," McEntee charged, and now is trying "to put it on the backs of the workers."

Kirkland sees labor poised for strong growth

Anaheim, Calif.—A trade union movement responsive to the needs of today's workers and open to fresh ideas is poised for a new spurt of growth, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the opening session of the convention.

Kirkland's keynote address rang with confidence that America's unions will once again confound "the crapehangers" who regularly proclaim labor's demise.

He acknowledged the "barriers and hurdles" to union growth.

Manufacturing employment is down, battered by job destroying imports, and there are fewer railroad and maritime workers. "A new labor force has grown up around us and the trade union share of it has dropped." A hostile Administration and its "yellow-dog" National Labor Relations Board are allied with professional union-busters, Kirkland noted.

But "the good news," he said, "is that we have a hell of a lot more people to organize—and we do mean to organize them."

"The trade union movement of America was not created by the National Labor Relations Board," Kirkland reminded the delegates. "We are going to outlast the bastards."

Labor's detractors to the contrary, Kirkland affirmed, the AFL-CIO has not been "idle, complacent or resistant to change and innovation" during the 30 years since the merger of the nation's two labor federations.

He cited the healing of internal divisions and establishment of a host of new programs. These have included job training and outreach, labor education and leadership training, pension investments to create jobs, a labor television service "responding to a widespread demand," creation of "a worldwide union foreign service," development of support groups strengthening labor's alliance with the black and Hispanic communities and reaching out to working women, senior citizens and young people. New AFL-CIO departments have led to greater cooperation among affiliates with shared interests.

Expanding membership

Fifteen AFL-CIO unions, in expanding fields of employment, have more than doubled their membership since the AFL-CIO merger, Kirkland noted, even apart from inter-union mergers. Two unions that had a combined membership of 140,000 in 1955 have 1,480,000 members today.

"This is not the record of a stand-pat organization," Kirkland asserted. "It is the record of a movement that is open and receptive to new ideas from within or without for new and better ways to serve its members and the human community."

But Kirkland warned that the erosion of America's industrial base is trapping millions of young workers in low-paying service jobs, depriving them of admission to the working middle class.

For the first time, he said, we have a generation of Americans who don't expect to do as well as their parents.

Kirkland assailed the callousness of the Reagan administration to the persistence of recession level unemployment.

At the time of the AFL-CIO merger, he noted, the nation's jobless rate was 4.4 percent and that was considered too high. But President Reagan speaks of the persistent 7.1 percent jobless rate as an economic "miracle."

At the height of the recovery from the Reagan lowpoint, Kirkland pointed out, "unemployment is higher than at the very depth of the 1971 recession."

The Reagan Administration has brought with it "a level of tolerance for the pain of others, on the part of the secure and the comfortable, that would have seemed unthinkable not too many years ago," Kirkland charged.

The enormous trade deficit, Kirkland stressed, "is not just money. It is jobs—millions of them. It is the product not just of a strong dollar, but of a studied policy of this Administration" to "buy foreign and fire American."

Kirkland spoke with contempt of the "elegance" of a suggestion by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce that workers "will get off their ass and go to work" if they aren't given "a fat unemployment check."

He scoffed at the "borrow-and-borrow" policy of the Reagan Administration in matching big tax cuts for the wealthy with heavy military spending increases to generate budget deficits that are strangling government.

Don't duck and run

But Reagan will have won his goal, Kirkland suggested, if a craven Congress ducks its responsibilities and runs to an unworkable balanced budget resolution.

Labor's tradition is to support its friends and oppose its enemies. But on some congressional issues, Kirkland suggested, "it is getting harder and harder to tell them apart."

Nevertheless, he stressed, "we have to stay active in every phase of the political life of this country and get better and better at it."

There is no choice, Kirkland said, because "we are involved for better or worse in the consequences of politics, like it or not."

Delegates vote to renew endorsement process

The effort to "again secure a representative and unified voice for America's working men and women in the nation's political process" will be undertaken "without prejudging whether or not our process leads to an early endorsement," the AFL-CIO resolution declared.

A film produced by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs recaptured highlights of the path to labor's endorsement of Mondale's candidacy for the Democratic nomination.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had asked unions to hold off on presidential endorsements while the search for a consensus was under way, and to seek out the views of their members on the various candidates.

By the time of the General Board endorsement meeting and the AFL-CIO convention that immediately followed, more than 3 million union members had expressed their views through a variety of opinion-sampling procedures adopted by their unions. The consensus was there.

The pre-primary endorsement for the first time permitted state and local central bodies to participate fully in the nomination process, the resolution noted. It brought thousands of union members into voluntary political activity. And the Democratic National Convention found "a record number of trade union delegates...working together in common purpose."

In past presidential election years, an early run of primaries had often determined the outcome before most of the nation had an opportunity to participate in the selection of a candidate.

Active involvement

Labor did not set up the procedures used by political parties to nominate candidates, the convention resolution noted. But "to be in a position to influence the political system," it stressed, "labor must understand and be actively involved in the day-to-day workings of that system."

In a lively floor discussion, delegates from a cross-section of unions gave testimony to the value of the procedure followed in the last presidential campaign.

Bricklayers President John T. Joyce cited election day polls showing that 61 percent of members of AFL-CIO unions voted for Mondale—some 20 percent above the population at large.

In his own union, he said, a poll showed that 80 percent of the membership supported the AFL-CIO's decision for early involvement in the presidential selection—including members supporting another candidate and two-thirds of the members identifying themselves as Republicans.

Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn found a comparable reaction in a post-election poll of his union's membership.

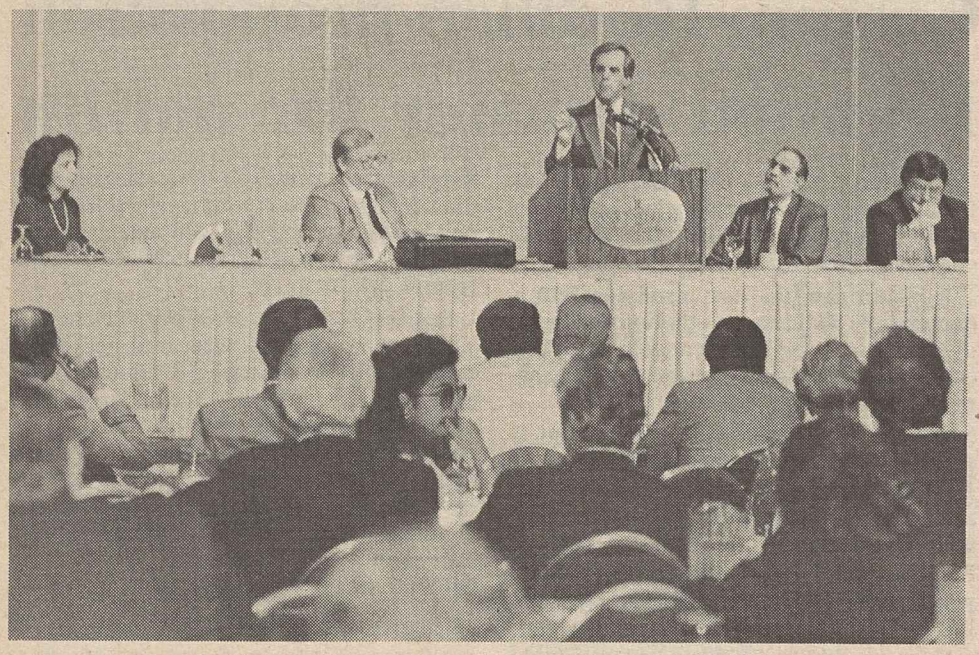
"By 85 percent," Wynn reported, "they told us our union should be involved. We might not always agree with the recommendation that you make, but we should be involved."

The Sheet Metal Workers are still not convinced that an early endorsement is desirable, Delegate Lonnie A. Bassett told the convention. So while his union worked actively for the Mondale-Ferraro ticket in the presidential election, it opposed the resolution.

State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee and Leon Lynch of the Steelworkers were very much for it. McEntee said the forging of trade union unity in the campaign was "labor's finest hour." Lynch stressed the labor movement's "responsibility" to provide leadership.

The resolution was adopted by an overwhelming voice vote, with only a scattering of "nays."

The convention also adopted a resolution calling on affiliates to work with COPE on registration, education and get-out-the-vote programs for the 1986 congressional and state elections.



"We face a tremendous task," the resolution noted, "to roll back the strength of the anti-union right wing in the U.S. Senate while retaining Democratic control of the House."

Checkoff urged

It urged greater promotion of the voluntary COPE checkoff, to narrow the big funding advantage of corporate and right-wing PACs.

A separate resolution reiterated the AFL-CIO's support of a federal postcard voter registration system and elimination of registration deadlines.

Because of inaccessible registration offices, unfair registration requirements, and early closing deadlines, the resolution noted, "every election year, millions of citizens are unable to vote because they are not registered."

Energy conservation policy asks alternatives to oil, gas

Anaheim, Calif.—Further weakening of federal energy programs exposes the United States to a repeat of the economic hardships of the 1970s and the threat to the nation's security caused by the oil import disruptions, the AFL-CIO declared.

A convention resolution outlined recommendations on conservation, alternate energy sources, natural gas and emergency programs to help secure America's energy sources in the future.

It called for increased funding for energy conservation programs, especially those for weatherization of low-income homes, schools and hospitals, the setting of energy performance standards for buildings and appliances, and mandatory mileage standards.

The federation urged "a strong research, development and demonstration program" as alternatives to oil and natural gas.

To counter the excessive increases in natural gas prices, it called for federal price controls based on the cost of production.

The Reagan Administration proposed an indefinite halt to the filling of a one-billion-barrel emergency oil reserve and still has no plan for distributing this oil in an emergency. The AFL-CIO urged that strategic reserve be filled at a rate that will achieve the one-billion-barrel goal in a reasonable time frame.

The federation also called for re-establishment of emergency presidential powers to prevent price gouging, ensure adequate oil for emergencies and to ensure supplies are fairly shared in the event of a shortage.

In other recommendations, it said Congress should continue to reject proposals to export Alaskan oil, called for increased funding for low-income fuel assistance, suggested an immediate moratorium on oil company mergers and acquisitions.

Extension of the Price-Anderson Act insurance program was urged to provide compensation to the public in the event of a nuclear power plant accident. Also the delegates suggested that "unnecessary obstacles" to the export of nuclear power plant components and fuel be removed in conformance with the U.S. nonproliferation policy.

The resolution noted that high energy prices are continuing to place a heavy burden on low- and middle-income families and the elderly. The Reagan Administration proposed to slash the energy aid to the poor and permitted deregulation of gas prices.

Drug abuse strategy looks to rehabilitation

Anaheim, Calif.—Drug abuse costs the nation nearly $47 billion in lost wages and outlays for medical care and the punishment of drug traffickers, the AFL-CIO said, as it supported a national strategy to deal with the problem.

The program endorsed by the convention includes prevention, enforcement, international cooperation, medical detoxification and treatment, and research.

In a related resolution, delegates called for labor-management cooperation "to reduce the incidence of alcohol and drug use in the workplace" by improving working conditions, reducing the strain that leads to dependency, and rehabilitating workers with addictions.

They also urged Congress to investigate the escalating use of employee screening tests "to insure workers' rights and dignity," and to enact legislation if it finds that these rights are being abused.

Labor's new directions point to broader role for unions

program. Union members, the poll indicated, have confidence that their unions will be acting in the best interest of the members in putting together such a package.

The study found that "the insurance industry and financial institutions are interested in developing programs that could be offered on a federation-wide basis to union members."

It concluded that "by acting together, unions would be able to obtain a range of benefits and services, at favorable rates tailored to meet the special needs of workers."

While the benefits would be made available to all affiliates, the convention specified, each union would make its own decision on the extent of participation. The AFL-CIO would pay the start-up costs of such a program, but it would be self-financing thereafter.

In response to one of the recommendations of the "changing situation" report, the AFL-CIO is presently testing a one-on-one program of increasing membership involvement in three states. Consider expanding the program, the convention recommended to the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions.

Major campaign

In another response, a multi-union program for organizing the health industry, with an initial focus on Blue Cross-Blue Shield employees, has already been approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council. It deserves the support of every union member, the resolution urged.

Such campaigns, "established for a defined period of time and charged with the task of organizing the unorganized in a given area, industry or company," are the way to go, the convention affirmed.

Linda Puchala, president of the Flight Attendants, opened the convention debate by welcoming the AFL-CIO's "giant step of self-examination" but stressing that "we have a lot of work to do" to follow through on the new ideas and concepts.

"The new worker more often than not is female, is a minority, is well educated and is sophisticated," she said.

"Listen to them," she urged. "Listen to the new ideas, to the new aspirations, to the new problems."

The trade union's credibility, Puchala suggested, "is not only what we say as a labor union movement, but what we do."

President John Kelly of the Office & Professional Employees welcomed the inter-union organizing approach and cited as an example of success the campaign by nine cooperating unions that organized New York City's hotels.

An experience

State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee said it was "an exciting experience."to serve on the Executive Council committee that shaped the report.

"We talked about new approaches to represent workers," he said. "We talked about new issues, such as pay equity and career ladders and child care" and a "voice in the workplace."

Robert F. Harbrant, from the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept., welcomed the "new road" on which labor is embarking.

"We need to do more," he urged, "more organizing, more health and safety, more hiring of women and minority organizers, more campaigns that involve a number of unions."

The benefits program will help keep in labor's ranks the millions who at sometime have been union members, Rosemary Trump of the Service Employees said.

Teachers President Albert Shanker spoke of the large number of former teachers who, given the opportunity, would keep up union ties. In the early days of unionism, he noted, before collective bargaining was established as a national policy, fraternal benefits attracted workers to unions.

And so, with a lot of hope and goodwill, the AFL-CIO took another big step toward the convention theme of "meeting the challenge of the future."

Ban on hiring illegal aliens urged

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO called on Congress to limit the lure of U.S. jobs for undocumented workers by prohibiting the employment of illegal aliens and establishing tough penalties for employers who break the law.

The delegates also called for protection against employment discrimination "on the basis of national origin or legal alien status" and "the most generous, practical legalization program," for those undocumented workers who are long-time residents and contributing members of their communities.

The urged strict limits on the numbers of temporary non-immigrant foreign workers who could enter the United States and stressed that American working conditions and standards be maintained.

Farm Workers Vice President Dolores Huerta noted that some immigration bills under consideration in Congress would permit an expanded guest worker program and warned that temporary workers already were displacing Mexican-American farm workers in the West as well as black farm workers on the East Coast.

She called the temporary worker or "H-2" program an attempt "to establish a permanent apartheid program for farm workers in the U.S.," where foreign workers would be constantly victimized and American workers continually unemployed.

Policy change demanded

Soaring trade deficit poses new job threat

Anaheim, Calif.—With the national economy reeling under the impact of cut-throat foreign competition, the AFL-CIO reaffirmed labor's call for a strong trade policy that would promote "full employment and rising living standards."

Rejecting the Reagan Administration's "free-trade" theory, convention delegates voted unanimous approval of a resolution calling for immediate, coordinated action to "reverse the disastrous decline" in America's trade balance.

The convention acted as the Commerce Dept. was announcing a surge in imports that drove the U.S. trade deficit to an all-time one-month high of $15.5 billion in September.

At the same time, the government adjusted upward the trade deficit figures it had announced in the two previous months. For August, the department said, the deficit was $12.9 billion instead of the previously announced $9.9 billion, while the corrected July figure was $13.6 billion instead of $10.5 billion as announced earlier.

Record deficit

With the continued flood of imports, the 1985 trade deficit will far outstrip the $123-billion loss racked up in 1984.

The United States is the only country in the world that "exposes its industrial foundation to unlimited erosion from imports," the resolution said. The result is that 2 million jobs have been lost to foreign competition since Reagan came to office and vital sectors of the economy have been decimated.

Noting the steep declines in the automobile, steel, textile and apparel, shoe, telecommunications, shipping and shipbuilding industries under the unremitting assault of foreign competition, the convention called for a policy that will make it possible for the nation to "retain its manufacturing, agricultural and maritme industries."

In the debate that preceded adoption of the resolution, a parade of union leaders went to the microphone to detail the dimensions of the problem.

Crisis stage

The situation is "an absolute nightmare," said President William H. Bywater of the Electronic Workers, and "things are going to get worse before they get better." He discounted Administration claims that legislation to safeguard American workers and industries would invite retaliation from Japan. "The Japanese need us more than we need them," Bywater said. "We are their biggest customers."

President Sol C. Chaiken of the Ladies' Garment Workers warned that without "massive intervention" in the form of legislative restraints on trade, the trade deficit could soar past the $200-billion mark before the end of the decade. He put part of the blame for the problem on the "pervasive pursuit of profits" by the multinational corporations which move from one country to another in search of the lowest possible wage scales.

President Reagan's recently announced trade "initiatives" were denounced by Auto Workers President Owen Bieber who said they were "designed to head off legislation instead of addressing the problem" which has "sacrificed basic industries and our best industrial jobs on the altar of mythical free trade."

The present trade practices around the globe, Steelworkers President Lynn R. Williams said, are being orchestrated by managements which are "simply pitting worker against worker as they go out and seek the very lowest wages they can find anywhere in the world in any industry."

President Morton Bahr of the Communications Workers urged unions to support the trade measure even if they are "not directly impacted." Two years ago, he said, the CWA fit into that category, and merely gave "lip service to this problem." But since the breakup of AT&T, he said, foreign telecommunications manufacturers have invaded this market. "There will not be a single residential telephone set made in the United States next year," he added.

President James E. Hatfield of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers and head of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., urged labor not to be intimidated by the "protectionist" label. "What's wrong about protecting the industry that our members work in?" he asked. "What is wrong with telling Congress that it ought to be speaking for us and protecting us instead of protecting all of the other countries around the world?"

Delegates said that the overhaul of U.S. trade law should include:

- Relief from the unfair trade practices of dumping, subsidies and disruptive imports from non-market economies.
- An end to the practice of foreign governments of expanding their sales and employment at the expense of the United States.
- Easing import relief standards by recoginizing that plant closings and layoffs are proof of serious injury.
- Passage of domestic-content legislation for automobiles to force companies who benefit from access to our markets to provide a suitable number of jobs for American workers.
- Passage of the Textile & Apparel Recovery Act to "roll back imports to a reasonable and stable level."
- Legislative relief for the beleaguered American shoe industry, which President Reagan refused to grant despite recommendations of the International Trade Commission.
- Legislation to halt the flood of telecommunication products in the wake of the AT&T divestiture.
- Restoring the Trade Adjustment Assistance Act and providing adequate compensation for people left jobless because of unfair trade, with improved funding for training, job search and relocation and the extension of benefits to workers in supplier industries.

Ernesto Herrera accepts George Meany Human Rights Award from Kirkland.

Philippines union leader wins Meany Human Rights Award

Anaheim, Calif.—"Democracy is on trial" in the Philippines, where the dictatorship of President Marcos stifles trade unions and denies justice to the people, Gen. Sec. Ernesto Herrera of the Philippine Trade Union Congress said on receiving the George Meany Human Rights Award.

Herrera accepted the award, the fourth given by the AFL-CIO, on behalf of the 23 officers of the Philippine labor movement who were murdered during the past year because of their support for "human rights, democratic trade unionism and democracy."

In making the presentation, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland hailed Herrera for his "great courage" in fighting the Marcos regime and his role on the commission which investigated the assassination of Benigno Aquino, where he led the majority which called for indictment of top military leaders.

Kirkland said the Philippine labor leader embodied George Meany's philosophy that the goal of labor is "to see to it that people without much power aren't kicked around by those with too much power."

Assassinated unionists

Herrera, who read the roster of assassinated union leaders, told delegates that "they died for the cause of democracy," at the hands of the Marcos government and the communists.

Although the Philippine government has ruthlessly "stamped out democracy and suppressed human rights," Herrera pledged that "the cause of free democratic unionism, reverance for human rights and human lives, the supremacy of truth and justice must be proclaimed even more vigorously, despite all the odds."

Noting that there are some in the labor movement "who are losing their faith in democracy," Herrera declared: "It is not democracy that has failed us, it is some men who have failed democracy," adding that trade unions are "a good example of how democratic ways will finally triumph."

Today, he said, the Philippine labor movement is "fighting an uphill struggle for democratic unionism. The dictatorial Marcos regime cannot possibly like us. Nor can the communists in the guise of unionists, pseudeo-unionists in the commumist fronts and their armed supporters."

Worldwide challenge

The challenge facing the labor movement around the globe, he said, is to "direct, with constancy and consistency, our dreams as well as our deeds to the fuller realization of the ideal that every individual member of the family of working men and women may have his or her dignity revered, not the subject of some autocratic or totalitarian state."

Herrera said that he accepted the George Meany award "to honor our common concern for democratic unionism, for democracy," adding that while he would keep the medallion, the $5,000 award which accompanied it "will go into the establishment of a foundation to fund the educational needs of children of martyrs at the altar of free trade unionism in my country."

Previous winners of the Meany award were Lech Walesa and Solidarnosc; Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi, a leader of South Africa's black liberation movement and Dr. Neil Aggett, a white officer of the African Food & Canning Workers who died in a Johannesburg jail; Leo Cherne, chairman of the International Rescue Committee.

Congress asked to bar banks from insurance

Anaheim, Calif.—Legislation is needed to prohibit banks from underwriting and selling insurance, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Citing the potential loss of jobs through the undercutting of the existing insurance agent system, the convention voiced support for legislation to close the "South Dakota loophole," where the state permits its state-chartered banks to engage in financial activities that are forbidden under current federal law.

If the loophole is not closed, the resolution warned, there could be "severe loses of income, and even unemployment, for employees in the insurance industry" and consumers would be deprived of the personal advice and assistance of agents.

Health cuts hit, cost curbs urged

Anaheim, Calif.—While a comprehensive national health care program remains the AFL-CIO's goal, the federation will continue to press for immediate action to control costs and fight cutbacks in existing health services.

The AFL-CIO cited high health care costs, diminishing access to care and uneven quality as firm evidence of the need for a universal health care system. It urged resistance to health care takeaways at the bargaining table, and urged unions to develop improved plans that reduce costs while preserving benefits.

The convention resolution examined the nation's skyrocketing health care bill, noting that more than $1 billion a day is spent on health care in the United States. Public health care programs, including Medicare and Medicaid, consume 12 percent of the federal budget, while the cost of private benefit plans doubles every five years, leading to rapidly increasing premium demands from insurers.

The convention found disturbing that in spite of these outlays, the number of people without health protection is growing rapidly, and includes large numbers of low-wage and jobless workers. Equally disturbing, the delegates found, is the growth of for-profit health care chains, which receive preferential treatment for their capital investment under the current Medicare reimbursement system.

The convention vowed to oppose further cutbacks in Medicare and Medicaid and denounced schemes that would set up individual medical care vouchers or "individual retirement accounts" earmarked for health care. The convention supported "the expansion of Medicare to provide coverage for prescription drugs, long-term care and other essential services."

Cost containment

Specifically, the AFL-CIO called for federal cost-containment legislation to provide across-the-board health care cost containment at the state level while protecting the wages, benefits and other contractual rights of health care workers. The resolution urged that government assistance be made available to public hospitals, particularly inner city hospitals which serve the majority of low-income patients and called for legislation that would ensure that all hospitals do their fair share in providing medical treatment for the indigent.

The convention endorsed efforts to improve living conditions in nursing homes and to assure decent wages and working conditions for nursing home workers.

Speaking in support of the resolution, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney warned that rising costs "threaten access to health care as we know it."

"We know that patients and health care workers are not responsible for rising medical bills," he continued, "we know that most medical care inflation is due to the unchecked competition among providers, growth of profiteering health care corporate empires and misguided federal health policies."

Sweeney urged a unified labor effort to promote cost containment through collective bargaining.

The convention also recommended that:

- The federal government establish an emergency program to give unemployed workers and their families health insurance protection.
- Affiliated unions participate in local coalitions and join with community groups working to control costs and improve quality and guarantee access to health care.

Star-studded labor history

Anaheim, Calif.—An evening with the performing arts, a highlight of the convention, featured labor history readings and union songs.

The event, titled "To Fight, Dream and Organize," was jointly sponsored by the Actors & Artistes and the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. It was a nonstop 90-minute visit with the past, as the words of generations of union leaders were brought to life.

Jessica Walter and J.D. Hall of the Screen Actors presented the hardships and concerns of "The Factory Girls" as described in an 1845 issue of the Pittsburgh Journal.

Former SAG President Ed Asner assumed the role of Eugene Debs, while SAG Vice President Joseph Ruskin gave voice to Samuel Gompers' thoughts on the organizing of the cigarmakers.

Ron Leibman, also a SAG member, performed his famous organizing speech as Reuben Warshovsky from the movie, "Norma Rae." And Norma Connolly, another SAG member, gave vitality to Mother Jones and her organizing efforts among the Mine Workers.

Janet MacLachlan and J.D. Hall, quoting from the documentary film, "Miles of Smiles, Years of Struggle," about the efforts of A. Philip Randolph to organize the Pullman car porters, brought that great cause to life.

Members of the Theatreworkers Project provided a glimpse of the pain of plant-closings, excerpting from "Lady Beth," a show about the closing of the Bethlehem Steel plant in Vernon, Calif.

Si Kahn of the Musicians interspersed a variety of old and new labor songs, ending the show with Solidarity Forever, joined by the entire audience.

Curbs sought on evasion of pre-hire pacts

Anaheim, Calif.—Legislation to curb double-breasted tactics of construction contractors was given a strong endorsement at the AFL-CIO convention.

The labor-backed bill is aimed at contractors who sign standard pre-hire union agreements but then set up non-union subsidiaries that pay lower wages, provide inferior benefits and disregard labor standards.

As approved by the House Education & Labor Committee last summer, it specifies that a pre-hire agreement will be binding on all of an employer's operations unless workers vote to decertify a union. Rep. William L. Clay (D-Mo.) is a principal sponsor.

Its enactment is essential to preserve the collective bargaining structure of the construction industry, the resolution declared.

With the approval of the National Labor Relations Board, the resolution noted, double-breasted contractors have been able to avoid their collective bargaining obligations and deprive workers of their rights.

The convention also reaffirmed AFL-CIO support for common site picketing legislation that would allow a building trades union with a dispute against a subcontractor to picket at the job site as workers and unions in other industries can do.

The legislation is needed to overcome a Supreme Court ruling that restricted picketing rights at construction sites used by more than one employer.

Memorial honoring FDR proposed by convention

Anaheim, Calif.—President Franklin D. Roosevelt restored hope to America with the New Deal and should be honored with a monument in the nation's capital, the convention urged.

It adopted a resolution calling on the AFL-CIO to seek action by Congress to honor FDR's "contribution to the welfare of our nation."

Public workers given support on retention of jobs

Anaheim, Calif.—Government workers received the backing of the AFL-CIO against Reagan Administration moves to contract out work traditionally performed by government employees and against the "privatization" of governmental services, including the postal system.

The AFL-CIO position, reiterated by the convention, is that public work normally performed by public employees should continue to be performed by them. Likewise, work traditionally done by private-sector workers, should continue to be performed by private employees.

Charles W. Carter, a delegate from the Government Employees, told the convention that under Reagan "a group of carpet baggers has descended on Washington" in search of lucrative contracts, often "peddling scab labor."

A convention resolution called on the Executive Council to establish "a union committee on contracting out." The committee would examine the impact of contracting decisions on the workforce and on the quality and efficiency of services and products.

The convention also expressed the AFL-CIO's opposition to attempts to repeal the Private Express Statutes, which it noted "guarantee first-class mail delivery at universal rates" to all locations.

Congress urged to pass curbs on lie detectors

Anaheim Calif.—Legislation to bar employers from using so-called lie detectors received a strong convention endorsement.

Polygraph devices, the resolution noted, have been used to intimidate workers and to pry into their personal life and union sympathies.

The convention urged Congress to act promptly on a bill by Rep. Pat Williams (D-Mont.) that was recently approved by the House Education & Labor Committee.

Erosion of America's industrial base leaves deficits in jobs, trade, fairness

Anaheim, Calif.—The Reagan Administration's "unfair, anti-worker, anti-union, pro-business, anti-people economic and social policies" were strongly condemned by the AFL-CIO convention as it called for policies to rebuild America's eroding industrial base.

The Administration's "economic and social mismanagement" has created "four key deficits"—in jobs, fairness, the federal budget and trade—delegates said. They pledged labor's commitment to improve the health and diversity of the American economy, assure expanded job opportunities and strengthen social justice.

Even as the convention was calling for sweeping action to "lay the foundation for economic and social progress," the Labor Dept. reported that unemployment in October remained stuck at the 7.1 percent level, unchanged from the previous month.

The convention gave this gloomy assessment of the Administration's "regressive" economic policies:

The Jobs Deficit—Persistent and excessively high unemployment has been fueled by cutbacks in jobs and training programs, "unbalanced" fiscal and monetary policies and an "unrealistic approach to trade problems." As a result, 22 to 26 million American workers and their families lost jobs and income in each of the past five years.

The Fairness Deficit—This is the result of "help-the-rich, help-big-business" tax policies, compounded by assaults on protections for the jobless, social security and Medicare, education, consumer and environmental safeguards, consumer protection and equal opportunity.

The Budget Deficit—The deficit has more than doubled since Reagan took office, rising from $914 billion to over $2 trillion, because of "huge, irresponsible and unfair Reagan tax cuts that gave peanuts and crumbs to low- and middle-income families but opened more loopholes for big business, corporations and wealthy individuals to avoid their fair share of the tax burden."

The Trade Deficit—It has reached "crisis proportions" because of the Administration's "dream-world belief in mythical free markets and in an illusory free-trade theory." At the same time, the overvaluation of the American dollar has pushed up the price of exports while opening the door to a flood of imports. The result has been the loss of some 3 million American jobs to predatory foreign competition.

Declaring that "unemployment generates tremendous economic and social losses, not only in lost production but also in unpaid taxes and extra welfare and unemployment compensation payments" as well as "physical and mental illness, family breakdown, social alienation and crime," delegates put their unanimous stamp of approval on a national industrial policy that would:

- Bring labor, industry, government and public interest groups together in a formal strategy council to map ways to revitalize the industrial sector.
- Require firms benefitting from assistance to commit themselves to respecting workers' rights and to adhere to equal opportunity, occupational safety and health, and environmental standards.
- Encourages management, government and labor to contribute to the revitalization of all industries, rather than promoting "one kind of industry at the expense of others."
- Establish a national industrial development bank to finance loans and loan guarantees to support agreed-upon industrial investment and modernization programs.
- Provide a framework for overhauling and coordinating tax, trade, interest rate, job training and other policies to encourage productive investment at home rather than abroad, to create a diversified industrial base and prevent injury to domestic producers, to bring interest rates down to within reach of the consumer and growth-minded industries, and to provide "decent economic opportunities for all Americans."

During debate on the resolution, President James E. Hatfield of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers accused the Reagan Administration of having "bastardized the system of corporate mergers," which has led to the subsequent shutdown of economically viable firms.

The system is being used "to make the rich a hell of a lot richer and make a lot of people suffer," Hatfield said. Mergers don't "create one new job," he insisted; instead, they provide tax writeoffs for the corporate raiders "at the expense of the working people."

Accusing President Reagan of being responsible for the "disgrace" of corporate mergers, the GPPAW president called for strengthening securities and anti-trust laws to "protect workers, consumers and local communities."

To keep pace

President Howard Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. told delegates a broad-based industrial policy is vital if America is to keep pace with other countries which long ago adopted similar programs.

Adoption of the policy position recommended by the convention, Samuel said, will make it possible to "compete in the global marketplace" and protect workers and communities against the losses that come when American firms move their operations to low-wage countries.

The resolution focused attention on the plant-closing issue, calling for legislation to require advance notice to unions and communities and to remove tax incentives which encourage businesses to shut down. Such legislation should "protect workers' health and pension rights, provide training for dislocated workers," and provide other safeguards for workers and communities.

Campaign for women's rights gains momentum

By Candice Johnson

Anaheim, Calif.—America's unions will aggressively fight discrimination against women and will pursue affirmative action, pay equity, equal opportunity and other remedies to help women workers break down barriers, the convention declared.

The convention resolution stressed that "there is still much needed legislation to promote and achieve women's rights," and advocated federal laws which would:

- Prohibit discrimination in insurance and pensions.
- Improve women's standing under social security.
- Provide better protection for women in private and civil service pension plans.
- Maintain and improve child care tax credits.
- Improve child support enforcement.
- Increase funding for Title XX day care services and for the Work Incentive Program to enable poor women to become self-supporting.
- Restore funds to Aid to Families with Dependent Children, food stamps, Medicaid and other programs where Reagan Administration cuts have severely harmed women.

The resolution urged women union members to participate fully in the activities of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and their unions and pledged the federation's support "to change laws, policies, institutions and attitudes to bring about equity and justice for all."

The measure also reaffirmed labor's support for a federal Equal Rights Amendment.

In speaking for the resolution, AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller said reports of the gains women have made in the workplace stand "in sharp contrast" to the reality of working women's lives. Women earn 65 cents for every dollar earned by a man, she noted, and "two out of three working women are still concentrated in low-paying, dead-end, low-status jobs."

Family responsibilities

Miller, a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers and president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, stressed that the worlds of work and family are one and the same for millions of working women, with 52 percent of women with preschool children in the workforce and 10 million women the sole support of their families.

"We must address the problems of the millions of unorganized women of this country," she said, "to show working women through words and deeds that the path to equality is through a union contract."

Communications Workers President Morton Bahr applauded the convention's assertion that the concept of family is a trade union issue. Noting that some anti-union elements have altered the idea of family to fit a narrow-minded political agenda, Bahr stressed that "from the beginning, unions have bettered the lives of workers and their families. The broader challenge for us is to reclaim our role and translate those ideas into concrete improvements in the lives of women workers and their families."

In other action, the AFL-CIO pledged to continue its efforts to achieve pay equity for women through collective bargaining, noting the success of many AFL-CIO unions in winning back pay and compensation for women and minority workers who have been the victims of wage discrimination. It pointed out that unions have successfully bargained for joint union-management pay equity studies, elimination of sex- or race-based job titles, elimination of entry barriers to better-paying jobs, and the reform of job classification procedures.

The convention also urged participation with women's and civil rights organizations to address wage discrimination through litigation, legislative remedies and other appropriate activities.

Connecticut delegate John Driscoll termed pay equity for women workers a valuable organizing tool. He cited the successful organizing drive at Yale University by the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, where pay equity was a primary concern.

Delegates from the Service Employees and State, County & Municipal Employees spoke in support of the measure, citing accomplishments of their unions in winning pay equity through legal action, state legislation and collective bargaining.

Significant change

The AFL-CIO urged affiliated unions to continue their efforts in forming and supporting local union women's committees, and pledged to provide those committees resources and materials on working women's special concerns. The convention also voted to seek legislation establishing an annual Women's History Month.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council report found that the increase in the number of working women was "the most significant change in the U.S. workforce over the past 40 years."

"Bringing women workers the benefit of a collective bargaining agreement rates high on the labor movement agenda, as does full participation by women unionists in all aspects of the trade union movement," the report stressed.

Delegates press for cleanup of nation's toxic waste sites

Anaheim, Calif.—Environmental legislation to prevent chemical accidents, increase funding for toxic waste dump cleanup and construction of wastewater treatment plants, and provide strict enforcement of existing regulations was urged in a series of convention resolutions.

Delegates also called on the Environmental Protection Agency to issue regulations on asbestos that require inspection of all public or commercial buildings and abatement of hazardous asbestos situations. In the absence of EPA action, Congress should consider legislation on asbestos, the AFL-CIO said.

Congress should continue to appropriate money for grants or loans to school systems to aid in asbestos abatement efforts and state governments were encouraged to continue their efforts at requiring inspections and abatement of asbestos hazards in buildings.

Noting that a "clean, healthy environment" is essential to maintain the quality of American life, convention delegates noted their alarm over the chemical accident in Bhopal, India, last December which killed more than 2,500 persons.

In a resolution, the convention urged the setting of emission standards for hazardous chemicals, and the monitoring and reporting of those emissions. For the more hazardous chemicals, the convention suggested safety performance standards for the equipment used in manufacturing the chemicals.

Right-to-know legislation was also recommended to require companies to make information available to communities about the chemicals used, produced or stored at company facilities and the dangers they pose.

Congress was urged to provide $10 billion to the Superfund for toxic waste dump cleanup, to order the Environmental Protection Agency to set mandatory cleanup schedules, to provide for adequate safety and health protections for workers doing the cleanup, and to provide for "effective redress and compensation for victims who suffer harmful effects from exposure to hazardous substances."

Strict enforcement of existing laws was sought to protect the public from the dangers of pesticides and toxic substances.

The convention also urged increased funding for wastewater treatment plants and opposed efforts to reduce federal spending for acquisition of land for parks and recreation, as well as the increase in user fees.

Attacks on the protections afforded under existing environmental laws, such as the Clean Air Act, were opposed.

The AFL-CIO urged expansion of recycling programs as an "effective alternative to legislation at any government level to restrict or prohibit the use of non-returnable beverage containers."

Renewed support given Phelps Dodge strikers

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO convention pledged labor's continued solidarity with the 2,400 members of 12 affiliated unions in their long strike against Phelps Dodge copper mines and smelters in Arizona.

Noting that the walkout began on July 1, 1983, delegates adopted a resolution accusing the company of having "prolonged the strike in an attempt to break the unions."

The convention noted with approval the action taken by the unions in forming a Phelps Dodge Task Force "to conduct a corporate campaign against the company," and promised the backing of the entire labor movement for this effort.

Unions to bolster diabetes fund

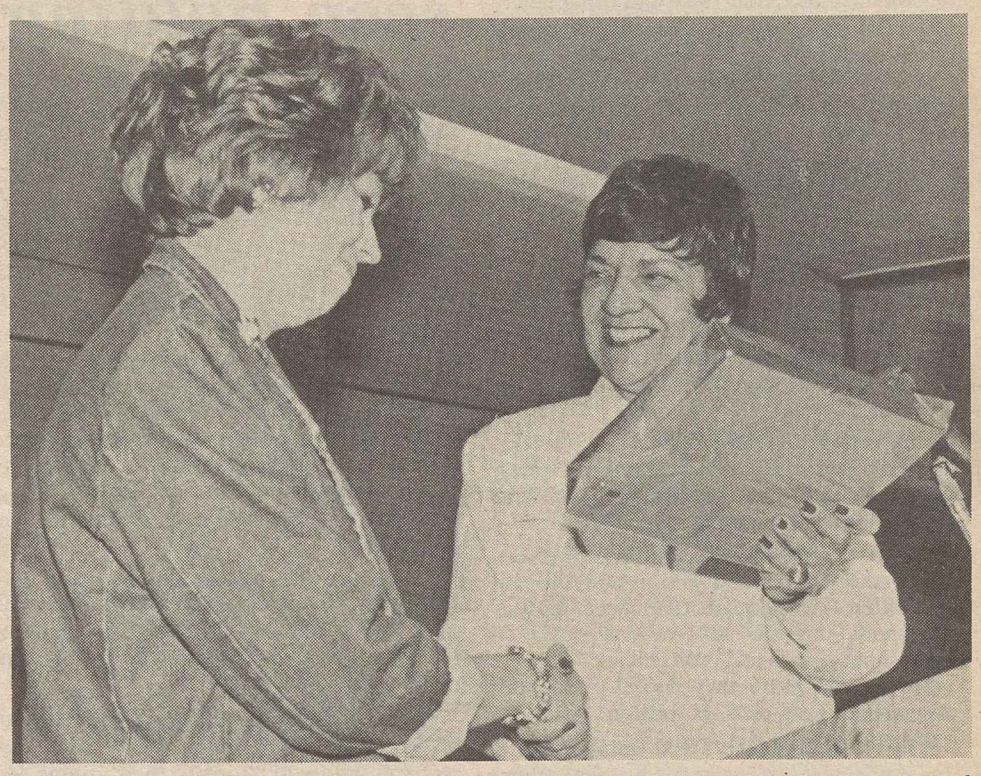
Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO pledged to help raise "desperately needed funds for the advancement of a cure for diabetes, the nation's third most deadly disease.

Convention delegates noted in a resolution that 12 million Americans have diabetes and 35,000 annually lose their sight to the disease, which also contributes to heart failure, kidney disease and amputation.



The resolution pointed to the efforts of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to raise $7 million to construct a Diabetes Research Institute at the University of Miami School of Medicine. The BCTD's fund-raising campaign is called "Blueprint for Cure."

The delegates adopted the resolution after seeing a short film on diabetes showing how devastating the disease can be. In the film was a 22-year-old woman made blind by the disease, a six-year-old girl who has had diabetes for a third of her life and a youth on a kidney dialysis machine who may eventually develop diabetes.

Delegate Gordon Brock of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers related to the delegates the hardship of being a diabetic and urged passage of the resolution. So did California AFL-CIO President Albin Gruhn who told of the impact of this disease on his granddaughter.

AFL-CIO Vice President Patrick J. Campbell, president of the Carpenters, said the BCTD's program aims to "build a building where we can bring the greatest and the best brains in research to one central place."

BCTD President Robert Georgine, a newly elected AFL-CIO vice president, urged the delegates to get each of their union's members to contribute $1 to this program.

CLUW steps up recruiting to reinforce drive for goals

Anaheim, Calif.—The Coalition of Labor Union Women has launched a nationwide membership drive to heighten public awareness of working women's concerns and increase CLUW's effectiveness.

CLUW President Joyce Miller announced the membership campaign as "a call to action to adapt our unions, our workplaces and the national policies of this country to a new generation of workers."

Miller, an AFL-CIO Vice President, said while CLUW was unable to match the financial resources or public relations efforts of the Reagan Administration, "we can get working women's stories out to counter the rhetoric and falsehoods about working women. We must tell our story every single day if we are to put to rest the myths and stereotypes that keep working women undervalued, underpaid and discriminated against in every way."

She stressed that CLUW members were especially qualified to "tell the story of what a union contract means to each of us as working women unionists."

Miller outlined the recruitment campaign, which will include local activities across the country, articles in union publications, media interviews with local union officers and public service announcements.

Miller also announced CLUW's plans for a national "Working Women's Awareness Week," beginning May 4, 1986, to focus public attention on working women's concerns, including pay equity, child care and affirmative action. CLUW chapters will be sponsoring film festivals, exhibits and other local events acknowledging working women's contributions.

The week-long celebration will follow CLUW's national conference on older and retired women workers.

CLUW, founded in 1974, has 18,000 members representing 59 international unions in 75 local chapters across the country.

Labor's grass-roots lobbyists praised

Anaheim, Calif.—Involving union members as grass-roots lobbyists is the best way to make labor's voice heard in Congress and in the legislatures, the AFL-CIO said.

A convention resolution praised the Legislative Action Committee network that has been set up in a number of congressional districts and urged its expansion.

"The continuing success of this program demands the fullest cooperation of the state and local central bodies and their local union affiliates," the resolution urged.

It noted that the success of the congressional lobbying program has led many unions and state bodies to launch similar grass-roots efforts.

The convention suggested that the Labor Institute of Public Affairs and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education provide training programs on grass-roots lobbying.

Strong rules urged to save pension plans

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO convention sharply criticized both the Administration and Congress for failing to come to grips with "a wide range of important pension issues essential to improving the retirement income protection" of workers in the private and public sectors.

Delegates scored the growing management trend toward terminating so-called "overfunded" pension plans to recapture, "for the employers' exclusive benefit," what corporations claim are "excess assets."

Congressional action is needed to halt this practice of "diverting pension fund assets to corporate purposes," a convention resolution said, because it is placing "the retirement security of thousands of Americans in jeopardy."

In public employment, the convention said, current pension programs are "inadequate" and only federal legislation can guarantee state and local government workers retirement protection "comparable to that given employees in private industry."

At the same time, the resolution noted that legislation enacted in 1983 will bring newly hired federal employees under social security for the first time. It supported the position of federal employee unions that the supplemental system being devised should, in tandem with social security, provide benefit levels comparable to those of the existing civil service retirement system.

'Disincentives' needed

The convention took a close look at the government-operated Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. and concluded that its single-employer termination insurance program has liabilities that "greatly exceed its current assets."

The resolution urged that employers' premium rates be increased and that "strong disincentives" be enacted to prevent wholesale terminations.

As far as state and local public employees are concerned, the convention said, current regulation is inadequate and federal legislation should provide "long-needed protection against the abuses and deficiencies" of those who run the more than 6,000 plans with assets in excess of $250 billion.

"No comprehensive and uniform set of legal principles exists to adequately regulate state and local government plans," the convention said. Workers who "are directly affected by public pension decisions are rarely involved in the decision-making process."

Pledge to Liberty

Anaheim, Calif.—Recognizing the Statue of Liberty as "a symbol of a nation built by working people of all races, creeds and nationalities," the AFL-CIO pledged support for the restoration projects under way on the monument and on Ellis Island, where millions of immigrants entered America.

The resolution urged affiliated unions to participate in fund-raising efforts and develop special activities to celebrate the statue's centennial in 1986.

Labor supporters have contributed more than $130,000 to the drive, with contributions from local unions, state labor federations and international unions.

The convention also called for the federation to step up its education programs to better inform the public about the valuable contributions of immigrant workers and organized labor's role in improving the lives of working Americans.

The restoration projects offer an opportunity "to educate America to the great contribution the American labor movement has made in building this country and bringing a measure of freedom and justice, not only in the workplace, but in the country as a whole," said Sec.-Treas. Jay Mazur of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

On Liberty Island, union crews have been working around-the-clock, six days a week to complete repairs in time for the monument's 100th anniversary celebration in 1986.

Labor's outreach initiative seen holding broad appeal

Anaheim, Calif.—Through their unions, American workers will win "a fair share of the benefits and a full voice in shaping their future," Missouri's Democratic Lt. Gov. Harriett Woods predicted.

Woods hailed the convention's decision to use new and innovative organizing techniques to reach the millions of still-unorganized workers, calling the decision "forward-looking and future-looking."

The federation's work in keeping in touch with the "common sense and the concerns of the people at the grassroots" is vital, Woods said, because in this era when workers are better educated and a little more skeptical than at any time in history, "they want more of a voice in their jobs and in their unions."

These are the people, Woods told the delegates, who understand that in the words of Solidarity Forever, people can achieve more together "than the feeble strength of one."

She noted that a key organizing target will be service jobs predominantly held by women, who will "look to their unions for role models, people they can relate to," union leaders who understand their needs.

"They need to see that the union is a place where they can speak out, to better their working conditions and achieve their goals," she stressed.

Harriett Woods

Woods cited polls which show that 75 percent of workers, organized and unorganized, agree that unions can improve their wages and working conditions, and 80 percent are confident that unions will protect their rights.

Woods acknowledged that labor has "an image problem, because people are afraid and think they are not going to benefit," but she expressed confidence that it can be offset by the AFL-CIO's stepped-up organizing drives and grass-roots campaigns.

Attempts to blame U.S. wages for lack of American competitiveness can't hold up under close scrutiny, she said.

"When labor asks for a piece of the pie, it's not trying to take away something from others, but rather to create a bigger pie for everyone," Woods said, noting this is in sharp contrast to narrow special interests who would take away benefits and insist that "we have to have less and must fight over the scraps."

Woods was elected Missouri's Lt. Governor in 1984 and is the highest ranking Democrat in the state. She is a former member and shop steward of Newspaper Guild Local 47 in St. Louis.

Wright vows to battle for benefits, jobs

Anaheim, Calif.—A two-pronged pledge to American workers—to protect their fringe benefits from taxation and their jobs from unbridled foreign competition—was brought to the AFL-CIO convention by Rep. Jim Writght (D-Tex.).

Wright said that the House of Representatives, which he described as "the last remaining bastion of democracy in this embattled government of ours," would resist Reagan Administration attempts to levy new tax burdens on "the hard-won benefits workers have gained through their unions."

Delegates thundered their applause as the House majority leader declared:

"As long as there are 65 major corporations in this country which among them accumulated total profits of more than $50 billion in the last three years and paid no taxes at all, we are just not going to vote to put taxes on the fringe benefits of labor contracts."

Wright sharply criticized the Administration for trying to "shrink, stifle and starve" the domestic portion of the federal budget while continuing its unbridled defense spending.

Industrial base needed

"National security is not just a matter of so many weapons, so many missiles in the ground, so many rounds of ammunition," he said. "National security depends upon an industrial base here in America. National security depends upon education of America's children. National security depends upon a workforce that's employed."

The Administration, he said, is guilty of "a tragic rerun of the thinking processes" of the Coolidge and Hoover Administrations, which has brought about the current economic decline.

"This past year," Wright told delegates, "we have seen more home and farm foreclosures than in any year since the Great Depression. We've seen more bank failures already this year than in any year since the Great Depression. We have seen more small business bankruptcies than in any year since the 1930s."

The erosion of the American industrial base hits all sections of the country and all segments of the economy, Wright said.

"It isn't just the old rust belt," he declared, "it's the sun belt. It isn't just heavy industry, it's the high-tech industry," adding that unless the trend is reversed the nation faces "recolonization and de-industrialization."

Jim Wright

Workers need greater role in pension fund investments

Anaheim, Calif.—Pension fund assets exceed $600 billion and represent the "largest pool of capital in the U.S. economy today," the AFL-CIO convention declared, as it called for an enlarged labor role in the management of these funds.

"The prudent investment of pension funds to better the life of the nation's workers is not only proper, it is essential," delegates asserted. "The pension plans covering union members have originated almost exclusively through the collective bargaining process and represent capital generated by the labor of working people."

Not all of this deferred compensation is "invested in ways that will benefit our members," the convention said, largely because most AFL-CIO unions do not have a voice in the investment decisions.

In approving a series of resolutions, the convention urged affiliates to:

- Gain access to the decision-making process in their role as collective bargaining agents.
- Encourage pension funds to exercise their shareholder rights as part of larger campaigns to advance worker interests in the areas of collective bargaining, occupational health and safety, plant closings and in support of labor's effort to force South Africa to abandon its policy of apartheid.
- Support the efforts of public employee unions to have state and local government pension funds invested in ways that will strengthen local economies and provide affordable housing.
- Conduct information and training programs for union pension fund trustees to make them aware of the findings and recommendations of the AFL-CIO Committee on Investment of Union Pension Funds and to share strategies, research and investment mechanisms developed by other unions.
- Use the AFL-CIO Housing Investment Trust and other vehicles to direct pension investment toward union-built construction.

Affiliates have already put over $120 million into the Housing Investment Trust, delegates noted, and thus have played "an important role in providing competitive investment yields for unions and pension funds while creating union jobs and providing American families with home financing."

Medical care safeguards backed for flight attendants

Anaheim, Calif.—Legislation now before the House of Representatives to require improved medical kits on commercial aircraft and liability coverage of flight attendants was supported by the AFL-CIO convention.

In a resolution, the delegates noted that flight attendants are often called upon in emergencies to administer first aid and that it would be "unreasonable to hold them liable for such care." The resolution noted that such a move would be in the best interest of the traveling public.

Effective consumer protection termed vital

Anaheim, Calif.— Consumers have a right to honest and adequate information about the products they purchase, the AFL-CIO said.

The convention's consumer rights resolution called also for fair terms of credit and insurance contracts, protection against unfair monopoly pricing, and both safeguards and redress against dangerous and defective products.

The federation also averred its continued opposition to the "unwarranted powers" the Office of Management & Budget has claimed for itself "to interfere with agency rulemaking to the detriment of consumers and in behalf of the Administration's business allies."

The Reagan Administration's deregulatory efforts will also be opposed when they enable business to escape its responsibilities to consumers, the convention warned.

The delegates voiced their support for adequate staffing and budgets for consumer agencies and called for assurances that these agencies will act with "independence and integrity in advancing and protecting the consumer interest.

End of double-standard on income pressed in program for tax justice

Anaheim, Calif.—Labor's program for tax justice called for plugging the gaping loopholes in the federal tax structure and ending a double-standard that taxes workers' wages at higher rates than unearned income from investments and interest.

It called on Congress to reject proposed "reforms" that would create new inequities by taxing workers on the value of their health insurance and other employer-provided benefits.

The resolution adopted by the convention was highlighted by a floor discusssion that pointed up areas of special labor concerns.

Victor Gotbaum, who heads the New York City district council of the State, County & Municipal Employees, and New York State AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary both spoke with concern of the damage to public services from disallowing state and local taxes as deduction on federal income tax. It would hit residents of the state with an average 18 percent increase in their federal tax bill, Cleary said.

Page Groton of the Boilermakers and Francis Frost of the Professional & Technical Engineers noted that threats to union-won job benefits are being paraded as "tax reform."

Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn and Ron Richardson of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees cited the tax avoidance record of big and hugely profitable corporations and the greed of the business community for still more loopholes.

Machinists President William W. Winpisinger contrasted the big tax break the Administration plan would give to people in President Reagan's income bracket with the tax increase that would hit an IAM member, with a working spouse, one child, buying a home and earning a combined income of $35,000. Their tax bill would go up 20 percent, he said.

'Escape hatches' hit

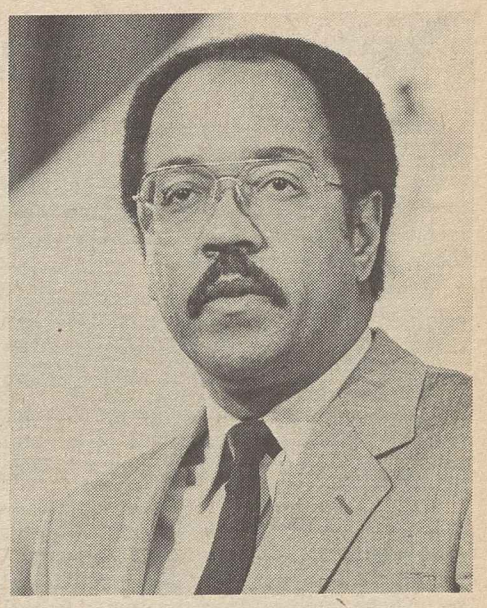
The convention resolution called for reinstatement of the corporate income tax as a principle source of revenue and elimination of "so-called incentives that subsidize mergers, takeovers, plant shutdowns, overseas investments and other activities that conflict with the national interest."



A goal of tax reform, the convention urged, should be to exclude the poor from taxation, assure that workers "pay no more and no less than their fair share," and close "escape hatches for the wealthy."

The resolution expressed concern that "the federal income tax structure has drifted further and further away from the principle of ability to pay." It noted that unearned income can be sheltered from taxation "through phantom deductions, capital gains exclusions, phony leases and overseas investments." But working men and women "pay the lion's share of taxes" and have their tax deducted from their paychecks.

Health insurance provided as part of employment is the alternative in the United States to the extensive government-funded benefits available in nearly every other industrial country, the resolution noted.

The consequences of the Reagan deficits will surely "force Congress to come to grips with the need to increase revenues," the convention agreed. But while the AFL-CIO will work with Congress to assure that any new taxes are equitable, it considered a value-added tax and other forms of sales taxes basically unfair. They "violate the fundamental principle of ability to pay," the resolution affirmed.

A separate resolution noted the special travel and transportation expenses incurred by construction workers forced to travel to distant job sites or rent temporary quarters. It endorsed legislation to make such expenses tax deductible.

William Gray

Budget chairman sees Senate plan as 'bill of goods'

Anaheim, Calif.—The Senate-passed Gramm-Rudman plan to force a balanced budget through mandatory spending cuts is a "doomsday machine" that would guarantee that recessions are turned into depressions, House Budget Committee Chairman William Gray (D-Pa.) charged.

"We're drowning in a sea of red ink" created by the Reagan Administration's economic policies, Gray told the delegates. But he warned that "anybody who tells you that you're going to have a balanced budget simply by cutting spending is selling you a bill of goods."

Because of the $2 trillion national debt, there will have to be some spending cuts, he said. But "let's make sure that the cuts are equitable and fair."

President Reagan will have to be told to put his "veto gun back in the holster," Gray said, and accept the fact that revenues will have to be raised through the tax structure.

Gray noted that the Senate measure wouldn't start the painful process of mandatory spending cuts until after the next congressional election. He suggested that's like telling a terminally ill patient, "I've got just the medicine to cure you, but don't take it now. Wait a year to take it."

The convention's response to Gray's speech—apart from an ovation—was prompt passage of a resolution spelling out the dangers of the Gramm-Rudman budget plan and calling on the House-Senate conference to reject it.

"Labor is under attack by the Reagan Administration," Gray noted. He cited Republican efforts in Congress to abolish the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and attempts "to knock out the pay floor by creating a subminimum wage for youth."

Gray termed the Administration's fiscal policy "the greatest threat" to jobs and prosperity. The dangerous deficit growth, he stressed has come through "massive tax cuts for the rich" and the "monumental increases in domestic spending."

Support pledged for museum to recall Holocaust

Anaheim, Calif.—To assure that the world "never forgets the unmatched evil" of Nazism, with its "state-ordered murder" of 6 million Jews and millions of others, among them many trade unionists, the AFL-CIO convention urged affiliates and individual members to contribute to the construction of the U.S. Holocaust Museum in Washington, D.C.

Congress donated land on the Mall in Washington as the site for the museum, but required that its $100 million construction and operating budget come from private sources.

With the museum scheduled to open in early 1989, the convention called on affiliates to give "wholehearted support" by contributing funds and encouraging local unions and members to make donations.

The record of the American labor movement in fighting anti-semitism is "without parallel," the resolution said, and the role it played in the "dark days" of World War II "is one of which all trade unionists today can be proud."

From the first days of Hitler's rise to power, it went on, "throughout the years of war and the horror of the holocaust," the American movement "repeatedly and vigorously condemned the Nazi persecution of the Jews along with their violent suppression of free German trade unions."

Union resources, volunteers termed vital to communities

Anaheim, Calif.—Trade union resources are a vital part of community efforts to provide an underpinning for workers and their families hard hit by unemployment and changing manpower trends, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

A resolution dealing with labor's role in the community called for concerted action to aid those who are "not yet back at work, or at work in jobs which won't support the living standards of the past."

Among programs "aimed at meeting basic human needs," the convention said, are food banks and feeding programs, emergency shelter and mortgage assistance, and alternative health care delivery projects.

The resolution urged local central bodies to recruit volunteers among the retired, disabled and unemployed to serve as union counselors in cooperation with the federation's Dept. of Community Services in providing "linkage between union members in need and available services and assistance."

At the same time, delegates called on affiliates to organize retired members and staff "to continue the bonds and benefits of association" with the labor movement. Establishment of such on-going working relationships, the resolution said, would emphasize "the need for communication and collaboration among all individuals with common concerns."

The convention also reaffirmed labor's long-standing relationship with the United Way, Red Cross and Boy Scouts, declaring that through these agencies, "the energy and experience of union men and women can contribute to community well-being."

Federal Reserve's tight money policy hit

Anaheim, Calif.—Another recession looms unless the United States "aggressively pursues" economic growth policies, the AFL-CIO convention warned.

The Federal Reserve Board must ease its tight money policies, delegates agreed, "to bring interest rates down and reverse the drift toward economic recession which would cause the budget deficit and the federal debt" to soar to new record highs.

The resolution called on Congress to enact standby credit control authority, so that "selective credit regulation" could be imposed "to call off an overheated economy, instead of placing sole reliance upon tight-money, high interest rate policies."

The convention urged restructuring of the Fed to include representatives of labor, agriculture, small business and consumers; making the term of the board chairman coincide with that of the President, and abolishing the Federal Open Market Committee by turning its functions over to the full board.

Prevailing wage laws still essential to workers

Anaheim, Calif.—A broad array of federal programs enacted over the years to safeguard the rights of workers should remain in place and, where necessary, be improved to guarantee both jobs and purchasing power, delegates to the AFL-CIO convention said.

"The protections American workers have possessed for decades under the Davis-Bacon Act, Service Contract Act, Walsh-Healey Act and Fair Labor Standards Act should be restored" by Congress and the Administration, delegates agreed.

The minimum wage should be "restored to its prior purchasing power" of 60 percent of average hourly earnings in the private sector, a convention resolution said, and should be indexed annually to keep it at that level.

The resolution called for a staged reduction of the workweek to 35 hours to open up employment opportunities for the 8.3 million workers now seeking jobs, the 5.3 million who cannot find full-time work, and the 1.2 million discouraged who have quit looking for jobs.

Such a move, the resolution continued, would be of particular help to millions of young workers who are finding it hard to "get a decent start and experience."

At the same time, the convention called for pushing the overtime premium to three times the hourly rate, pointing out that the present time-and-one-half provision which has been in effect for 47 years "does not discourage regularly scheduled overtime" and compels many to "work long hours, even weekends and holidays, while others are unemployed."

Delegates pledged to fight current moves to remove state and local public employees from the wage-hour protections of the law. Earlier this year the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of covering public employees under FLSA, but efforts are afoot in Congress to take away these safeguards.

With respect to the other labor standards measures, the convention had this to say:

Davis-Bacon—The purpose of this legislation was to ensure that workers on federally funded construction projects receive "a fair day's pay for a fair day's work," so that these benefits would not be jeopardized by cost-cutting contractors. Similar prevailing wage laws have been enacted in most states.

For the past several years, the Business Roundtable, the Associated Builders & Contractors, the Chamber of Commerce and other right-wing forces have been running a "sophisticated, well-funded lobbying and public relations campaign" for repeal of the federal and state statutes.

The convention pledged to fight these efforts, as well as attempts by the Labor Dept. to "cripple" the effectiveness of the law through wholesale exemptions to contractors who pay substandard wages under the "fiction" that many of the workers are "merely helpers."

Service Contract—Like Davis-Bacon, this law was designed to guarantee that "government contracts are won on the basis of skill and efficiency, rather than on the basis of substandard wages and exploitation of workers."

Anti-worker forces have won regulatory changes denying protection to a substantial number of workers formerly covered by the act, funneling many contracts to low-wage areas and depriving unionized service contract workers of their right to collectively bargained wages and fringe benefits.

The convention called for an all-out effort before federal agencies, in the courts and in Congress to preserve what it said was "an integral part of the remedial labor legislation of our nation."

Walsh-Healey—Enacted in 1936, the law requires government contractors to pay no less than the prevailing minimum wage and observe the eight-hour day and the 40-hour week.

Under legislation now pending in Congress, union contractors would continue to be held to the provisions of their collective bargaining agreements, but non-union contractors would not be bound by the present requirements of the law.

Delegates pledged the AFL-CIO's opposition to any efforts to either eliminate the law in its entirety or to limit its scope.

To strengthen enforcement of all of the labor standards legislation, the AFL-CIO urged the Labor Dept. to restore the enforcement officer positions dropped under the Reagan Administration's retrenchment policies between 1981 and 1985.

New social security campaign seeks improvements

Anaheim, Calif.—Organized labor, having fought the battles to keep the nation's social security system fiscally sound, will now renew its efforts "to complete the structure which was begun a half-century ago," the AFL-CIO pledged.

Now "is the time to turn our attention to efforts to improve and strengthen the protection social security provides for all Americans," a convention resolution urged.

The convention condemned the Administration's multi-pronged assault on the program, pointing to the President's broken campaign promises.

Social security is "a self-financed program paid for by workers and employers," the convention said as it demanded social security be removed from the unified federal budget and made an independent agency "free from the pressures of political appointees."

The federation "strongly supports repeal of the retirement age increases legislated for the next century." Calling the increase "bad social policy," the delegates pointed out that it will amount to a future benefit cut for today's younger workers and will aggravate unemployment for tomorrow's youth.

Undermining progress

In addition, increasing the retirement age undermines decades of progress made in negotiating early retirement programs "designed to meet the twin goals of a dignified retirement for the older worker and a job opportunity for the younger worker," the resolution said.

The AFL-CIO urged further that partial general revenue financing be introduced into the social security program to provide relief for low- and middle-income workers. The resolution noted "such financing was anticipated by the founders of the system and is to be found in practically all industrialized countries."

The system also should be modified to more equitably provide income protection for women, the delegates stressed. "We support the concept of earnings sharing which recognizes marriage as an economic partnership and accords to each marriage partner the right to retirement income based on half the total retirement credits earned by a couple during their marriage."

The resolution expressed dismay over the Reagan Administration's "capricious" purging from the rolls of tens of thousands of disabled beneficiaries. It said the federation, in cooperation with other organizations, will "monitor the implementation of the Disability Reform Act and, if necessary, will seek additional action by Congress to insure that the Administration carries out both the letter and spirit of the new law."

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, told the delegates, "We need this resolution to boost our morale, to remind us of trade union responsibilities and to let all America know we know a villainous behavior in the White House when we see it."

Attack on benefits

President Reagan has turned the "power of the government against the benefits for the aging millions of Americans," Henning said.

AFL-CIO Vice President Owen Bieber, head of the Auto Workers, declared that the "callous attitude" of the Reagan Administration is evident in its disregard for campaign promises on social security and in its "sneak attack on tens of thousands of disabled persons covered by the social security system."

Federal action urged to curb foreign firms' union-busting

Anaheim, Calif.—Although the AFL-CIO welcomes investments in the American economy by "responsible foreign-based firms," these companies must be compelled to operate "within the context of American labor law," the convention declared.

Delegates condemned the "anti-unionism" of BASF Corp. and Heidelberger Zement, both of West Germany, Kawasaki Motors of Japan, and LaFarge-Coppee of France, pointing out that they oppose trade unionism in their American operations even though they have "long-standing collective bargaining relationships" with unions in their own countries.

The convention singled out BASF for particular criticism, noting that it has taken "extraordinary measures to rid itself of labor unions" in this country and has tried to extract "devastating concessions from those units that resist union decertification efforts."

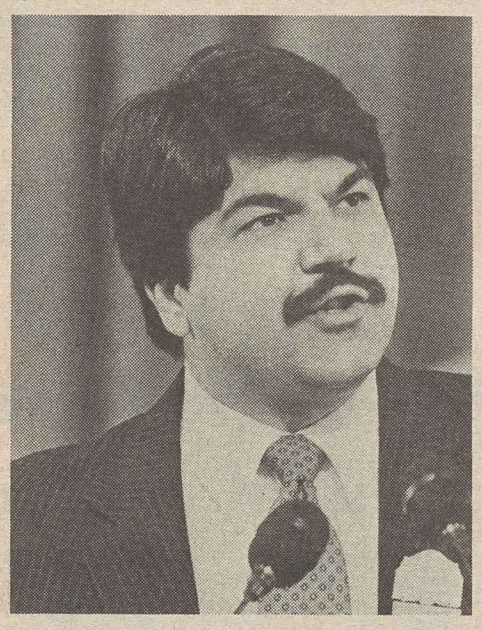
The resolution noted that in June 1984, when BASF was unable to convince Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers members at its Geismer, La., facility to accept an inferior contract, it locked out 370 union members and in the succeeding 16 months spent over $7 million "in an unsuccessful effort to destroy the bargaining unit."

Before adopting the resolution, delegates heard OCAW President Joseph Misbrener detail BASF's growing concentration of power. It has 72 American plants—70 of them acquired in the last 15 years—which account for one-fourth of the firm's $16-billion-a-year income.

Denouncing the company's "pattern" of assaults on trade unionism, Misbrener said that three of OCAW's locals "have been busted in the last five years and two more have been required to accept massive concessions."

In addition, BASF has attacked locals of the Chemical Workers, Clothing & Textile Workers and unaffiliated Teamsters, the resolution pointed out.

At Kawasaki's Lincoln, Neb., plant, the Auto Workers have tried for seven years to form a union. The company retained the services of a union-busting law firm and succeeded in invalidating elections in 1978 and 1979 along with the cancellation of another vote in 1982.



"It is only reasonable to demand that foreign-owned firms respect America's laws—including its labor laws," the convention said.

In addition, it urged Congress to establish new federal standards for public disclosure by foreign-held firms, declaring that these companies "should not be able to hide behind the formality of their foreign ownership" to avoid disclosing basic operating data required of comparable U.S.-owned firms.

BASF boycott

Anaheim, Calif.—Condemnation of the "union-busting and illegal activities" of the BASF Corp. was voted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in a post-convention session.

It threw labor's full support behind the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers boycott of BASF video, audio and computer tapes and discs, Lurotin brand vitamins and Alugard 340-2 protectant found in some brands of anti-freeze, and called on the Union Label & Services Trade Dept. to publicize the boycott.

Need cited for public employee bargaining laws

Anaheim, Calif.—Employees of state and local governments should have collective bargaining rights comparable to those that private-sector workers are guaranteed under the National Labor Relations Act, the AFL-CIO said.

Only 21 states have comprehensive bargaining laws and 10 states have no public employee bargaining legislation at all, a convention resolution noted. Further, "no two state laws are the same."

Against this spotted backdrop, the convention reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for "federal legislation extending full collective bargaining rights to all state and local government employees."

Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon said he supports federal legislation but that the prospect of getting a law enacted during the Reagan Administration is "remote."

"Therefore," he urged, "we must seek state legislation in states where public employees are treated as second-class citizens." Labor should target for defeat politicians with "right-to-work mentality" and "plantation thinking," Gannon said.

In another area of concern to public employees, the convention urged that collective bargaining be used to set caseload limits for social workers and others involved in providing human services.

UMW president warns of threat from giant firms

Anaheim, Calif.—Labor's "greatest challenge" is to develop a mechanism "to counter the economic and political power of the multinational corporations" that dominate American industry, Mine Workers President Richard Trumka told the AFL-CIO convention.

The first UMW leader to address convention delegates in the federation's 30-year history, Trumka said that unions face "protracted battles against these corporate Goliaths, many of which will go to any lengths to break the back of organized labor."

Because the multinationals "have little loyalty to any nation and none at all to the areas and communities in which they operate," the UMW president said, unions are finding that "our most powerful weapon, the strike, is increasingly rendered less and less useful."

If labor turns to government for assistance "to enable us to do more equal battle on behalf of working people," it is told that unions are "an outmoded, obstructionist, irrelevant force." Trumka said.

"The unspoken message is that the needs and desires, hopes and dreams of the working people of this country are merely an irritant to the workings of multinationals," he said, adding that public officials believe their "obligation to the theory of 'free trade' outweighs any obligation they have to protect the citizens of this land."

Two-way street

Taking aim at the Reagan Administration's charge that labor is seeking "protectionism," Trumka noted that working people have always been called upon by their government "to protect our nation" in time of war "so that our American values might be preserved for future generations."

"Now we call upon America to protect its workers, our values, our way of life," he said. "We think it is about time that the act of protectionism became a two-way street in this country."

But labor's concerns will not be heard by the Administration, Trumka asserted. "Its actions, both here and abroad, can only lead to the conclusion that it is doing everything in its power to assist multinational corporations to the continued detriment of the people it supposedly represents.

The UMW president charged that the government's foreign policy is "to make the world safe for corporate profiteering," and that in pursuit of that goal, it backs "any dictator of any stripe who will maintain a 'good business climate' by keeping down wages and working conditions and by preventing workers from organizing."

Aided by that policy, American corporations have been steadily moving jobs overseas—going wherever they find workers who can be "forced to work for the lowest wage, under the most hazardous conditions," Trumka said.

"It's time for us to fight for a foreign policy which is supportive of working people around the world. We must help workers in poor countries to bring up their working and living standards—for their benefit and for ours. If we do not, we will continue to find ourselves under the guns of the corporate profiteers."

Strike averted as AT&T agrees to talks on jobs

Anaheim, Calif.—A last minute agreement between the Communications Workers and AT&T averted a nationwide strike set for Nov. 1 by some 50,000 CWA members against AT&T's Information Systems division.

CWA President Morton Bahr announced the settlement which reduces the number of scheduled layoffs and requires AT&T to notify the union of its plans to contract out traditional telephone work.

Bahr said that the number of union members threatened by layoffs had been reduced from 9,100 to 4,100. "CWA won't rest until all of our members have jobs within AT&T, the Bell Operating companies or elsewhere. They are skilled workers who want and need to work," he continued.

Bahr noted that the agreement does not prohibit AT&T from contracting out work, but added "in fact, the company has severely limited its use of subcontracting,"

Support for UFW grape boycott renewed

Anaheim, Calif.—Gov. George Deukmejian (R-Calif.) is "paying his political debt to the growers with the blood of farm workers," President Cesar Chavez of the Farm Workers told the AFL-CIO convention, as delegates reaffirmed their support of the table grape boycott.

Although the state's Agriculture Labor Relations Act was "a very good law" when it was adopted in 1975, it "doesn't work anymore" under the Deukmejian administration, Chavez told delegates.

The convention took note of the fact that 36,000 farm workers who voted for union representation have been frustrated in their efforts to negotiate first-time contracts "because of the growers total disregard for the law and refusal to bargain in good faith."

The resolution laid much of the blame on Deukmejian, whose administration has "gutted" the agency, slashed funding, and invoked new administrative procedures to deny farm workers "access to the law that was meant to protect them."

Lax enforcement

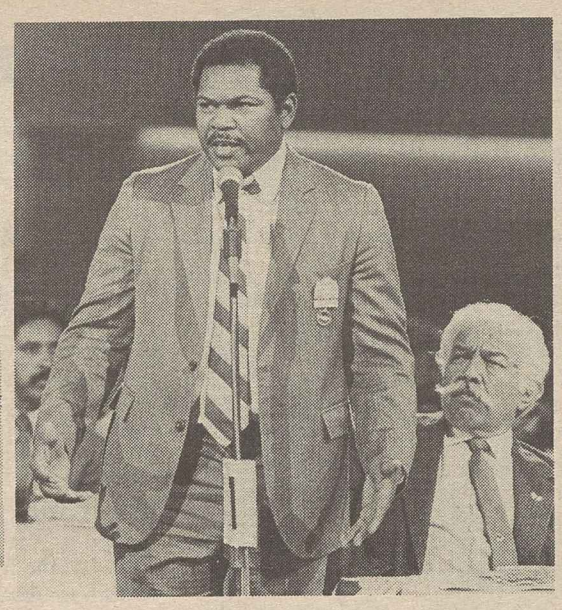
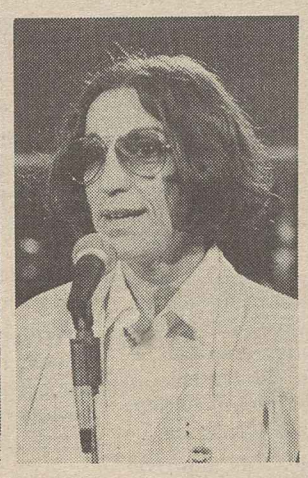
It also noted that "thousands of farm workers have been poisoned every year" because of inadequate laws and lax enforcement of existing statutes dealing with the use of pesticides. It said the boycott will continue until growers guarantee workers free and fair elections, and until they "voluntarily ban" the five deadliest pesticides.



A companion resolution praised the city of Santa Cruz, Calif., for endorsing the table grape boycott in the face of hostility from the County Farm Bureau, and recommended the city as a site for conventions and conferences.

On the general subject of boycotts to achieve labor's legitimate goals, the convention said they have proved to be "a means to effectively combat the forces that would destroy" the trade union movement.



All affiliates and state and city central bodies should continue to support national boycotts endorsed by the Executive Council, the resolution said, and the editors of labor publications should give these activities "all possible publicity."

Strong support pledged workers fighting for union rights overseas

Anaheim, Calif.—Reaffirming its conviction that freedom of association is the bedrock on which all other human rights are founded, the AFL-CIO convention pledged continued support for workers struggling to preserve free trade unions against dictatorships of the left or right.

In a wide-ranging exposition of the federation's foreign policy objectives, delegates adopted a resolution aligning American labor with the trade union movements in Poland, Israel, South Korea, South Africa, England, Ireland and Central America.

The convention also voiced its approval of the resumption of arms negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union, endorsed a verifiable reduction in nuclear weapons while opposing unilateral disarmament, reiterated its historic support for Israel, which it called "the only democratic state in the Middle East," and sharply condemned South Africa's racial policies as "a moral affront to civilized humanity."

Forefront of struggle

Delegates praised the democratic trade union movements in strife-torn Central America, pointing that they have "moved into the forefront of the coming struggle for political freedom and economic and social justice in their nations."

Noting that the civil wars in El Salvador and Nicaragua have "taken a bloody toll," the resolution condemned "anti-democratic forces" in both countries and urged the two governments to settle their internal problems peacefully.

The convention sharply rebuked the Reagan Administration for continuing to place emphasis on a military rather than a political solution to the conflicts in Central America.

"The AFL-CIO believes that a negotiated settlement, rather than a military victory, holds the best hope for the social, economic and political justice that the people of Nicaragua and El Salvador deserve," the resolution declared.

It also reiterated the federation's insistence that military aid to El Salvador be conditioned on "demonstrable progress in guaranteeing trade union rights, implementing land reform, ending the attacks and killings by right-wing 'death squads,' reforming the judicial system, and bringing to justice the murderers of AIFLD representatives Michael Hammer and Mark Pearlman and Salvadoran labor leader Jose Viera."

NATO backed

Delegates voted continued support of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Atlantic Alliance, recommended a "continuing consultative relationship" between the alliance and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and urged the ICFTU and the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development to work out a "collective approach" to worldwide economic problems.

The resolution condemned terrorism and the governments that sponsor it, and called on all democratic governments to adopt more effective security measures, "consistent with the preservation of civil liberties," to prevent such attacks and to apprehend and prosecute terrorists.

The provisions dealing with Central America sparked an animated floor debate.

President Kenneth T. Blaylock of the Government Employees said the resolution did not go far enough because no mention was made that terrorism by the "death squads" in El Salvador has been replaced by military action "planned, supported and connived by" American advisers.

With respect to Nicaragua, Blaylock continued, "we fail to mention the contras who are perpetuating not a war against military targets but a war of terror against the people of that country."

Right approach

Declaring that the AFL-CIO had "the right approach and the right policies," Vice President Leon Lynch of the Steelworkers said the federation's position is based on the recommendation of Central American trade union. "We have a responsibility to rely on their judgments, not to substitute ours for theirs," Lynch said.

Nita M. Brueggeman of the Clackamas County, Ore., Central Labor Council, expressed concern that labor had not taken "a clear position against support for the contras," noting that Adolph Coors, head of the anti-union beer company which bears his name, is "one of their benefactors."

Bricklayers President John T. Joyce said that the resolution "clearly indicates that the Reagan Administration is off base by putting insistence on a military solution over a peaceful solution."

"We may disagree on details," Joyce said, "but we should not divide our movement in its commitment to freedom of association, which is for trade unionists both an appealing ideal and a necessity of life."

Edward Asner, outgoing president of the Screen Actors Guild, said that while the resolution called for diplomatic, rather than military, solutions, he did not believe that "we have the right to dictate how a Nicaragua or an El Salvador should be governed."

'Death squads' toll

In Nicaragua, Asner said, there have been 500 civilian deaths while the El Salvadoran "death squads" have taken 50,000 lives. "Yet our institutional rhetoric offers no reflection of this truth, even when the victims include our fellow trade unionists and our own people," including Hammer and Pearlman.

Al Shanker, president of the Teachers, stressed the fact that, "instead of abandoning human rights in El Salvador, our aid to that country has been conditioned on progress on human rights."

Although delegates might disagree on the contra issue, Shanker said, "nothing that we say here should be taken as some sort of a sign of approval" for the Sandinista dictatorship. "Our job," he added, "is to help build a free trade union movement" in the face of the "destructive" Sandinista regime.

President Edward J. Cleary of the New York AFL-CIO noted that the Nicaraguan government recently suspended virtually all remaining rights in that country under the guise of a national emergency. "You can not take away freedom of association, freedom of speech, freedom to strike or freedom to organize," he declared.

Edward Clark of the New Bedford & Cape Cod, Mass., Labor Council, said the language of the resolution concerning the murderers of Hammer, Pearlman and Viera is similar to that adopted two years ago. "These conditions have not been met," he said, "and as long as the AFL-CIO continues to support the foreign policy of the Reagan Administration by sending aid to the military government of El Salvador they will not be met."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland rejected as "beneath contempt" the suggestion that the federation was "in league with Coors or Reagan," adding:

"Those who made it would react most vigorously if it were pointed out what associations their support of the Sandinista regime would place them with."

Concerning the Hammer and Pearlman slayings, Kirkland said that, at their funerals, "I swore I would not rest until we had brought their murderers to justice," and that the federation had devoted considerable resources to that task.

Stern conditions

But, he added, the AFL-CIO would not be satisfied if the killers were punished "and the killings and the injustice against the workers of El Salvador continued." If that were to happen, Kirkland said, "I will oppose all military aid to that country."

American trade unionists who work with their counterparts in Central America, and in other trouble spots around the globe, are "doing the work of the trade union movement as it ought to be done," he declared, and the resolution supports their efforts.

"When we send our people out around the world, expose them to conditions of great danger, I think they deserve your support and not a knife in the back," Kirkland said.

Among other highlights of the resolution:

Disarmament—Labor supports a strong national defense to protect America and her allies, but the defense budget must be "fairly financed," American workers must not be "forced to bear a disproportionate share of the burden," and procurement procedures must be overhauled to eliminate waste and corruption.

Middle East—There can be no resolution of the deep-seated conflicts there until the Arab nations demonstrate "unqualified acceptance of the state of Israel" and willingness to negotiate directly with Israel.

South Korea—The government's systematic crackdown on trade unions violates that country's constitution, and unless it releases jailed trade unionists, present import benefits it now enjoys should be withdrawn.

South Africa—A broad range of sanctions is needed to force the Pretoria government to end "institutionalized racism" and grant black citizens "full and equal participation" in the country's political life. In addition to ending apartheid, South Africa must release trade union and other political prisoners and halt such "odious" practices as the holding of people without trial or even charge and the torturing of those in custody.

British Miners—Labor continues to support the British Trades Union Congress in defending the rights of British miners, and opposes efforts by the British National Union of Mineworkers to split off and ally itself with communist-controlled unions in Western and Eastern Europe.

John Vanderveken

ICFTU presses tough sanctions against apartheid

Anaheim, Calif.—Violations of human and trade union rights anywhere in the world have "a direct impact on workers everywhere," John Vanderveken, general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, told the AFL-CIO convention.

Support for South African workers must "remain at the top of our agenda" until they achieve full citizenship and economic justice, Vanderverken said.

Reporting on his recent visit to South Africa, the head of the 83-million-member ICFTU said that the message from unions in that strife-torn country is that they want "real, tough sanctions."

A total crackdown on South Africa's government, strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, "cannot hurt the blacks more than apartheid does already," he said. "If we fail to respond adequately, the consequences for the future direction of South Africa will be grim indeed."

'You are not alone'

Addressing a message from the convention platform to black unionists struggling for justice in South Africa, Vanderveken declared:

"We salute your courage and your fortitude. You are not alone. Free trade unionists throughout the world will support you until you finally and inevitably triumph over a tyranny that is doomed."

Vanderveken also proclaimed solidarity with the Polish trade union movement suffering under the "oppressive regime" of Gen. Jaruzelski, and with the workers in Chile where "another dictator is trying to stifle free trade unions."

He called on the United States to ratify the conventions of the International Labor Organization, pointing out that these documents—on such issues as job safety and health, and workers' rights to organize—are under attack by "left-wing and right-wing dictators."

Because of the failure to adopt international labor standards worldwide, the ICFTU leader pointed out, runaway companies are able to "join hands with repressive governments" around the globe, establishing "low-wage, union-free environments" which translate into worker exploitation.

Program set to promote central body affiliations

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO moved another step closer to the goal of full affiliation of all union members with their state and local central bodies.

Only a slim majority of the AFL-CIO's membership is in local unions that have affiliated with state and local bodies. And that's not enough, a convention resolution made clear, not with the increasingly important role state and local bodies.

The resolution noted approvingly the new program launched by a special committee of the Executive Council and the Dept. of Organization & Field Services "to aggressively promote voluntary affiliations." As an important part of this program, each national union has been asked to designate a high-level official to join in efforts to encourage full affiliations.

But if the rate of voluntary affiliations remains unsatisfactory, the convention authorized the Executive Council to "develop and adopt" a new approach, subject to approval at the next AFL-CIO convention.

It said that any program that would affect the cost of an affiliate's standing within the AFL-CIO must provide at least three years' notice before it takes effect.

The resolution also urged more coverage of state legislative activities by union publications. It said unions should strive to assure that their locals and field staff join in and support the legislative efforts of central bodies.

AFL-CIO Vice President Wayne E. Glenn, who heads the Ad Hoc Committee on State & Local Central Bodies, termed the percentage of affiliation "far too few."

State legislatures write unemployment compensation, workers compensation and picket line laws, he stressed. Central bodies are expected to take leading roles in election campaigns, "but we haven't given them the ammunition to fight with."

Glenn, who is president of the Paperworkers, called for international unions to push actively for affiliation of their locals with central bodies, and not just give "lip service" to the continuing objective of full affiliation.

Two state federation presidents—Robert G. Gibson of Illinois and John W. Schmitt of Wisconsin—welcomed the convention action as moving in the right direction, but stressed the need for following through on the measure.

Delegates speaking on the resolution likened local unions that don't affiliate with central bodies to free-loaders in "right-to-work" states who benefit without paying their share.

Glenn H. Freeman, president of the Greater Lansing Labor Council in Michigan gave a graphic picture of the handicaps and hardships faced by an underfunded local central body.

"I work fulltime for the telephone company," he told the delegates. "My secretary-treasurer works fulltime." The central body receives per capita on about 8,000 union members, but "our potential is in excess of 34,000." Through resolutions adopted at the convention, Freeman said, central bodies are "rightfully" being urged to get more involved in public relations, COPE, organizing and legislation.

Dealing with change

Professional unions cite growth prospects

Anaheim, Calif.—The Dept. for Professional Employees welcomed the AFL-CIO report on "The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions" as a roadmap that continues in a direction the department and its affiliated unions have already taken.

Growth and change was the reiterated theme of the DPE's fifth biennial convention—the changing nature of an increasingly white-collar workforce and the opportunities for growth in unions responsive to the needs of today's workers.

DPE President Albert Shanker stressed in his opening remarks that collective bargaining must be stretched to embrace the professional concerns of employees as well as the traditional elements of union contracts.

The "Catch-22 situation," he said, is that employees who participate in what is construed as management decisions risk losing their right to be part of a bargaining unit.

Labor law needs to be updated, Shanker urged, so that employees don't have to choose between professionalism and union membership.

Shanker, who is president of the Teachers, was re-elected president of the department. Alan Eisenberg, executive secretary of Actors' Equity, was elected vice president. He succeeds Sanford I. Wolff of the Television & Radio Artists. Rodney A. Bower, president of the Professional & Technical Engineers, was re-elected treasurer of the department.

DPE Director Jack Golodner told the delegates that the degree of unionization among professionals now exceeds that of other segments of the labor force.

Fastest growth

"Professional occupations are now the fastest growing and best organized in the labor movement," Golodner said. "Two-thirds of all organized white-collar workers are professionals."

A special feature of the one-day convention was a panel discussion by a varied group of professionals with first-hand experience in organizing.

San Francisco television news reporter Bill Hillman, a former president of AFTRA, moderated the session. Participants included Shanker, from the Teachers; Mark Smith president of the San Francisco Interns & Residents Association; Sandra Delahoussaye, a nurse who is president of the Los Angeles County Employees affiliate of the Service Employees; Louis Albano, a professional engineer who heads AFSCME's Civil Service Technical Guild in New York; Gene Allen, an Oscar-winning Hollywood set designer and a vice president of the Theatrical Stage Employees, and DPE Associate Director Dennis Chamot.

The featured speaker at a luncheon session was Lawrence Grossman, president of NBC News, who welcomed labor's expanded use of television and new technologies to get its message across.

Fairness doctrine

In response to questions, he differed with labor's support of the fairness doctrine in broadcasting, arguing that the obligation to present a diversity of views should not be imposed or interpreted by government. But he acknowledged that commercial television, including his own network, had been lax in its coverage of non-conflict labor issues such as the AFL-CIO's self-examination of the role of unions in a changing workforce.

Resolutions adopted by the delegates expressed concern at the capture of the National Labor Relations Board by "anti-union ideologues appointed by President Reagan" and the undermining of government programs established to provide equal opportunity and job safety and health working Americans.

It adopted a comprehensive education statement, including the goal of "improving education in our nation's central cities." High quality free public education is the right of every American, the department said.

Pay equity should be pressed through collective bargaining, and political and legislative action, the DPE urged, "to bring about equality of pay for work performed and to remove all other barriers to equal opportunity for women and minorities."

It called for "federal child and dependent care programs" and opposed moves to eliminate or reduce the child care income tax credit.

In an area of special concern to unions in the performing arts, the convention called for enactment of legislation to require importers and manufacturers of audio recording equipment and blank tapes which are used for the home recording of copyrighted sound recordings to pay a reasonable royalty fee which could be distributed among copyright owners of recordings subject to home taping.

DPE President Albert Shanker urges labor law reforms to aid professionals.

Congress urged to restore child care, social services

Anaheim, Calif—The AFL-CIO called for an end to the federal government's "retrenchment" on child and dependent care services and urged Congress to move quickly to help "the nation's most vulnerable citizens."

The resolution cited "growing numbers of working parents searching for frequently non-existent child care arrangements," as evidence of the need for federally funded centers. It noted that Congress slashed federal funds for child care and social services in 1981, and turned the remainder over to the states with no restrictions on how it was to be spent. The predictable result, the convention found in many cases, was the deterioration of child care services and early education programs.

"Any federal commitment to child care has been virtually eliminated," the AFL-CIO protested. "Even the source of federal support for child care services now provided by the existing tax credit is threatened by the Administration's efforts to change the tax credit to a tax deduction—making it far less advantageous to lower-income families."

The convention urged Congress to:

- Retain the existing child care tax credit.
- Increase funding for Title XX of the Social Security Act, to meet the needs of abused children, the mentally ill and the elderly.
- Provide financial incentives for state-run child services and programs for the elderly and disabled.
- Enact legislation giving parental leave to workers with newborn children without risk of job loss.

The convention also urged affiliates to seek child care and dependent care services through collective bargaining. Options for care suggested by the resolution include employer-sponsored centers; information and referral services; allowances for care in existing centers; time off when a child or dependent is sick, and flexible working hours to allow for the care of sick children and dependents.

Programs backed to assist nation's family farmers

Anaheim, Calif.—Acknowledging the common concerns of farmers and workers, the AFL-CIO proposed a series of actions to aid America's family farmers, protect consumers and strengthen the nation's rural economy.

The convention resolution was based on an Executive Council report noting that one-third of the nation's family-sized farms are experiencing serious financial problems, with nearly 300,000 forced out of business over the last four years.

The convention resolution urged:

- Restricting farm income-support programs to benefit only family farmers.
- Fair price and production policies that allow family farmers to earn a decent living, without transferring loopholes and benefits to giant agribusinesses and tax shelter farms.
- A moratorium on farm foreclosures.
- Limits on the growth of giant agribusinesses, with regulations on sales of farms to foreign interests.
- Establishment of a National Grain Board to handle foreign sales of U.S. grain and protect the interests of family farmers and consumers.

Cranston hits 'hypocrisy' on budget

Anaheim, Calif.—Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) lashed out at the "hypocrisy" of the Reagan Administration and the Republican-controlled Senate in pushing for a balanced budget plan that would decimate social programs while continuing to insulate multi-billion-dollar corporations and the super-rich from taxes.

The Senate-passed Gramm-Rudman bill, Cranston told the AFL-CIO convention, should be called "the Republican Evasion Act of 1984," because, despite the urgent need to stem the flow of red ink in the federal budget, it would not go into effect for another two years. Thus, he said, it would exempt Republicans seeking re-election next year "from being hurt by budget cuts."

The Senate minority leader called for passage of a Democratic alternative, being advanced by House Democrats, which would meet the test of fairness by exempting social security and programs for the poor and disabled from budget cuts, targeting spending reductions on "a broad range of programs, including Pentagon weapons systems," and levying minimum taxes on corporations and the wealthy.

The GOP-backed plan, Cranston said, ignores the fact that "corporations that pay little or no taxes" have been the "largest contributor to the federal deficit." Since President Reagan took office, he pointed out, corporate loopholes have contributed to a $400-billion revenue loss.

Instead of addressing this source of potential revenue to bring budget deficits down, he said, Gramm-Rudman would attack the social safety net, already decimated under Reagan.

Alan Cranston

"The first programs to get the knife," he told convention delegates, would be "school lunches for hungry kids and food stamps for poor families," along with federal programs to aid the blind, the elderly and the handicapped.

Instead of waiting two years to address the deficit issue, Cranston said, Congress should move ahead at once to curb the borrow-and-spend policies of the Administration.

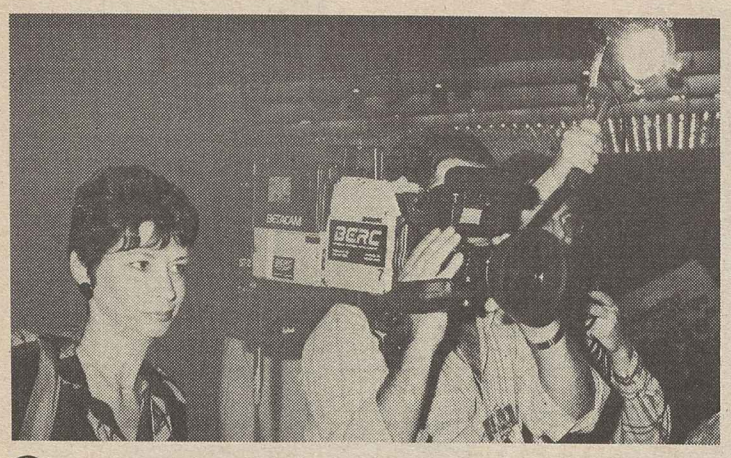
"It took 200 years to accumulate a trillion-dollar debt," he said. "It took the Republican party just five years to double that debt. We've gone from a federal budget deficit of $60 billion in 1980 to $212 billion today.

"We're paying $150 billion a year just on interest on the national debt," he continued. "That's larger than the whole budget for the whole government when John Kennedy was in the White House."

Cranston warned that Gramm-Rudman would "pass the power of the purse from the Congress to the President and we all know how this President would use that law." But whether Reagan or someone else is in the White House, he said, "we should not cede that power to any President."

The Republican deficits of the past five years, Cranston told delegates, have led to "the biggest trade deficit in our nation's history," which in turn has created a "job deficit" which has seen 2 million American families victimized by foreign competition.

"These deficits are not made in Japan, despite Japan's many unfair trade practices," he said. "They're made in America. More precisely, they're made in a Washington dominated by the Republican party."



Yet the White House has "ignored the trade catastrophe," and has failed to come up with a program to deal with predatory foreign practices which are "costing jobs, devastating families, and threatening the future supremacy of our economy," Cranston said.

Union-busters pushing Hobbs Act amendment

Anaheim, Calif.—Anti-labor forces are trying to twist a federal anti-racketeering law, the Hobbs Act, into a weapon against unions, the AFL-CIO warned.

A convention resolution reiterated the federation's strong opposition to proposed amendments to the Hobbs Act that would make picket-line misconduct a criminal felony, subject to 20 years in prison.

Misconduct in labor disputes is already punishable under state and federal law, the resolution noted. The Hobbs Act is aimed at violence or threats of violence for extortion of money, and the Supreme Court has held that it cannot be used to deal with misconduct during disputes over legitimate labor objectives such as higher wages and better working conditions.

On camera

State of the art video programming by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs was highly visible throughout the convention.

LIPA'S high-tech output included daily satellite feeds of convention highlights and labor videos to 540 television stations.

LIPA also supplied gavel-to-gavel coverage of speakers and floor debates, projected onto 12-by-16-foot screens, and offered round-the-clock audio highlights of convention activities.

At night and before the morning sessions, delegates could tune in to WORK-TV, a closed circuit television system for labor programs and specials produced by LIPA and AFL-CIO affiliates.

Steps pressed to fill nation's housing gap

Anaheim, Calif.—Stepped-up housing production and increased availability of affordable capital are vital to meeting the nation's housing needs, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation called for government programs to help make adequate supplies of capital available at affordable rates for construction and rehabilitation projects, and to reduce inflation of housing prices and rents through increased housing production.

The convention resolution supported standby credit controls, as needed, to assure "adequate funds for reasonably priced mortgage credit for housing," and urged the government to undertake new construction projects, particularly to address the housing problems of the elderly, handicapped, homeless and lower-income families.

Upgrading needed

"Existing low-income public housing stock should be modernized and maintained in good order," the convention stressed.

"Tens of thousands of people are on waiting lists for availabel assisted housing in cities across the country," while the nu;mber of new public housing units built has dropped from 180,000 units in 1980 to only 23,000 in 1985.

The convention urged expanded union investments in home mortgages, where union pension funds are invested in government-guaranteed, long-term, fixed payment mortgage plans.

Organizing effort asked to target Latino workers

Anaheim, Calif.—Hundreds of thousands of Hispanic Americans "are looking to you for leadership," Rep. Esteban Torres (D-Calif.) told the convention, as he urged the labor movement to intensify its efforts to "come and organize them."

Torres, a former Auto Worker, said that the Latino community "will be organized," adding: "They understand the unity that we talk about. Theirs is the fastest-growing movement out there."

Commending the federation for its "continued commitment to the Latino workers across this country," he said that labor has "a responsibility to organize them and bring them within our ranks."

Torres, one of the leaders in the House fight for comprehensive foreign trade legislation, said that action is urgently needed to "repair the damage that has been inflicted on the economy and its workers" by Reagan Administration policies.

Broken promises

In 1981, he said, President Reagan promised the American people increased economic growth, more jobs and an improved standard of living. What they've gotten instead has been "lost jobs, diminished earnings, depressed communities and shattered dreams," he said.

House Democrats, he said, have a comprehensive agenda to restore the American economy. "We plan to attack unfair trade practices, lower the value of the dollar, balance the budget, increase access to foreign markets, and help workers who have lost their jobs to imports."

Bold action is required, Torres told delegates, because "we are living on both borrowed funds and borrowed time."

He said the plan includes measures to penalize unfair import practices and to promote exports with government funds.

Major overhaul demanded for jobless benefit system

Anaheim, Calif.—With less than a third of the unemployed drawing jobless benefits, and with not a single state providing long-term assistance, the half-century-old unemployment insurance program stands "in serious need of reform," the AFL-CIO convention declared.

At the same time, delegates called the patchwork quilt of state workers' compensation laws "clearly inadequate" to meet today's needs and called for federal minimum standards below which the states could not fall, particularly in the area of occupational disease.

In the resolution on unemployment compensation, delegates demanded Congressional action to restore the system to its original role as "a bulwark of protection for all jobless Americans," and called for:

- Removing harsh eligibility and disqualification provisions which keep millions from the benefit rolls.
- Adopting federal minimum benefit standards and increasing the taxable wage base to at least 65 percent of the average annual wage, to forestall competition among the states for industrial relocation based on the linkage of low benefits and low contribution rates.
- Defeating proposals to shift more responsibility to the states, arguing that this would weaken the historic federal role in the system.
- Enacting a permanent program of aid for the long-term jobless to guarantee benefits for at least 65 weeks.
- Establishing a reinsurance plan to help states meet the "extraordinary costs" they incur during periods of high unemployment.
- Allowing states flexibility in repaying federal loans which help tide them over recession-level case loads.
- Repealing existing taxes which the Reagan Administration placed on unemployment benefits.

On the workers' compensation front, the delegates said the program has failed to live up to its original promise of eliminating the "unjust and chaotic" common-law system of dealing with injury and illness caused by the workplace.

The present program, the resolution declared, has become "saddled with delays, contested claims and disputes over the coverage of occupational diseases."

Because the states have a "poor record of compliance" with the recommendations of the 1972 National Commission on Workmen's Compensation, the convention said, federal action is required "to assure fair and just treatment for those in our society who are suffering from work-related injuries and diseases."

As the first step in this process, the delegates urged Congressional action to "provide compensation to occupational disease victims and those who are disabled as a result of occupational exposure to toxic substances."

The AFL-CIO also called for passage of the High Risk Occupational Disease Notification and Prevention Act, which would establish a system for identifying, notifying, counseling and medically monitoring workers who are at high risk because of exposure to toxic substances in the workplace.

System not working

In the debate preceding adoption of the unemployment compensation resolution, Wilbur Daniels, executive vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, said that the system has been "literally destroyed for most American workers" in the past four years.

"For the vast majority of American workers, the unemployment insurance system might just as well not exist," Daniels said. "For long-term unemployed workers, the unemployment insurance system in effect does not exist."

President Betty Tianti of the Connecticut AFL-CIO, President Julius Uehlein of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO, and Ronald Richardson of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees in the District of Columbia told delegates that employers have gutted unemployment compensation programs by threatening to move to states with lower payroll taxes.

Equal opportunities pressed for disabled

Anaheim, Calif.—Federal, state and local action is needed "to insure equal opportunity in employment for all qualified handicapped workers," the AFL-CIO said.

To further the long-standing policy objectives of the federation, affiliates were urged in a convention resolution to:

- Insert clauses in collective bargaining agreements to prevent denial of employment to disabled workers still capable of doing the job.
- Participate in programs to rehabilitate and employ union members.
- Support the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped and the Industry-Labor Council.
- Help tear down architectural barriers which deny the handicapped access to the workplace or public areas.
- Work to restore and strengthen nondiscrimination in programs ranging from job training to independent living, protect workers in sheltered workshops,

Unionists urged to help mark holiday honoring Dr. King

Anaheim, Calif.—The observance of the birthday of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., on Jan. 20, 1986, marks the achievement of a goal pursued for 14 years, the AFL-CIO convention said.

In reaffirming its commitment to "bring about the day when the dream . . . of dignity, justice and peace for all shall be fully realized," the federation urged its members to "initiate the observance of Dr. King's birthday by participating in community events that not merely pay tribute to his memory, but that exemplify his spirit."

The unanimously adopted resolution pointed out that the civil rights leader was in Memphis, Tenn., supporting a peaceful struggle of the city's sanitation workers when he was struck down by an assassin's bullet.

Labor's advocacy of a holiday honoring the memory of Dr. King "arose from the conviction that no other American in our time has more fully exemplified the spirit of brotherhood that alone can bring to birth a society of liberty and justice for all," the resolution said.

Teachers Vice President Nat LeCure, speaking on behalf of the resolution, urged that "King's Day not become just another day off from work, but rather a day when we take time to call to the attention of the conscience of America the need to do more" and labor's commitment to do so.

William Lucy, secretary-treasurer of the State, County & Municipal Employees, recalled the sanitation workers' strike in Memphis and noted, "I could not help but be touched by the spirit of those workers and the understanding of Dr. King as to the role that American labor plays in the lives of our people." He said that next January's celebration of King's birthday will give organized labor a chance "to demonstrate the highest calling of our movement."

AFL-CIO Vice President Murray H. Finley, head of the Clothing & Textile Workers, said that "hopefully all of us will use this holiday to rededicate ourselves to the meaning of the labor movement and the civil rights movement and the fight for human dignity by participating in the activities and celebrations that will be taking place.

The King holiday was set by Congress to be the third Monday in January, even though he was born on Jan. 15. In 1986, the holiday will be on Jan. 20.

Services expanded

Labor editors fund ILCA expansion plan

By Arlee C. Green

Anaheim, Calif.—Delegates to the International Labor Communications Association convention unanimously approved a two-step dues assessment to fund the upgrading of ILCA services and programs in a move to expand membership.

Although more than 100 publications have been added to ILCA membership rolls in the past two years, nearly as many withdrew because of the 1982-83 Reagan recession and the lackluster economic recovery.

Carolyn Jacobson, director of communications for the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, was elected to a two-year term as president to succeed Robert Kalaski, director of communications for the Machinists. James Cesnik of the Newspaper Guild was elected to a full two-year term as secretary-treasurer, after having been appointed to that post in late 1984. The new terms of office begin next Jan. 1.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the delegates that union communications will be a key to meeting the challenges the labor movement will face in the future. "We can't rely any longer on the single line of communication through the shop steward to reach the members," Donahue said. "We need to develop other lines of communications with the members."

High satisfaction rate

He noted that recent national polls show that 76 percent of union members are satisfied with their unions. "You can take pride and credit for that," he told the labor editors.

The 152 delegates attended a variety of workshops during the three-day convention, including sessions on investigative reporting, localizing national news, rejuvenating old ideas, use of computers and publication design.

A panel discussion on the "Labor Media—the Best Alternative Going?" featured Murray Seeger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Information, and labor reporter George Laine, president of the Los Angeles Newspaper Guild. Another panel of labor editors—David Mitchell of the Auto Workers, Kim Fellner of the National Writers Union, William Moody of the Graphic Communications Union, and Ken Germanson of the Allied Industrial Workers—discussed "Burned Up or Burned Out."

Screen Actors President Edward Asner and SAG member Mike Farrell discussed the attempt of the right wing to dominate the mass media.

Delegates elected eight new vice presidents to the executive council: Patrick J. Ziska, IAM Report from Headquarters; Merilyn Toro, Label Letter, Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Susan Phillips, UFCW Leadership Update; Jim Perry, Los Angeles Firefighter, IAFF Local 112; Karen Keiser, Washington State Labor Council Reports; Susan Dunton, Interchange, Railway & Airline Clerks; Marshall O. Donley, Jr., Public Employee, AFSCME, and Patsy Cashmore, Milwaukee Labor Press, Milwaukee AFL-CIO.

Dues increase

The dues increase would raise both the minimum and rates per thousand circulation in two steps. As an example, dues for a national union with a 200,000-circulation publication would increase from $400 a year to $450 on Jan. 1, 1986, and to $500 on Jan. 1, 1987.

For local union publications under 30,000 circulation, dues would increase from $30-$60 a year to $30-$100. The rate for local unions with more than 30,000 circulation would go from $2 to $2.50 per thousand in 1987 with a minimum annual payment of $120.

Seven council members were re-elected: Jay Bloom, Voice of Local 1, UFCW; Jeffrey Miller, CWA News; Matthew Doherty, New York Teacher; James Earp, Engineers News; Gary Hubbard, Steelabor; Richard Calistri, Labor newspaper, and David Elsila, UAW Solidarity.

ILCA's A. J. Liebling memorial lecture was delivered by Harry Bernstein, labor reporter for the Los Angeles Times.

Winners of ILCA's 1985 film and broadcast, and journalism competitions also were honored at the convention.

NAACP's Hooks condemns Reagan's civil rights retreat

Anaheim, Calif.—The civil rights and labor movements, allies in "the struggle for equality and a better life for all Americans," today face "the greatest challenge in our historical partnership," declared Benjamin L. Hooks, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

That challenge is being posed by the Reagan Administration which is "running backwards into the future," Hooks told AFL-CIO convention delegates here. He cited Administration attacks on the equal opportunity employment laws, and its extreme reluctance to take any actions against the apartheid government of South Africa.

"We find ourselves often forced to refight battles we thought we had won," he said.

"We have a Civil Rights Commission that would destroy civil rights, an Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that would gut affirmative action, and a Labor Dept. that until just a few days ago did not even speak to labor, and we have a National Labor Relations Board that is constantly anti-labor," Hooks said.

The Reagan Administration has put the brakes on and reversed the whole concept of equal employment opportunity enforcement, Hooks said, by calling for voluntary compliance rather than strict enforcement.

The reason for this, he avowed, is "because deep in their hearts they do not want to see those who have been cast aside on the road of life to have an equal opportunity to make it."

The mutual efforts of the civil rights and and labor movements helped create the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the successive laws on voting rights, fair housing and age discrimination, Hooks reminded the delegates. But Reagan Administration officials are "peddling double-talk, trying to convince us that up is down, that right is wrong and that somehow the problems caused by years of systematic discrimination against minorities and women have all been cured," he added.

Administration retreat

Hooks charged that no recent Administration has been "as anti-labor, anti-woman, anti-minority, anti-human rights, or anti-civil rights."

Attempts by the Administration to "undo Executive Order 11246" concerning fair employment practices were scored by Hooks, who asked for labor's help in seeing that the order "does not bite the dust."

In addressing concerns about employment quotas, Hooks noted that under the EEOC, quotas should be "floors that must be reached," not ceilings that can be used to prevent people from attaining full equality.

American business must use its resources to change the system of apartheid in South Africa, to help build strong labor unions that are multi-racial, or "else they must withdraw from South Africa—planes must not land there, ships must not be unloaded there, and diplomatic relations, if necessary, must be broken in order to bring freedom and justice to our brothers and sisters in South Africa.

"America must use all of its strength to convince the government in Pretoria that this system cannot last, must not last," he said.

Renewed federal programs demanded to eradicate race, sex discrimination

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO convention deplored the Reagan Administration's attacks on civil rights and called for an end to race and sex discrimination through employment, training and education programs.

"The dilution of civil rights law and enforcement by this Administration must be halted and the country must use federal programs to wipe out discrimination," the delegates said.

Federal agencies, including the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs and the Justice Dept., should have adequate funding "and more importantly, a commitment to their missions," the convention resolution said.

Further, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights must be restored to its position of being the watchdog for the nation on the effectiveness of the agencies working to end discrimination, the convention said.

AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to support fair housing legislation that provides enforcement powers.

The federation stressed its "unwavering support for affirmative action" and condemned the Administration's attempt to end such programs.

The Administration "is leading the reactionary effort in the courts to end affirmative action and is taking steps to weaken Executive Order 11246," it charged.

"The Administration seeks to use the civil rights laws to thwart the full political and economic participation of women and racial minorities in our society rather than as a means of furthering that goal."

Delegates stressed that "effective affirmative action plans are as necessary in 1985 as those plans were in 1964" when the Civil Rights Act was adopted.

While Title VII protects nondiscriminatory seniority systems that provide important protection to all wirjersm the law permits workers to negotiate affirmative action plans, including plans that modify such seniority systems.

In protesting any personnel actions taken against persons because of their sexual orientation, the AFL-CIO urged enactment of legislation at all levels of government to guarantee the civil rights of all persons.

Federation affiliates were urged to combat the "fear and intimidation engendered by such hate groups as the Ku Klux Klan" by establishing or expanding educational programs "exposing these groups for what they are in order to effectively counteract their propaganda."

AFL-CIO affiliates were urged to utilize and work with the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Committee and Dept. of Civil Rights, to appoint officers or staff as civil rights and women's rights designees, and to "move ahead forcefully with programs to eliminate discrimination."

President Thomas Turner of the Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO told the convention that "our job is not done. The battle is not over. We have made progress in this country...and really the battle is not over until we as minorities get a part of the economic pie."

Racism persists

Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz, in supporting the resolution, urged the delegates "to resist those who would seduce us into supporting the premise that discrimination no longer exists and that the affirmative action programs which have served us so well have in someway perverted the cause of civil rights... discrimination and racism still exist on a mass institutional scale."

AFL-CIO Vice President Alvin E. Heaps, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, said labor must block Administration attempts "to destroy all the gains that we have made for these past 50 years. I don't believe we are going to let them do it."

AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, president of the Actors & Artistes, noted that some unions had not yet named their civil rights designates and urged them to do so.

Delegates voice concerns on media conglomerates

Anaheim, Calif.—The recent rash of mergers and acquisitions of newspapers, magazines, radio and television stations could lead to "a handful of media moguls controlling the news," the AFL-CIO convention warned as it called on Congress to consider limiting the degree of concentration of media ownership.

Delegates cited Capital Cities Communications' purchase of ABC, the Gannett chain's acquisition of Family Weekly, the Detroit News and the Des Moines Register, and Rupert Murdoch's purchase of seven Metromedia TV stations and half of 20th Century Fox as examples of the unprecedented wave of ownership consolidation.

Upgrading of nation's transport systems urged

Anaheim, Calif.—On land, sea and in the air, the AFL-CIO convention called for development of "an efficient and diversified transportation system" to enhance the national economy and insure the nation's security.

Delegates took note of the fact that, "without a major federal role, the transportation network—already under stress—would deteriorate further and key parts of the system would be lost.

"Urban transit, the maritime industry, the rail passenger system, airports, air service to smaller communities, intercity bus systems and the highway and bridge system would be in jeopardy."

The convention assailed the Reagan Administration for its efforts to "scale back or terminate the federal role in many essential transportation activities," and said that unless these efforts are reversed, the result would be to "add to the already severe unemployment problem."

In adopting a broad-ranging transportation resolution, the convention took note of these ominous developments:

Maritime—The Administration has reneged on its pledge to develop "an ongoing and dependable maritime policy," and has, instead, "attempted to dismantle or cripple" existing programs.

The merchant marine and shipbuilding industries should be put back on a solid foundation by measures that include:

- Continuation of operating and construction subsidies to compete with the fleets of other nations which receive substantial underwriting from their governments.
- Strict adherence to the Jones Act which provides that all goods moving between U.S. ports be carried on American-flag ships.
- Developing a viable oceans policy which recognizes safety and environmental concerns while encouraging development of such new technology as ocean mining and ocean terminal energy conversion.
- Enforcement of cargo preference laws, including the requirement that 50 percent of government-financed Food for Peace cargoes move in American vessels.
- An end to the government's "cynical" support of American business interests which register their vessels under runaway flags to avoid American wage and safety standards.
- Preservation of the right of licensed officers on American-flag ships to join a union—a right being challenged by shipowners "on the unfounded grounds that such personnel are supervisors."

Railroads—In each of the past four years, the Administration has targeted railroad programs for cutbacks, and the President's fiscal 1986 budget proposal to eliminate federal funding for Amtrak would deprive millions of passengers of train service and destroy the jobs of thousands of railroad workers.

The Administration's proposal to sell Conrail to Norfolk Southern would reduce competition, raise freight rates and eliminate 10,000 jobs, even though Conrail has become profitable "because of government assistance and sacrifices made by workers."

The convention opposed any attempts to curtail full funding for Amtrak, any effort to reduce or further tax railroad retirement benefits, and supported the public sale of Conrail as an independent company to prevent "further monopolization of the rail system, prevent cost increases, and save thousands of jobs."

It also called for full enforcement by OSHA and the Federal Railway Administration of laws safeguarding the health and safety of railroad workers and the public.

Air Transportation—Air travel has been plagued by time-consuming delays resulting from the inadequacy of the air traffic control system, and efforts must continue to rebuild the system which President Reagan "destroyed" at the time that he broke the Air Traffic Controllers in 1981.

Delegates registered their strong opposition to the Administration's budget proposals which would eliminate subsidies for air carriers. These subsidies are provided principally for airlines serving small communities, the resolution said, and their removal would "heighten the disruption" of service to those localities.

Pointing out that Continental Airlines went bankrupt two years ago "to avoid living up to its collective bargaining contract," the resolution noted that Continental is controlled by Texas Air, which this year attempted to purchase TWA. "Airlines operating under the protection of the bankruptcy law should not be allowed to take over or gain control of other airline companies."

The convention also went on record in support of a sweeping program of airline safety geared to a "crashworthy environment in the cabin" to protect the lives of passengers and flight attendants. It called on the Administration to formulate regulations to improve cabin conditions.

Urban Mass Transit—Over the past four years, the Administration has repeatedly proposed ending operating subsidies for local mass transit systems.

Such cuts would lead to service reductions, fare increases and wage or job cutbacks, and would increase the burdens on "already financially strapped" states and localities, the convention warned.

At the same time, the convention spoke out against any weakening of workers' bargaining rights, earnings, benefits and jobs, and voiced strong opposition to the Reagan Administration's attempts to assist private companies to compete with public transit systems.

Highways—The Administration has proposed an across-the-board freeze on federal aid for highways and bridges which would hold the spending line at fiscal 1985 levels.

Funding for these projects must be "high enough to assure that the federal highway system remains in safe and efficient condition," the convention insisted.

Delegates also urged restoration of Davis-Bacon Act protections for highway workers "to prevent ruinous wage competition" and to guarantee that construction work is of high quality.

Intercity Busing—Because of Administration efforts to roll back regulations covering inter-urban bus systems, "jobs have been lost, workers' earnings have declined, and needed service to less populated areas has suffered."

Deregulation has allowed bus companies to abandon less profitable routes, but has not encouraged competition, the convention said.

William Sirs

Dick Martin

Fraternal delegates stress labor's common concerns

Anaheim, Calif.—Trade unions around the world are encountering similar problems in foreign trade, unemployment, sluggish economic growth and increasing hostility from corporations and governments alike, fraternal delegates told the convention.

Dick Martin, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, spelled out labor's common concerns. "We know that your struggle is our struggle. Your defeats are our defeats, and your victories are our victories."

The challenges "that you have faced are now facing us," Martin said in addressing the issue of free trade vs. fair trade.

Martin advised the delegates that "your plight on free trade is exactly the same plight that Canadian workers have. We are, in fact, being bombarded by imports from extremely low-wage countries in which dictatorships prevail most of the time."

The CLC has told the Canadian government and the public "that we do not want free trade either," Martin assured the delegates. That extends to Canada's nearest trading partner, too, he said.

All must benefit

"We do not want free trade with the United States, but what we do want with the United States is fair trade, sectoral fair trade that will benefit the workers of both the United States and Canada. That is one item that we must be united together around between the CLC and the AFL-CIO."

One export from the United States, Martin said, was one that wasn't welcome in his country. "You exported the 'right-to-workers.' Take them back and keep them here and we'll help you kick them out of the United States to someplace."

The "right-to-workers" in Canada call themselves the National Citizens Coalition, Martin said. "They are financed by the same types of companies that financed the 'right-to-workers' down here."

Martin noted that 38 percent of the Canadian workforce is organized. But labor's foes are at work trying to change this. "We are under tremendous attack." he said.

That also was the message from William Sirs, a member of the general council of the British Trades Union Congress.

Hostility to unions

"The narrow, ideological. and short-sighted hostility toward unions by our government is accompanied by disastrous economic policies," Sirs said. "The hostility of the government amounts to an irrational hatred of unions."

The aim of the government's legislative attacks has been "to narrow the scope for industrial action, to intimidate working people, to interfere in the internal affairs of unions and to weaken the political activities and the associations of our unions."

Sirs charged that Prime Minister Thatcher's government "has done great damage to our economy." Unemployment stands at 13 percent of the workforce, or 3.5 million people, according to the government's figures. Those numbers "have been cooked," Sirs said. "The real number of unemployed, on the former system of counting, is well over 4 million."

Britain's economic stagnation over the past six years shows "that Thatcherism does not work," he stressed in drawing a parallel with conditions in the United States and the policies of the Reagan Administration.

In South Africa, he said, unions of black working people hold the only hope for peaceful transformation from apartheid to a fully democratic and fair society.

The trade union movements in the industrialized countries should do their best to assist in the growth of trade unions in South Africa, Sirs advised.

Union role sought in coping with impact of automation

Anaheim, Calif.—Organized labor must be brought into the picture when new technology is introduced into the workplace, the AFL-CIO convention asserted.

Delegates called for labor-management negotiation of retraining programs to prevent the displacement of workers by technology. They also urged sharing cost savings with workers and said that half of the productivity increase resulting from new technology should be used to reduce the workweek, without cutting wages, in order to boost employment opportunities.

American industry is rapidly implementing the use of computer-controlled machinery, industrial robots and other labor-eliminating techniques, but the benefits are "accruing solely to corporate management," the resolution declared.

Experience shows that technology is making a number of jobs "more routine, more unskilled, more unsafe and more insecure," the convention said. It cited a report by the AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work showing that "automation and other factors are contributing to a chronic shortage of four to six million jobs"

In a related action, delegates noted that the rapid introduction of video display terminals is affecting the jobs, and potentially the health, of tens of millions of clerical, professional and blue-collar workers.

They adopted a resolution urging affiliates to "fight at the bargaining table and in other arenas for proper training, higher pay, job security and career ladders" for workers using VDTs, and for working conditions that will reduce stress in the VDT environment.

Delegates also called for legislative action to force manufacturers of video display terminals to provide equipment that meets minimum standards for "safe and comfortable operation."

This, the resolution said, should include detachable keyboards, tiltable VDT screens, adjustable screen brightness, adjustable chairs, appropriate desks, appropriate office lighting, and effective shielding from all potentially harmful emissions of electromagnetic radiation.

Research funds sought to seek cure for AIDS

Anaheim, Calif.—Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS) is fast becoming a major public health problem in the United States and federal funding for research on its cause, transmission and development and on a search for a cure should be increased, the AFL-CIO convention urged.

The AFL-CIO recognizes that unions have the dual concern of seeking to protect the health and safety of workers occupationally exposed to AIDS and the rights of workers who are AIDS victims and individuals who are at high risk, the resolution said.

The federation urged that the Centers for Disease Control of the U.S. Public Health Service develop and issue guidelines to protect all workers who may face occupational exposure to aids.

Line-item veto bid seen ideological ploy

Anaheim, Calif.—The "line-item veto" that President Reagan wants would enable him to put an ideological stamp on the congressional appropriations process, a convention resolution warned.

The resolution urged continued opposition to proposals for a constitutional amendment that would allow a President to veto a particular item in an appropriations bill without rejecting the entire measure.

While an item veto has been touted as contributing to fiscal responsibility, the resolution suggested that a President such as Reagan would likely use it "as a weapon of political punishment or to terminate only those spending items determined to be ideologically distasteful."

The solution to the deficit doesn't lie in "constitutional gimmickry," it said, "but rather in correcting the combination of irrational tax policies, excessive defense budgets and high unemployment."

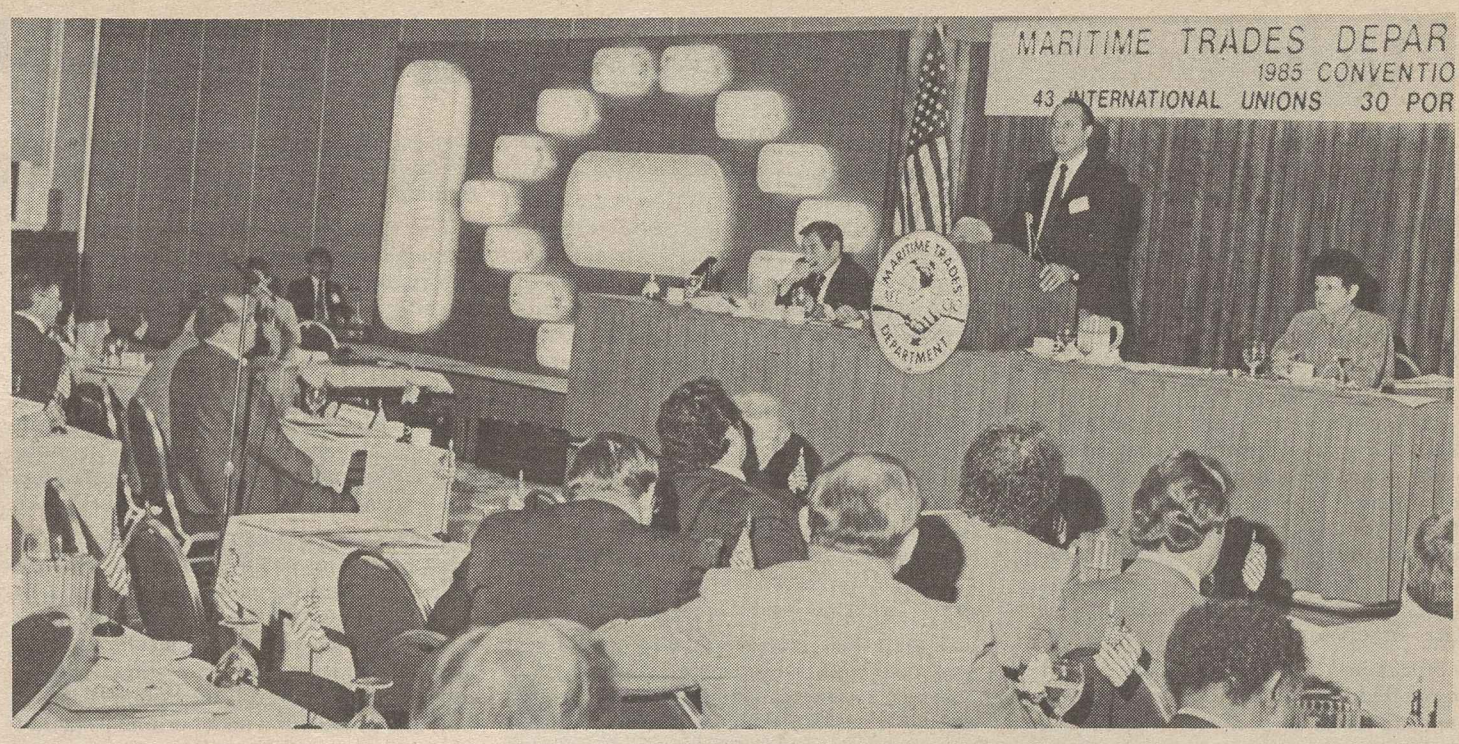
Restoration of aid to states, cities sought

Anaheim, Calif.—Public services are being squeezed by federal cutbacks and antiquated state and local tax structures, the AFL-CIO convention warned.

Federal general revenue sharing and programs for economic community development, such as those of the Economic Development Administration and urban and community development block grants, should be continued and funded at levels that existed prior to the Reagan Administration, convention delegates insisted.

They called on Congress to reauthorize revenue sharing, which is already some $10 billion less than it was in 1981.

Funding for both operating and capital costs of mass transit systems should be provided from all levels of government to facilitate the access of intercity unemployed to jobs in the suburbs, the AFL-CIO said.



Further, proposals for "enterprise zones" should be rejected because they will result only in giveaways of public revenue and wasteful competition among businesses without any increase in jobs, the delegates declared.

States should use their broader tax base to improve the conditions of their cities, and resist the temptation to boost taxes through user fees and assessments on the goods, services and homes of workers.

Preferential tax giveaways aimed at attracting businesses should be avoided, the convention said.

Instead, tax revenues should be more equitable and more productive, keyed to a progressive rate on individual and corporate income, thereby correcting the regressive slant of sales and excise taxes.

The delegates also strongly opposed the Reagan Administration's desire to eliminate the deductibility of state and local taxes from the federal income tax load, noting that such a measure could make home ownership more costly and make it more difficult for states and cities to raise revenues needed to provide public services.

MTP President Frank Drozak calls for overhaul of U.S. maritime policy.

Maritime Trades Dept. presses call for revitalization of merchant fleet

Anaheim, Calif.—Decades of neglect that have ravaged the American-flag merchant fleet can and must be reversed, the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. insisted.

That was the theme of MTD President Frank Drozak's opening remarks to the department's biennial convention here. And it was the thrust of many of the resolutions that were proposed, discussed and voted on by delegates from 43 affiliated unions and from Port Maritime Councils across the country.

Drozak, who is also president of the Seafarers, acknowledged the "tough times" that have overtaken the maritime industry and eroded much of the nation's industrial base. He had sharp words, too, for the anti-labor tilt of the Reagan Administration and for its unconcern about "jobs shipped overseas."

But Drozak told the delegates he was enormously encouraged by the recent 245-179 vote in the House rejecting an attempt to scuttle the cargo preference law through an amendment to the farm bill. As the maritime-linked unions see it, the already decimated merchant fleet would be sunk entirely without the requirement that half of all government-generated cargo be transported in American vessels.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue also sounded an optimistic note, suggesting in his address to the convention that there has been an important shift in the tide of American public opinion.

People catching on

Labor is no longer "a voice crying in the wilderness for a sensible trade policy," he said. Polls are reflecting a growing concern over the loss of jobs to the U.S. economy, Donahue noted. "People are beginning to catch on to what's happening to our industrial base and to our maritime base, and that's a good thing."

A comprehensive maritime policy resolution adopted by the delegates noted that only 6 percent of U.S. ocean trade is carried in ships flying the American flag.

The essential first step, the MTD convention urged, is "a national policy which generates cargo for the U.S. merchant marine." An assurance of a fair share of cargo, the resolution suggested, will generate the investment needed to build new ships in U.S. yards and encourage the training of crews in the latest maritime techniques.

The Jones Act, reserving coastal shipping for American vessels, remains "a fundamental component of maritime policy," the convention said, and should be expanded to include all marine operations within a 200-mile zone.

Such an extension, it noted, "would require the use of only U.S.-built and manned drilling rigs, platforms, offshore boats, dredges and offshore mining equipment."

Another section of the policy resolution called for development of the nation's marine resources, including minerals from the sea bed and thermal energy.

Shipbuilding, offshore construction and mineral extraction programs should follow "a buy-American philosophy which will keep American dollars circulating in the American economy and employ American workers," the MTD advocated.

Another convention resolution dealt with the "flags of convenience" that allow shipowners to register their vessels in non-maritime countries in order to escape their own nation's labor and safety standards.

Two years ago, the resolution noted, the MTD urged participation by the United States in sessions of the United Nations Conference on Trade & Development seeking to phase out "flags of convenience" ship registries and require a genuine link between vessels and the flags they fly.

But "regrettably and incredibly," the convention said, the United States has joined with nations that profit from providing flags to runaway ships. As a result, the current draft of an international agreement would actually increase the opportunity for "runaway ship havens," and should be rejected, the MTD said.

Another resolution urged stronger steps—by the United States and other countries—to combat the "deadly, worldwide epidemic of terrorism."

Other actions

Other convention actions reflected the broad concerns of the trade union movement, such as urging legislation to require advance notice of plant closings, opposing "a discriminatory subminimum wage" for teenage workers, resisting attacks on the Davis-Bacon Act and calling for stepped-up economic pressure against South Africa's apartheid policy.

A floor discussion of a resolution strongly opposing the taxation of employee benefits resulted in telegrams from the unions represented at the convention to each member of the House Ways & Means Committee reiterating labor's position on the issue.

The department's elected officers—Drozak, Vice President Stephen J. Leslie and Executive Sec.-Treas. Jean F. Ingrao—have two years remaining in their four-year terms so there were no elections during the two-day convention.

Brock brings olive branch, asks civility in disagreement

Anaheim, Calif.—Labor Sec. William E. Brock came to the convention with a proffer of cooperation in areas of common concern and an insistence that disagreement between the Labor Dept. and the trade union movement can be expressed without personal animosity.

Brock, who has sought to repair relations damaged during his predecessor's term in office, was praised by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland for having kept open lines of communication.

Kirkland told the delegates that one result of this more open approach has been the serious consideration by the Reagan Administration of seeking Senate ratification of several International Labor Organization conventions that the United States delegation strongly supported. This nation's failure to ratify ILO agreements on minimum labor standards and human rights, Kirkland said, has exposed the United States to justified criticism—from its friends as well as its adversaries.

William E. Brock

Brock lauded the AFL-CIO and its unions for having improved the standard of living for all Americans, not just union members.

"You have always fought for the health and safety of all workers," he testified. And labor has "stood firm" on protection of "the right of all citizens to be free from economic, social or political discrimination."

Brock was the U.S. trade representative during the first Reagan Administration and earlier had been Republican national chairman.

Differences acknowledged

He acknowledged his differences with the trade union movement, but noted that "the strength of our institutions does not depend upon absolute agreement."

Politics, he suggested, is "a healthy contest of ideas."

While making clear that he does not share the AFL-CIO's advocacy of curbs on job-destroying imports, Brock said the drive to make American goods more competitive should be conducted "within the American value system," not outside it.

It must not be achieved through "sabotaging the American worker's standard of living," he said.

Brock told the convention, but without going into details either in his speech or in a subsequent news conference, that he favors expanding "flextime" to the private sector, so that working mothers especially would be able to manage more successfully their responsibilities as workers and parents. He welcomed the negotiation of day care facilities in some union contracts.

Unions, Brock said, have a "responsibility to reflect the values of those who are your members."

The unions of the AFL-CIO, he added, can take pride in having done so.

Bakery union saluted as centenary nears

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO convention saluted the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, which will celebrate its 100th birthday in 1986, hailing the union as "an important and respected voice in the American labor movement."

The BCT and its predecessor unions, the anniversary resolution said, "have done an outstanding job in serving the interests of members in both the United States and Canada," citing, in particular, the efforts to reduce working hours, abolish child labor, improve workplace safety, and secure better wages and benefits.

BCT President John DeConcini expressed his gratitude to the federation's leadership for the assistance it gave in "the fight for a clean union," reminding delegates that the former B&C was expelled from the AFL-CIO for corruption in 1957.

After the American Bakery Workers received a charter from the federation, to retain its ties with the house of labor, it engaged in a 12-year "war for membership" with the B&C. During that same period, he said, a band of officials in the B&C "waged their own war" against corrupt elements in their union and ultimately saw them go to jail.

The two unions reunited in 1969, in what DeConcini said was an "unprecedented" achievement, and now, with the Tobacco Workers who merged with them in 1978, present a united front in the continuing struggle on behalf of working men and women.

Fight vowed to restore safety, health protection

Anaheim, Calif.—Labor's commitment to restoring the integrity of federal safety and health agencies and securing full, effective enforcement of existing regulations was reaffirmed at the AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates also expressed "total support for the concept of health and safety protection for all public employees" in a resolution protesting the lack of coverage for the public workforce.

The labor movement has fought hard over the past five years to turn back most attempts by the Reagan Administration to weaken regulations of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and the Mine Safety & Health Administration. Instead, labor has forced these agencies to address head-on important safety and health issues, the delegates observed.

OSHA and MSHA only take action when compelled by court order or congressional pressure or in response to tragedies after workers lose their lives, the delegates said.

Gaining issuance of new, effective regulations on asbestos for construction and general industry, benzene, formaldehyde, ethylene dibromide, short-term exposure limit for ethylene oxide, infectious diseases such as Hepatitis B, noise, grain elevator safety, confined space entry and lock-out of dangerous machinery are top priorities, the convention said.

OMB interference

The federation pledged an all-out effort "to stop OMB interference" in the establishment of safety and health standards. And federal enforcement policy must be changed to prohibit exemptions from inspections, delegates said.

Noting that state and local governments have provided worker protections in the absence of federal action, the convention strongly urged all affiliates and state federations to "support state legislation on video display terminal use and on certification and training for asbestos removal."

The state legislatures in 25 states have provided worker right-to-know protections. Efforts to gain such protections in the remaining 25 states must continue, the delegates stressed, until all workers and members of the public are afforded protections.

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates must train and educate workers and the public about their rights under these laws and make sure the laws are enforced, delegates said.

Workers were also urged to seek enforcement of federal health and safety laws by exercising their rights to file complaints to get inspections. Further, the delegates suggested that where traditional enforcement methods fail to protect the workers, unions should explore the use of product liability suits and prosecution under criminal statutes when manufacturers or employers willfully disregard the law with resulting injury, disease, or death to workers.

The delegates cited the mammoth chemical accident in Bhopal, India, where more than 2,500 persons where killed. No regulations exist yet in the United States to prevent a similar mishap, the delegates noted, pointing to the Union Carbide plant accident in Institute, W.Va. in August when 132 persons were injured.

Concern for victims

Rubber Workers President Milan Stone, in supporting the resolution, declared that "those victims of Bhopal and Institute, W.Va., are victims no different than victims shot in the street in a violent crime."

In another resolution, the delegates urged federal regulations on hazardous ingredients in cosmetics to protect consumers and barbers and cosmetologists.

Poverty program cutbacks falling hardest on children

Anaheim, Calif.—In a series of resolutions on aid to poor families, the AFL-CIO called on Congress to take quick action and undo the "serious damage done in the last five years" to programs that are "critical to the survival and well-being of millions of children."

The convention condemned the harsh cuts in welfare programs, pointing out that as a result, the national poverty level had moved to a rate higher than that of the early 1960s, and that young children are now the largest group of poor in America.

The convention noted that poor children and pregnant women have been hardest hit by cuts in federal AFDC spending and cutbacks by states, "resulting in denial of the most minimal needs."

Criticizing the program's capriciousness, the convention pointed out that millions of children—from families on strike, from those who had exhausted unemployment compensation, and from poor, working families—have been denied any help by the program's "outrageously harsh provisions."

"For those very poor who were allowed to receive assistance, payment levels have fallen further below the poverty level," the resolution continued, since AFDC is the only benefit program not indexed against inflation.

Specifically, the AFL-CIO urged Congress to:

- Establish a national minimum standard for AFDC benefits, with regular increases to keep pace with inflation.
- Promote family stability by allowing AFDC benefits where two parents are in need. Currently, in 26 states, needy families are found ineligible or must split up to qualify for benefits. Assistance should also be available to needy individuals and childless couples.
- Abolish workfare programs, where recipients must "pay back" their grants by working for no wages. Instead, the AFL-CIO recommended expanding training and placement programs to provide decent jobs at fair wages.

In a related resolution, the convention charged that deliberate government policies have made hunger "a more severe problem in this country than it has been for over two decades."

Criticizing the Reagan Adminstration's substantial cutbacks in food stamp and child nutrition programs, the convention resolution cited growing lines at soup kitchens, increases in infant mortality in some regions and widespread cases of malnutrition among children, the elderly and the unemployed as evidence that "despite the economic recovery, hunger is getting worse."

The convention also charged that "in addition to trying to dismantle food and nutrition programs, the Administration would force food stamp recipients into jobs for no wages—frequently replacing existing or recently laid-off workers."

El Al Airlines condemned for attempt to break union

Anaheim, Calif.—El Al Airlines was condemned by the AFL-CIO for provoking and prolonging a 19-month strike by the Machinists through union-busting tactics.

The convention noted that only because negotiations are "underway between the AFL-CIO and the highest levels of the Israeli government is stronger action against El Al being withheld from consideration at this time."

The company's anti-union tactics, the AFL-CIO said, "project an unfair image of the nation of Israel." Despite efforts by the federation and leaders of the Israeli government to bring about a satisfactory settlement, El Al "refuses to carry on good faith negotiations," the resolution stressed.

The convention charged that the strike was caused by management demands for wage concessions, cuts in fringe benefits and elimination of vital work rules. El Al has "refused to bargain in good faith, has repeatedly walked out of meetings, has imported strikebreakers from Israel, has hired union-busting consultants and has caused violence on the picketline," the resolution said.

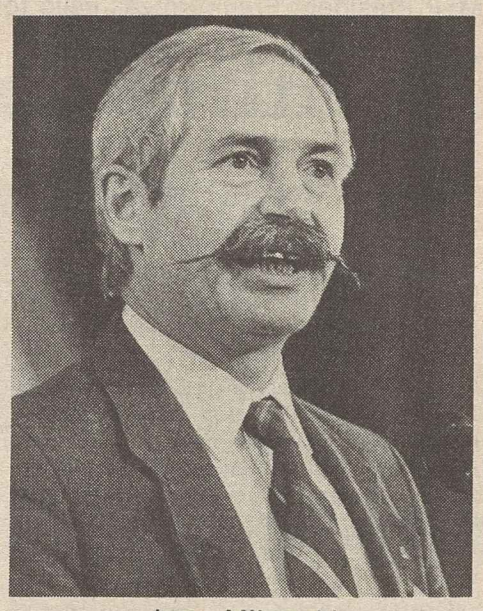
El Al's attempt to decertify the Machinists as the bargaining agent for the workers by forming a company union was called a "despicable tactic."

The strike at El Al began Mar. 16, 1984, and since July 11, 1984, there has been a national boycott against El Al Airlines.

IAM President William W. Winpisinger told the delegates that a "valiant, courageous band of strikers walk the picketlines at John F. Kennedy Airport in New York City against the lawless conduct of this carrier."

Winpisinger lauded the efforts of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and of Histadrut and its American representatives to gain a settlement. "The carrier even objects to the Histadrut representative sitting with us" at the bargaining table, he pointed out.

Printing unions plan to resume merger talks



Anaheim, Calif.—Officers of the Typographical Union and the Graphic Communications Union met here during the AFL-CIO convention and agreed to resume merger talks in early 1986.

A meeting schedule will be announced shortly, the two unions said.

In convention action, the AFL-CIO's departments, field staff and state and local central bodies were congratulated for their success in preventing a takeover of the ITU by the unaffiliated Teamsters.

A resolution noted that on the request of the ITU leadership, the AFL-CIO responded with "its full resources and expertise."

This was credited with bringing about the 2-1 ITU referendum vote rejecting the Teamster takeover attempt.

Jerzy Milewski

Walesa message says Poles still back Solidarnosc

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO renewed its pledge of "unstinting support" for Solidarnosc, and convention delegates warmly welcomed a message from Lech Walesa, the shipyard electrician who became the leader of Poland's free trade union federation.

"Solidarnosc lives on," Walesa affirmed in a letter to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. His message was read to the convention by Jerzy Milewski, international representative of the outlawed but still active federation.

Despite the risks, Walesa wrote, Polish workers continue to pay dues and demonstrate their support of Solidarnosc, while shunning the puppet union Poland's rulers sought to impose on workers.

The price workers have paid for supporting Solidarnosc has included dismissals, imprisonment, even death, Walesa reported. But the movement "is rooted in the working people of Poland," and the underground press is active.

Steadfast friendship

Polish workers appreciate the solidarity and friendship of unions around the world, Walesa said, and especially the "steadfast" friendship of the AFL-CIO.

Walesa expressed hope that one day Solidarnosc will also be in a position "to help those with whom we share common ideals, values and goals."

Milewski told the convention that Polish workers "are struggling for bread and freedom." To them and to other workers under oppressive governments, he said, "freedom is no less important than bread."

The convention resolution called on the U.S. government to reject Poland's requests for new credits and to bring stronger diplomatic and economic pressure on Poland to lift its ban on Solidarnosc and bring about negotiations on economic issues.

It asked free trade unions in other countries to press for a similar policy.

The resolution affirmed Solidarnosc as "the only authentic voice of the workers of Poland," representing "the democratic aspirations of the overwhelming majority of the Polish people."

HRDI called vital to labor's role in job training

Anaheim, Calif.—Active labor participation can overcome some of the deficiencies of the federal Job Training Partnership Act and open up employment and training opportunities for unemployed workers, the AFL-CIO said.

A convention resolution stressed that the federation's Human Resources Development Institute can contribute significantly to this effort. It called on HRDI to continue its technical assistance to the AFL-CIO's affiliates and central bodies so as to strengthen labor's role in the program.

The resolution noted that JTPA is "woefully underfunded." It criticized both the lack of income support for workers in training programs and the dominance of business interests.

But despite the difficulties, it urged, "labor must solidify and build on gains achieved so far, with a view to moving toward full partnership in the JTPA system."

The convention urged vigilance "to assure that JTPA funds support quality training leading to good jobs." It expressed the labor movement's "deep concern" at repeated Administration efforts to end national funding for HRDI activities and at reductions in funding levels.

The "special expertise" of the HRDI staff is needed, the resolution noted. It urged that HRDI maintain its national program structure so that it can continue its services to labor and the unemployed. Adequate funding by the Labor Dept. is "essential" to that goal, the convention said.

AFSCME wins vote in 3 Ohio elections

Columbus, Ohio—The State, County & Municipal Employees won statewide collective bargaining rights for three bargaining units with a total of 11,000 workers in a mail vote tallied Nov. 7. A fourth unit of 1,600 health professionals voted for representation by the Hospital & Health Care Employees.

AFSCME and its Ohio affiliate won majorities in an institutional security unit of 3,500, mostly prison guards; in a unit of some 5,800 paraprofessionals in human service jobs, and in a unit of 1,700 food, service, custodial and laundry workers.

The elections were part of a series being conducted to determine union representation for various groups of state employees under an Ohio collective bargaining law that went into effect last year.

Convention asks support for Idaho R-T-W battle

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO and its affiliates will help and encourage an attempt to nullify Idaho's "right-to-work" law prohibiting the union shop.

The Idaho AFL-CIO led a court battle to block implementation of the anti-union law, and carried on a successful petition campaign to put the issue on the ballot in the 1986 general election.

A convention resolution urged "full support" for the effort to kill the law and maintain full bargaining rights in Idaho.

Label Trades delegates press 'buy union' drive among U.S. consumers

Anaheim, Calif.—The impact of imports on American workers' jobs and the challenge of educating U.S. consumers to "Buy American/Buy Union" were the focus of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. convention here.

Key resolutions noted the need to develop a national policy on "fair trade" rather than an unworkable concept of "free trade." The convention stressed the key role of union workers in the marketplace, especially in supporting boycotts.

Label Trades President James E. Hatfield, president of the Glass, Pottery & Plastics Workers, told convention delegates that America's trade crisis "won't be solved by wage-cutting, union-bashing or presidential rhetoric." He noted that President Reagan still holds to an "outmoded notion of free trade."

While most other nations "use some combination of tariffs, quotas, state subsidies, local content rules, restrictive standards and license requirements, and require their trading partners to buy a certain amount of exports," Hatfield said, "we have a President who believes that simply asking other nations to buy our products is enough."

Sharp reminders

The department's "Buy American" program and the "Do Buy" list of fair employers "are sharp reminders of labor's strength through unity and solidarity," Hatfield assured the delegates. "By supporting union-made goods, we send a message to employers and merchants that working people want the quality of a 'Made in the U.S.A.' label and the dignity of a union shop." And with more than 13 million union members, "that message gets louder everyday," he said.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the delegates, "Talking here about imports and about America's trade problems is surely like talking to those already saved in church. You are in the trenches of that fight everyday."

In his convention speech, Donahue stressed that "a flood of imports continues to drive American-made goods from our own marketplace, draining our jobs and destroying communities. Those imports, most often produced under appalling working and living conditions, are afflicting many of our industries."

He assured the delegates that "in the real world, free trade is a bad joke. There is no such thing as free trade. I think more and more people clearly have come to realize that we have to stop the destruction of our industries and renounce whatever faith people have had in some imaginary free trade system."

Showcase for unions

Donahue cited the department's Union-Industries Show as an excellent example of labor's using its own resources and energies to showcase the message that American workers can compete with workers anywhere in the world and that they do share their employers' concerns for productivity, profitability and fairness.

Ian E. Reilly, president of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. of the Canadian Labor Congress, told the convention of the recent successful boycott sponsored by the Food & Commercial Workers against Kresge's department stores, a subsidiary of K-Mart. The boycott strategy included buttons, leaflets, stickers, a song, advertisements, a rally, and the threat of using radio ads made by Vicki Lawrence's character, Mama.

The "attitude in the nation is changing as more and more people are becoming aware of the problems we are facing," department Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara said. "They are becoming aware of the impact of imports on jobs."

Challenge detailed

The interest in "buy American" has grown, Mara noted, and if "we can convince American consumers to 'buy union,' then they'll know that it was made in America. That's the challenge before us."

Electrical Workers Sec. Jack F. Moore and H. Max Webster, secretary-treasurer of the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers, were sworn in as new vice presidents. They were elected by the department's executive board to fill out the terms of former IBEW Sec. Ralph A. Leigon and former Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers President Lawrence A. Holley, both of whom retired.

The convention's 146 delegates heard two groups of panelists discuss union label and service trades councils and boycotts.

Resolutions adopted by the convention included measures calling for the department to defeat any legislation that targets employee benefits for taxation, urging respect for picket lines, recommending that the union label be attached to work clothes and tools, urging full union support for boycotts, and supporting the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Davis-Bacon Act.

Other resolutions urged an increase in the federal minimum wage, proposed the creation of broad federal child and dependent care programs, and suggested federal regulation of cosmetic ingredients.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at Union Label convention exchanges quips with UL&STD President James E. Hatfield.

Participation urged in label week, show

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO designated Sept. 1-6, 1986, and Sept. 7-12, 1987, as the Union Label Weeks for the next two years and encouraged affiliates to participate in the annual AFL-CIO Union-Industries Show.

In a resolution delegates called on federation affiliates to "renew their efforts to promote Union Label Week" and see that programs of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. are "given their just due throughout the year."

As a part of the annual label week, state and local central bodies should secure proclamations from governors and mayors calling for observance of Union Label Week, the delegates said.

All affiliates were urged to participate in the annual show to "help assure the success of the show and improve the state of the American labor movement."

Sweeping reforms backed to bolster public education

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO convention reaffirmed labor's historic commitment to the public school system and its continued opposition to "vouchers, tuition tax credits or other schemes which would limit student opportunity and weaken public education."

Public schools are "the foundation of our democratic system," delegates said, and offering incentives to parents who put their children in private schools would "divert attention and resources from the real issues of teaching, education reform and adequate financial commitments."

The convention stressed the need for a program of sweeping education reform, including:

- Tests for beginning teachers that would set a high standard of competency.
- Certification requirements that put greater emphasis on competency in the subject matter and less stress on methods.
- Insistence that teacher-training institutions offer programs which provide reasonable assurance that graduates will be competent to enter the classroom.
- Requiring school boards to take affirmative action in hiring minorities as teachers and to remove artificial barriers which prevent qualified minorities from entering the profession.
- Radical increases in pay for beginning teachers and establishment of salary patterns that encourage teachers to stay.
- Greater sensitivity to teachers' needs.
- Implementation of fair and practical methods for removing incompetent teachers.

Labor believes that "every citizen is entitled to free public education of high quality to meet both individual needs and the needs of society," the convention said. "High unemployment, unprecedented budget cuts and demographic changes have had a disproportionate impact on our urban school systems," and federal and state governments must improve education in the central city schools.

During floor discussion, Lawrence Decresce of the State, County & Muncipal Employees in Ohio warned that the Reagan Administration's education budget cuts and its attempts to use tax money to encourage attendance in private schools could lead to "the demise of free public education" in America, leaving inner city schools to "the poor, the deprived and the minorities."

The resolution condemned White House efforts to slash college financial aid for the children of low- and middle-income families, adding: "We reject the notion that workers and their children must assume exorbitant debts in order to realize the benefits of higher education."

At the same time, they urged that consideration be given to establishing a grant program to serve needy adult students taking parttime college courses to help them enter the workforce, retrain for new careers, or gain skills needed for advancement in their present jobs.

Vocational funds needed

Hailing Congress for enacting new vocational education legislation which added programs for previously unserved groups, the convention urged that funds be appropriated to assist older workers, single parents and displaced homemakers.

The legislation opened the door for labor participation in vocational education and apprenticeship training, the resolution said, and affiliates should work with state bodies in putting union members on advisory councils.

The convention also called for adequate funding for university labor centers, the use of these facilities for union training programs, and collective bargaining agreements that provide funding for labor education.

In a related action, delegates expressed concern that labor is "largely ignored" in public schools, with the result that students lack "objective information to counter the generally negative images found in the media.

House Action Expected Soon On Needed Plant Closing Bill

Foreign imports and the damage they are doing to America's economy are beginning to get the attention they deserve, both in Congress and in the media. But what about the trauma suffered by working communities when corporations suddenly pull up stakes and move their operations?

Often the decision to close is completely unexpected, leaving entire towns devastated, totally unprepared. The AFL-CIO maintains that if a company must close its doors, the owners have a responsibility to the community and the workers. Legislation expected to reach the House floor this week would require companies with 50 or more employees to be laid off to give advance notice and affected workers would have input into the decision to close.

H.R. 1616, sponsored by Reps. William Ford (D-MI), Silvio Conte (R-MA) and William Clay (D-MO) would:

- Require employers to give three months' advance notice before a permanent plant closing. Notice would be given to the employees, the union, if any, and the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service (FMCS).
- Prevent plant closings unless and until the employer has met with representatives, if any, of the employees, and consulted in good faith for the purpose of reaching a mutually satisfactory alternative or modification to the plant closing plan. Only in the case of "unavoidable business circumstances" could a time of less than 90 days notice apply.
- Direct the Secretary of Labor to take action and seek injunctive relief if an employer has ordered the closing of a plant in violation of the Act.
- Establish a 15-member National Commission on Plant Closings and Worker Dislocation to study and report legislative recommendations concerning closings.

H.R. 1616 is a modest proposal to bring some structured protection to working families, and with 173 House members already signed on as cosponsors, it has a good chance of passage this year. A concerted effort is being mounted by the opposition to thwart the measure.

The most serious threat will likely come in the form of a substitute bill from Reps. Jeffords (R-VT) or Gunderson (R-WI). The GOP version would cut the heart out of the bill by shortening the notice period from 90 to 60 days and greatly reducing its injunctive powers.

H.R. 1616 does not prevent failing companies from closing their facilities. It only gives working families early warning and a voice in the final outcome. To insure its passage, workers should contact their representatives as soon as possible. Make sure they vote for H.R. 1616.

Bill Helps Family Farms, Ups Cargo For U.S. Ships

A vote on legislation to help America's threatened family farmers is expected soon in the Senate.

The AFL-CIO has supported the farm groups in their quest for legislation to preserve family farms and to provide a satisfactory income to farmers, who consume 40 percent of the goods U.S. workers produce.

An amendment to the Omnibus Farm Bill, S. 1714, will be offered by Senator Tom Harkin (D-IA). It includes a system of voluntary production controls for those involved in feed and grain production.

Under the plan, farmers would agree to limit their production of these commodities in exchange for higher government price supports, a feature considered necessary for many to survive. Under a uniquely democratic plan, participating farmers would themselves vote on whether or not to implement the controls.

Also included in S. 1714 is important cargo preference language insuring that the bulk of these U.S.-produced feeds and grains are shipped overseas in U.S.-flag vessels. Under the existing PL 480 program, 50 percent of these cargos are already shipped in U.S.-flag bottoms. With the new law, this percentage would increase to 75 over the next three years.

Gramm-Rudman Continues To Bounce Back And Forth

The Gramm-Rudman ping-pong game continues between the House and Senate, with no one wanting to touch the hot potato. On the surface it looks like the members are working to reduce the deficit, but most know in their hearts that the Gramm-Rudman Balanced Budget Amendment cannot and will not do it.

They have also learned that it's possible to raid the Social Security trust fund to keep the government running beyond the budget deadline, so the entire process could continue to drag on.

In the meantime important trade legislation, tax reform and other measures must wait their turn.

Bill Outlawing Polygraph Could Clear House Soon

The House is expected to move this session on important legislation to protect workers against polygraph interrogation by employers. The bill H.R. 1524 was reported out of the House Education and Labor Committee October 23, and is ready for floor action. 165 House members have cosponsored.

Strong opposition is coming from some corporations and there is a move to retain the demoralizing tests for security guards, jewelers and employees of large drug store chains. Presently, the bill only allows polygraph testing for national security positions and in cases where a drug store has experienced an actual theft.

In the Senate, Orrin Hatch (R-UT) and Edward Kennedy (D-MA) have introduced identical legislation to outlaw these tests, demonstrating the widespread, bipartisan opposition that exists to polygraphs.

Grassroots Action Helped Move Important Textile Legislation

There is more to grassroots lobbying than winning "right" votes. Recently, activists in Illinois' third congressional district met with their congressman, Democrat Marty Russo. At the same time, workers in South Carolina's fifth district were lobbying Republican John Spratt, both in support of H.R. 1562, the textile bill.

In both cases, grassroots lobbyists came out of their sessions with a commitment, but with an added bonus. The two congressmen volunteered to lobby their colleagues in support of the measure. This member-to-member lobbying proved critical to House passage of the bill.

Meanwhile, activists from the Vermont At-Large Legislative Action Committee thought they had a commitment from Republican James Jeffords on the textile bill. But rumors had it he was considering changing his mind. LAC activists redoubled their efforts and Jeffords remained "right" on the bill.

Members of Iowa's sixth district had a special problem with their congressman -- Democrat Berkley Bedell. His family operates a fishing business that relies heavily on imported items. They would never get his vote, they were told.

But the grassroots lobbyists refused to take "no" for an answer and Bedell finally agreed to vote "present" rather than vote against the bill. Meanwhile, the other five Iowa representatives voted wrong. Every little bit helps!

Key Prevailing Wage Victory In Senate

Anti-worker elements in the U.S. Senate tried to severely limit Davis-Bacon prevailing wage protections for workers on military construction projects November 7, but the measure was ultimately killed by the full Senate.

Senator Mack Mattingly (R-GA) inserted language into the Military Construction Appropriations bill that limited Davis-Bacon protections to only those workers on projects valued at $1 million or more. Under present law, any project valued over $2,000 is covered.

On a procedural vote, senators voted 45 to 49 in support of workers to declare the amendment not germane and thereby strike the damaging language.

Senate votes to curb imports

Fighting for their jobs

Texas union members marched through downtown Austin for a "Buy American" rally at the Texas AFL-CIO headquarters. Imports have already wiped out 50,000 jobs in the state. The union demonstrators welcomed Democratic Gov. Mark White's support for labor-backed trade legislation pending in Congress. The governor is flanked by State AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard and Sec.-Treas. Joe D. Gunn. (Story on Page 2.)

White House repudiated on textiles, shoes

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted 60-39 for a job-saving bill that would set realistic and enforceable quotas on textile, clothing and shoe imports.

The House passed a similar, labor-backed bill last month by a 262-159 vote, and may accept the Senate version to head off any threat of delaying tactics. The White House, which has warned of a presidential veto, had sought unsuccessfully to sidetrack the bill and spare President Reagan a direct confrontation with Congress.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed labor's concerns in an urgent message to every senator on the eve of the vote.

The import-battered textile and apparel industry employs one out of eight industrial workers and the legislation is "crucial" to its survival, Kirkland said. He noted also that the women and minorities who make up a large part of the threatened workforce are least likely to have alternative job opportunities.

Passage of the legislation has been a high-priority goal of the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing & Textile Workers, whose members' jobs are at stake. The two unions helped forge a coalition with textile and garment manufacturers and political allies from both parties.

The Senate included the equally threatened shoe industry in its bill and also adopted an amendment directing the Administration to initiate talks with copper-producing countries in an effort to limit the import share of the U.S. market.

Roll back imports

The Senate version would roll back textile imports from South Korea and Taiwan—the biggest suppliers—by 30 percent and cut imports from Hong Kong by about 14 percent. Imports from China, Japan, Pakistan, Indonesia, India, the Philippines, Thailand, Brazil and Singapore would be frozen at 1984 levels.

Imports of non-rubber footwear would be limited to 60 percent of the U.S. market. Shoe imports now have taken over about 76 percent of the market.

Despite the Administration pressure, Republicans broke ranks to put a bipartisan stamp on the bill.

On the final vote, 35 Democrats and 25 Republicans voted for the bill; 28 Republicans and 11 Democrats opposed it.

Senate Republican leaders scheduled a vote on the textile import bill after its sponsors agreed not to try to attach it to an

House cuts back, then sidetracks plant closing bill

The House sidetracked a labor-supported bill to require employers to give a 90-day advance notice of plant closings, explain the reason for a planned shutdown, and consider union proposals for alternatives that would preserve jobs.

Passage of a Republican-sponsored amendment that seriously weakened an already modest bill caused its chief sponsors to postpone further consideration of the measure. That kept open the possibility of reshaping the bill to win broader support without sacrificing its effectiveness.

The measure the House debated for most of two days had already been trimmed back from earlier proposals in the hope of gaining broad bipartisan support.

But Republicans voted almost solidly for an amendment that eliminated all requirements for consultation on alternatives to a shutdown, and were joined by about one-fourth of the Democrats.

Big rise in job injuries tied to enforcement lag

By Arlee C. Green

The Reagan Administration's weak enforcement of job safety and health regulations were blamed by the AFL-CIO for significant increases in work-related injuries, illnesses and fatalities.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics's newly published annual occupational injury and illness report for 1984 shows "serious health and safety problems throughout American industry," said Margaret Seminario, the federation's top occupational safety specialist.

"These problems are getting worse," Seminario said. "The statistics confirm that Reagan Administration policies of weak enforcement and deregulation do not protect workers."

The combined injury and illness rates per 100 full-time workers posted increases in nearly every occupational category. In construction, services and wholesale and retail trades, they reached record levels under the Reagan Administration.

An analysis of the survey data reveals:

- The annual increase in the injury and illness rate from 1983 to 1984 is the largest ever since the OSHA survey was initiated.
- There were 565,600 more work-related injuries and illnesses reported in 1984 than a year earlier—an increase of 11.7 percent. Occupational deaths rose by 640 to 3,740.
- For the first time in the survey's history, the rate of "less serious" injuries increased, as did the rate of serious injuries resulting in time off the job.
- The number of occupational illnesses increased by more than 17 percent.

The annual report is based on a BLS survey of about 280,000 employers. More than five million jobsites are regulated by OSHA.

Labor Sec. William E. Brock said he is "deeply concerned and disturbed" by the report and promised to "re-examine, re-evaluate and re-double our efforts to assure we are doing everything possible to make the American workplace as safe as it can be."

Early in the Reagan Administration, OSHA switched to a cooperative approach with business and cut its inspection force by some 25 percent. "Workers are now bearing the scars of that deregulatory effort," Seminario said.

The total incidence of injury per 100 workers in construction, which has been targeted by OSHA for increased on-site inspections, reached 15.4, its highest point during the Reagan Administration. By contrast, the rate was 14.9 in 1981 and and 14.5 in 1982.

The most hazardous occupations were in the lumber and wood products industries where the rate of injuries per 100 workers hit 19.3, up from 18.1 a year earlier.

Injuries in the forestry segment also rose from 9.8 to 13.5 per 100 workers.

Bishop's freedom letter

The AFL-CIO is spurring an intensive drive to obtain a million signatures on a "Freedom Letter" supporting Bishop Desmond Tutu's "non-violent fight against apartheid" in South Africa.

Moving to implement a strongly worded resolution adopted at the 30th anniversary convention in Anaheim, Calif., President Lane Kirkland called on affiliates to reproduce and circulate copies of the letter so that the signature drive can be completed in November.

Quoting the words of the resolution, Kirkland said the petition campaign is to let Tutu "and our black brother and sister trade unionists in South Africa know that Jerry Falwell does not speak for America."

On a recent visit to Pretoria, Falwell was critical of Tutu, charging that the bishop did not speak for South Africa's black majority.

Kirkland has urged all affiliates and state and local central bodies to return all signed petitions to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights as soon as they are completed.

A fair share

Organizing & Field Services Deputy Director Donald Slaiman briefs members of new AFL-CIO committee pursuing full affiliation of union members with state and local central bodies. The 58-member committee, which held its first meeting at federation headquarters, was designated by international union presidents to "aggressively promote voluntary affiliations." The project follows up on a convention resolution which stressed the "critical importance" of the state and local bodies and instructed the federation to pursue full affiliation.

ILO prescribes safeguards for all health care workers

Geneva—A panel convened by the International Labor Organization prescribed better pay, shorter hours and collective bargaining for health care workers through out the world.

The tripartite group—drawn from unions, management and government—called for worldwide acceptance of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining for all health and medical service personnel.

It found that health workers generally are underpaid in view of the long hours and heavy responsibilities of their jobs.

An ILO statement summarizing the week-long meeting cited "imbalances" in salaries in the health field, especially for women workers. It said the principle of equal pay for equal work must be applied and urged that pay in general be improved in order to attract and keep qualified workers.

Victor Gotbaum, executive director of New York City's District 37 of the State, County & Municipal Employees, said at the meeting's end that health care workers "get the short end of the stick" because they are often not organized and because women make up about 80 percent of the workforce.

The result, he said, is "double discrimination" through lack of representation and sex bias in pay.

Gotbaum, who was the American worker participant in the meeting, said management has argued that health workers should be denied rights that other workers have because of the sometimes "life-or-death" importance of their work. But the pay levels don't reflect that importance, he stressed, and hospital managements have resisted such basic rights as arbitration of grievances.

The ILO statement said that health and medical service employees should have the right to strike in cases where patients would not be endangered.

Any restrictions on the right to strike should be limited to strictly construed essential services, the group affirmed. It said union representatives should be involved in the decision of the functions that should be maintained.

Shorter hours

The ILO summary also urged a reduction of hours to not more than 40 in a week, and longer hours in an emergency should be offset by longer rest periods.

It called for efforts to assure two consecutive days off for health workers. Under no conditions should an employee have less than 24 consecutive hours off in a seven-day week, the panel said.

It said workers should be allowed to claim exemption from performance of duties that conflict with their religious or ethical convictions, except when emergency treatment is required and no staff substitutions are possible.

The meeting also adopted a resolution urging the ILO to establish a standing committee for health and medical services.

Teachers hit voucher scheme as assault on public education

Teachers President Albert Shanker sharply criticized a Reagan Administration proposal to replace direct grants to public schools for educating disadvantaged students with vouchers usable in private as well as public schools.

The plan, announced by Education Sec. William J. Bennett, emerged as another attempt by the Administration to get around the Constitution's prohibition against using federal funds to support sectarian schools.

"At a time when every state is focusing vast amounts of attention on improving our schools," Shanker said, "we view this latest attempt to divert money to private schools as a slap in the face."

He predicted that neither Congress nor the public would be "lulled by the rhetoric" of Administration claims that the plan "addresses the needs of the poor."

Concept challenged

The government currently spends $3.6 billion a year to help local school districts finance remedial education programs for disadvantaged children. Under the proposed legislation, the money would continue to flow to school districts, but parents would have the right to demand vouchers—worth an average of $600 per child per year—to pay for private school tuition or services in another public school.

Bennett rejected charges that it was an attempt to find a new way to underwrite sectarian schools with federal dollars, contending that the money would go to parents rather than to particular schools.

The proposal, he said, would spur "a healthy rivalry" between public and private schools—the same catch-phrase he has employed in the past to describe Administration initiatives in support of private education.

Shanker pointed to studies made by the Dept. of Education which show dramatic gains in the reading skills of students receiving services under the present system. The Administration's plan, he said, "represents the cannibalization of a program with a proven track record."

Transit workers balloting on new Greyhound offer

Phoenix—With jobs disappearing at Greyhound Lines, Inc., 10,000 members of the Amalgamated Transit Union have begun balloting on a new long-term contract that would guarantee employment to drivers and maintenance workers with 10 years of service.

The new contract, which would run through Oct. 31, 1989, would also give "voluntary separation incentives" ranging from $5,000 for furloughed workers with five years of service to $1,000 for active employes with two years of service. It would also provide retirement supplements for those taking early retirement.

The dwindling employment is the result of a company plan to eliminate 2,500 jobs at its terminals over the next four years by turning their operation over to "commission agencies." It promised to give ticket agents and baggage handlers "preference" when it selects the commission agents.

Shutdown threat

Although the existing agreement negotiated after a seven-week strike in 1983 still had a year to run, the company forced reopening of the contract under a threat to shut down major parts of its operation and turn them over to a non-union subsidiary.

The company said it would close its entire New England operations and shift the business to Vermont Transit, a partially owned non-union subsidiary. The ATU said similar moves were threatened in Texas, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Tennessee.

The ATU's Council of Greyhound Local Unions voted to send the proposal out to the members without a recommendation, after the panel narrowly defeated a move to reject it.

The contract would freeze wages for the next four years and eliminate cost-of-living allowances scheduled for May and August 1986.

The only exception would be a 7.8 percent increase for maintenance workers, bringing their pay to $10.57 an hour. The company also agreed to increase health and welfare contributions from $100 to $120 per month per employee.

Senate adopts labor-backed import quotas

unrelated, Administration-sought measure.

A filibuster threat was quickly squelched by a 91-6 vote to limit debate, and a series of labor-opposed amendments that would have weakened the legislation were defeated by approximately two-to-one margins. An example was an amendment by Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Tex.), who termed Hong Kong "a paragon of fairness" in trade relations and sought to exempt it from trade restrictions. His amendment was rejected, 68-30.

In the heated debate over trade legislation, the White House and retail trade associations raised the specter of higher prices for consumers if import curbs were enacted.

But supporters of the measure countered that argument by displaying clothing purchased from the counters of leading stores. Clothing items made abroad, were found to be selling for the same price as those made in the United States.

Earlier this year, the International Trade Commission found unanimously that the U.S. shoe industry had been seriously damaged by imports and recommended that President Reagan place quotas on footwear imports retailing for more than $5 a pair.

Reagan rejected the recommendation, dooming another American industry to virtual extinction. The Senate's addition of shoes to the import quota bill dissented from this presidential verdict.

Patty Duke heads Screen Actors

Hollywood, Calif.—Oscar and Emmy Award winner Patty Duke was elected president of the Screen Actors Guild.

She is the second woman in SAG's 52-year history to hold the top elected post.

Duke won 58 percent of the ballots cast in a four-way race for the presidency. She received 10,831 votes compared to 7,419 for her nearest competitor, Ed Nelson.

She succeeds Edward Asner as president of the 58,000-member union. Asner, who did not seek re-election, won a newly created seat on SAG's board of directors.

Texas labor mounts anti-import drive

Austin, Tex.—Fighting back against imports that have already destroyed more than 50,000 jobs in this state, Texas union members have rolled up their sleeves and launched a "Buy American" counterattack.

Braving a driving rain, 5,000 union members gathered for a massive rally outside the Texas AFL-CIO headquarters here, one block from the state capitol, after marching through downtown Austin.

Standing in front of a 96-by-18-foot "Buy American" banner which covered the entire front of the federation's office building, State AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard said the rally was "only the beginning" of a long-range campaign to put Texas industries back in business and workers back on the job.

The backdrop included charts showing the relationship between the sharp increase in the trade deficit and the disappearance of Texas production jobs.

Over 50,000 workers have lost their jobs in the state's steel, oil refining, textile and clothing industries because of imports, Hubbard said as he issued a call for a coordinated plan of mass media and targeted direct mailings to push American-made goods.

It will be the same kind of all-out labor effort, he said, "just like we would use if we were running a political campaign."

Decisions needed

Sen. Lloyd Bentsen (D-Tex.), the keynote speaker at the rally sponsored by the state federation and 18 national and international unions, threw down the gauntlet, declaring:

"The leaders of this country have to decide who they are for—the Port of Hong Kong or Port Arthur, Tex.; Seoul, Korea, or Daingerfield, Tex.; Tokyo or Houston."

Port Arthur is the home of the state's largest oil refineries and Daingerfield is a small East Texas town where employment at the import-battered Lone Star Steel Co. has plunged from 5,000 jobs to only 2,000.

Bentsen, co-author of legislation to slap a 25 percent tariff on products from countries which erect trade barriers against U.S.-produced goods, said that "more and more, people in both parties are saying they want a fair trade bill passed now."

Gov. Mark White (D) threw his full support behind trade restrictions, particularly on oil and refined oil products, in order to bolster the state's sagging economy.

Just the day before the rally, the U.S. Dept. of Labor released figures showing that unemployment in Texas stood at 8.1 percent—a full percentage point above the national average.

It marked the first time since unemployment records had been kept by the state that Texas joblessness was higher than the national average, Hubbard told the rally. The job loss, he said, was "a direct result of imports."

Compromise on overtime gives public employees long-overdue protection

President Reagan signed into law an amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act that left both sides to a once-bitter dispute satisfied.

Its enactment was hailed as a demonstration that the give-and-take of the bargaining table can be equally useful in the shaping of legislation.

At issue was overtime coverage for employees of state and local governments, who had originally been excluded from the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Congress voted to bring them under the wage-hour law in 1974, but the extension never went into effect because of a 5-4 Supreme Court decision that it would violate the states' rights clause of the Constitution.

The constitutional challenge was brought by the National League of Cities, representing public employers. The decision, which stood for 10 years, was referred to as the National League of Cities case.

But earlier this year, the Supreme Court had second thoughts and a switch of one vote reversed the ruling.

Local and state governments appealed to Congress for relief against what they claimed would be huge overtime costs. At their prodding, bills were introduced in both the Senate and House to remove public sector workers from the overtime pay requirement.

Unions representing public employees fought the takeback legislation and accused mayors and governors of exaggerating the cost. Good management could minimize costs, the unions asserted. And the arguments being raised against coverage, they noted, had been considered—and rejected—by Congress when it enacted the 1974 law.

With the outcome uncertain, both sides and key members of Congress from both parties began informal talks that led to the breakthrough agreement that quickly was enacted into law.

The legislation allows local and state governments to reach advance agreements with their employees to substitute compensatory time off for overtime pay after 40 hours a week. But "comp time" must be computed at the same time-and-one-half rate as cash payments. Thus, a 42-hour workweek would entitle a worker to three hours of paid leave.

Key breakthrough

Establishment of time-and-one-half principal for compensatory time off as well as cash payments for overtime was regarded as a major breakthrough by the public sector unions.

The legislation defers the enforcement of the overtime pay requirement until April 1986. It limits the accumulation of compensatory time off to 240 hours for most workers and 480 hours for public safety and emergency workers. After the limit is reached all overtime must be paid in cash. The bill also prohibits public employers from retaliating against workers who assert their rights to overtime compensation.

In a letter urging congressional support of the negotiated agreement, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison termed the measure "a carefully balanced approach" that "preserves the integrity of the Fair Labor Standards Act, which is so vital to the interests of employees, while addressing the concerns of public employers."

Labor Sec. William E. Brock termed the outcome "a responsible consensus" achieved through "tough bargaining on all sides."

Auto Workers get pattern gains in Dynamics accord

Detroit—The Auto Workers ended a seven-week strike against five General Dynamics plants, ratifying a contract patterned after the recently negotiated UAW agreement with Chrysler Corp.

The three-year contract, retroactive to June 5, provides a $2,000 up-front bonus for 5,000 production workers plus a 2.25-percent wage increase this year. Workers will also receive a lump-sum payment in the second year equal to 2.25 percent of their base wage, and a 3-percent pay hike in the third year.

UAW Vice President Marc Stepp said that the key to the settlement was the company's pledge not to discharge 101 union members accused of picketline confrontations.

As soon as the contract was ratified, by a 53.4 percent vote, workers began returning to their jobs at installations in Michigan, Ohio and Pennsylvania where the company produces Army tanks under a long-term contract with the Defense Dept.

White-collar workers at the five plants settled their contract in June.

The UAW called the General Dynamics agreement the union's "best defense contract."

United Garment Workers move offices to Nashville

Nashville, Tenn.—The headquarters of the United Garment Workers was moved to Nashville after 94 years in the New York City area.

The relocation brings the 28,000-member union and its general office closer to members in the South and Midwest, UGWA President William O'Donnell said.

The union will celebrate its 100th anniversary in 1991.

Women's work

"Women of Steel" won first place in the prestigious Women at Work Broadcast Awards, sponsored by the National Commission on Working Women. The documentary examines the lives of three women steelworkers who must readjust to low-wage "pink-collar jobs" following layoffs from mills in western Pennsylvania. Beth Destler, Steffi Domike and Linny Stovall, all former steelworkers, and Allyn Stewart produced the documentary with financial help from the USWA and the Labor Institute of Public Affairs. Sherrie Ortallona, left, worked nine years at Monessen's Wheeling-Pittsburg plant.

Pilots end Continental strike, gain senority, severance pay

Houston—Air Line Pilots—on strike against Continental Airlines for the last two years—began returning to work after a final, binding, non-appealable court order that ended one of the longest pilot walkouts in history.

Bankruptcy Judge Glover Roberts ordered the airline to provide seniority protection for returning pilots, grant severance pay for those who choose not to go back to Continental, and reinstate pensions which the company had withheld since the strike began on Oct. 1, 1983.

As a result of the settlement, the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. lifted its nationwide boycott against the airline. The boycott was put into effect in December 1983.

ALPA members are going back to work, with full seniority rights, as positions become available. Those who elect the severance option will receive up to $4,000 for each year of service to provide a financial cushion while they make the transition to another airline or another career.

"As with all third-party decisions, we didn't get everything we wanted," said ALPA President Henry Duffy. But seniority reinstatement, severance pay and the retirement fund issue "were on the top of our list," he added.

The Machinists and an unaffiliated flight attendants union which also walked out in 1983, settled their contract disputes with the airline six months ago. With the return of the pilots, "the Continental strike has now ended," Duffy said.

The dispute was precipitated when Continental filed for bankruptcy on Sept. 24, 1983, abrogating its collective bargaining agreement with the unions.

In the wake of Continental's action, federal laws were revised to prevent other companies from using bankruptcy proceedings as a shield behind which to hide their efforts to break union contracts.

Unions call for broader job safety, health laws

Two panels of union representatives, testifying at separate House hearings, urged legislation to alert workers to occupational health risks to which they have been exposed and backed a bill establishing a federal system of compensation for victims of occupational diseases.

Both measures were strongly supported in a resolution on workers' compensation adopted at the recent AFL-CIO convention.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison, with Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel and Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert A. Georgine, testified to the inadequacy of state compensation laws in dealing with the long-term consequences of exposure to asbestos and other disease-causing substances.

They told a House Labor Standards subcommittee headed by Rep. Austin J. Murphy (D-Pa.) that a federal law is needed because less than 10 percent of occupational disease victims are compensated under state programs—and in almost all cases only after lengthy and costly court battles.

The union witnesses urged approval of the bill introduced by Rep. Pat Williams (D-Mont.), which would set up a federal program to compensate persons disabled by exposure to asbestos fibers in the workplace, and establish procedures for designating other occupational ailments as eligible for the federal compensation program.

"One out of every four blue-collar workers will die from occupationally related cancers," Denison reminded the subcommittee. By the end of the century, deaths from asbestos alone are expected to reach 200,000, he said.

The labor-supported bill would eliminate the present need under state laws for stringent proof of the link between a disease and its occupational cause. Thus a worker exposed to asbestos who is stricken by a disease caused by exposure to asbestos would be entitled to compensation.

Damage suits

The Williams bill would also allow workers to sue third parties responsible for their ailments, such as the manufacturer of a hazardous product. But any compensation paid under the federal program would be deducted from the amount received through a court suit.

Both Samuel and Georgine strongly endorsed the bill's procedure for adding occupational illnesses other than those linked to asbestos to the compensation list on the basis of medical research.

Samuel noted that conventional state laws require a cause-and-effect proof that is almost impossible to demonstrate in many late-developing occupational illnesses. Georgine cited examples of the many hazardous substances that construction workers encounter on the job, and noted that the most recent employer might bear little or no responsibility for the toxic exposure.

In a related area, a House Subcommittee on Health & Safety heard strong labor endorsement of a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.) to require notification and medical examination follow-ups of workers who have been exposed to hazardous substances.

Margaret Seminario, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety, Health & Social Security, said existing requirements for medical surveillance of workers exposed to toxic substances or high noise levels apply only to the present workforce.

There is no monitoring or notification requirement for workers who were previously exposed, she stressed.

Sheldon Samuels, who heads the IUD's safety and health department, charged that government agencies that are supposed to be concerned with the welfare of workers have caved in to pressures from business trade associations. Opposition to the Gaydos bill from the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health & Human Services "is being coordinated by the Office of Management & Budget," Samuels charged.

Two Auto Workers' health experts, Dr. Franklin E. Mirer and Dr. Michael A. Silverstein, said health hazards can be minimized through effective government programs, but there are too many cases where this isn't being done.

Wider federal role

Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan noted that the Gaydos bill would expand federal research to identify groups of workers at risk, as well as establish a federal program to notify exposed employees and former workers, and provide medical testing.

"This is a good bill," he testified, "a workable bill, a reasonable bill."

Dr. Kenneth Miller, occupational health physician for the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, told the subcommittee that the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health has information pertaining to the health risk status of hundreds of thousands of workers who have not been notified that they are in a risk category "and thus cannot act to protect themselves." Other government agencies have similar knowledge, he said, urging action on the legislation.

Birth of the CIO bolsters cause of industrial democracy

By Henry C. Fleisher

Fifty years ago—on Nov. 9, 1935—a new, exciting and turbulent epoch in the history of American labor was opened with a low-key announcement from John Llewellyn Lewis, president of the United Mine Workers. Together with seven other AFL union leaders, he revealed the establishment of a new Committee for Industrial Organization—the CIO.

The committee's purpose: "to encourage and promote organization of the workers in the mass production and unorganized industries of the nation . . . its function will be educational and advisory . . . other organizations interested in advancing organization work along the lines of industrial unionism will be invited to participate . . ."

That announcement marked the beginning of a new labor movement. Within months, the CIO was functioning as an independent entity with a Washington headquarters; it had a score or more of affiliated unions; it had launched major and ultimately successful organizing campaigns in the steel, auto, rubber, glass, textile, packinghouse and other industries; it had garnered a vast amount of national attention, and outpourings of both love and hate for the dramatic figure of Lewis; it had been branded as a rival, dual organization by the AFL, and its unions were eventually expelled; it was emotionally hailed for its contributions to furthering the cause of "industrial democracy" and condemned—sometimes hysterically—for various arrangements through which it utilized for several years the talents and received the support of American communists and fellow travelers.

The CIO increased the rosters of its affiliated unions up to a claimed four million members within just three years—and paradoxically nudged the leadership of the AFL into financing its own organizing activity which brought in, by the end of World War II, even more members than the CIO could claim.

Was it the purpose of the founders of the CIO merely to push the cause of industrial unionism within the existing structure of the AFL? Or, as some of its most active adversaries in the AFL continually claimed, was the real intent to form a rival labor federation?

Question of flexibility

Professor Walter Galenson of Cornell University, in his carefully researched volume "The CIO Challenge to the AFL" (Harvard University Press, 1960) concludes that most of the original CIO group would have been content if the AFL leadership had been more flexible on the industrial union issue. But he infers from some remarks of Lewis, and some unilateral actions by the CIO leader, that Lewis may from the beginning have sought to create a rival federation. On the other hand, Galenson found words of William Green that suggested that a deep seated skepticism that the steel industry could ever be organized—a belief that might have led to a less than flexible reaction to the CIO proposals.

Thus, however restrained the actual words of the original CIO declaration may have been, the decision to form a committee without advance consultation with the AFL leadership was bound to be inflammatory. It marked a new eruption in a dispute that had wracked the American Federation of Labor for more than two years—whether industrial (or "vertical") unions should be given full jurisdiction in the great mass production industries which had resisted union organization for decades, or whether a place existed in these industries for the extension of craft (or "horizontal") unionism.

Lewis and his allies among the industrial unions argued that the success of organizing those corporate bastions depended on assuring the workers that they would stay united, in one bargaining unit—not "carved up" into various craft groups. To do so, he argued, would be to dissipate union strength and discourage workers from signing a union application card.

To many of the craft union leaders in the AFL, however, that view ignored the successful tradition of craft organization which had permitted the unions of the AFL to survive during a period—in the 19th and early 20th century—when various industrial union movements had bubbled up and as quickly deflated and disappeared.

The craft-industrial union issue had been a major preoccupation of the 1934 AFL convention in San Francisco. There, after several days of behind-the-scenes meetings, the resolutions committee brought out a compromise resolution. It had been negotiated by Lewis and Charles Howard of the Typographical Union, as spokesmen for the industrial union bloc; and by Matthew Woll, president of the Photoengravers and chairman of the resolutions committee, and John P. Frey, head of the Metal Trades Dept., two leading exponents of the craft union position.

An unsettling question

The resolution was interpreted by the New York Times and others as a clear victory for the industrial union forces, and Lewis complimented the committee for its report. But Arthur Wharton of the Machinists and W.L. (Bill) Hutcheson of the Carpenters, both strongly oriented to the craft union position, asked a number of questions about the effect of the resolution and "appeared to be satisfied." That suggests that they felt the language contained sufficient safeguards for the craft union position. Perhaps the most enthusiastic statement came from President Frank Martel of the Detroit Federation of Labor—who had been in the center of swirling craft-industrial disputes in the auto industry; he said, optimistically, that the report "settles that question for all time." But a year later, events proved that the dispute was far from settled.

The 1934 compromise language expressed recognition of the value of the industrial union form of organization in the mass production industries even though, the majority report said, "craft organization is most effective . . . where the nature of the industry is such that lines of demarcation between crafts are distinguishable." So the convention told the executive council—now expanded, after some campaigning by Lewis, from 11 to 18 members, to use its good judgment on these matters. The council—with only a small number of industrial unionists—then offered to the Rubber Workers and the Automobile Workers charters which straddled the issue.

At the 1935 AFL convention, it was clear to the industrial union group that the 1934 resolution on union jurisdiction had proven to be far from effective. A URW delegate said that craft unions had taken members organized by his industrial union, and that the Rubber Workers would "never again" permit such a development. Emotions ran high. President William Hutcheson of the Carpenters at one juncture offered a point of order that the industrial union question had already been disposed of. John L. Lewis moved over to talk with Hutcheson, and in a few moments blows were struck as the two rather stately and substantial gentlemen fell to the floor. ("He called me a foul name," Lewis told Louis Stark, the labor reporter of the New York Times.)

The conflict rages

For the next several years, the conflict between the AFL and the unions of the CIO was waged on many fronts. In Washington the battle was carried on in a framework of diplomatic struggle.

For the AFL, the issue had moved from the narrow policy issue of industrial vs. craft unionism to a question of organizational integrity. The CIO was a "rival, dual" organization, said the AFL's strict constructionists. Let it dissolve its structure, let it relinquish its "disruptive" activities, let its unions return individually to "the house of labor"—and then a new look could be taken at the most appropriate form for unions in the mass production industries.

For Lewis and increasingly for his associates in the CIO leadership, the AFL offer was not good enough, by far. In the CIO view, the intransigence of the AFL's "old line" leadership had forced the industrial unions to act as they had. To "return to the house of labor" implied both a sense of guilt and of contrition which they did not feel. At least in the early years, moreover, there was an attitude upon the part of many CIO people that they were "the wave of the future," that their organization would soon be the dominant force in American labor . . . that the AFL would eventually be left with few unions outside the building trades. Somewhat later, Lewis still further enraged the craft unionists by blandly announcing one day the creation of a "United Construction Workers Organizing Committee" to bring industrial unionism to the construction industry. Except in a few places where Lewis had political influence, it enrolled only insignificant members of workers.

Lewis frequently took a stronger, less diplomatic position on the role of the CIO than some of his colleagues. Both Sidney Hillman of the men's Clothing Workers and David Dubinsky of the Ladies' Garment Workers spoke at times of achieving the limited objectives of industrial union organizing with minimum damage to relationships with the AFL, and of re-creating labor unity.

The first secretary of the CIO, President Charles P. Howard of the Typographical Union, tried to play peacemaker while stressing his personal belief in the industrial union position. Howard's role, however, was complicated by the fact that he was in the CIO as an individual; the ITU never affiliated with the new group, although it officially permitted Howard to function. After Howard's death in 1937, the ITU played little part in CIO affairs.

In November 1935, only 14 months after having been elected to the expanded AFL executive council, Lewis resigned from that AFL body, apparently without consultation with his CIO associates. Explaining the CIO viewpoint to the public for the first time in a national radio speech, Lewis talked of the "tragic failure" of the craft unions. The CIO's purpose, he said, is to "encourage the formation of industrial unions . . . in the steel, automobile, rubber, glass, textile, radio and all other basic industries. We have no opposition to craft unions which are established and successfully functioning . . . . We hope that the significance of our movement will not be misunderstood." It was the CIO's belief, he maintained, that "this is not a conflict among unions or a striving for power among organized labor groups." Rather, in the Lewis view, a successful effort to organize the unorganized

Leading the way

Evidently, the first plans for creation of a CIO were discussed at an informal meeting in Atlantic City, N.J., during or immediately after the AFL convention of 1935.

In attendance were presidents of five unions: John L. Lewis, Mine Workers; Charles Howard, International Typographical Union; Sidney Hillman, Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and David Dubinsky, Ladies' Garment Workers.

An expanded group met for the same purpose—promoting industrial unionism—on Nov. 9, 1935. In addition to the "founding four," the new Committee for Industrial Organization included President Thomas McMahon of the United Textile Workers, Harvey C. Fremming of the Oil Field, Gas Well & Refinery Workers, Thomas Brown of the Mine Mill & Smelter Workers, and Max Zaritsky, head of the Cap & Millinery Workers Union.

While Howard was active for the few years before his death, the ITU never affiliated with the CIO. Dubinsky and Zaritsky, with concern and reservations about the wisdom of establishing a rival group, led their unions out of the CIO before its founding convention in 1938.

John Brophy, a Mine Worker who had had differences with Lewis in the past, was the first member of the CIO staff; he was named its director at the November 1935 meeting.

would spare America a repetition of what happened to the unions of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy—destruction at the hands of hostile political and economic forces.

Various people tried to head off a complete break between the new CIO committee and the federation. AFL President Green wrote to each member of the new CIO group urging that it be disbanded, since all unions were bound by the policy decisions of the AFL convention and since the CIO would inevitably be considered a dual organization. The always dramatic Lewis responded with a letter to the rather mild-mannered Green saying that it is ''bruited about'' that Green—a long time official of the Mine Workers—has ''private sympathies and individual inclinations'' in support of the industrial union group. If Green cared to ''disassociate'' himself from his position as head of the AFL, Lewis would step down as chairman of the CIO and turn the post over to Green. Needless to say, Green declined—but on many future occasions Lewis twitted, ridiculed or otherwise sought to humiliate his erstwhile brother from the Mine Workers.

The history of the relationship between the AFL and CIO during the next three years is a continuous series of negotiations, posturing and critical public statements between the two groups. Many leaders of the AFL felt the creation of the CIO to be an intolerable organizational affront, and there were almost immediate demands for suspension of at least some of the CIO unions. But rapid action was impossible; the AFL council, it developed, appeared to have no power to suspend an affiliate. In May 1936 the council called on the CIO unions to disband their ''rival and dual'' unit—an invitation that was quickly declined. By August, the council found the CIO unions guilty of dual union activities and threatened future suspension. At the 1936 convention the AFL delegates upheld the council's suspension motion—and, with the CIO unions not sending delegates, approved the move by a 10-1 majority. In April 1937, the Carpenters urged the AFL to hold a special convention to expel the CIO unions rather than keep them in a state of suspension, but it was decided that only a regular constitutional convention could consider such an action.

With negotiations over, the 1937 AFL convention gave the council the power to revoke the charters of the CIO affiliates, and early in 1938 the council cut the affiliation ties of seven CIO unions.

By the end of 1937, as Lewis had observed, the CIO had moved a long way, in just two years, toward its goal of organizing the workers of what are now referred to as the ''smokestack industries.'' Shortly after its formation, the CIO had given funds and lent experienced personnel to help the Rubber Workers win a bitter strike at Goodyear in Akron. Lewis, together with Philip Murray of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee and Sidney Hillman of the Clothing Workers, gave active support and participated in the top-level collective bargaining with General Motors, while offering the advice of experienced union leaders to the young officers of the Auto Workers.

Sit-in strikes

Early in 1937 a group of UAW strikers at Flint, Mich., hit on the idea that it would be both more comfortable and effective to strike against GM by sitting idle at their machines rather than picketing outside the gates in the harsh Michigan winter. The ''sit-in strikes'' infuriated the corporate world and much of the press, which depicted them as the illegal actions of ''radicals'' and ''revolutionaries.'' Lewis, commuting to Detroit from Washington, was able to persuade Gov. Frank Murphy (later a justice of the U.S. Supreme Court) not to listen to GM's entreaties to use the National Guard and the police to drive the strikers from the factories. Eventually, GM reluctantly signed an agreement with the young UAW, and the race to organize the auto industry gathered speed.

Just a few weeks later—on Mar. 2, 1937—a series of secret discussions between Lewis and Myron Taylor, chief executive of U.S. Steel, resulted in the signing of a recognition contract for the Steel Workers Organizing Committee.

Early CIO leaders: Sidney Hillman, John L. Lewis, Philip Murray and John Brophy.

U.S. Steel promised no discrimination or interference with employees who joined the steel union; it offered an hourly pay boost of 10 cents, with a daily minimum wage of $5; it consented to a five-day, 40-hour week, and an almost unheard-of week's vacation with pay each year; and it granted a seniority system and a grievance settling mechanism. It was a dramatic development in an industry that had long resisted unionism with hostility and force. Throughout the steel industry employees flocked to join the Steel Workers Organizing Committee. For Lewis and for his closest associate, Phil Murray, the chairman of the SWOC, it was a triumphant moment.

Thus, while negotiations and conversations, public and private, occasionally took place with the AFL, the CIO during the middle months of 1937 was feeling no pain about its status outside the federation.

AFL organizing push

In May of that year, the AFL reached a decision that it too must play a more activist role in organizing the unorganized—an objective to which it had paid respect in resolutions without taking corresponding steps for serious planning and programs. At a special conference in Cincinnati, the AFL leaders voted an assessment to finance an organizing campaign.

It was a wise decision. Expanding its organizing staff and taking advantage of the pro-union mood of the times, the unions of the AFL began a steady rise in membership that within a few years blotted out the dreams of some CIO people that they would enjoy the permanently dominant position on the American trade union scene.

The ''Little Steel'' strike in the spring of 1937 also helped end the aura of CIO invincibility that had arisen from its string of successes. The strike against four ''smaller'' steel companies—they were ''Little'' only when compared to ''Big'' U.S. Steel—found management hostile and determined to break the strike. In the conflict with Bethlehem, Youngstown Sheet & Tube, Republic and Inland Steel, strikebreakers were called in, violence was used against strikers, police launched brutal attacks on the union's pickets. In South Chicago, 10 pickets were killed in the Memorial Day Massacre in the marshy fields near the Republic Steel plant. Eventually, the SWOC called off the walkout, and it took several years before the ''Little Steel'' firms signed union contracts.

The ''Little Steel'' strike focused attention on a previously little-known strain in the relationship between President Franklin Roosevelt and Lewis. Most Americans, in and outside the union ranks, assumed a warm and cordial working relationship between the two strong men. The UMW chief, after all, had organized thousands of miners in 1933 with leaflets proclaiming that ''FDR wants you to join the union.'' In the 1936 election, CIO unions had poured out money and manpower to help the Roosevelt election landslide. But in 1937, when asked at a press conference about the Little Steel strike and its attendant violence, Roosevelt replied testily and with some sense of frustration, ''a plague on both your houses.'' To which, Lewis, in one of his most spectacular oratorical outbursts, declared: ''It ill behooves one who has supped at labor's table and has been sheltered in labor's house, to curse with equal fervor and fine impartiality both labor and its adversary when they become locked in deadly embrace.'' After that, needless to say, the relationship deteriorated.

By 1938, the CIO was claiming an affiliated membership of something over four million. Even allowing for inevitable exaggeration, that was a very respectable number for a three-year-old organization. The links with the AFL were all but gone. The original CIO unions had been expelled; the newer ones had never been affiliated to the federation. In November 1938, the CIO held its first formal convention, and changed its name to the Congress of Industrial Organizations. The mood was proud and confident.

Lewis was elected president, of course, by acclamation. Phil Murray and Sidney Hillman were elected vice presidents; young Jim Carey of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers—who had unsuccessfully sought an industrial union jurisdiction charter in the AFL three years earlier—was elected secretary-treasurer.

A new generation

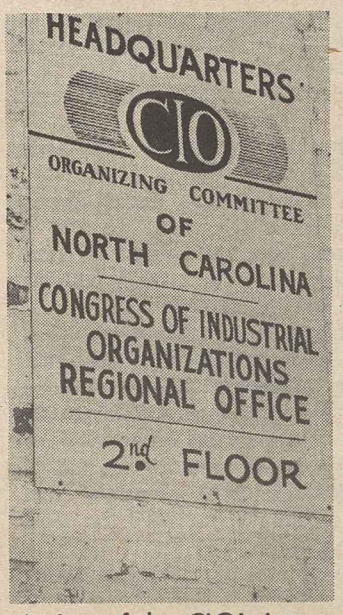
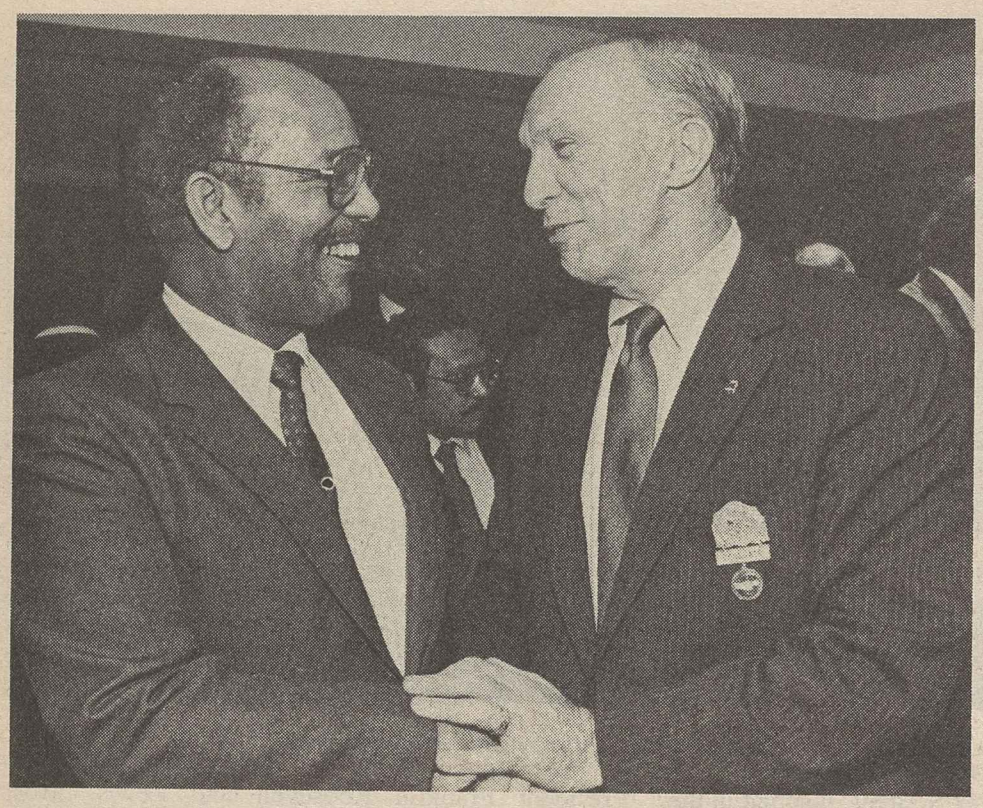
At the convention, Lewis, savoring the CIO's successes, recalled that 57 years earlier ''the great Gompers founded in this city the labor movement of his generation.'' But, Lewis added, ''time moves on and the old order changes, and as the changes became more obvious, it was more and more apparent that . . . the type of organization founded in Pittsburgh 57 years ago was not equal to the task of organizing or rendering service to the teeming millions who labor in American industries in this generation of our life.''



And thus, on Nov. 14, 1938, the CIO came into being as a permanent constitutional organization of trade unions. ''There can be no compromise with its fundamental purpose and aim of organizing workers into powerful industrial unions,'' the CIO said. These ''fundamental purposes and principles'' must be an essential ingredient before the ''goal of labor unity'' with the AFL can be achieved. That goal, of course, was reached 17 years and 21 days later—on Dec. 5, 1955—at the AFL-CIO unity convention in New York City.

Lewis, after endorsing Wendell Willkie, the Republican candidate for president against Roosevelt in 1940, carried out his pledge to step down from the CIO leadership if FDR was re-elected. Lewis was succeeded by Phil Murray. Within two years their old friendship was ruptured. Lewis led the United Mine Workers out of the CIO in 1942, tarried briefly back in the AFL, and then led the UMW into a role of isolation in the labor community that is only now beginning to change.



In 1952, Phil Murray and William Green died within days of each other. Walter Reuther of the Auto Workers was elected to succeed Murray, and George Meany was elected to succeed Green. Within three years they had negotiated a healing of the rift that had had its beginning a generation earlier in the furious debates between the industrial and craft union delegates at the 1934 AFL convention in San Francisco.

A helping hand

Christopher Edley, president of the United Negro College Fund, at a reception in Anaheim, Calif., reminds AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue of the UNCF's annual telethon supporting higher education that airs Dec. 28 in 79 cities. President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees, labor chairman of the fund, is urging union members to contribute one hour's wages to the drive. Local unions donating $1,000 or more can join the telecast in their area to present their checks.

Alabama delegates denounce Reagan's tax, trade policies

Montgomery, Ala.—President Reagan's tax and trade policies came under a drum fire of criticism at the 15th constitutional convention of the Alabama AFL-CIO.

Keynoting the three-day convention, AFL-CIO Vice President William W. Winpisinger, president of the Machinists, castigated the Administration's "tax reform" proposals as "tax robbery—Robin Hood in reverse," and accused the President of being "blind to the differences between free trade and fair trade."

The 700 delegates approved a series of resolutions criticizing the Administration for its failure to deal with the floodtide of imports which have cost more than 3 million U.S. jobs, and opposing the White House plan to tax health insurance, unemployment compensation, workers' compensation and black-lung benefits.

The convention gave standing ovations to two potential candidates in Alabama's 1986 elections—Sec. of State Don Siegelman, who is expected to announce shortly for the seat now held by Sen. Jeremiah Denton (R), and Lt. Gov. Bill Baxley, who is seeking the Democratic gubernatorial nomination.

Winpisinger said the Administration's "air head" approach to trade has resulted in Alabama miners, steelworkers, textile workers and clothing workers "being sacrificed on the altar of cheap labor in the church of free trade."

Plant shutdowns

Rubber Workers President Milan Stone also focused on the trade crisis, telling delegates in this largest tire-producing state in the nation that "job-killing imports" threaten their industry. He pointed to the closing of five tire plants across the nation, representing 10 percent of America's tire output.

"We can't win the trade battle by exchanging $12-an-hour jobs for $5-an-hour jobs," Stone said. "Our workers can't buy the products" if their wages are reduced to a level comparable to those abroad.

The convention re-elected President A. G. Trammell and Executive Vice President James E. Albright, elected acting Sec.-Treas. Douglas S. Burkhalter to a full term and re-elected 14 vice presidents. Four new vice presidents were elected: Fred Allen of the Electrical Workers, Sara Lipscomb of the Clothing & Textile Workers, Mark Guin of the Rubber Workers, and Rosemary George of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

In other actions, delegates approved resolutions calling for:

- Re-enactment of a state prevailing wage law to replace the one repealed in 1979.
- Passage of a national health-care plan to provide adequate coverage at costs which are within reach of the family budget.
- Enactment of federal legislation to provide for adequate notice to unions and workers of plant closings accompanied by funded retraining of displaced workers.

15 resolutions referred to council for action

Anaheim, Calif.—The AFL-CIO's 16th convention referred 15 of the 289 resolutions submitted for its consideration to the Executive Council for further consideration before final disposition.

The convention adopted a record number of resolutions, 105, accepting amendments to several of them, and deemed 165 others to be covered by its actions. Non-concurrence was voted on one resolution, no action was taken on two others because they reflected existing policy, and one was withdrawn.

The referred resolutions cover a broad range of issues affecting workers and their unions, including job security, tax policy, part-time work, and computers.

Bradley rips into governor for vetoes of workers' bills

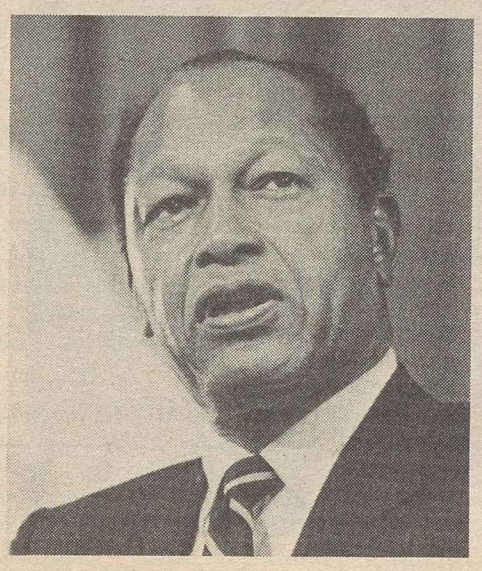
Anaheim, Calif.—Los Angeles Mayor Thomas Bradley (D) unleashed a blistering attack on California Gov. George Deukmejian (R) for his repeated vetoes of legislation of concern to working men and women.

Branding Deukmejian as "Mr. No," Bradley told the AFL-CIO convention that among bills voted were ones to:



- Raise maximum unemployment insurance benefits from $166 to $211 a week by 1988.
- Raise temporary workers' compensation benefits "which now are among the lowest in the nation."
- Post notices in fields sprayed with dangerous pesticides.
- Grant workplace access to local government unions.
- Give labor representation on boards of pension plans.
- Establish an occupational disease identification program.
- Curb future state investment in companies operating in South Africa, with its "immoral and corrupt" government.

Bradley also assailed the Republican governor for slashing funds for additional job placement specialists, more workers' compensation judges to deal with a mounting caseload, an agricultural labor relations board plan to process claims for millions of dollars in back wages for thousands of farm workers, and a study of the need for comparable worth.

Bradley, who ran for the California governorship three years ago with strong labor backing, lost to Deukmejian by a narrow 1-percent margin. He indicated strongly that he would again seek the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in 1986. He currently is serving an unprecedented fourth term as mayor of Los Angeles.

The mayor stressed the close relationship between his administration and Los Angeles labor, pointing to the comparable worth agreement recently negotiated with the State, County & Municipal Employees, and the joint decision to withdraw pension fund investments in South Africa.

"We have worked together on civil rights, human rights and economic justice," Bradley said, "in an alliance for the benefit of working men and women."

For New Jersey

Key elements upheld in toxic hazards law

Philadephia—A federal appellate court ruling upholding most of New Jersey's right-to-know law on toxic hazards was hailed by the AFL-CIO as "another major victory for workers and the public."

The 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rejected a lower court ruling and the chemical industry's contention that the entire act was preempted by the federal hazard communication standard.

Margaret Seminario, the federation's occupational safety specialist, called the suit "a last-ditch effort to forestall the expansion of right-to-know to the workplace and the community."

The court of appeals made it "clear that as long as state right-to-know laws are not in conflict with federal standards, these statutes will be found to be valid," Seminario said.

The appellate court "totally rejected the chemical industry's argument that the federal standard preempted any state action," she said.

Employer challenge

The court challenge was brought by the New Jersey State Chamber of Commerce, several business associations and more than a dozen pharmaceutical, chemical and cosmetic corporations.

The ruling by the three-judge panel rejected the broad applications of the federal Occupational Safety & Health Act and the hazard communication standard that the employer groups demanded.

Earlier this year, the Steelworkers successfully challenged the preemption and narrow scope of the federal standard. The judges, relying on that case, held that the New Jersey law is preempted only insofar as it "pertains to protection of employee health and safety in the manufacturing sector."

In a section-by-section review of the New Jersey law, the judges ruled that a section should be preempted only if conflicted with other federal or state laws or if it regulated hazard communication in the manufacturing sector. It could also be preempted if it obstructs the intent of the OSH Act.

The judicial panel upheld the labeling requirements for toxic substances for all businesses except those in manufacturing. They ruled that the labeling of environmentally hazardous substances is not "expressly" preempted.

The judges said they were prohibited from ruling on the labeling requirements for environmentally hazardous substances because a federal district court had not done so. The lower court, in determining the preempted sections could not be severed from the law, had said the entire state law was preempted.

The lower court "erred in ruling that as applied to the manufacturing sector the entire right-to-know act is preempted," the judges said.

Requirements that New Jersey's health and environmental protection agencies develop lists of hazardous substances "will in no way inhibit the implementation of the federal standard. The federal and state lists may comfortably coexist," the judges wrote.

The requirement that employers complete environmental hazard surveys was held not to be preempted by the federal standard, while the requirement for a workplace hazards survey was preempted in the manufacturing sector only.

The court upheld the assessment on all New Jersey employers that provides the funds for implementing the law.

Trade secret requirements of the New Jersey law were also upheld.

House cuts back, then sidetracks plant closing bill

Earlier, a Republican cosponsor of the measure, Rep. Silvio O. Conte (Mass.), had chided his GOP colleagues for their stance.

"Do a little bit for the working men and women of this country," Conte scolded.

The two principal Democratic cosponsors, William L. Clay (Mo.) and William D. Ford (Mich.), sought to keep the measure from being savaged by amendments. The debate was often emotional. A trade union veteran serving in the House, Rep. Charles A. Hayes (D-Ill.), gave his congressional colleagues a first-hand account of sudden plant closings drawn from his own experience as a packinghouse union leader. Hayes is a former vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers.

Epidemic hits

In a letter to all House members on the eve of the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison stressed that the epidemic of plant closings has hit every section of the nation, small towns and rural areas as well as large industrial cities. Over the past five years, he noted, "5 million workers lost their jobs without any advance notice whatsoever."

Even if a plant can't be kept open as a result of the consultation requirement, Denison said, studies have shown that advance notice reduces the duration of unemployment and allows communities to prepare for the "ripple effects" of a large layoff.

The bill's requirement for a 90-day advance notice could be waived if the company demonstrated that unavoidable business circumstances gave it no alternative.

Opponents argued that companies could be put at a disadvantage if they were required to reveal the business reasons for a plant shutdown decision. And some argued that any legislation should await the findings of a task force recently named by Labor Sec. William E. Brock to study plant closing issues.

Supporters saw nothing in the bill that any company with a decent concern for its workers and the community where it is located could find objectionable.

Big rise in job injuries tied to enforcement lag

Every industry category in the durable goods manufacturing sector posted increases in injuries as the overall rate there rose to 10.7 per 100 workers, up from 10. In non-durable goods, the rate went from 9.2 to 9.4.

In wholesale and retail trades, injuries per 100 workers went from 7.2 to 7.4, while in transportation and utilities, the rate increased to 8.6 from 8.1.

Labor's Vital Links

THE AFL-CIO asks a lot from its local and state central bodies—and almost always gets it.

It expects them to be the legislative watchdogs of city councils and state legislators, and they are. Whether the issue is a restrictive picketing ordinance, a teachers' pay raise, prevailing wage laws, unemployment insurance or health and safety issues, the state feds and central bodies are out in front.

The federation expects from its state feds and central labor councils responsibility and leadership in seeking a consensus on political endorsements, and only rarely is it disappointed.

Is there a Labor Day observance to organize? Is there a civic function to perform, or some event at which a labor presence is needed? Central body officers, many unpaid, are known to survive for months on end without a full weekend to spend with their families and mighty few evenings in front of the television set.

The SOS from the AFL-CIO's Washington lobbyists for the phone call to a wavering congressman or the initiation of a letter writing campaign goes to the central bodies, because that's where the job will be done.

These are not make-work chores, none of them. They are vital to labor's program and to the welfare of working men and women.

THE SHAME OF the labor movement is that such a valuable able tool is so neglected. Only about half of local unions are affiliated with their city and state central bodies, despite the repeated proddings of parent national unions.

Seldom, the record shows, is there a defensible reason for this neglect.

A special committee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council has called on affiliates "to aggressively promote voluntary affiliations" by their local unions with the federation's central bodies.

A resolution adopted at the recent AFL-CIO convention reinforced that appeal and held open the possibility of further steps to achieve that goal.

Some participants in the convention discussion of the issue noted a parallel between local unions that don't pay their share of the costs of maintaining labor's central bodies and freeloading workers who don't support the union that bargains for them.

The AFL-CIO Committee on the Evolution of Work, which envisions a still bigger role for central bodies as the trade union movement adapts to changes in the workforce, put it a bit more diplomatically, but with similar emphasis.

A low level of affiliations, it noted, means "that certain affiliates carry a disproportionate share" of responsibility for sustaining the state and local bodies. And it means also, the committee added, that the paucity of support results in central bodies that "are not as strong as they could be."

In times like these, America's trade union movement needs all the vitamins it can get.

Drawing the Line

THE REPUBLICAN-HELD Senate has too often been the graveyard of House-passed bills the Reagan Administration opposes. That adds special significance to its breakaway from the shadow of the White House to pass by a convincing 60-39 margin a bill to limit imports of textile products and shoes.

It's a bill that President Reagan sought to keep from his desk because a veto would mark him as callous to the mass murder of American jobs.

Instead, both the House and Senate have now sent a strong, bipartisan message to the President and to the nations that trade with us that a limit has been reached, a line drawn.

These are not high-paying jobs at stake in the textile, apparel and shoe industries. Quite the contrary. But there are no jobs to replace them, and they must be saved. That's the welcome message from Congress.

3 of 4 unemployed workers deprived of jobless benefits

By Press Associates, Inc.

For America's unemployed, things can only look up because they can't get much worse.

An analysis by the non-profit Center on Budget & Policy Priorities pointed out that the percentage of the unemployed receiving jobless benefits in October fell to an all-time record low of 25.8 percent. That means only one in every four unemployed workers received benefits.

According to the center's research director, John Bickerman, the situation of the jobless is even worse in certain states. The overall 25.8 percent level of recipients means 5.9 million jobless received no benefits in October, but here is how the worst-off states fared:

- In Michigan, where the jobless rate hit 10.3 percent, only 17.4 percent of the unemployed got benefits. More than 340,000 of those out of work went without.
- In Texas, only 16.3 percent of the unemployed received benefits and more than 500,000 jobless got nothing.
- In Ohio, with unemployment at 9.2 percent, only 20.8 percent received benefits. More than 370,000 went without.
- In Illinois, with a jobless rate of 9.4 percent, 22.1 percent received benefits. More than 400,000 did not.

The center reported that the percentage of jobless workers receiving unemployment benefits ranged from 23.8 percent to 35.6 percent in these populous states: California, Florida, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina and Pennsylvania.

The AFL-CIO convention explored the problem of the steady erosion of the federal-state system and made recommendations to reverse the trend.

The federation traced the cause to exhaustion of benefits, the greater difficulties in becoming eligible for extended and supplemental benefits, more stringent work and earnings requirements to qualify and more severe disqualification penalties.

In discussion of the convention resolution, President Betty Tianti of the Connecticut AFL-CIO summed up the dynamic behind eroding benefits. With 50 different state programs, she said, "Our employers are fighting us and threatening to move out, close plants, because unemployment comp benefit costs are less in other states, and they use it as a whipsaw, if you will, to try to force us to take less in benefits, to cut benefits, and to keep the funding levels low so that we are always in a deficit situation."

President Julius Uehlein of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO said a similar situation exists in his state, with "the business community attacking continuously." He said that business claims industry will not come into the state and it now wants to offset social security benefits for the unemployed over 62.

Attacking a myth

President Gerald McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees agreed. It is a myth perpetuated by business that high jobless benefits keep out business, he said. The federation's Public Employee Dept., which he heads, is issuing a study that will show business relocates on the basis of labor supply, educational opportunities and social and entertainment factors. This may help kill the myth, McEntee said.

Convention delegates called for the reversal of the measures that have weakened the unemployment compensation system. Labor also will press Congress for creation of a permanent program of supplemental benefits to provide at least 65 weeks of benefits for the longterm unemployed.

The AFL-CIO also wants benefits levels raised to at least 50 percent of average weekly earnings. It said efforts should continue to reduce the importance of experience-rating in financing jobless benefits, and to raise the taxable base.

In 1935, Congress chose the worst of several ways of financing the jobless benefits program. It is time to modernize a program that has failed to aid jobless workers properly.

White-smocked meatcutters picket one of 1,100 Southern California supermarkets hit by a strike-lockout involving 22,000 members of the Food & Commercial Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters. The sign on the door is an example of tactics being used by the 10 giant grocery chains to recruit scabs.

22,000 strike supermarkets in California

Los Angeles—The strike-lockout of 22,000 workers at 10 major Southern California grocery chains entered its second week as a federal mediator sought to resolve the dispute.

Mediator Frank Allen brought both sides back to the bargaining table this week, after the talks collapsed earlier. The negotiations are between the Food & Commercial Workers, the unaffiliated Teamsters and the Southern California Food Employers Council.

The strike-lockout was triggered on Nov. 5, when management walked out of last-ditch negotiations with the two unions.

When the UFCW launched a selective strike against some outlets in the 164-store Vons Supermarkets chain and the Teamsters walked out at two of Vons' distribution centers, the employers retaliated by locking out union workers at 1,100 markets stretching all the way to the Mexican border.

Seven smaller grocery chains immediately broke ranks with the employers' group, reaching interim agreement with the two unions to abide by the terms of the final settlement.

At the heart of the dispute is management's insistence on a wage freeze, coupled with other major concessions.

It demanded that the UFCW's meatcutters agree to creation of a new, lower-paid "meat cutter-clerk" classification, reduction of the guaranteed eight-hour day to only four hours, and a cutback in the number of hours markets are required to have a journeyman meatcutter on the job.

For the truck drivers, warehousemen and clerical workers represented by the Teamsters, the employers proposed a two-tier wage system and elimination of a current cost-of-living increase. They also demanded the right to escalate contracting out of work.

No settlement

In the war of words, the UFCW denied management charges that the union had reached a tentative settlement but was pressured to strike by the Teamsters.

"We thrashed out a lot of issues, but we never agreed on anything," said UFCW Local 421 Sec.-Treas. Gerald McTeague, the union's chief negotiator. Management was told from the start of negotiations that "there was no way we could make an agreement unless the Teamsters got one too," McTeague said.

Elsewhere in the country, the UFCW reported "steady progress" in its drive toward restoring a national wage rate of $10 an hour for packinghouse workers.

New contracts have been negotiated at Swift & Co., Armour/Dial, Sugardale, Dinner Bell and Superior Brand, bringing the higher wage rate to 10,000 workers. Existing agreeements with Hormel and Oscar Mayer, which come up for renegotiation in mid-1986, already include the $10 rate. The new contracts also provide pension improvements, an additional holiday, and improved vacations and sick pay.

The drive for a national wage rate has run into the intransigence of several companies, most notably John Morrell and Farmer John, where UFCW members have been forced to walk out in an effort to win their demands.

Michigan unions rally to turn tide against constitutional convention call

Lansing, Mich.—A grass-roots lobbying effort by Michigan unions and their coalition allies was instrumental in defeating an attempt to force Congress to call a constitutional convention to initiate a balanced budget amendment.

The 57-53 vote in the Michigan House of Representatives greatly eased the pressure on Congress to enact some form of mandatory balanced budget, no matter how unworkable, as the alternative to risking a runaway convention that could do lasting damage to the U.S. Constitution.

Thirty-two of a required 34 states have petitioned for such a convention, at the prodding of a self-styled "taxpayers" lobby. Most of the endorsements came 10 years ago, when the con-con campaign was first launched and before it was recognized as a serious threat.

Although the Constitution specifies that two-thirds of the states can convene a convention to initiate amendments, the procedure has never been used. Thus far, all amendments have been initiated by a two-thirds vote of each house of Congress, subject to ratification by three-fourths of the states.

But Michigan, with a Republican Senate and a slim Democratic majority in the House, was a prime candidate to become the 33rd state and push the nation to the brink of economic chaos.

The danger early this year was real, when the state Senate approved the convention call by a 19-12 margin, and its supporters pumped money into the state to fund a media blitz aimed at getting the House to concur.

But there was a counter-effort, less lavishly financed but pooling the lobbying efforts of a coalition that included the trade union movement, human resources organizations, local school boards and religious groups from all major faiths.

Direct approach

Darrell Tennis, Michigan political director for the State, County & Municipal Employees, coordinated the lobbying effort and credited a grass-roots direct approach to legislators for turning the tide.

When legislators were convinced that there was a real danger to the Constitution, he said, they were willing to take the political risk of seeming to vote against a "balanced budget." Another big asset, Tennis said, was the willingness of both Gov. James Blanchard and House Speaker Gary Owen to publicly oppose the measure.

The initial strategy was to give lawmakers who feared political hazards a free pass by changing the Senate's call for a constitutional convention into a non-binding resolution endorsing the concept of a balanced federal budget. But the Senate insisted on its version, and the issue came back to the House for an up-or-down vote, with no hedging.

Supporters, principally the Chamber of Commerce, ran full-page newspaper advertisements aimed at getting constituents to pressure wavering House members. The pressure included running the home telephone numbers of legislators, a tactic that was close enough to harassment that it probably backfired.

Opponents, anxious to offset Democratic defections, welcomed into Michigan Republicans such as Senators Nancy Kassebaum of Kansas and Ted Stevens of Alaska who were willing to speak out against the con-con measure.

On the 57-53 vote, nine Republicans who voted against the resolution more than offset the defections of the eight Democrats who supported it.

Last shot

After the vote, House Republican Leader Michael Busch left no doubt that the verdict was conclusive.

"Today was our shot," he told reporters, "and that's that. It's over. It's done. It's dead."

Nationally, the issue isn't dead—yet. New Jersey, with a new Republican majority in the state Assembly, and Connecticut are among the con-con targets. And since there is presently no time limit for reaching the two-thirds mark in state endorsements, con-con remains a ticking bomb. But Michigan's action, at least for the moment, took the U.S. Constitution off the endangered species list.

Legislative action agenda forged by Georgia labor

Jekyll Island, Ga.—The Georgia AFL-CIO forged a legislative action plan to improve workers' job rights and increase health and safety coverage in the coming year.

The 350 delegates meeting here for the State AFL-CIO's 29th convention endorsed a legislative program seeking:

- Coverage of occupational disease under the state's workers' compensation law.
- A hazardous substance "right-to-know" law.
- Collective bargaining rights for public employees.
- Changes to make the state's income tax fairer.

The convention opposed Georgia's current teacher testing provisions and urged legislation that would require voter registration by political party.

The delegates demonstrated support for the Textile & Apparel Trade Enforcement Act and other measures that would limit imports in hard-pressed domestic industries and went on record opposing Administration efforts to tax employee benefits.

In a "state of the Georgia labor movement address," State AFL-CIO President Herbert H. Mabry said organizing and education are critical to the success of the labor movement.

"If we educated our members better, we wouldn't lose them to the right-to-workers," Mabry told the delegates.

He noted that Georgia was one of three pilot states participating in the AFL-CIO's One-on-One program, designed to increase communications among union members, and anticipated the project would be very useful in Georgia's "most important" 1986 elections.

Mabry reminded delegates that all the state's General Assembly seats will be up for election in 1986 and that unions must begin now to update their mailing lists and activate COPE communities.

Delegates attended a series of workshops on the One-on-One program, political action, communications, arbitration, community services and the AFL-CIO's "Changing Situation" report.

The communications workshop showcased the State AFL-CIO's public cable television program, "Inside Labor." The show currently is seen in Atlanta but central labor councils in Albany, Macon and Savannah are negotiating with local stations to broadcast the show in those areas.

Convention speakers included AFL-CIO Regional Director Jim Sala, Regional COPE Director Clem Dowler, Florida AFL-CIO President Dan Miller; Harold McIver, national organizing director for the Industrial Union Dept.; Fanny Neal, regional COPE VIP director; State Labor Commissioner Joe Tanner, and Jan Douglas of the Anti-Klan Network.

Chicago city council assails Tribune for strikebreaking

Chicago—The City Council has condemned the Chicago Tribune for "importing strikebreakers" and "failing to bargain in good faith" with 1,200 members of Graphic Communications Union Local 7, Typographical Union Local 16 and Mailers Local 3, who have been on strike since July 18.

The council's denunciation of Tribune management for its insistence on eliminating existing benefits and working conditions came on the heels of a statement by Joseph Cardinal Bernadin urging the newspaper to reach a settlement as the dispute dragged on toward the end of its fourth month.

To date, the Tribune's management has ignored all such public calls for good faith bargaining, meeting only infrequently with the three unions involved in the strike, and refusing to budge from its demands for a three-tier wage structure, abandonment of the pension plan, an end to the grievance procedure and major reductions in the health care plan.

The resolution, introduced by Councilman Edward Vrdolyak, cited the city's Fair Labor Ordinance opposing the importation of strikebreakers, noting that Tribune President Charles T. Brumback had boasted openly that scabs had been sent here from the newspaper industry "all over the country."

Meanwhile, in a demonstration of trade union solidarity with the strikers, more than 1,000 members of 15 unions joined the picket line.

The union members marched for more than three hours under banners demanding that the Tribune management come to the bargaining table and work out a fair and equitable contract settlement.

Failed trade policy hit for raising risk of more job losses

America's unions called on Congress to stop the destruction of industries and jobs by shaping trade policy in the national interest instead of clinging to the unreal concept of "free trade."

Auto Workers President Owen Bieber, testifying for the AFL-CIO as well as his own union, warned the Senate Finance Committee that the constant search for cheaper production abroad threatens to "impoverish the American economy."

The auto industry, already battered by Japanese products, faces a new flood of imports from nations with "incredibly low wage rates," Bieber warned.

Unless the United States shifts to a more realistic trade policy, he said, auto industry employment will be slashed another 25 percent before the end of this decade, "eliminating hundreds of thousands of jobs that pay decent wages."

And it's not just the auto industry that is threatened, Bieber stressed. Other industries are under similar assault, "and there will certainly be more," he warned.

"We need these manufacturing jobs to keep our economy strong, our workers employed and our living standards high," he insisted.

At the same hearings, the Ladies' Garment Workers testified to the impossibility of labor-intensive industries in the United States competing with pennies-an-hour wage rates.

ILGWU Research Director Herman Starobin told the Senate panel that apparel workers' pay in the 20 low-wage nations that produce for the American market "range from 2 percent of the U.S. level in Bangladesh to a high of 25 percent in Singapore."

Starobin said he visited plants in Bangladesh where the pay of experienced garment workers ranged from $28 to $37 a month for 10-hour, six-day workweeks.

Elimination of "unfair" trade practices by other nations would have only a minor impact on apparel trade, he said. Products made in these low-wage countries would still undercut U.S. producers.

America's apparel workers are already low paid, and there is no way to further reduce their wages "without creating a shameful Third World of our own." Thus the issue of import curbs "is one of life or death for the American industry and its workers," he stressed.

Peace, human rights top Central American goals

Conference asks political solution

San Jose, Costa Rica—There is "no military solution" to the Central American crisis, labor and political leaders from 21 countries of the Americas and Europe said, calling for negotiations to restore peace based on "the full exercise of human rights."

The current turmoil stems from "social injustice, lack of freedom and the absence of democracy," they declared. The result has been a "virtual state of war" which has taken a toll of over 200,000 dead and 2 million displaced in several Central American countries.

"The militarization of the societies, the arms race and the presence of extraneous military factors sink the Central Americas even more in the tragedy of war," the 145 delegates to the second Conference on Peace and Democracy in Central America said. They adopted a declaration strongly condemning violence and terrorism as "a return to barbarism."

A political solution is "imperative" or else "peace will continue to be a chimera," the declaration said as it urged formation of "a democratic front on behalf of peace" in the strife-torn area.

The conference was held under the sponsorship of President Luis Alberto Monge Alvarez of Costa Rica, President Lane Kirkland of the AFL-CIO, Secretary General

Kirkland presses worker freedoms

San Jose, Costa Rica—Expressing stern opposition to violations of trade union and human rights in both El Salvador and Nicaragua, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland insisted that "human rights be respected by all governments, whether they are of the left or the right."

Freedom of association is "essential to democracy," Kirkland told delegates to the second International Conference for Peace and Democracy in Central America, adding:

"We demand that workers have the right to organize their own unions and to strike, whether the means of production be owned by oligarchs or commissars, by plutocrats or bureaucrats.

"Whoever owns the means of production, workers must own their own labor."

Kirkland, one of the sponsors of the session which brought together 145 labor and political leaders from 21 countries in the Americas and Europe, said that there was both "good news and bad news" in Central America.

The good news included this month's free elections of a president, a national congress and municipal officials in Guatamala; the elections last March which brought a democratic majority to El Salvador's National Assembly, "strengthening the hand of President Duarte as he strives to over-

House scuttles key measure on plant shutdowns

By David L. Perlman

The House killed a labor-supported bill requiring employers to give workers 90 days notice before closing a plant or laying off a large portion of the workforce.

The 208-203 vote was a victory for business groups that fought the measure and for an Administration that had sought to sidetrack it—as one Republican congressman expressed it during the debate, to avoid "embarrassing" President Reagan by sending him a bill that he would feel compelled to veto.

It was a setback for the coalition of concerned organizations—including religious

Economy continues to rumble on bumpy rollercoaster run

By Gene Zack

The nation's economy continued its rollercoaster run as an upsurge in the gross national product for the third quarter was offset by a steep drop in retail sales and a sharp rise in producer prices in October.

At the same time, the industrial output went down in October for the fifth time in the past six months, and unemployment in 27 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico climbed to higher levels than a year ago.

All this led the AFL-CIO to conclude that the economy remained "haywire" and that the specter of a "growth recession" loomed over the horizon.

The third-quarter rise of 4.3 percent in the GNP, said Research Director Rudy Oswald, was "hardly enough to overcome the deficit in jobs and income and hardly enough to provide the growth that we need" to put the economy back on track.

After growing at an anemic annual rate of 1.1 percent during the first half of the year, the GNP leap in the third quarter

Who says imports cost less?

Slowly but surely, the American buying public is getting the message: textile and apparel imports aren't the bargain that profiteering importers claim they are.

Countering arguments that legislation to curb imports would push up retail prices, Rep. Ed Jenkins (D-Ga.) released figures showing that foreign-made apparel last year cost 97 percent of the average retail price for U.S.-made goods.

At the same time, the Fiber, Fabric & Apparel Coalition used Commerce Dept. figures to show that many imported blouses, shorts and shirts actually cost more than their American-produced counterparts.

"American consumers, who are also workers, know now that they get no bargain in buying imports," said President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers. "All that they do is to place their own jobs in jeopardy" when they buy foreign-made goods.

President Murray H. Finley of the Clothing & Textile Workers said that the data "clearly show that the consumer gets no benefit" from purchasing apparel made by cheap foreign labor. It may cost producers only one-fifth as much to make their goods abroad, he said, but these savings are pocketed by producers, wholesalers and retailers—not passed along to the consumer.

Reporters go to school on labor

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and presidents of six affiliated unions met with reporters covering labor-management relations in a seminar cosponsored by the federation.

Twelve reporters from newspapers across the country took part in the three-day program at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. The National Press Foundation coordinated the event in cooperation with the AFL-CIO, the Ford Motor Co., and the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Reporters were able to discuss public sector collective bargaining with Presidents Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees and Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers.

Airline industry issues were dealt with by Presidents Henry A. Duffy of the Pilots and Linda Puchala of the Flight Attendants.

Bricklayers President John T. Joyce talked about bargaining in the building trades. And Tom Doudy, assistant director of the Auto Workers' Ford Dept., joined Peter Pestillo, Ford management's negotiator, to explain the shaping of a national agreement in the auto industry.

Blowing the whistle

President Gene Upshaw of the Professional Athletes blew the whistle on sports writers who come ill-equipped to cover negotiations in professional sports.

Professors John Dunlop of Harvard, a former Secretary of Labor, and Thomas Kochan of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology contributed insights into labor-management relations issues. And AFL-CIO staff members took part with government and industry representatives in panel discussions.

Reporters participating in the seminar included Joseph Ward, Louisville Courier-Journal; Joseph Ritz, Buffalo News; Joseph Coccaro, Atlantic City Press; Paul Shinoff, San Francisco Examiner; Christopher Pummer, Wilmington News Journal; Suzanne Halliburton, Beaumont Enterprise; Helen Fogel, Detroit Free Press; Mike McGraw, Hartford Courant; Allegra Bennett, Baltimore Sun; Laurent Belsie, Christian Science Monitor; David Moberg, In These Times, and John Bussey, Wall Street Journal.

Courts clear SEIU local on walkout

A California court's ruling that public sanitation workers have a right to strike in the absence of a "substantial and imminent threat" to public health and safety became final when the U.S. Supreme Court refused to review it.

The decision by California's highest court had been challenged by the Los Angeles County Sanitation District.

Members of Service Employees Local 660 had struck for 11 days in July 1976, despite a court order to end the walkout.

In 1981 a trial court awarded the sanitation district a $270,000 judgment against the union and a state appeals court affirmed the award, holding that public employee strikes are unlawful.

After the California Supreme Court overruled the lower courts, the sanitary district sought to raise a new legal argument. It claimed that such a strike could lead to violations of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act and the Federal Resource Conservation & Recovery Act, leaving the agency vulnerable to civil and criminal penalties.

New issue

In a brief filed with the Supreme Court, Local 660 pointed out that the district did not raise the federal preemption issue until after California's high court had ruled that the workers had a right to strike. The court's decision, the SEIU said, was based on "independent and adequate state grounds."

In another case affecting workers' rights, the Supreme Court agreed to review a Michigan court's interpretation of that state's unemployment insurance law.

The review was sought by the Auto Workers on behalf of members denied jobless benefits when they were laid off because of a parts shortage resulting from a strike by their union at a different plant.

The workers were ruled ineligible for benefits because they contributed to a UAW strike fund in preparation for national auto negotiations. However, the contract was settled without a strike, and the walkout that triggered the layoffs was over local issues.

The Michigan court acknowledged that its interpretation conflicted with the National Labor Relations Act's guarantees of freedom of association, but insisted that Congress intended to allow state preemption on such matters.

OSHA ordered to set standard on formaldehyde

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration must issue a proposed formaldehyde standard by Dec. 1 or explain why it has not done so, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for Washington, D.C., ruled.

The court order was in response to the latest of four years of legal actions initiated by the Auto Workers and 14 other unions to force a formaldehyde standard out of OSHA.

The unions' petition to compel issuance of the standard was held in abeyance until Dec. 3 when Sec. of Labor William E. Brock must advise the court of the action taken by his department and include a copy of the notice published in the Federal Register.

If OSHA fails to act, a show-cause hearing will be held on Dec. 6 "after which the court will take necessary and appropriate action to compel compliance" with an earlier order, the judges said.

OSHA has twice rejected petitions from the UAW for an emergency standard on formaldehyde to lower the worker exposure level.

Currently, OSHA limits exposure to a maximum of three parts formaldehyde per million parts air, averaged over an eight-hour workday, a level that it admits is harmful.

Some 1.3 million workers are occupationally exposed to formaldehyde, a colorless, pungent gas, and its liquid equivalent, formalin.

Formaldehyde is a potential human carcinogen and can cause severe skin disorders, allergies, and other ailments. The chemical is widely used in industry.

House panel adopts immigration reforms addressing union concerns on 'braceros'

A House Judiciary subcommittee approved an immigration reform bill significantly closer to labor's position than the version the Senate passed last September.

The Senate's bill would launch a new bracero-type "guestworker" program to bring up to 350,000 "temporary" farmworkers into the United States each year, for up to nine months of work harvesting perishable crops.

A Republican-sponsored amendment that sought to add the Senate's guestworker provision to the House bill was defeated, as the AFL-CIO had strongly urged. But that and other disputed issues are virtually certain to be refought when the bill is considered by the full Judiciary Committee and certainly when it comes to the floor of the House.

The subcommittee, headed by Rep. Romano L. Mazzoli (D-Ky.), had under consideration a bill introduced by Rep. Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the full committee.

It also had a letter from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison expressing labor's support for legislation to effectively prohibit the employment of undocumented workers, coupled with "the most generous feasible" legalization program for persons who have established roots in the United States since coming into this country illegally.

As amended by the subcommittee, the bill deals with many of labor's concerns.

It now covers all employers, not just those with four or more workers.

It prohibits discrimination against persons who are legal residents of the United States, regardless of citizenship status.

It directs the Attorney General to develop a tamper-proof social security card for verification of the status of job applicants. Counterfeit social security cards have been commonly sold to illegal border-crossers.

Legal status

It would legalize the status of all aliens who came to the United States before Jan. 1, 1982.

One labor-urged amendment adopted by the subcommittee scrapped a "transitional" provision that would have allowed growers to continue to use undocumented aliens for another three years without facing a penalty.

Another would require growers to provide housing, not just housing allowances, to any temporary workers they bring in under the existing H-2 program, which requires evidence of a shortage of domestic workers. The temporary workers would also be entitled to legal services to safeguard their rights.

But while the amendment to include the Senate guestworker program was defeated, some who voted against it expressed a desire to "negotiate" a compromise that would allow U.S. growers to bring in more temporary farmworkers to harvest their crops. So the threat of a new bracero program still remains.

$64 million earmarked for pay equity

Albany, N.Y.—More than 114,000 women and minority workers employed by the state government will share $64 million in pay hikes to compensate them for years of wage discrimination.

The action follows on the heels of two independent studies which concluded that women and minorities were consistently paid less than white men for jobs of comparable value.

In a report released by State, County & Municipal Employees Local 1000 and the governor's office, the Center for Women in Government found that 77,000 women and minority members of Local 1000 held jobs that were undervalued by 3 percent, or 1.6 pay grades. The pay equity study was a key provision of the local's 1982-85 collective bargaining agreement with the state.

A separate review of New York's job classification and compensation system by Arthur Young & Co. found that female-dominated jobs were undervalued by between 2.8 and 4.8 pay grades.

Women make up about 48 percent of the state's workforce, while minority workers account for about 22 percent. Female-dominated job titles were defined as those with at least 67.2 percent women, and minority-dominated titles were considered to have at least 30.8 percent minority workers.

State employee unions negotiated an end to the state's discriminatory pay practices during contract talks, with the state agreeing to set aside $64 million to implement the recommendations of the studies.

AFSCME Local 1000 President William L. McGowan praised the pay equity report and urged the state to implement the pay remedies as quickly as possible.

Social security supplement

Federal pension bill goes to conference

A supplemental retirement bill covering federal and postal workers hired since January 1984 is being shaped in a House-Senate conference committee.

Persons hired after that date are covered by social security, and unions representing federal-sector workers have been working with Congress to shape a supplemental retirement plan for them that would bring the total benefit package in line with that of the Civil Service Retirement System.

The Senate-passed bill is more acceptable to the Reagan Administration because it would require a smaller employer contribution from the government. It is less acceptable to the unions because it would deny to recently hired workers early retirement rights and the more comprehensive cost-of-living protections of the civil service plan.

Unions of federal and postal workers are pressing for a supplemental plan that would provide for newer workers' benefits and total contributions comparable to those of earlier workers who are covered by civil service retirement.

Their preference is the version approved by the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee, sponsored by Chairman William D. Ford (D-Mich.) and Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio).

That's the bill the AFL-CIO also endorsed, in a letter from Legislative Director Ray Denison. It combines social security with a supplemental add-on of benefits based on the civil service plan.

Incentives provided

It provides incentives to career government service, Denison noted, while the early retirement option makes retirement sufficiently inviting so that there will be opportunities for younger workers.

A sound retirement plan "is a good investment for any business, whether it is General Motors or the U.S. government," Denison suggested.

The House committee decided to take the Ford-Oakar bill directly to a House-Senate conference, which is possible because the Senate attached its plan to a minor House-passed bill. Time is a factor since newer workers will have to start making full payments into both the civil service and social security systems in January unless Congress has completed action on a supplemental plan.

Both the House and Senate versions would allow both older and newer workers to supplement their retirement benefits with a thrift plan to which the government would contribute.

Veto threatens publications with big postage rise

President Reagan's veto of a bill carrying funds for postal subsidies could be devastating to union newspapers and publications of other non-profit and charitable organizations.

Congress sought to continue a stretchout of the timetable for postage rate increases for non-profit groups, while the Administration has sought to eliminate the subsidy entirely.

Inclusion of an $820 million postal subsidy in the appropriations bill for the Treasury Dept. and the U.S. Postal Service was one of the provisions the White House said led to Reagan's veto. The Administration had also opposed funds added by Congress to beef up Internal Revenue Service tax-collection functions.

Reagan used the veto to chastise Congress for not acting on the controversial Gramm-Rudman balanced budget proposal—even though the White House was sending signals to Congress that the Senate-passed plan would be unworkable.

House leaders decided not to try to override the appropriations veto and sent the measure back to committee where efforts will be made to shape a compromise. If the postal subsidy were to be ended immediately, postage rates for non-profit publications would more than double.

Stuff it, Marval

With Thanksgiving and the holiday season just around the corner, the Food & Commercial Workers and "Mama" are reminding families to shop carefully and not buy Marval turkeys or turkey products.

Mama says: "When employees have to put up with the kind of working conditions that these Marval workers do, plus unreasonable treatment by management, then somebody has to send that company a message...one that goes straight to their wallet."

Mama is television performer Vicki Lawrence.

Marval turkeys bear the plant number "P-18" on the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture stamp and are sold under the following brand names:

Armour, Bigger Brothers, Bird in Hand, Boston Beef, C&S Distributors, Del Farm, Dogwood Hill Farms, Esskay, Farmer Gray, Food Club, Frosty Acres, Kingston, Lancaster, Land-O-Lakes, Longacre, Louis Rich, Manor House, Marval, Maryland Chicken, Mazo Lerch, McSweeney's, Montoco, Rockingham, Shady Brook Farms, Shop Rite, Stu Leonard, Super True, Sure Fresh, Table Rite, Tender Pride, Top Frost, Weber Gourmet and Wilson.

UFCW's poultry workers maintain 17-month vigil

Dayton, Va.—Seventeen months after their strike began, Marval workers are still walking the picket line at the giant poultry processor in Virginia's Shenandoah Valley.

The strikers, mostly women who earned less than $6 an hour, are members of Food & Commercial Workers Local 400. Their walkout began in June 1984, to protest the company's inhumane and degrading work rules, production speed-ups and unsafe working conditions.

A national boycott against Marval Poultry was endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in July 1984.

In time for the biggest turkey-buying season of the year, Operating Engineers President Larry Dugan joined the Local 400 members on the picket line, praising their "bulldog determination" for taking on a management "out to destroy the trade union movement."

Earlier, some of the striking workers described conditions at Marval as high-pressure and "prison-like." Restroom privileges were restricted, with workers required to get passes from supervisors. Anyone who left the cutting or production line without permission was "writtten up" or suspended. No medical personnel were available to diagnose or treat accidents resulting from sharp equipment and production "speed-ups," although the number of accidents had tripled since 1981.

Marval's response to Local 400's complaints was an attempt to slash wages, drop the grievance procedures and eliminate the union's health and welfare plan.

When nearly 500 UFCW members voted to walk out, Marval moved quickly to replace them with strikebreakers. On Oct. 1, 1984, Local 400 lost a decertification election.

But on March 27, 1985, National Labor Relations Board Regional Director Louis J. D'Amico charged Marval with using illegal payments and other dirty tricks to convince workers to oust the UFCW from the plant.

The NLRB complaint found that a Marval supervisor violated federal labor laws when he "telephoned employees and solicited their assistance in a campaign to decertify the union," and promised to pay those workers for their efforts.

Local 400 officials obtained affidavits from a number of workers who described company offers to pay "$15 for workers who would come to the plant early to solicit anti-union signatures and $15 to stay late" for the same purpose.

Rocco Enterprises, Marval's parent company, appealed the ruling. It is still pending before an NLRB administrative law judge.

But on the picket line, IUOE's Dugan predicted that "not even the reactionary, union-baiting National Labor Relations Board can ignore Marval's mean-spirited violations of the law."

Job loss due to imports hits 700,000 households a year

Surging imports of steel, clothing and other foreign-made products caused workers in 2.1 million American families to lose their jobs in the past three years.

That's the finding of economic consultants Joel Popkin & Co. in a national survey of 1,600 households from June 1982 to June 1985.

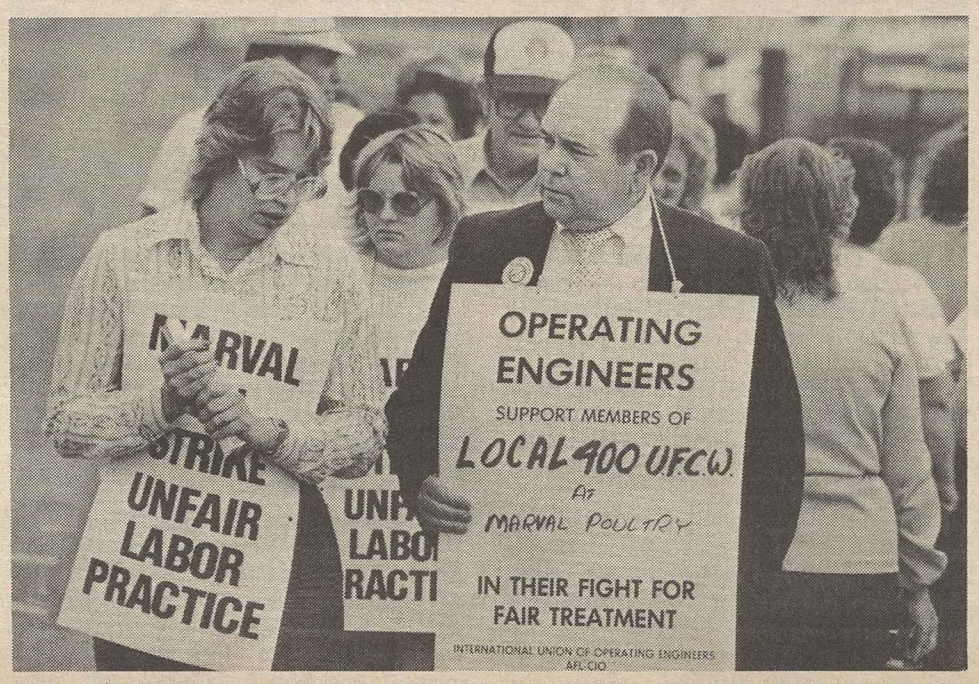
The study found that 700,000 households have family members who lose their jobs every year because of imports or foreign competition.

Most of the job losses affected blue-collar manufacturing workers, the study pointed out, with 70 percent employed by large firms with 500 or more workers. Very few workers in service jobs were displaced, the study found.

The layoffs hit experienced workers and newer employees alike—36 percent of the laid off workers had ten or more years of service with the same employer while 39 percent had been with the same employer five years or less.

Foreign competition seemed to hit young workers the hardest, with 88 percent of those laid off under age 45.

Although 70 percent of the workers who lost their jobs during the three-year period eventually found new work, nearly half were re-employed at lower-paying jobs, and "very few reported higher pay than in their previous job," the analysts noted.



A similar survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics confirmed that plant closings, payroll cutbacks and failing businesses took a heavy toll on American workers. The BLS review found that 5.1 million workers with three or more years of service lost their jobs during layoffs and plant closings between January 1979 and January 1984. Although more than half of this group eventually found new employment, many workers were forced to accept severe pay cuts, often exceeding 20 percent, the BLS pointed out.

The BLS study also found that hundreds of thousands of workers who found new jobs did not receive any health care benefits.

Dennis Fitzgibbons joins Information Dept. staff

Dennis Fitzgibbons, formerly a senior speechwriter for Chrysler Corp., has joined the AFL-CIO Dept. of Information staff.

Fitzgibbons, 30, was a speechwriter for Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio) before going to Chrysler in 1984. He has also served as an aide to Rep. Tony Coelho (D-Calif.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, and to Ambassador Robert S. Strauss in the U.S. Trade Representative's Office and in the 1980 Carter-Mondale campaign.

AFSCME picks up 6,000 in Ohio vote

Columbus, Ohio—The State, County & Municipal Employees won representation rights for 6,000 state-employed craft and maintenance workers.

The election involved one of many bargaining units set up following passage of Ohio's public employee bargaining law last year, a measure labor helped push through the state legislature.

AFSCME has won the representation rights for more than 20,000 of the 35,000 state public workers in a series of elections. In next month's elections for administrative support workers and professional staff, AFSCME is unopposed.

The vote by the craft and maintenance workers was 2,134 for AFSCME to 1,904 for the Communications Workers.

Kirkland cites vital role of unions in democracy

come the obstacles to reform;" the decline in the incidence of "death squad" attacks in El Salvador; and enactment by the U.S. Congress of foreign aid legislation that included funds for a Central American Development Organization (CADO).

The bad news, Kirkland said, is "Nicaragua's headlong rush into the totalitarian camp," highlighted by the the Sandinista government's recent suspension of "virtually all civil rights and liberties, including freedom of association and the right to strike."

He took sharp issue with those who claim that Nicaragua was pushed "into the arms of Moscow" by U.S. hostility to the revolution and U.S. government support for the contras.

The situation in Nicaragua is a case of "a revolution betrayed," Kirkland said. The "anti-democratic tendencies of the Sandinistas were manifest before the contras became a factor and, indeed, while the United States was providing aid to Nicaragua."

The decision to force all unions into the Sandinista labor federation "was made within 24 hours after they took power," he said. "The expulsion of AIFLD occurred while the AFL-CIO was supporting $117 million in aid to Nicaragua."

Kirkland rejected the contention that Nicaragua "would behave differently if only we were more persuasive, more generous, or set a better example in the conduct of our affairs." Such thinking, he said, suggests that the Sandinistas "could have been bought," and "betrays a condescending, imperialist cast of mind."

Kirkland reminded the assembled delegates that the AFL-CIO's 16th biennial convention in Anaheim, Calif., a week earlier had reaffirmed its support for a peaceful and democratic resolution to the problems of Central America.

He urged the leaders of Nicaragua and El Salvador to enter into negotiations with opposition forces "aimed at ending violent conflict by assuring all parties the right to democratic participation in the political process."

"We insist that freedom of association is essential to democracy—to bourgeois democracy, proletarian democracy, people's democracy, participatory democracy or any other kind of democracy" Kirkland stressed.

In this regard, he said, the CADO bill passed by the U.S. Congress is an important step forward because it supports a tripartite structure involving labor, management and government in the movement toward social reform and political democracy.

Of equal importance, Kirkland said, it would give Central America's democratic labor movements "significant and practical leverage in their struggles to expand trade union and human rights."

AIDS guidelines for workplace hailed by labor

The AFL-CIO welcomed the publication of federal workplace guidelines for preventing the transmission of the virus that causes acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS).

Margaret Seminario, the federation's safety specialist, stressed that the AIDS issue has become a "serious and difficult problem for many unions," especially those with workers in the health care field.

The guidelines, produced by the Centers for Disease Control, an agency of the Dept. of Health & Human Services, should be widely distributed and accompanied by educational materials, Seminario suggested, so that workers and employers can fully understand the problem.

"Presently, there is a lot of misinformation about how the AIDS virus is transmitted," Seminario said. "This has resulted in apprehension and anxiety in the workplace, as well as discriminatory actions against both those who have AIDS and those who may be exposed to it."

The AFL-CIO, in recent convention action, called on the CDC to develop guidelines. The federation will send copies of the guidelines to its affiliates.

Seminario noted that the AIDS virus can be transmitted only through sexual contact or through contact with blood from an infected person. She noted that the guidelines do not call for screening of workers for the virus and pointed out the AIDS virus is far less contagious than the hepatitis B virus.

The guidelines said "workers known to be infected with the AIDS virus should not be restricted from work solely based on this finding," nor should they be restricted from using facilities in the workplace.

Beatrice Whitmore named to IAFF's federal staff

Beatrice E. Whitmore was appointed by the Fire Fighters as an international representative for federal employees.

Whitmore, a vice president of the union's Federal Fire Fighters Joint Council, is a former president of IAFF Local F-88 at Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio, where she had been a fire inspector.

Negotiations urged to end strife in Central America

Mario Soares of the Socialist Party of Portugal and Secretary General Ismario Gonzalez Urdaneta of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT). The first such conference was held in June 1984 in Lisbon, Portugal.

The labor and political leaders renewed their support for the Contadora process and the backing provided by the Lima Group, but warned that there were "serious obstacles" in the path of peace.

"The absence of a firm political will in favor of justice, freedom and democracy is an unyielding barrier hindering the Contadora process," they declared. "The lack of a firm commitment in favor of demilitarization, disarmament and the withdrawal of external war-making factors also hinders the success of Contadora."

The declaration contained sharp criticism of international financial institutions for attempting to impose "recessive economic policies" on Central American governments. These "inhumane policies" have pushed workers and their families into "an even deeper mire of distress," and have fostered "forced emigration of Central American workers to the United States."

By "forcefully imposing financial formulas" on debt-ridden Central American governments, the world's banking institutions "deny the right to peace and democracy" to working class families and encourage perpetuation of the "immoral" concept that recovery can be achieved only by exploiting the "low-wage labor of workers and peasants."

Calling for a new program of development assistance that would benefit "the salaried majorities rather than the oligarchies," the resolution asserted that it is "unfair to burden the masses of the people with the heavy responsibility" for repaying the debts incurred by the wealthy.

"A new economic policy is urgently needed in order to reduce unemployment and misery and promote economic growth together with social justice," the delegates agreed. They called for the "militant solidarity" of democratic forces in Europe and elsewhere around the globe "to strengthen the hand of the fighters for democracy in Central America."

Latin American delegations came to the conference from Argentina, Barbados, Belize, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatamala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Uruguay and Venezula.

They were joined by delegates from France, Portugal and West Germany.

House scuttles key measure on plant shutdowns

groups from the major faiths—that have carried on a years-long campaign to end the tragedy of sudden plant closings that abandon communities and leave workers stranded.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said America was the loser when "business interests ganged up to defeat a very modest plant closing bill."

Any calls for labor-management cooperation by those who fought the legislation are now "exposed as hollow," Denison said. Labor-management cooperation to lessen hardship for workers and communities was the purpose of the defeated bill, he stressed.

A foretaste of the outcome was given a week earlier, when the House adopted a weakening amendment that stripped from the bill a requirement that firms meet with unions representing their workers to explore alternatives to a shutdown. That Republican-sponsored amendment was adopted, 215-193, with the help of 56 Democratic votes.

The bill's principal sponsors—William L. Clay (D-Mo.), William D. Ford (D-Mich.) and Silvio O. Conte (R-Mass.)—sought to shore up support for the notification requirement by working with the Education & Labor Committee's ranking Republican, James M. Jeffords (Vt.). The revised measure would have expanded the bill's small business exemption and put off the starting date of the legislation until a plant-closing study group recently appointed by Labor Sec. William E. Brock released the results of its study.

Line drawn

The debate found the House divided several ways on the measure. But supporters drew the line at bargaining away the bare bones of the bill on the possibility of picking up another vote or two, especially with a Republican-held Senate and a hostile White House promising further hurdles.

The thrust of the argument by the bill's opponents was that government shouldn't intrude on a management decision or "harass" business. As one GOP foe explained during the debate, it wasn't as if management "liked" to fire people. In fact his own experience as an employer was that he felt sick every time he had to fire someone.

So in the end, 154 Republicans and 54 Democrats voted against requiring employers to give advance notice of a plant shutdown; 183 Democrats and 20 Republicans voted for the bill.

Oklahoma gears up for 1986 RTW fight

Tulsa, Okla.—The Oklahoma AFL-CIO convention delegates geared up to continue the fight against a so-called right-to-work law in the state and re-elected Rex Reynolds as federation president.

Although no formal action was taken on the right-to-work issue, it was threaded through convention speeches and was the center of a fund-raising effort, Sec.-Treas. Ross Williams reported.

Right-to-work bills were defeated five times in the last legislative session, but as a result of the recent elections, proponents claim they have enough votes to force a public referendum on the issue.

Williams said that the backers of RTW lack the two-thirds majority needed to call a special election, so the earliest it could be on the ballot would be in August 1986.

Orville Tate, vice president of the Electrical Workers seventh district, pledged to try to get $1 per member per month from IBEW members in the state to aid in the fight against RTW. Buttons and T-shirts that read "Right-to-Work is a Ripoff" were sold to delegates to help raise additional funds.

Four-year term

In the elections, Reynolds of the Food & Commercial Workers defeated Barney Allen of the Operating Engineers for the top post. Reynolds will serve for four years as a move to reduce the term to two years was defeated. The 1983 convention had increased the term from two to four years.

Williams of the IBEW was re-elected secretary-treasurer and Dennis Quish of the Transport Workers was elected to his first term as vice president.

Three new executive board members were elected and 19 others were re-elected. The new members are: Stan Kroeling of the Grain Millers, Jessie Jackson of the State, County & Municipal Employees and Rosetta Rogers of the Glass & Pottery Workers.

Delegates attended a workshop on workers' compensation, unemployment insurance and the National Labor Relations Board.

Delegates called for the federal and state governments to amend tax laws to require corporations to forfeit any tax gains they received from closing a U.S. plant if they have built any foreign plants within the previous five years.

Unions detail flaws in U.S. trade policy

Bieber's testimony for the UAW and the AFL-CIO termed the soaring U.S. trade deficit a national emergency.

Instead of just reacting—almost always inadequately and too slowly—"it is time for us to call the shots for ourselves," Bieber said. He urged as a first step congressional action on pending bills, including imposition of a surcharge to limit imports from countries that have used unfair trade tactics to penetrate the U.S. market.

Exploitation of workers abroad is a form of unfair trade tactics that U.S. law and policy should prohibit, Bieber said. In many of the developing nations, government-imposed repression of unions is used as an inducement to attract investment by multinational corporations.

"The suppression of basic labor rights should be treated under U.S. law and in international trade agreements as a subsidy," he urged, subject to counter-measures by the United States to prevent damage to U.S. industries.

"The United States can no longer afford to respond at a measured pace to unfair practices," Bieber insisted. "The threat of retaliation must be real if we are to make progress in eliminating these practices."

"We can no longer accept the unending negotiations to remove unfair barriers to our exports, one by one, while the trade deficit undermines our industrial base," Bieber testified.

Job-saving trade policy is urged by Auto Workers President Owen Bieber at Senate hearings. At right, UAW Legislative Director Dick Warden.

Flight Engineers elect Widdicombe as Gill steps aside

Auckland, N.Z.—Alan Widdicombe was elected president of the Flight Engineers at the union's annual convention here.

Widdicombe, 57, succeeds William A. Gill, Jr., who has headed the FEIA for 20 of the past 22 years.

Gill, 61, did not seek re-election and was voted the title of president-emeritus.

In his farewell address, he urged delegates representing 4,000 flight engineers—1,500 of whom are employed by U.S. commercial airlines—to keep the union on the same path it has pursued for the past 37 years.

"We are organized into the best representational organization that politically and economically we can be," Gill said, expressing confidence that FEIA chapters can continue to negotiate job security for their members.

Gill reviewed the union's accomplishments in the past year in such areas as security, hijacking, deregulation, tax law changes and retirement.

The union's Frank Durkin Award was presented to Gill in recognition of his years of professional achievement on behalf of the FEIA and its members.

Delegates approved changes in the constitution and bylaws affecting its international affiliates but left standing all of the existing provisions dealing with its chapters in the United States.

Jerry L. Austin was re-elected executive vice president and secretary-treasurer.

Safety concerns prompt call for scrapping older airliners

Toulouse, France—Scrapping of all passenger airliners that are more than 15 years old was endorsed here by union leaders representing 1.8 million aerospace workers in the United States and a dozen other countries.

The 120 union leaders, attending the third World Aerospace Conference sponsored by the Geneva-based International Metalworkers Federation, also called for establishment of an international agency to monitor airliner safety.

Safety became a conference issue because of the spate of recent air disasters in which 1,200 people have died. The IMF declared that, of the 6,441 commercial passenger planes currently in service, 1,000 are more than 16 years old and another 1,500 are 12 years old or more.

President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, chairman of the IMF's aerospace committee, said that with one-sixth of the commercial airline fleet aging rapidly, the public is being forced to travel aboard "flying coffins."

The disasters which have resulted, Winpisinger said, are an example of "technology out of control."

Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus of the Auto Workers said that some of the blame for slashing the number of servicing personnel while continuing to use dangerously outdated aircraft could be laid at the doorstep of deregulation in the United States. Encouragement of cut-throat competition, he said, has forced carriers to reduce employment in their pursuit of profits.

IMF Gen. Sec. Herman Rebhan pointed out that the rise in airline profits has been accompanied by a sharp increase in "the danger to millions of flying passengers." He accused "profit-hungry airlines" of "cutting corners in servicing and safety in order to maximize passenger flying hours."

The IMF official was particularly critical of Japan Air Lines for the crash last August of a Boeing 747 in which 520 passengers died. That plane, Rebhan said, was kept in the air despite having been patched together following crashes in 1978 and 1982.

Victims of greed

Those who died in the JAL crash, he said, were the victims of management's "greed."

The conference also focused on the need for international union cooperation to meet what the IMF called "the massive spread of research and production agreements" spanning companies in different countries.

Delegates approved a resolution urging all aerospace workers employed by companies involved in joint ventures to share information on work organization, health and safety, production, and financial and commercial details.

An IMF study said experience in other sectors shows that international union collaboration is best initiated by strong unions at the parent or dominant company in any joint venture.

"But," the IMF declared, "the domination of U.S. aerospace firms hampers collaboration because American management has a near-apoplectic dislike of unions and unionism."

OMB rapped for rule delay on cotton dust

The Office of Management & Budget is coming under increasing congressional pressure to release the revised cotton dust standard that it has delayed for more than a month.

The proposed final standard is unique in that the textile workers and their unions, the industry and the Occupational Safety & Health Administration all agreed on the provisions of the standard, including the need for textile workers to undergo annual medical examinations.

But OMB has blocked it thus far, objecting to the cost of the annual medical examinations for workers who might be exposed to the hazard. The proposed standard would affect about 100,000 textile workers who could develop byssinosis or brown lung disease.

Rep. Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.), chairman of the House Education & Labor Subcommittee on Health & Safety, assailed OMB's delaying tactics.

In a strongly worded letter to OMB Director James C. Miller III, Gaydos said the agency's action "is clear evidence of a continuing insensitivity to worker health and safety and appears to be an excessive use of agency authority."

Early detection

Gaydos pointed out that regular medical examinations of textile workers "provides for early detection of brown lung disease and substantially reduces the incidence of the disease, reducing the burden on the health care system as well as the workers' compensation system."

Since everyone except OMB agrees on the standard, Gaydos said, it would seem "OMB's actions represent unwarranted and excessive government intrusion."

An OSHA spokesman said the agency anticipates OMB may hold up the standard until early next year.

A report prepared by the Labor Dept.'s Office of Regulatory Analysis shows that even with full compliance with the new dust exposure limits, some 6,000 workers out of a workforce of 100,000 would get brown lung disease. With a medical surveillance program, however, the number could drop to under 1,000.

The most likely presumption, the report said, is that "medical surveillance programs, which facilitate the transfer of ill workers while the disease is still reversible, is the greatest contributor to the successful prevention of these 5,000 cases."

The budget office contends that annual medical examinations would be too expensive when measured against the potential benefits to society, according to a Labor Dept. official.

Economy rumbles on rollercoaster

was paced by an automobile-buying spree by consumers lured into dealers' showrooms by price cuts and bargain-basement financing.

This prop was removed from the economy in October when 1986 models hit dealers' showrooms, as two key sets of statistics made clear:

- Retail sales nosedived 3.3 percent last month—the sharpest drop since the government began publishing these statistics in 1967—erasing most of the gains chalked up in the preceding two months.
- Producer prices showed a surprisingly steep rise of nine-tenths of 1 percent—the largest one-month increase since April 1981—negating the declines of six-tenths of 1 percent in September and three-tenths of 1 percent in August.

Underscoring the continued failure of the post-recession "recovery" to reach down to American workers was the latest report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics, showing that a majority of the states had higher joblessness levels in September than they did a year ago.

The grim employment statistics were no respecter of region.

In sun belt states, unemployment climbed 2 percent in Arizona, 1.7 percent in New Mexico, 1.4 percent in Texas and Louisiana, and 1.1 percent in Georgia.

In the rust belt, joblessness went up sixth-tenths of 1 percent in Connecticut, five-tenths of 1 percent in Illinois, and 1 percent in Ohio.

In the farm belt, unemployment rose 1.1 percent in Nebraska, eight-tenths of 1 percent in Iowa and seven-tenths of 1 percent in Kansas.

Only one state—Michigan—showed no change, with joblessness stuck at the year-ago level of 9.8 percent, while 22 states showed a decline in unemployment, paced by 2.8 percent in Alabama, 2 percent in North Carolina and 1.6 percent in Pennsylvania.

Meanwhile, strong import competition pushed down the rate of utilization of the nation's productive capacity. The October level was 80.2 percent, compared with 80.4 percent a year ago, and 1.8 percentage points below the 82-percent peak reached in July and August 1984, the high point of the "recovery."

In other economic developments:

- Housing construction rose 10.8 percent in October, rebounding from the steep 8.7-percent drop the previous month. In what could be an ominous sign for the future, however, permits for new construction fell 7.2 percent last month—the biggest one-month decline since July 1984.
- BLS reported that most major industries registered substantial productivity increases in 1984, paced by a 13.1-percent improvement in steel and 4.8 percent in autos—two industries where jobs are disappearing and plants are closing in the face of unremitting import competition.

New yardstick will skew GNP data

The Commerce Dept. is scheduled to announce an apparent major surge in the gross national product next month—but it will achieve this goal only by making wholesale changes in the way it charts economic growth.

The government will shift the "base year," which it uses for measuring the GNP from 1972, when the country was enjoying relative prosperity, to 1982, when the nation's economy was mired deep in the Reagan Recession.

In the process, it will downgrade the economic realities of the 1972-1982 period, which was marked by several years of rapid inflation. The resulting skewed picture will show a surge in the national economy since President Reagan took office.

Officials at the Commerce Dept.'s Bureau of Economic Analysis said that the move was designed to reflect better reporting of the "underground economy" and the growing influence of the computer industry.

The changes in the way that national income and products data are compiled will mark the eighth major revision in the government's methodology. The last such revision took place in 1980.

Export loophole

Reagan scheme hit on Alaskan oil

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to tighten restrictions on exports of Alaskan oil and thwart a Reagan Administration ploy to exploit a loophole in the law.

Legislative Director Ray Denison told a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee that the case against exports of oil from Alaska's North Slope is equally valid against a proposed sale of oil from Alaska's smaller Cook Inlet fields near Anchorage.

Oil sent to a port through the Trans-Alaska pipeline cannot be exported except under stringent criteria that take into account national and consumer interests. Congress reaffirmed that policy just this year by extending the ban for five more years.

But because Cook Inlet oil is produced near a navigable port, it does not move through the pipeline and is shipped directly by tanker to West Coast refineries.

Using that loophole, President Reagan last month set in motion an administrative procedure that would allow the oil to be exported to Japan.

While the Cook Inlet produces some 43,000 barrels of oil a day compared with 1.7 million barrels of North Slope production, the breach of the no-export policy is viewed as a wedge for future exports of North Slope oil as well as damaging to the U.S. economy in its own right.

Alaskan oil production has brought the United States a big step closer to energy self-sufficiency, Denison noted. An important byproduct, he stressed, has been the development of a transportation system using American-flag tankers and U.S. crews.

The Cook Inlet oil, because of its location, is less costly than North Slope oil and its elimination would force the San Francisco refinery which processes it to buy higher-priced replacement oil or shut down, Denison testified. Every barrel of Alaskan oil sold will have to be replaced by higher-priced imports from less stable parts of the world, he noted.

And while the Administration argues that only a relatively small quantity of oil would be exported, Denison said he has "no doubt" that the interests pushing for the breach in policy still have as their goal the unlimited export of Alaskan oil.

The Alaskan oil trade is vital to the U.S. tanker fleet, Denison testified, employing 46 percent of the vessels and 74 percent of the tonnage. Without that capacity, he warned, America would be dependent on foreign-registered vessels in any emergency.

"We strongly oppose any effort to permit the export of Alaskan oil," Denison testified. If it is allowed, he said, "consumers, labor and industry will be hurt, and our national security will be weakened."

New Mexico convention elects Suarez

Albuquerque, N.M.—The New Mexico AFL-CIO elected a new president and charted its legislative and political course at its 24th biennial convention here.

Johnny Suarez of the Carpenters was elected president, replacing Frutoso N. Chavez who did not seek re-election. Delegates returned Executive Sec.-Treas. Neal Gonzalez to office for his ninth two-year term and elected George Dunivan of the Food & Commercial Workers first vice president. Ten new members were elected to the 26-member executive board.

The 150 delegates placed a state hazardous substance "right-to-know" law and improved pay and benefits for teachers and state employees at the top of their legislative priority list.

The convention also urged local unions to activate COPE committees for upcoming state and national political campaigns.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in an address to the delegates, outlined the federation's new approaches to organizing, including the "union associates" program, endorsed by the AFL-CIO convention in October. That plan would allow AFL-CIO unions to offer certain membership benefits to union supporters not currently covered by collective bargaining agreements.

Other convention speakers included Gov. Toney Anaya (D); Alfredo Montoyo, director of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, and Joseph Valasquez of national COPE.

"I pray that the freedom loving people of the United States will not let the government of South Africa think that Reverend Falwell speaks for all America.

"It is time for good people to be heard — loud, clear and now."

Desmond Tutu
Johannesburg

Dear Bishop Tutu:

Jerry Falwell does not speak for me -- or for America.

The American people know that apartheid is a crime against the human soul. It is a moral outrage. We condemn it.

By signing this FREEDOM LETTER we say NO to Mr. Falwell, NO to apartheid, and NO to the Government of South Africa.

I am proud to stand with you, Pope John Paul, Coretta Scott King and one million other Americans to speak with a single and solid voice against the oppression of the Black people in South Africa.

Bywater honored for human rights, bargaining roles

New York—The Workers Defense League presented its top annual award to William H. Bywater, president of the Electronic Workers.

The IUE leader was honored for his role in human rights, both at home and abroad, and for his leadership of the coordinated bargaining committee that represents 13 unions in negotiating with the huge General Electric and Westinghouse companies.

The David L. Clendenin Award was presented to Bywater by J.C. Turner, president emeritus of the Operating Engineers and last year's winner of the League's award.

Jack Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing & Textile Workers, introduced Bywater as a "leader who enriches our movement by his principles, honesty and compassion."

In accepting the award, Bywater scored the Reagan Administration for its continued free-market philosophy that has resulted in a flood of imports. The impact has been the loss of many jobs in the electronics industry to workers overseas.

"We have exported jobs and imported unemployment," Bywater told the audience. "The United States is rapidly becoming a have-not nation."

The bargains found in the marketplace are really no bargain when the end result is the loss of work and dignity for American workers, he said.

The Workers Defense League was formed in 1936 as a permanent, nonpartisan organization to coordinate legal and financial resources and to organize publicity to defend the rights of workers.

The WDL's newest project is a program to train volunteers to assist in rectifying the long-standing abuses of unemployment insurance rules which result in arbitrary disqualifications of out-of-work people.

Pentagon snubs wartime role of merchant sailors

New York—A Pentagon decision denying veteran's benefits to American seamen who served on U.S.-flag merchant ships in World War II was denounced by Maritime Union President Shannon J. Wall as "mean-spirited and un-American."

The NMU has battled for four decades "to get the deserved recognition for the seamen who served, sacrificed and died" in the war, Wall said.

But the Defense Dept. has consistently refused to provide benefits. In its most recent refusal, the Pentagon contended that the role merchant seamen played on convoys and in invasions did not constitute "active military service."

Seamen suffered casualties "equalled only by the Marine Corps," Wall said. He cited President Reagan's pre-summit television address which laid particular stress on the casualties suffered on the North Atlantic and North Sea convoys.

There are less than 1,000 surviving World War II seamen who would qualify for veterans' benefits, Wall said.

Psychological Strip Search

IS THERE A NEED for federal legislation to prohibit the use of polygraph tests in private employment? Or do state and local laws adequately protect employees and job applicants from the humiliation of being hooked up to a so-called "lie detector" while being questioned by an employer?

A federal law is very much needed, the AFL-CIO Food & Allied Service Trades Dept. confirmed with a bit of investigative reporting.

To start with, many jurisdictions do not have any restrictions on polygraph questioning by employers. And as unions such as the Food & Commercial Workers and the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees have discovered, the diversity of laws invites evasion.

Take the experience of the FAST legislative aide who applied for a job at a Radio Shack store in the District of Columbia, where polygraph testing by employers is illegal. The chain also has stores in nearby Maryland, where there is less stringent regulation of polygraph testing, and in Virginia, where there are no restrictions.

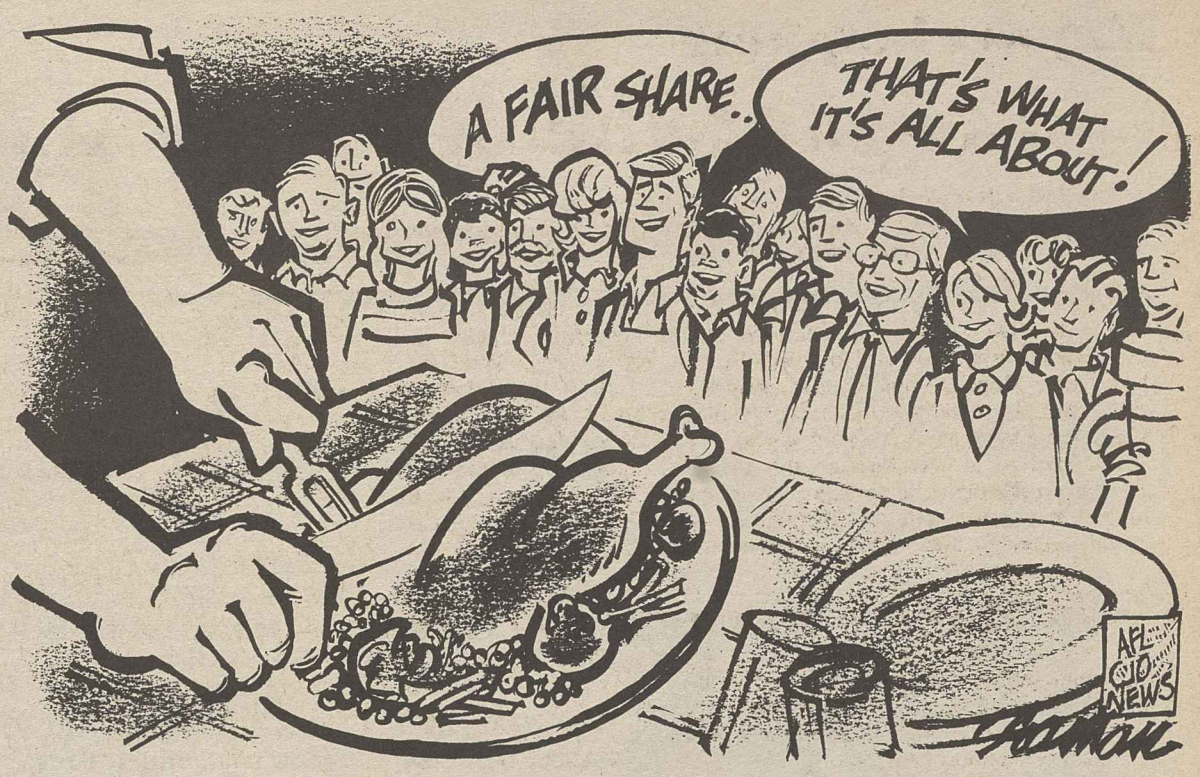
Before offering her a job at one of its D.C. stores, the chain sent her to Virginia to take a polygraph test—an action which probably violated the D.C. law. But since no one has ever been prosecuted under the statute, Radio Shack management clearly wasn't taking much of a risk.

HOOKING A PERSON to a polygraph machine has been described as a "psychological third degree." Mary C. Brazell, who went through the ordeal to test compliance with the local ordinance, likened the experience to "awaiting the electric chair." Among the questions was whether any member of her family had been on welfare or applied for food stamps.

In some jurisdictions, such as Maryland, employees or job applicants can be asked, but not required, to subject themselves to the polygraph machine. Supposedly, a person who declines cannot be penalized. But does anyone doubt that the intimidation is there? As an official of a polygraph testing business said to a reporter, "Why would somebody not want to take it unless they had something to hide?"

One might ask the same question; of course, of anyone objecting to such indignities as strip searches, opening of personal mail or telephone bugging.

The House Education & Labor Committee has reported a bill barring virtually all polygraph testing by private employers, and a companion measure in the Senate has bipartisan sponsorship. The legislation is needed.



Good employers can and do protect themselves against dishonesty without the trappings of a police state. The polygraph machine has no place in the business relationship between workers and their employers.

In the Grip of Zealots

A NEW YORK TIMES editorial largely endorses the AFL-CIO charge that the Reagan Administration's failure to enforce the Occupational Safety & Health Act contributed to the big rise in work-related injuries and illness.

Progress achieved under the Carter Administration's Eula Bingham was wiped out by Reagan appointees Thorne Auchter and Robert Rowland, it charges. "Through exuberant budget-cutting, they stripped the agency of technical and scientific expertise. With piddling fines they let employers know that OSHA had no teeth."

Labor Sec. William E. Brock is trying to get a new OSHA head cleared by the White House, the editorial notes. "But no matter how capable, a new OSHA chief can be no more effective than the Administration allows." Despite concerns expressed by Labor Sec. Brock, it concludes, "the Administration seems in the grips of zealots who want not to see OSHA improved, but eliminated."

Washington Window

Slower growth expected in service industry jobs

By Press Associates, Inc.

In the world of work, nothing is more constant than change. New technology and inventions, international competition, business cycles, trade policy, tax laws, the drive for the highest profit—these and other factors are ever revolutionizing the nation's workforce.

In recent years, the economy's service sector has expanded rapidly while employment in manufacturing has declined. A new study by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics forecasts that the number of service jobs will continue to grow over the next 10 years, but at a slower rate than during the past decade.

The steady job loss in manufacturing will give way to a moderate expansion, but this sector will continue to decline as a proportion of total U.S. employment, the study predicted.

The nation's economy, depending on its health, will add between 10 million and 21 million jobs in the next decade, the study said. If the economy grows at a modest 2.9 percent rate during this period, slightly above the 2.4 percent growth rate between 1973 and 1984, more than 15 million jobs will be created, it said.

In that case, the BLS study said, the labor force will reach 129 million and the unemployment rate by 1995 will inch down from the current 7.1 percent to 6 percent—still very high by post-World War II standards.

Changing workforce

Whatever the growth rate, about 9 of the 10 new jobs will be in the service-producing industries, the study projected. It said:

- Occupations with the greatest number of new jobs will be, in declining order: cashiers, registered nurses, janitors and cleaners, truck drivers, waiters and waitresses, wholesale trade salesworkers, nursing aides, retail salesworkers, accountants and auditors. These occupations will expand by more than 3.5 million jobs.
- Clerical, office and other administrative support jobs are expected to expand less rapidly during the next 10 years as a result of computerized office equipment. Even so, these jobs will grow by nearly 2 million, to 20.5 million, keeping it one of the largest occupational groups.
- The fastest growing occupations will be, in order: paralegals, computer programmers and analysts, medical assistants, data processing equipment repairers, electrical and electronics engineers and technicians, computer operators, travel agents, physical therapists, financial services salesworkers, mechanical engineers, lawyers, correction officers, accountants and auditors, registered nurses and employment interviewers.
- Manufacturing will grow modestly to about 21 million jobs by 1995, but these jobs will represent only 17 percent of total employment, compared to 25 percent in 1969.
- The three occupational groups accounting for the largest proportion of workers requiring post-secondary education or training—managers, professional workers and technicians—will increase faster than the average for total employment.
- Craft, precision production and repair occupations will grow by nearly 12 percent, somewhat slower than total employment. These jobs are heavily tied to manufacturing, which will grow slowly, and to construction, which will grow faster than manufacturing, but somewhat less than the average for total employment.
- Machine operators, fabricators and laborers—which declined during the past decade—will increase about 7 percent.
- The occupations which will decline most rapidly over the next 10 years include many which have been suffering job losses in recent years because of imports and automation. The textile and apparel industry, a leading example, is expected to lose about 350,000 more jobs. Farming, forestry and fishing jobs are expected to decline about 3 percent, less than half their decline in recent years.

The continuously changing make-up of the workforce poses a challenge to organized labor to adapt and meet the needs of workers and their families and communities.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Bills Draw Broad Support

Occupational Disease At Epidemic Levels, AFL-CIO Seeks Federal Compensation Plan

Suffering and death from work-contracted diseases have reached epidemic proportions in the U.S. As a result, Congress has begun work on two important bills that would alert employees to dangerous work conditions and compensate them and their dependents when disease strikes.

It is estimated that 25 million workers are exposed to harmful substances of some kind, and 11 million of these are exposed to known or suspected cancer-causing substances or processes. One of these -- asbestos -- will kill 200,000 workers over the next 15 years.

The AFL-CIO is urging Congress to pass H.R. 1309, the High Risk Occupational Disease Notification And Prevention Act, and H.R. 3090, the Federal Occupational Disease Compensation Act. The first would alert employees to workplace dangers and the second would create a federal program of compensation.

During testimony before Congress, spokespersons from the AFL-CIO and its member unions praised the features of the two bills. Among those stressing the great need for quick action were Legislative Director Ray Denison, Industrial Union Department President Howard Samuel and Margaret Seminario, Associate Director of the Department of Occupational Safety, Health and Social Security.

H.R. 3090, sponsored by Rep. Pat Williams (D-MT), would:

* Replace scattered state systems with a strong federal compensation program.
* Give asbestos-contaminated victims immediate coverage.
* Permit workers to retain their rights to sue for damages.
* Cover diseases other than those asbestos-related through a trigger and rulemaking procedure.
* Create a federal compensation insurance fund.

H.R. 1309 would for the first time establish a system for notifying workers at high risk and for providing appropriate medical surveillance. This program alone could save thousands of workers from an early death and provide incentives for employers and manufacturers to reduce risk and exposure in the workplace.

Double Breasting Bill Clears House Committee Unscathed

Important legislation to bring an end to double-breasting in the construction industry has cleared the House Education and Labor Committee and is expected to reach the House floor soon.

With the tacit approval of the NLRB, union construction firms across the country are evading the Federal labor law by setting up non-union operations under the same corporate structure. These phony companies drain work away from the union operations and threaten to undermine the wages and benefits that construction workers have gained in security and income over the years.

H.R. 281, sponsored by Rep. William Clay (D-MO) would end these abuses and restore the original intent of Congress.

The bill came out of committee without alteration and has a good chance of getting full House approval before the end of this session. However, there is strong opposition from contractor associations and the perennial National Right To Work Committee.

Attempts will be made to amend or weaken the bill on the floor so workers should write their representative as soon as possible, stressing the importance of this legislation.

Taxing Benefits: Moment Of Truth Arrives For House Of Representatives

The moment of truth has arrived for tax reform in the House. The Ways and Means Committee, Chaired by Dan Rostenkowski (D-IL) could report out its tax package before the Thanksgiving recess, and as with most tax bills in the House, there will be limited, if any opportunity for amendments on the floor. This bill could come to the House floor before the tentative adjournment on December 13.

The effect of a year-long campaign by workers and their families to stop the taxation of employee benefits and to retain the deduction for state and local taxes could be measured in the next few days. As of the middle of November, over 70,000 postcards opposing the unfair tax on worker supports were received by key members of the House Ways and Means Committee.

The package now before the tax writing committee would tax health care premiums above a ceiling of $120 per month for individuals and $300 for families. It would also tax all group life insurance payments, death benefits, employee education assistance, group legal services and unemployment compensation. It originally included a tax on worker compensation.

These critical issues, including the deduction for state and local taxes, are yet to be addressed and time is running out. Most of the key decisions will be made in the next few days, so now is the best time for workers to contact their lawmakers one more time.

On September 20, Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-CA), with the support of the AFL-CIO, introduced a resolution in the House opposing any tax whatsoever on the hard-earned support benefits of working families. As the weeks passed, H.R. 268 gained momentum, due in a large part to the continued grassroots efforts of union activists across the country.

The measure now has 279 cosponsors, including many important House leaders.

AFL-CIO's Fair Tax

In answer to the Reagan Administration, the AFL-CIO has outlined a fairer system of tax reforms that would take the burden off the backs of working families and make the wealthy and corporations pay their fair share. The plan includes more equitable tax brackets that would reduce the tax cuts for wealthy individuals now contained in the Administration's package.

It would establish a fairer personal exemption so that a middle class family's children would receive the same tax deduction as a rich child.

It would reduce the capital gains and foreign tax credit loopholes enjoyed by the rich, eliminate a proposed corporate dividend deduction windfall, create more equitable tax rates for corporations including a minimum tax and at the same time raise needed revenues to help reduce the deficit.

What You Can do

If you haven't written, do so now. If you have, do it again. A simple postcard to your representative will do. Urge him or her to oppose any legislation whatsoever that includes a tax on worker support benefits or a repeal of the important state and local tax deduction. Do it today!

Imports pushing U.S. trade deficit to new high

Exports drop in October to 20-month low

By Gene Zack

The nation's trade deficit raced headlong toward a record-smashing high despite a narrowing in the export-import gap to $11.5 billion in October.

For the first 10 months of this year, the Commerce Dept. reported, the trade deficit totaled $118.1 billion, 11 percent ahead of last year's blistering pace for the same period, when the 10-month figure was a grim $105.5 billion.

While the surge in imports slowed a bit to $28.8 billion in October, U.S. exports fell to $17.4 billion—the lowest monthly level since February 1984.

Although last month's deficit was lower than September's $15.5 billion—an all-time one-month high—"that is nothing to be thankful for," said AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald.

"America's trade problems continue to grow unchecked," Oswald said, threatening more hard times ahead for American industries and their workers who have been trapped in the path of the import juggernaut.

The largest deficits are concentrated in the manufacturing sector, he emphasized, although America's farmers "are also paying a high price because an over-valued dollar and import-export policies practiced by other countries" are driving U.S. farm products from world markets.

Heading higher

Oswald pointed out that, with two more months still to go, the 1985 trade deficit is a scant $5.2 billion below the $123.3 billion chalked up in all of 1984—the worst performance in the nation's trading history.

Underscoring the concerns expressed by the AFL-CIO, Beryl Sprinkel, the President's chief economic adviser, predicted that not only will the trade deficit reach a new peak this year, but that 1986's deficit will be even worse. He blamed the over-valued dollar, which makes American products harder to sell overseas and attracts a flood of cheap imports to this country.

The disastrous trading performance has led to growing pressure in Congress for action on labor-backed legislation to aid domestic industries, where more than 270,000 jobs have been wiped out since the beginning of the year—and some 2 million jobs have been lost since President Reagan took office—all as the result of imports.

Automobile imports declined in October to $2.8 billion from September's unusually high level of $4 billion.

Oswald attributed this to the general slump in automobile car sales following the end of aggressive selling techniques to move last year's models. Like domestic producers, he said, foreign carmakers are reluctant to see a huge buildup in dealer inventories at a time when demand is slackening.

Mirroring the drop in automobile imports, America's trade deficit with Japan narrowed to $3.2 billion after having set a record of $5.1 billion in September. But the U.S. deficit with Japan remains larger than with any other country.

On the other sign of the trade coin, October's exports of manufactured goods slumped almost 3 percent to $11.8 billion, while agricultural sales rose 5.1 percent to $2.26 billion.

House panel rules out tax on workers' job benefits

March against apartheid

Union supporters mark first anniversary of demonstrations against apartheid in South Africa with a march to the South African embassy in Washington. Nearly 2,000 demonstrators took part, including AFL-CIO Vice President Gene Upshaw and Civil Rights Director William Pollard.

Final version responds to labor protests

By David L. Perlman

The House Ways & Means Committee stripped President Reagan's "tax reform" proposal of its worst elements—an attempt to slap an employment benefits tax on workers and elimination of the federal income tax deduction for taxes paid to state and local governments.

Spurred by a grass-roots campaign mounted by the trade union movement, 279 House members signed on as sponsors of a resolution by Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.) opposing taxation of employment benefits.

With such a big majority of the House clearly on record, the Democratic majority of the Ways & Means Committee looked to the corporation profits tax as the alternative to taxing worker benefits. (For account of labor's campaign, see story on Page 3.)

The bill it adopted would make the complex federal tax structure more equitable by requiring corporations that have paid little or no taxes to assume a fairer share of the burden.

Corporate tax

One of the committee's final actions was to move the corporate tax 1 percent higher than anticipated to offset elimination of proposed taxes on health insurance and other employer-provided job benefits.

In the end, the committee did succeed in the enormously difficult task of shaping a package that has a realistic chance of winning House approval.

That's the "first-look" impression from labor's point of view. But because of the complexity of tax legislation, the AFL-CIO will be taking a much more detailed look at the bill's probable impact before making a judgment.

The House committee passed up the opportunity to raise revenue and decrease the budget deficit by doing a more effective

Dixie organizing gains mark union resurgence

A resurgence of organizing in the South has led to significant successes for affiliates of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Through the first ten months of this year, IUD Organizing Director Harold McIver said, the department participated in 32 representation elections. Its affiliates won 25 elections to gain bargaining rights for 4,000 workers. Four other elections are in litigation. IUD affiliates lost only three times, in units totaling just over 600 employees.

Major organizing successes in 1985 include:

- Ladies' Garment Workers, 650 employees at two Fitzgerald Underwear plants in Georgia.
- Steelworkers, 600 employees at Batesville Casket Co., Manchester, Tenn.
- Carpenters, 225 employees at Fleetwood Homes, Lexington, Miss., and 261 employees at Coastal Lumber Co., Havana, Fla.
- Auto Workers, 200 employees at Lilliston Corp., Albany, Ga.
- Electrical Workers, 281 employees at Katon Industries, Hazlehurst, Miss.
- Food & Commercial Workers, 215 employees at Farm Fresh Catfish, Hollandale, Miss.

In addition, the Rubber Workers have an election scheduled Dec. 6 for 150 employees at a new Data Technology plant in Dadeville, Ala., just 25 miles away from its plant in Opelika, where the URW has representation rights.

The URW, with IUD assistance, has also petitioned for an election among 200 employees at Carolina Rubber Hose in Salisbury, N.C.

McIver credits an "attitude change on the part of workers" in the South for the increasing success of union organizing efforts.

Real earning plunge again, leaving workers worse off

Real earnings fell a sharp six-tenths of 1 percent in October, the Labor Dept. reported, leaving America's workers worse off than they were a year ago.

Wage increases averaging 3 percent over the past 12 months were more than eaten up by a decline of three-tenths of 1 percent in the average workweek and a 2.9-percent hike in the cost of living.

The result, said the Bureau of Labor Statistics, was that workers' average purchasing power in October was two-tenths of 1 percent below the same month of 1984.

The consumer price index inched up three-tenths of 1 percent last month, paced by the continued inexorable upward movement in health care costs, plus sharp rises in shelter costs, auto finance charges and educational costs.

A five-tenths of 1 percent rise in medical care costs—the same as in September—meant that Americans are now paying 6.5 percent more for health care than they did a year ago.

Shelter costs went up sixth-tenths of 1 percent last month, mostly as the result of rent increases, leaving this component of the family budget 5.2 percent above where it was in October 1984.

Automobile finance charges surged 1.9 percent in October, BLS said, signaling an end to the "incentive financing" to which manufacturers and dealers resorted to reduce inventories before the start of the new model year. This financing ploy had skewed a number of economic indicators over the past several months.

Further evidence that the August-September car-buying boom was over came as the industry reported that sales of new domestic cars nose-dived 27.2 percent in mid-November from a year ago. Ford's sales were off 30.7 percent, Chrysler reported a

House rollcalls on plant shutdown bill

More than five million Americans have suffered the loss of their jobs through plant shutdowns in the last five years. Thousands of factories, work sites and stores have shut their doors—often with no notice to employees, leaving behind stricken communities and broken families. In Congress, a modest legislative proposal, formulated by Representatives William D. Ford (D-Mich.), William L. Clay (D-Mo.) and Silvio Conte (R-Mass.), would have cushioned the blow by requiring that employers give notice of an impending shutdown and that they meet with employees to discuss the possibility of alternatives.

On Nov. 21, after prolonged debate and the adoption of weakening amendments, the House of Representatives adopted a notification proposal by a 211-201 vote and then, reversing itself, killed the measure by a 208-203 vote.

The Labor-Management Notification & Consultation Act (H.R. 1616), with 175 cosponsors, and following modification on the House floor, would have required an employer with 50 or more workers to give 90 days' notice of closing or a layoff involving more than 50 workers. It required that consultation take place with the firms' workers where there was a collective bargaining arrangement and provided that the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service be notified and be available to assist in consultations. It also provided for a National Commission on Plant Closings & Worker Dislocation.

When the bill came before the House, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Chamber of Commerce and scores of corporate lobbyists in Washington opened an all-out assault. In terms that were echoed on the floor by the bill's opponents, the bill was derided as "cuckoo economics" and "dangerous" and would push companies into bankruptcy.

Meanwhile, representatives of the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions, as well as the League of Cities, the U.S. Catholic Conference and other community interest organizations, sought out vacillating legislators to combat the often wild and erroneous attacks on the measure.

The first test vote came on an amendment by Rep. Steve Bartlett (R-Tex.) to strike the provision requiring consultation between the employer and workers. The provision required only that talks be held, with no requirement that any resolution of the problem be reached. The purpose of the provision was to explore avenues to keep the facility open, possibly through the involvement of the community or through a worker participation mechanism.

Vote No. 1. On Nov. 13, the House voted 215-193 to accept the Bartlett amendment, striking from the bill the provision to require consultation. Right votes (R) against the amendment were cast by 178 Democrats and 15 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 159 Republicans and 56 Democrats. There were 26 members absent (A).

When the Bartlett amendment revealed the heavy inroads by the corporate lobbyists and the timidity of several Democrats and many more Republicans, a decision was made to modify the bill slightly to increase the likelihood of passage.

When the bill was returned to the House floor on Nov. 21, Rep. James Jeffords (R-Vt.) offered an amendment, supported by the bill's original sponsors and the AFL-CIO, which provided for 90 days' notice where more than 50 workers faced a layoff or if more than 30 percent of the firm's workforce would be affected.

Vote No. 2. On Nov. 21, the House voted 211-201 in support of the AFL-CIO-backed Jeffords amendment providing for pre-notification. Right votes in favor of the amendment were cast by 189 Democrats and 22 Republicans. Voting wrong were 153 Republicans and 48 Democrats. There were 22 members absent.

An attempt followed by Rep. Buddy Roemer (D-La.) to further weaken the Jeffords amendment. It was soundly beaten, paving the way for final passage. But the House then reversed its earlier vote and defeated the bill.

Vote No. 3. On Nov. 21, the House voted 208-203 against final passage of H.R. 1616 as amended. Right votes in favor of passage were cast by 183 Democrats and 20 Republicans. Voting wrong were 154 Republicans and 54 Democrats. There were 23 members absent.

Nationwide campaign reverses surge toward tax on worker benefits

A campaign that involved tens of thousands of union members in a nationwide grass-roots lobbying effort is largely responsible for the decision of the House Ways & Means Committee to scrap proposals to tax the employment benefits of America's workers.

In a dramatic, last-minute showdown that paved the way for agreement on a tax reform package, the committee majority said no to taxing workers on the value of employer-paid health insurance and other job benefits that unions pioneered but are increasingly common in America's workplaces.

The decision to look to corporate taxes instead of workers' life support benefits didn't just happen.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland sounded the alarm a year ago when the Treasury Dept. came out with its "first draft" of a long-promised tax reform plan. It was touted as cutting taxes for everyone, but the AFL-CIO warned that many workers would be worse off. Lots worse off in some cases.

Workers penalized

Comprehensive health insurance benefits, group legal services and educational benefits provided by employers would all be taxed as if they were cash wages to workers. State and local taxes would no longer be deductible on federal tax returns, threatening a disastrous cutback of public services. Workers' compensation and black lung benefits would for the first time be counted as taxable income.

The network of union lobbyists that meets at the AFL-CIO headquarters nearly every Monday that Congress is in session canvassed members of the House Ways & Means Committee and a cross-section of House members before the new Congress convened in January.

The reports were not encouraging. It would take more than conventional lobbying to protect the paychecks of workers in the shaping of tax legislation.

As in the labor law reform campaign, which came within a Senate filibuster of success, and as in the successful 1984 campaign to stop the bankruptcy law from being used as a device to break union contracts, the AFL-CIO turned to its state and local federations—and to rank-and-file union members.

The first concentration was in the districts of Ways & Means Committee members. Union members in each of these key districts were mailed a brochure on the issues, postcards to be sent to both senators as well as the House member and one to be returned to the AFL-CIO. A letter signed either by Kirkland or the president of the worker's own union stressed the importance of the issue and urged that the postcards be completed.

"Don't tax or reduce my employee benefits," the postcards urged. "I'd like to know how you stand on this issue. Please let me know."

Meanwhile, union papers across the country highlighted the threat to worker benefits. The AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research prepared a Federationist insert in the AFL-CIO News that presented labor's position in full. Inter-union legislative action committees that have been established in a number of congressional districts swung into action. Television and radio spot ads were scheduled in key districts, and polls showing opposition to taxing worker benefits were publicized.

More than a million postcards were distributed, along with some 650,000 brochures, 10,000 posters and 60,000 legislative fact sheets. The Building & Construction Trades Dept. and many individual unions mounted additional massive efforts of their own.

100,000 postcards

At least 100,000 postcards were received on Capitol Hill, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison reported. State and local central bodies organized multi-union delegations to seek meetings with members of Congress in their home states during the Easter recess.

The final phase began after Labor Day, as the Ways & Means Committee prepared for the tug-of-war between competing interests that would determine the final shape of the tax bill.

Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.) introduced a resolution expressing "the sense of the House of Representatives that employee benefits not be taxed."

The initial goal was to get 218 members—a majority of the entire House—to sign on as cosponsors. The goal was reached by Oct. 1, and at latest count the number of cosponsors had grown to 279.

But labor's lobbyists aren't sounding the trumpets—yet. The Senate has still to act. The White House is mulling strategy. And the message that came through so loud and clear in the first session of Congress may have to be repeated still louder in the second session when the real showdown on the shape of tax legislation is likely to take place.

McDermott to step down, CLC president since 1978

Toronto—Canadian Labor Congress President Dennis McDermott, 63, announced he will not seek re-election at the end of his current term.

McDermott, who has served four terms as president, said his decision was based on personal reasons. A successor will be elected at the CLC's next convention, Apr. 28—May 2.

Stickin' to the union

A construction worker has the right to put a union sticker on his hardhat during an organizing campaign, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

NLRB Chairman Donald L. Dotson dissented from the ruling by a three-member labor board panel ordering the Malta Construction Co. of Conley, Ga., to reinstate Johnny Lambert with back pay and interest.

Lambert was working as a crane operator on a highway construction job during an organizing campaign by Local 926 of the Operating Engineers. He was fired when he refused to remove two union stickers from his company-issued hardhat.

A NLRB administrative law judge ordered the reinstatement of another worker who was also fired for union activity, but said management had the right to punish Lambert for "defacing" company property.

That was OK with Dotson, who said Lambert could have chosen to wear a union T-shirt as an alternative means of expressing his union support. But NLRB members Patricia Diaz Dennis and Wilford W. Johansen said any work rule curtailing the right to wear a union insignia is invalid unless based on legitimate production or safety reasons.

Bill to continue OPIC sent to House-Senate conference

The Senate responded in part to labor concerns about the job-destroying potential of the Overseas Private Investment Corp. It voted to trim a House-passed, four-year extension of OPIC to 18 months and to make other changes in the controversial program.

OPIC provides federal insurance of private-sector investments in what the law terms "less developed friendly countries." The law authorizing the program expired at the end of September, and the AFL-CIO opposed its reauthorization.

OPIC's encouragement of investments in goods-producing industries in countries such as Taiwan and South Korea has taken jobs away from American workers, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote senators. He noted that the U.S. merchandise trade deficit has tripled since 1981, when OPIC was last reauthorized.

Both the House and Senate bills include new language that allows insurance of investments only in nations that are taking steps to implement "internationally recognized worker rights."

The Senate bill also directs the Comptroller General to study the impact of OPIC on U.S. employment and report to Congress within one year.

Both the study and the shortened reauthorization period were added to the bill in amendments by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio).

Metzenbaum told the Senate that 40 percent of OPIC-insured projects represented investments in overseas manufacturing industries. The countries that were the chief beneficiaries, he said, are most heavily in competition with U.S. domestic production.

Both the amendment and bill were approved by voice vote, setting the stage for a House-Senate conference to resolve the differences.

Airline deregulation scored as excuse to undercut unions

Airline unions charged at Senate hearings that the Dept. of Transportation is using deregulation as a pretext to abandon a 30-year-old policy of requiring job and pay safeguards for workers adversely affected by mergers and route takeovers.

According to the Reagan Administration, the only justification for the labor protective provisions in the past was concern that a strike would hurt the public by eliminating air service along an important route.

Now that deregulation allows other airlines to move in and fill the gap, Assistant Transportation Sec. Matthew V. Scocozza told the Subcommittee on Aviation, there is no need for the government to intervene.

The only public interest concern that would justify imposition of worker protections, he testified, would be the threat of a nationwide disruption of air service. A strike against one airline no longer has "ominous implications," Scocozza said.

The department's position is based on a "gross distortion of history," Air Line Pilots President Henry A. Duffy retorted.

Duffy's testimony cited repeated instances—from the early 1950s through the 1970s—when the former Civil Aeronautics Board had specifically expressed the desire to prevent hardship to employees as a reason to require labor protections in an airline consolidation. It required carriers to provide displacement and dislocation allowances to workers whose jobs have been eliminated, downgraded or moved to other locations. And it required provisions for an equitable merging of seniority lists.

While the CAB's functions have been taken over by the Dept. of Transportation, the obligation is unchanged, the union insisted.

Under the Administration reasoning, Duffy noted, the only way unions could be assured of worker protections would be to threaten to strike all the nation's airlines.

Congress intended employee safeguards "as a matter of fairness and equity," he suggested, "not as a bribe against strikes."

The point was emphasized also in joint testimony by the Railway & Airline Clerks, the Flight Engineers and the Machinists.

The unions, in testimony presented by attorney John O. Clarke, Jr., urged Congress to make the commitment to worker protections mandatory rather than subject to interpretation by the Transportation Dept.

"Employees are the innocent victims" of the effects of deregulation, the three unions stressed. Contrary to the intent, the deregulation law "has proved to be the most effective anti-labor legislation" of the modern era, they testified.

job of closing tax loopholes used by profitable corporations and wealthy individuals.

In view of President Reagan's declared intention to veto any form of "tax increase," and aware of the election-year pressures on Congress, the committee abided by the Administration's insistance that any tax changes to be "revenue-neutral."

The Administration had sought to reduce the present 14 tax brackets to three, with a top rate of 35 percent. That would have given 25 percent of the total tax reduction to the one-half of 1 percent of the population with incomes over $200,000.

The committee bill lessened the tilt by adding a fourth bracket of 38 percent for taxable incomes above $100,000 on joint returns. The personal exemption would be raised from $1,080 to $2,000 for each taxpayer and dependent.

The standard deduction also would be raised for all taxpayers not choosing to itemize deductions, from $3,670 to $4,800 on a joint return. Non-itemizers would also be allowed a further deduction for charitable contributions over $100.

To further discourage itemization, taxpayers could only itemize deductions that exceed $500 for each person covered by the return. Thus a family of four could itemize only deductions exceeding $2,000 if it didn't take the standard deduction.

Corporate tax rates would be reduced, to the benefit of companies that have paid their taxes in full. But total corporation taxes would rise through the partial closing of tax-avoidance loopholes. The maximum corporate tax rate, now 46 percent, would drop to 36 percent under the committee bill. The Administration proposal would have dropped it to 33 percent.

Low-income exclusion

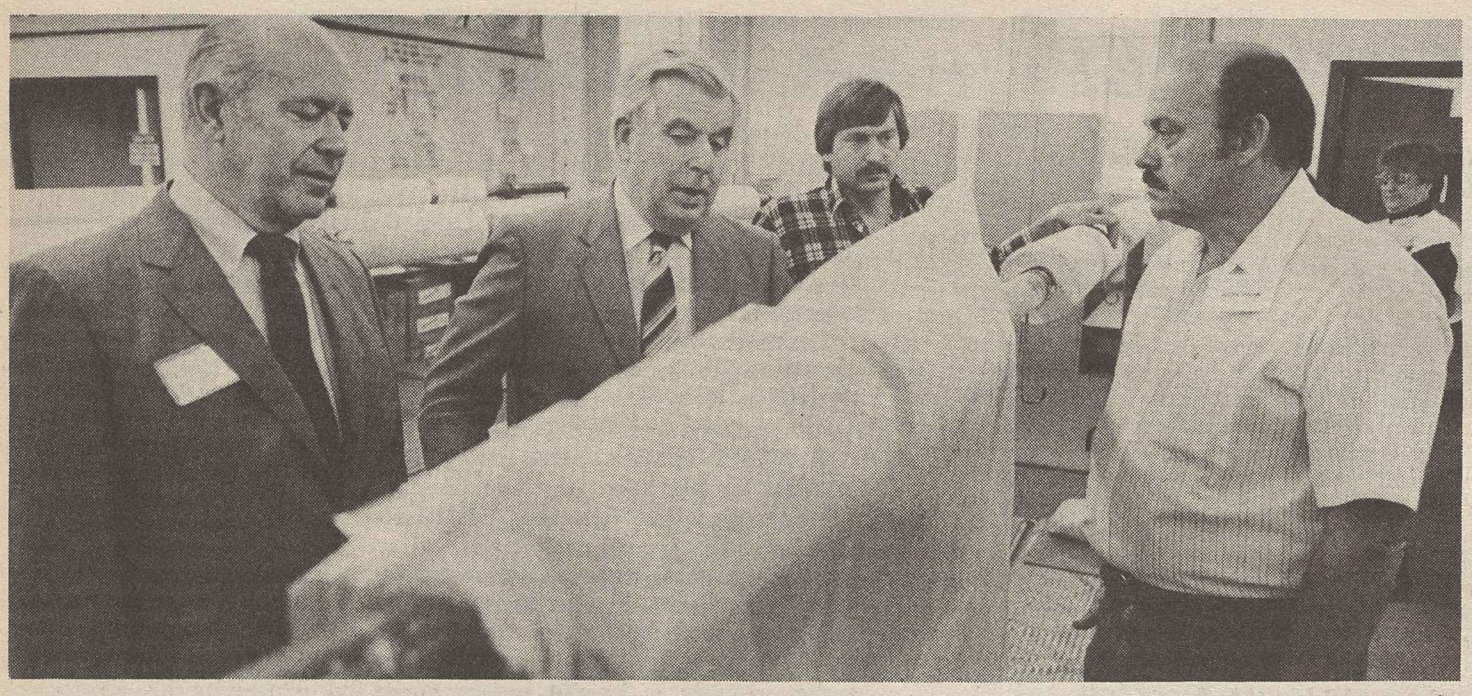
The threshold on income subject to taxation would be raised, eliminating some 6 million low-income persons from the tax rolls, But two-income households would lose the second-earner deduction, which was one of the few anti-worker features proposed by the Administration to win committee approval.

A plus in terms of labor's position was a 25 percent minimum tax for individuals and corporations. It would apply to income over $30,000 for single taxpayers and over $40,000 for couples that would not otherwise be taxed.



Home mortgage interest would remain deductible, but not on more than two homes. Among many other proposed changes would be a $7,000 ceiling on tax-deferred contributions to an employer-established 401(k) savings plan, and an end to the income-averaging option.

The Reagan Administration proposal and many of the alternative "tax reform" bills that had been introduced in Congress would have made workers pay taxes on the value of a wide range of employer-provided benefits, from health insurance to child care and legal services.

Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) disposed of the threat with a motion to exclude from the legislation any taxation of employee benefits. All 23 Democrats and three of the 13 committee Republicans supported the motion.

But the committee did go along with the Administration proposals to make all unemployment compensation subject to tax and limiting the deductibility of employment-related expenses such as union dues.

The committee bill is expected to be brought to the House floor under a rule that bars amendments but allows a vote on a Republican substitute.

UAW, GM open contract-funded job safety center

Madison Heights, Mich.—The Auto Workers and the General Motors Corp. jointly dedicated a unique health and safety training center here.

Located in a 16,500-square-foot former manufacturing plant, the center was established under the terms of the union's 1984 GM contract to "provide meaningful and consistent health and safety training." Under the agreement, GM puts 4 cents an hour per member into the joint health and safety fund to pay for the program.

Although joint health and safety training has been available to a lesser degree at all GM plants, "we believe development time and costs are best spent when course design and development is performed at one location and administered consistently at all GM plant locations," said UAW Vice President Donald F. Ephlin and GM Vice President Alfred S. Warren, Jr., in a joint statement.

"We are not aware of any other program that prepares plant health and safety trainers to deliver such a comprehensive classroom and hands-on training program," they said.

Training given

Training is given to appropriate management and union health and safety representatives. Graduates of the program return to their plants and work with local health and safety committees in developing a training plan based on the specific needs of the local workforce, preparing classroom and laboratory training, scheduling trainees and conducting the training.

About 400 GM employees already have taken some training programs. Courses currently being given include protecting workers during asbestos removal, safe operation of various manlift equipment, protective measures for entering confined spaces, and procedures for making plant equipment inoperative prior to performing repairs or maintenance.

Other planned courses include hazard communication, electrical safety, fall protection, robot safety, and mobile cranes.

Solidarity in 8-week strike brings IUE gains at Sperry

Great Neck, N.Y.—Nearly eight weeks on the picket line and a strong demonstration of union solidarity netted a major victory for members of the Electronic Workers at Sperry Rand Corp. here.

The IUE reached a three-year settlement with Sperry providing yearly wage increases and other improvements for 3,300 workers—members of IUE Locals 444, 445, 450 and 470.

Coordinated bargaining and "100 percent membership support" were the keys to success, said Bob Kennedy, chief negotiator for three of the four IUE locals.

"In spite of all the company propaganda, the people believed in their union and stood behind it," Kennedy declared. "The company attempt to weaken the union completely backfired. We're in a stronger position today than we have been in years."

Local 444, representing plant engineers, bargained separately, but coordinated their efforts with other IUE locals. Local 444 President Henry Zylla called the team effort "fantastically successful."

"All told, we faced 36 company giveback demands; it really was a serious attempt to break the union," he said.

"But the company got virtually none of its concessions and we managed to hang on and come out quite well," Zylla told reporters.

The Sperry workers won 5 percent yearly wage increases, plus improvements in pension benefits, life insurance, medical benefits and dental care.

The wage hike will raise the average hourly wage for production workers to $15 an hour, and will give engineers an average annual salary of $30,000 to $74,000 by the last year of the contract.

Under a new stock option plan, workers will receive stock worth one-half of one percent of their annual earnings. Sperry also agreed to double the value of workers' life insurance protection.

While the company sought major concessions in health coverage and an end to the union's right to file grievances over benefits disputes, the IUE succeeded in maintaining the existing medical coverage, increasing accident and sick pay and expanding dental coverage.

A new child care leave program was established, giving both men and women workers up to six months' unpaid leave, starting at the birth or adoption of a baby. This supplements the existing pregnancy disability leave.

Sperry Rand workers voted overwhelmingly in favor of the pact, the IUE said.

Old-age funds siphoned off, suit charges

Senior citizen groups are suing Treasury Sec. James A. Baker on charges of siphoning off social security funds to carry the federal government through its current fiscal crisis.

The lawsuit was filed in federal district court in Washington by the 40-million-member Save Our Security coalition, the National Council of Senior Citizens and other organizations representing elderly persons.

The action came in the wake of disclosures that large amounts of monthly payroll contributions were not transferred into social security trust funds as required by law, and that assets of the funds were liquidated to keep the government operating while Congress wrestles with debt-limit legislation.

The AFL-CIO said the court action was "essential" to halt "the Administration's juggling of social security funds" that are supposed to be used only to pay benefits and to cover administrative expenses of the program.

"If the government continues to misuse these funds," Social Security Dept. Director Bert Seidman warned, "beneficiaries will lose confidence in this system which is designed to protect the elderly, the disabled, their families, and surviving spouses and dependent children."

In instituting the suit, SOS charged that Baker's actions will result in the "permanent loss to the trust funds" of up to $2 billion in interest revenues over the next five years.

William R. Hutton, NCSC executive director, also charged that social security's public trustees "were not informed" of Baker's action. He called for legislation requiring advance notification to the board before changes are made in either fund-transfer procedures or investment policy.

Beulah Carter moves to COPE headquarters

Beulah Carter has joined the COPE headquarters staff after serving as western region director of Volunteers in Politics for the past year. Carter, 49, will oversee COPE's direct mail and polling activities.

Earlier, she had been an AFL-CIO field representative and also worked with a number of federation affiliates.

Workers worse off as real earnings plunge

29.7 percent drop and General Motors weighed in with a 27.3 percent decline.

Industry analysts said the gloomy sales figures were evidence that the industry is experiencing a "pattern of weakness" fostered by growing consumer reluctance to take on the burden of monthly car payments in a period of economic insecurity.

There were these other developments:

• Initial unemployment compensation claims took a large upward leap in the first week of November, rising to 392,000 from the previous week's 370,000. The Labor Dept. said that only 2.5 million of the 8.3 million people officially listed as unemployed are drawing jobless benefits.

• Americans sharply curtailed their spending in October. The nine-tenths of 1 percent drop from the previous month was the largest one-month decline in a quarter of a century.

• Machine tool orders—a measure of how the industrial sector of the economy is faring—jumped 33 percent in October from September, according to the National Machine Tool Builders' Association. But there was little measure of comfort in the statistic, since orders are still 18.4 percent below the same level of a year ago.

• Orders to U.S. factories for durable goods slumped 2.1 percent in October, the third decline in the last four months and the largest drop since July.

The demand for manufactured goods has been sluggish all year, economists noted. Orders placed thus far in 1985 are up only 3.4 percent—a far cry from last year's 14.8 percent increase.

Analysts expressed particular concern about last month's 7.4 percent drop in orders for non-military capital goods, since this category of orders is regarded as a key indicator of industry's intentions to expand and modernize plants.

U.S. firms hit for union-busting in Philippines

Evanston, Ill.—Labor and religious leaders accused two American-based multinational corporations of attempting to "weaken and destroy" unions at their plants in the Philippines.

The charges were leveled by the International Union of Food & Allied Associations (IUF), a secretariat embracing 214 member unions in 65 countries, and came as stockholders of Baxter Travenol, Inc. and American Hospital Supply Corp. were meeting here and in nearby Deerfield to approve a corporate merger effective in 1986.

Immediately following ratification of the agreement, Vernon D. Loucks, president and chief executive officer of the merged company, disclosed plans to slash the workforce by 6,500 over the next four years—mainly in the United States.

Most of the job loss will occur in the next 12 months, Loucks said, implying that the cutback would primarily affect domestic operations. The "consolidation" was needed, he said, to insure expansion of overseas markets.

The lengthy conflicts at the Manila plant of AHS, which markets vitamins, and at Baxter Travenol's Philippine facility which manufactures an intravenous dextrose solution, stretch back 18 months. They have been marked by mass firings of union officials and police violence against pickets.

Workers' choice

The IUF criticism was voiced by Joy Ann Grune, regional secretary of the secretariat's North American Regional Organization (NARO). "These multinational companies are reaching from Chicago into the Philippines to weaken and destroy the organizations that workers chose to build," Grune said.

Noting that the two companies "justify their merger by arguing that larger scale global operations mean greater cost efficiency," Grune expressed concern over "how many more working women and men in how many more countries will suffer" because of the companies' anti-labor policies.

The worsening situation in the Philippines brought a blunt warning from Rene Rondou, secretary-treasurer of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, who heads both the IUF and NARO.

"Unless the newly merged Baxter Travenol/AHS company takes positive action to meet demands of workers at the Philippine plants," Rondou said, "IUF with 214 member unions around the world is prepared to take this issue to other countries and new arenas to build international support."

The IUF called on the companies to hire back all fired workers, to negotiate in good faith with the union, and to come to agreement on a new contract. Management officials, who previously rejected similar appeals from the secretariat, agreed to meet with IUF representatives in December.

The AHS strike began 18 months ago when, just prior to negotiations, management fired 46 workers—half of them officers and members of the Drug & Food Workers Alliance of the Philippines (DFA). On four occasions in 1985, heavily armed police used violence to disperse pickets.

Although AHS claimed that economic difficulties led to the firing, it has posted continuously rising profits since 1980. A union appeal of a finding by the Philippine National Labor Relations Commission that the strike was illegal is still pending.

Reinstatement ordered

The dispute at Baxter Travenol also reaches back to 1984, when the company fired 78 of its 320 workers—almost all of them DFA officers—and refused to recognize the union. After the Philippine Supreme Court ordered the company to reinstate the workers and to stop targeting unionists for termination, Baxter Travenol closed its plant.

Joining with labor in protesting the company's anti-union policies were representatives of the Sisters of Charity and an interfaith group known as Synapses.

CLUW spurs contract clauses on child day care

By Candice Johnson

A new study by the Coalition of Labor Union Women gives some needed advice to working parents seeking quality child care and encourages unions to negotiate better "family-related" contract provisions.

"Bargaining for Child Care" is the product of an 18-month study by CLUW on the state of child care in the United States. It reviewed the options now available to working parents, offering model contract language on pregnancy and sick leave, alternative work scheduling and other child care benefits for union parents to adapt to their individual workplaces. It also summarized existing provisions in contracts negotiated by a number of unions in the United States and Canada.

Facilities needed

In releasing the report, CLUW President Joyce Miller stressed the growing need for quality child care facilities in the United States, noting that "the traditional family of a working father with a stay-at-home wife who cares for 2.3 children is no longer an accurate picture of the workforce."

"A growing number of families are maintained by single parents, most of whom are women, or two-wage earners," she continued, who "represent the majority of families today."

The report noted that working parents need the assurance of continued employment and financial security most after the birth of child, but "nothing could be further from reality" for most workers. Acknowledging the many changes in federal law since the Pregnancy Discrimination Act was passed in 1978, the report maintains "it is less likely in 1985 than it was in 1975 that a woman worker will be able to take time off during a 'normal' pregnancy without losing her job. A worker cannot be sure that a job will be waiting if he or she chooses to spend the first months or years staying home with a new child."

As a first step, CLUW recommended setting up a labor-management committee, where interested union and management members can meet to assess employees' child care needs.

With "a little imagination and effort," the committee can modify contract clauses covering overtime, sick leave and absence to accomodate the needs of workers with children or other dependents, like aging parents, who require care, the study pointed out. Unions also should protect their members from possible employer bias by including a clause that clearly prohibits discrimination based on parenthood, the report stressed.

CLUW suggested that the committee survey the workforce to determine the ages of children who would need care, the hours child care is most needed and current arrangements of employees. The committee also should review the availability of child care in the area, and make that information available to workers.

Possible solutions

The report also covered possible solutions to the classic problem of work schedules that severely limit the time working parents can spend with their children.

The study reviewed the advantages and disadvantages of part-time work, job-sharing and flexible work schedules, including "flextime."

CLUW pointed out that in 1984, only 10 percent of children whose parents worked received care from licensed programs, because child care services are not expanding to meet the rapidly increasing demand. "The remainder make do as latchkey children or in inadequate facilities with untrained caregivers."

Noting the decline in government support for child care programs, especially for lower-income parents, the report listed options for employers and unions to help meet the needs of working parents.

These include:

- Subsidies to defray some of all the cost of child care.
- Purchase of slots for workers in existing child care centers.
- Development and/or operation of child care centers.
- Vacation, holiday or summer camp programs for school-age children.
- Provision of information to parents about child care services.

CLUW urged that the labor-management committees consider union retirees when developing a quality child care program. The report suggested that retired members could provide:

- "Drop-in" services at the workplace for short-term care of unattended or ill children.
- Emergency care at workers' homes.
- Information and referrals.
- Infant care.

Kirkland calls joblessness grim challenge for America

Minneapolis—Chronic high unemployment tops the list of difficulties plaguing the labor movement, and it is a problem from which no American is immune, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed.

Delivering the annual Carlson lecture at the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute of Public Affairs, Kirkland said that while unions feel the effects of joblessness most acutely, the problems they create touch the lives of all citizens.

"Ask the shopkeepers what happens when the steel mills close," he said.

"Ask the realtors what happens when the assembly lines shut down—ask them how many homes they sell to people earning the minimum wage flipping hamburgers in fast-food franchises.

"Ask those who earn their living from high-technology where they will sell their mainframes or their robots or their lasers when their biggest customers—our basic industries—are forced to shut down."

Labor's concern

Speaking before an audience of more than 3,000 on the subject of Unions and the American Future, Kirkland said that joblessness is a particular challenge to the labor movement.

"A reserve army of the unemployed makes it difficult for unions to organize and bargain—it always has," he declared. "And it makes it tempting for employers to indulge their fantasies of getting rid of a union."

Kirkland recalled that robber baron Jay Gould once claimed he could "hire half the working class to kill the other half. Some employers apparently still believe that—and they see heavy unemployment as the ideal condition for testing the theory."

Chronic unemployment, Kirkland said, is evidence of such forces at work in the economy as the shift of jobs from manufacturing to the service industry, the "irreversible result of technological change," and the unchecked flood of foreign imports.

But, Kirkland warned, "anyone who thinks he or she is immune from these changes is living an illusion."

Most of the 2 million manufacturing jobs lost in the past few years, he said, "have turned up in foreign countries," adding:

"A great many of those lost jobs belonged to union members. They all belonged to Americans."

The "steady erosion" of America's industrial base "is depriving millions of young American workers of the stable, well-paying jobs that maintain our standard of living, and offer admission to the working middle class," Kirkland continued. "Trapped in low-paying service jobs, they see the American dream fading fast.

"For the first time, we have a young generation of Americans who do not expect to do as well as their parents. Their opportunities are shrinking, and so are their hopes."

Although these trends "appear to bode ill for the labor movement's future," Kirkland said, a closer examination of what has happened to American unions gives a different picture.

There are fewer steel and auto workers in labor's ranks, because of the shrinkage of their industries, but unions have 11 times as many teachers, 10 times as many public employees, four times as many pilots, three and a half times as many service employees, three times as many actors and artists, and more than twice as many postal workers, firefighters and communications workers as they did three decades ago.

Changing membership

"More than 40 percent of our members today work in white-collar and technical jobs," Kirkland said. "Another 23 percent are craftsmen and supervisors. Less than 40 percent of our members work in blue-collar jobs."

AFL-CIO unions have "a higher proportion of members with college degrees than the population at large," he pointed out.

"That should tell you that trade unionism has not lost any of its appeal. It should also tell you that trade unionism does have a future.

"And it should give those who delight in labor's troubles some cause for worry, because, as the composition of our membership shows, we are nothing more—and nothing less—than the American middle class."

The trade union movement "has a future and will always have a future," Kirkland declared, "because at its core it stands for fundamental American values."

Kirkland delivers Humphrey lecture at the University of Minnesota.

Trade impact aid faces Senate test

The Trade Adjustment Assistance program, which aids workers whose jobs have been wiped out by the glut of foreign imports, has been given a temporary extension under a stop-gap government funding bill.

The program, scheduled to expire Nov. 15, was extended until Dec. 12 under a continuing resolution that keeps the government operating until separate appropriations bills can be passed.

Labor has advocated long-term extension of TAA and has called for improvements in benefits and training programs to help workers find new jobs.

The Reagan Administration has adamantly opposed trade assistance, preferring to concentrate its attention on the Job Training Partnership Act, which does not recognize the impact of unbridled imports on workers.

The House has already passed a four-year extension of TAA, and a six-year program, to be financed by levying import fees on goods and services entering the U.S. market, is pending in the Senate.

An attempt by Sen. Philip Gramm (R-Tex.) to strip TAA from the budget reconciliation bill was defeated by voice vote after Senators Daniel Moynihan (D-N.Y.) and William Roth (R-Del.) argued that the crushing trade deficit underscored the urgent need to continue the adjustment program.

Labor-management accord key to building Saturn plant

Spring Hill, Tenn.—Construction of General Motors Corp.'s small-car Saturn complex here will be carried out under a innovative agreement keyed to a high level of labor-management cooperation.

Fifteen unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the unaffiliated Teamsters negotiated the agreement with Morrison-Knudsen Co., Inc., the contractor who will manage the three-year, $3.5-billion project.

The "adversarial relationship" between labor and management "must end and be replaced by cooperation and mutual respect and understanding," both sides agreed in the preamble to the precedent-setting agreement.

It covers all terms and conditions for the project with the exception of hourly wage rates and fringe benefits, which will be based on current local union contracts.

Future wage and benefit adjustments will be determined by a Project Review Committee composed of BCTD and Morrison-Knudsen representatives. Their guidelines will be the average wage and fringe benefit adjustment calculations of the Construction Labor Research Council's Southeastern States Survey.

The agreement establishes a joint union-management board to deal with workers' grievances. Any matter that cannot be settled by that panel will go to a special Board of Arbitration, made up of two union and two management representatives and a fifth member acceptable to both sides. The board's binding decision must be reached within 10 working days.

Union jurisdictional disputes must be resolved without causing a strike, work stoppage or slowdown, the compact said. In addition to banning job actions, the agreement also will prohibit lockouts.

General Motors created the Saturn operation last January to produce a line of small cars to compete with foreign imports. The plant will employ an estimated 6,000 workers who will be covered under an Auto Workers contract signed last July.

Construction is expected to begin in 1986 after plans are cleared by state, local and utility officials. The number of construction workers needed for the project has not yet been determined.

Navy flagged on shifting cargo to foreign fleet

A federal district court has rapped the Navy for attempting to shift military cargoes to foreign-flag ships.

Federal Judge Harold H. Greene ruled that the Military Sealift Command violated the Cargo Preference Act of 1904 when it tried to take shipments away from Rainbow Navigation, Inc., a small American carrier, and turn the work over to fleets from other nations.

The Masters, Mates & Pilots, an affiliate of the Longshoremen whose members crew the company's ships, hailed the decision as "clearly reaffirming the sanctity and importance of cargo preference to the maritime industry."

Capt. Robert J. Lowen, MMP president, said that the court's action "put the government on notice that the act must be fully enforced and fully complied with."

Newsday's Molly Gordy—one of the reporters taking part in DPE panel discussion on labor's relationship with the media.

DPE conference

Professional unions reach out to members

New York—Unions have a message for today's workers but they have to do a better job of getting it across, participants in a leadership conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees stressed.

The two-day program, Communicating with Professional, Technical and White-Collar Employees, involved staff members and officers from 23 unions. It explored the special problems of "reaching out and touching" members and potential members in today's workforce.

DPE Director Jack Golodner noted in his opening remarks that professional occupations are the fastest-growing segment of the workforce and the rate of union organizing is higher there than for the workforce as a whole.

The AFL-CIO report, The Changing Situation of Workers and Their Unions, was a focus of the conference discussions. Guest speakers and panelists dealt with aspects of the problem of developing a more positive image of unions among the public at large and especially among those in fields being organized.

Professional employees who accept the value of a union in improving salaries and working conditions may nevertheless be concerned about what they perceive as a loss of status, DPE President Albert Shanker said.

Professional concerns

Shanker, who is also president of the Teachers, urged that unions address the professional as well as the economic concerns of their members.

Leading consultants and practitioners in communications and public relations discussed the techniques of reaching and influencing people, including identification of the audience for which the message is intended.

But "style cannot replace substance, nor the medium replace the message," panelist Diane Curry, publications director of the Railway & Airline Clerks, stressed.

Other union staff experts taking part in conference panels were Bob Kalaski, Machinists; Phil Sparks, State, County & Municipal Employees; Scott Widmeyer, Teachers; Gloria Johnson, Electronic Workers; Conrad Fowkes, Actors' Equity and Screen Actors; Rozanne Weissman, Communications Workers; Eloise Payne, Labor Institute of Public Affairs; Susan Glass, N.Y. Teachers; Susan M. Dooha, Graphic Artists Guild, and Katherine Shrier, AFSCME Council 37.

In conference sessions, the use of television to commuicate labor's message was discussed and debated. There was no disagreement as to the medium's powerful impact, but participants expressed concern at the substantial cost involved and suggested imagination and creativity in the use of less costly alternatives.

Legitimate news

At the same time, there was emphasis on developing legitimate news that shows unions in a favorable light and presenting it so as to get the best possible coverage in all news media, including television.

Internal communications was another key topic, with discussion of new technologies such as videotapes as well as direct, one-on-one contacts. Membership surveys and polls were stressed as tools of communication.

James J. Kennedy, Jr., executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, spoke of the value of getting members involved in their unions and in union programs. Better communication with the public starts with better communication within labor's ranks, he stressed.

Kennedy complimented the DPE for setting up the conference, saying he had been "educated, informed, disturbed and stimulated" by the discussions.

While unions are aware that the news media are often biased against labor's viewpoint, Kennedy said, doing a better job of presenting labor's story can lessen the tilt.

The union participants also heard the other side of the news picture from speakers and panelists including Tom Pettit, NBC News national affairs correspondent; Irv Chapman, longtime ABC News correspondent; William Serrin, New York Times labor reporter, and Molly Gordy, a reporter for Newsday.

Author and former ILGWU editor Leon Stein addressed the group, as did communications consultants and practitioners including Dick Moore, the DPE's public relations consultant; Adele Greene, James Margolis, Paula Green and Beverly Hyman. DPE Associate Director Dennis Chamot moderated several of the panels.

Funds to spur political action approved in Rhode Island

Providence, R.I.—The Rhode Island AFL-CIO voted to increase funds for an expanded political action program at its 14th convention.

The 400 delegates raised the monthly per capita fee from 30 cents to 35 cents, effective Nov. 1, 1985, and to 40 cents on Nov. 1, 1986. The monthly COPE allocation from the per capita fund also was increased from 3 cents to 4 cents effective Nov. 1, 1985, and will go to 5 cents a year later.

The convention reviewed the state legislature's 1985 record and set a legislative agenda for the coming year.

In a series of workshops, delegates discussed the AFL-CIO's "Changing Situation" report. Other sessions covered health care cost containment, Rhode Island's upcoming constitutional convention and labor's community service programs.

Delegates gave a standing ovation to members of the Pawtucket Teachers and their president, Mary Ann Kaveny, for the courage and solidarity the teachers displayed during their union's 13-day strike in September. Fifty-three union members were jailed, with fines of $500 a day levied against individual teachers and $10,000 a day against the union until the agreement was ratified. The Pawtucket AFT won pay raises totaling 19.5 percent over three years.

The convention pledged its support for the Teachers' fund-raising efforts to pay the court fines totaling $76,000.

In other resolutions, the delegates urged passage of a $20-million state bond issue to remove asbestos from schools and public buildings and endorsed the nationwide Coors beer boycott.

McElroy re-elected

President Edward J. McElroy was re-elected to his fourth two-year term. James F. Kiley was elected to his first term as secretary-treasurer, replacing Edwin C. Brown who retired last December. Delegates also elected 65 executive board members.

Gov. Edward Diprete (R) pledged to step up the state's job training and retraining programs. He praised the state federation's efforts noting that "labor's battles have been fought for fairness and justice for all our citizens."

Delegates also heard from AFL-CIO Regional Director John F. O'Malley, Massachusetts AFL-CIO President Arthur Osborne and AFL-CIO Field Rep. David Sickler, coordinator of the Coors boycott.

Southern drive nets steady gains for IUD affiliates

"They feel employers have been taking advantage of them by holding down wage increases, or denying them entirely, for the past several years," he said. "They're fed up with it and they want to do something about it."

According to IUD President Howard D. Samuel, 1985 has been "the best year in the 1980s" for organizing, largely because workers now have less fear of unemployment and of reprisal for union activities.

The IUD and its affiliates have concentrated their organizing efforts in the south, Samuel said, because that's where the greatest need exists to reach out to the unorganized.

This year, 37 organizers drawn from 22 unions have taken part in the coordinated organizing efforts, working out of regional offices in Atlanta, Charlotte, N.C., Madison, Ala., and Tupelo and Jackson, Miss.

The IUD also hired interns from union staffs to work for the department for two years, McIver said, with unions looking on the department as a valuable training ground for organizers.

Maine convention presses organizing, affiliation goals

Rockport, Me.—The Maine AFL-CIO convention forged a plan to step up organizing efforts and strengthen the state's labor movement.

To accomplish those goals, the 150 delegates called for the formation of a special committee to promote and increase local union affiliation with the state federation.

The affiliation action parallels a resolution adopted by the AFL-CIO convention in October, which stressed the importance of local union affiliation with state and local central bodies, and developed an action plan to increase participation.

The convention urged local unions to make "organizing the unorganized their number one priority," and adopted a six-point program to encourage such efforts. Included were recommendations that rank-and-file members play an active role in organizing campaigns and that unions take advantage of new technology and techniques.

Sec.-Treas. Edward Gorham was re-elected to his third four-year term and delegates elected four new members to the state federation's 15-member executive board. They are: Kent Chiavelli, Machinists; John Portela, Marine & Shipbuilding Workers; William Mezerve, Paperworkers, and Joseph Nixon, Electrical Workers. The terms of President Charles O'Leary and Vice President Gwendolyn Gatcomb expire in 1987.

Delegates adopted 48 resolutions, including a call for full collective bargaining rights for state employees and legislation requiring safe workplaces for workers using video display terminals.

Schedule of Labor Studies Center courses

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer nine labor studies institutes, workshops and programs during December and January. The schedule:

New Staff, Dec. 1-13—A two-week orientation to help new union officers and staff make the transition from on-the-job activists to full-time representatives.

New Developments in Collective Bargaining, Dec. 8-10—A two-day briefing cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research to discuss important developments and trends in recent settlements.

Representation Procedure before the NLRB, Dec. 9-13—An institute on basic Labor Board rules and decisions on jurisdiction, appropriate units and elections. Participants will handle a simulated election hearing including preparation, and direct and cross examination.

Television: The Cool Medium, Dec. 15-18—A three-day workshop to coach union officers on facing TV cameras and working with TV reporters.

Organizing in the Construction Industry, Dec. 15-20—An institute cosponsored by the Building & Construction Trades Dept. to upgrade techniques of "salting" jobs, leafleting and picketing campaigns, unfair labor practice strikes and "bottom-up" recruiting programs.

Advanced Arbitration Techniques, Dec. 15-20—Advanced training on handling grievance arbitration cases, focusing on examination and cross examination of witnesses, preparation of briefs and researching issues.

Pension Trustee Training for Public Sector Unions, Jan. 5-9—A four-day institute cosponsored by the Public Employee Dept. exploring the structure and operation of public agency pension plans.

The Craft of Negotiating, Jan. 12-17—A study of negotiating tactics to avoid bargaining impasses, improving grievance resolution and everyday administration and leadership situations.

Teaching Techniques in Labor Education, Jan. 19-24—An institute cosponsored by the Dept. of Education to upgrade the teaching skills of union staff.

An institute on Arbitration Techniques: Prepartion & Presentation will be presented at the University of Oregon, Eugene, Jan. 26-31.

Six AFL-CIO affiliates will use the center's facilities for conferences or staff training during December: State County & Municipal Employees, Dec. 1-6; Government Employees, Dec. 1-6; Professional & Technical Engineers, Dec. 1-6; Public Employees Dept., Dec. 11-13; Metropolitan Washington Council, Dec. 16-17, and Food & Allied Services Trade Dept., Dec. 19.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will bring its country directors to the campus for their annual staff conference, Dec. 13-20.

More information about these or other labor studies is available from Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md., 20903 - 301/431-6400.

Homer Cole steps down as BCT vice president

Homer Cole, a vice president of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers and former secretary-treasurer of the Tobacco Workers, retired Nov. 1.

Cole, 57, served as a Tobacco Workers representative from 1956 to 1968 when he was elected secretary-treasurer. Since 1978, he has served as a vice president of the merged union.

Hunger in America

NOT MANY Americans went hungry on Thanksgiving Day, unless they were too proud to share the meals or food baskets that churches and other concerned groups provide to brighten holiday seasons. But the Thanksgiving leftovers won't stretch until the Christmas baskets are passed out, and the bull market in stocks isn't going to provide meat for the needy.

The good news, and heaven knows we need it, is that Congress is starting to accept the fact that the solution to poverty and hunger isn't yet another deep round of cuts in programs to help the poor.

A welcome sign is that the Republican Senate, as well as the Democratic House, rebelled against proposals to make further cuts in food stamp eligibility and refused to make the needy bear the burden of budget deficits caused by round after round of tax cuts for the wealthiest.

On a voice vote, it soundly defeated the proposal by Sen. James A. McClure (R-Ida.) to cut back on food stamp allotments to demonstrate that the Senate "really means" to balance the budget.

By an impressive 63-36 margin, it supported an amendment by Sen. Robert T. Stafford (R-Vt.) and overturned the Senate Agriculture Committee, which had sought to count low-income energy assistance as income in determining food stamp eligibility. At least this winter, poor families in cold climates won't have to choose between heating and eating.

Neither the Senate bill nor the more adequate House bill repairs all of the rips in the supposed safety net inflicted during President Reagan's first term. But Congress seems to be signaling at least a truce in the ugly war against the poor.

Part of the Answer

THERE WOULD be less hunger, less poverty, less need for food stamps and unemployment compensation, if an unrealistic trade policy had not encouraged the shift of job-providing industries to other countries.

To date, the one trade bill the Reagan White House has been unable to sidetreack in Congress is the measure setting realistic quotas for textile, apparel and shoe imports. The House, which has already passed one version of the legislation, has scheduled a vote on a motion to accept the Senate-passed bill, thus avoiding the risk of further delay.

It should be approved, and by a big enough vote to let President Reagan know that a veto would defy the will of a large bipartisan majority of Congress—and of the American people.

Making a Choice

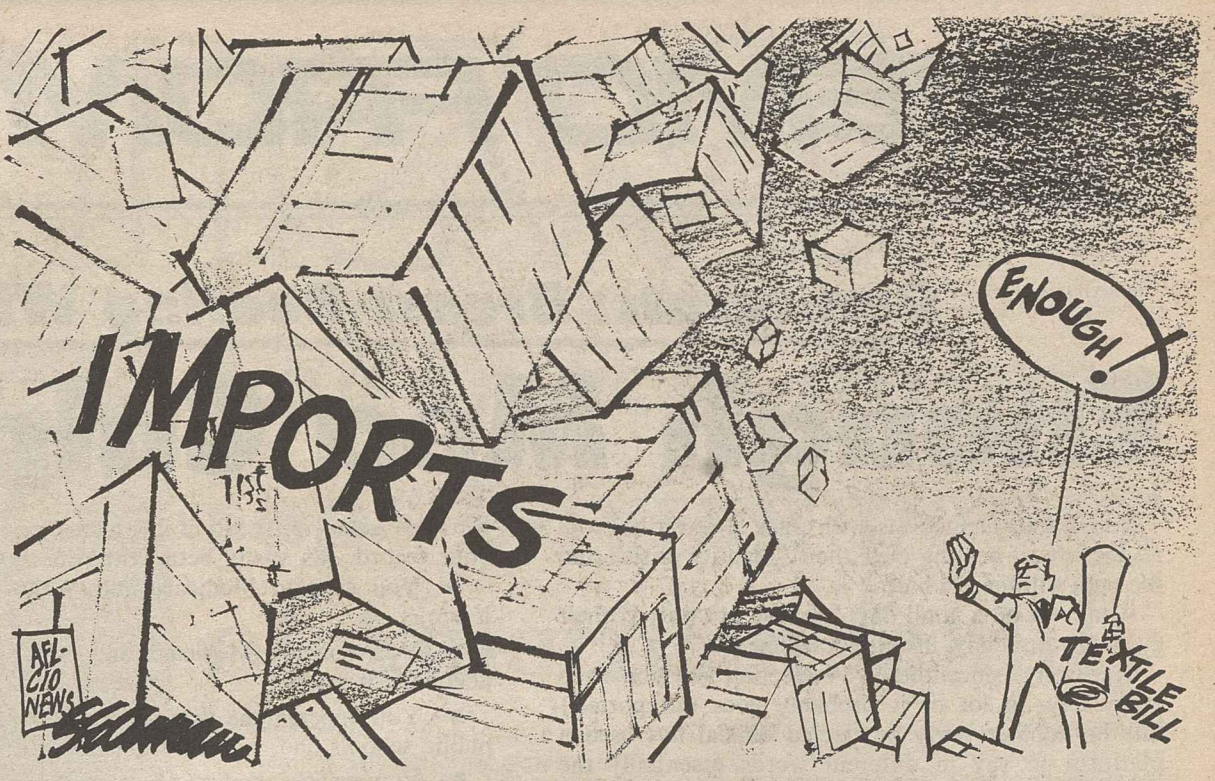
ELECTIONS ONLY TELL us who won and who lost, for a little while, until the next round. They don't tell us who was wrong or right. For that we rely on history.

History has already proved that labor was right in 1968, when it chose Hubert Humphrey over other contenders for the Democratic nomination and then over Richard Nixon. How much better off the nation would have been, how much grief and trauma it would have been spared, if it had followed labor's lead then.



History will also prove labor right in 1984 for having chosen another man from Minnesota over a different candidate from California. And when history's judgment is finally rendered on that election, the labor movement will be able to look back on its choice with a clear conscience.

To keep faith with our mission, we intend to stay active in every phase of the political life of this country. Our choice is not whether to be involved, for like it or not we are involved for better of worse in the consequences of politics.

Our choice is whether we will be among the victims or among the authors of events.

We in the labor movement are willing to stand on our record—and build on it as we move forward into the future.

Upgrading of public schools threatened by voucher plan

By Press Associates, Inc.

Equal universal education and abolition of imprisonment for debt headed labor's list of demands in the early 19th century. Labor's recognition that education offered a way out of poverty and a means to cope with emerging industrialization led to the free public school system.

A generation ago, after 14 years of lobbying by labor and its allies, Congress passed a program of aid to school districts with large numbers of disadvantaged children.

Today, that program—known as Chapter I—stands threatened, along with the teacher unions and, in the view of some, even the public school system itself.

When Education Sec. William J. Bennett recently unveiled a plan to provide poor parents with vouchers averaging $600 to enable them to send their kids to private or public schools of their choice, he couched it in lofty terms.

"At present," Bennett said, "our most affluent families do exercise choice by buying a home in the neighborhood of their choice, or by sending their children to a private school. The poor do not now have that kind of choice."

The Reagan Administration plan would cover the 5 million children now in public schools receiving $3.1 billion in federal funds under Chapter I, formerly Title I of the aid to elementary and secondary schools program.

Rivalry lauded

According to Bennett, the voucher plan would "serve the cause of social justice" and promote a "healthy rivalry" among schools.

The voucher idea came under immediate fire from union leaders, big city school officials and others.

Teachers President Albert Shanker said the vouchers would result in "cannibalization of a program with a proven track record." He said the success of the Chapter I remedial programs has been proven by Bennett's own Education Dept.

Shanker said the voucher system could result in skimming the public schools of better students, removing role models and weakening the schools. Vouchers could wind up financing schools geared to certain racial, religious, ethnic, political or ideological groups, he warned.

The proposed voucher could be the nose of the camel, Shanker said, with the rest of the camel bringing tuition tax credits and vouchers for all schoolchildren and with them the destruction of public education. "Congress should send this camel on a long trek through the desert," Shanker wrote.

President Mary Hatwood Futrell of the unaffiliated National Education Association called the voucher plan "nothing more than a ruse to use public money to pay for private schools."

Siphon off funds

The National Coalition for Public Education, a broad-based group of unions, religious and civic organizations, blasted the voucher plan. The coalition said it would put an "enormous" bureaucratic burden on local schools, siphon off already inadequate funding, and ill-serve needy children because voucher schools would not have to meet any educational standards.

The New York Times editorially called the voucher idea "a cruel hoax." Suburban White Plains, N.Y., charges $7,000 for non-residents to attend its public schools, the Times noted. Even inner-city parochial schools charge $1,000, it noted.

The National Parent-Teacher Association called the voucher idea an "insult." The Council of Great City Schools labeled it "ridiculous."

If the voucher idea is so bad, where did it come from? Credit—or blame—probably should go to the right-wing Heritage Foundation.

The school voucher plan and tuition tax credits were put forward in 1981 and again in "Mandate for Leadership II" in 1984 by Eileen M. Gardner. She wrote they would provide competition to the "public school monopoly, buttressed by the iron control of the teachers' unions."

Congress let the voucher proposal die in 1983, and it should suffer the same fate again.

MEMO FROM COPE

Democrats: Breast-Beating Will Crack Your Ribs

Enough Mea Culpa, Already

Some day, Democrats will crack a few ribs from all the breast-beating over their "identity crisis" and the pain will force a halt.

That will be a good day, because not only is their guilt trip unseemly, it's grown tedious.

Regularly, since the 1984 election (maybe even every day—a lot of it probably goes unreported) one or another party or elected official has used a platform to say in different words essentially the same thing:

We have sinned by being what we are. We shall atone by being what we aren't.

Then, maybe you voters out there will help us win elections in the Sun Belt and West (and, for that matter, the Northeast, the Mid-Atlantic, the South and the Midwest). Maybe if we sound like Republicans, you'll love us better.

If they keep doing this, we'll wind up with uniparty politics.

Someone should shake them. Someone should tell them, sure, go look for new approaches, new solutions, new ways to win voter allegiance.

But don't do it by retreating from convictions. Don't do it by imitating the other guys. And, for heaven's sake, don't do it by whiny apologies for your record. It's vastly better than the opposition's.

► You enacted Medicare and, while imperfect, it works.

► You enacted Medicaid and, while not fully adequate, it works.

► You enacted the first general aid program to public schools and, while it's got holes, it works.

► You enacted the first program of broadly available loans and scholarships for college-bound children of workers and the needy and, while it could be better, it works.

► You enacted the Voting Rights Act, and while its teeth can stand a sharpening, it works.

► You enacted the food stamp program, rent supplements for the needy, child nutrition and maternal care programs, Job Corps, Head Start, highway beautification, cultural programs and, while there's room for improvement in every one of them, they work.

These and other programs you put through—usually over the opposition of the same crew some of you now reach to emulate—have made things a little better for a lot of Americans. If they weren't cures for hard-core problems, they were softeners.

So Democrats—as you head into an important election year—breast-beat less, boast a little more.

You won support because you tried to do—and somewhat succeeded in doing—the humane thing, with very little help from the other camp. Stop apologizing for it.

Enough of mea culpa, already.

Something Wrong With 'Constituent Interests'?

"Mr. President, there are any number of Senators who, because of constituent interests (emphasis added) are going to be voting for this bill, and they are going to be voting for it with many qualms. They are not going to like it at all. But they are going to feel that they have to vote for it."—Sen. John Danforth (R-Mo.) in Senate debate on proposed textile/footwear import restrictions, Nov. 13, 1985.

ODDS 'n ENDS

STEPPING UP their drives for 1988 GOP presidential nomination—first of the post-Reagan era—are Rep. Jack Kemp and Vice President George Bush. Recent Kemp fund-raising dinner in New York lined his campaign coffers with $1 million, as more than 1,000 supporters put down $1,000 each to back their horse. On top of that, an additional $700,000 was pledged to Kemp by folks who either couldn't get there or didn't like the menu. Meanwhile, Bush not idle. To show how deep and wide his political support is, Bush announces formation of 476-member national steering committee for his PAC, Fund for America's Future. List includes governors, U.S. Senators, nearly 250 chairpersons of Reagan-Bush 1980 and 1984 campaigns. His PAC already has taken in $2 million.

PUBLIC FINANCING of U.S. Senate campaigns, on limited scale, is objective of legislation introduced by Sens. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) and Paul Simon (D-Ill.). Proposal would not cover Senate primaries or House contests. It would slap spending limits on candidates opting for public funds from voluntary income-tax check-off like one used to finance last three presidential races. Purpose is to slow down, perhaps reverse, staggering cost of campaigning, diminish perceived influence of PAC contributions.

TALK ABOUT PACs and arm-twisting they're sometimes accused of, here's man-bites-dog story. Washington Post reports PAC formed to help reelect incumbent Sen. Jim Abdnor (R-S.D.), who's up in 1986, pays messengers to go to trade/corporate PAC offices with letter from Sen. Strom Thurmond on impressive Senate-type letterhead. Letter duns PACs for contribution to Abdnor, says President Reagan will attend Abdnor fund-raiser and would be "disappointed to hear that your PAC has not signed on" to attend. PACs are given choice of $5,000 contribution, dinner tickets at $1,500 per, or confessing "No, our PAC does not wish to support the Salute to Jim Abdnor featuring President Reagan"—thus rebuffing not only Abdnor, but the President. Messengers are instructed to hang around PAC office like guilty conscience while PAC managers make decision. Says Abdnor aide, method works. "We got some of the answers we wanted." Now that's arm-twisting.

HERE'S A GUTSY GUY for you. Elliot Greenspan of Ridgefield Park, N.J., had announced he would challenge incumbent Rep. Robert Torricelli for 9th Congressional District Democratic nomination in 1986. Soon after, Greenspan was jailed in Lawrence, Mass., for refusing to testify before grand jury looking into credit card fraud. One of his first requests from the slammer: He asked a friend to call Washington and ask his congressman, Torricelli, to intercede for him.

MUCH WRITTEN AND SAID already about strong Democratic prospects in 1986 U.S. Senate races. With 22 GOP and only 12 Democratic seats up, Democrats have shot at taking control of Senate, now held 53-47 by Republicans. Flip side of that, however, comes in 1986 gubernatorial contests. Demos now in statehouse in 34 states, GOP in 16. But of 36 gubernatorial spots up in 1986, Democrats hold 27, Republicans nine. Clearly, if arithmetic favors Dem gains in Senate races—as it does—same arithmetic applies on side of GOP in governor contests.

MORE ON TURNCOAT Democrats seeking office as newborn Republicans. Recent election in Charlotte, N.C., saw Dem Mayor Harvey Gantt reelected over Dem-turned-GOP challenger. At same time, Herb Spaugh, city council member who switched from Dem to GOP in mid-term was defeated for re-election, running sixth out of eight for four seats up for grabs.

RIGHT-WING COALITION formed to deny labor unions right to participate in politics, one of Jesse Helms' long-held goals. Called Coalitions for America, it includes among leaders some big-hitters from "new right" movement, notably Paul Weyrich, who heads Committee for Survival of a Free Congress—one of most active and well-funded rightist PACs—and Henry Walther, former high officer of National Right to Work for Less Committee.

No-Tax Firms Give Big $$ to GOP

On one hand we have 50 major American firms who've gotten terrific tax breaks under our President. In fact, despite raking in profits, they haven't paid any federal taxes. Not only that, they've been given money from the Treasury in the form of tax rebates (on taxes they didn't even pay).

On the other hand, we have these same corporations (most of them, anyway) lavishing contributions on Republican candidates for the U.S. House and Senate.

Now, you'd have to be an awful cynic to conclude that there's a link between tax benefits received by these firms from Republicans and contributions conferred by them on Republicans. So don't do that. Don't be cynical. It's unhealthy. Just read the facts.

According to research by Citizens for Tax Justice, political action committees of 50 major profit-making companies that paid no taxes during President Reagan's first term gave $6 to Republican candidates in the hottest Senate elections of 1984 to every $1 for Democratic candidates.

Their contributions ran 4-1 GOP in the closest House races.

These 50 firms got net tax rebates of $2.4 billion on combined domestic profits of more than $57 billion between 1981-84.

The rebates were over and above the $26 billion in federal tax they should have paid but didn't under the 46 percent corporate tax rate. So, they were forgiven $26 billion and given another $2.4—a cool net of $28.4 billion.

The PACs of these firms handed out $4.9 million to Senate and House candidates in 1984. In marginal House contests, 82 percent of their funds went to Republicans. In marginal Senate races, 86 percent.

The 13 biggest corporate PAC donors handed 96 percent of their contributions to GOP candidates for House and Senate—$840,000 out of $879,000.

Oh, That One Vote!

Does one vote count?

Here's your answer, from results in Nov. 5 local elections in Maryland and Virginia close-in suburbs of Washington:

Charles Donnelly and incumbent Alvin Kushner tied in the race for mayor of College Park, Md., at 1,293 votes each. Barry Wood and Sherrill Murray tied at 193 each for a College Park city council seat. (New elections might be called in each case.)

Stephen DelGuidice defeated incumbent Sammie Abbott for mayor of Takoma Park, Md., by just seven votes out of 3,149 votes cast.

In Stafford County, Va., M. A. Fagan topped Rebecca Reed for the board of supervisors 1,185-1,183, just two votes out of 2,368. In a contest in Virginia for House of Delegates, Stephen Gordy defeated Jeffrey Fairfield 9,810-9,744—only 66 votes out of 19,554.

Does one vote count? You better believe it!

Job security at stake

Management's refusal to include job-security provisions in a new contract triggered a strike of 8,000 Machinists at three Connecticut plants of Pratt & Whitney Group. More than 8,500 jobs have been lost to new technology at the aircraft firm in the last five years, and another 1,000 could be wiped out within the next 12 months. (Story on Page 4.)

Lag in real income saps buying power of American family

By Gene Zack

American families with children, struggling to keep their heads above water, have seen their pretax income plunge steadily over the past 11 years, with the steepest drop in purchasing power concentrated among those in the lowest income bracket.

That's the conclusion of a congressional study which shows that the typical middle-income family lost 10.9 percent of its purchasing power between 1973 and 1984, while those on the lowest rung of the economic ladder suffered a staggering 34-percent loss.

"Most American families are worse off today than they were in the early 1970s," the AFL-CIO said, because of the inflationary surge in the middle of the 11-year period, the high unemployment levels that followed, and the Reagan Administration's cuts in social programs during the past five years.

The federation's 16th convention in Anaheim, Calif., assailed the Administration for slashing $6 billion from Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and for its "outrageously harsh" eligibility provisions which denied all assistance to the working poor.

"This has cut the ground out from under the poorest of the poor," AFL-CIO economist Ann Draper said, "and makes a mockery of Administration claims that it is pro-family."

Rich get richer

The study was made public by the Joint Economic Committee and is based on data furnished by the Census Bureau and the Bureau of Labor Statistics. It shows that, in the top income bracket, real earnings declined only 1.7 percent over the 11-year period, and actually rose 1.5 percent since 1979.

"Once again," Draper said, "the economic philosophy of the Reagan Administration is made abundantly clear. The figures prove the old adage that the rich get richer and the poor get poorer."

The statistics painted a grim across-the-board picture of what has happened to families with children. Female-headed households suffered steep drops in purchasing power, but two-earner families also saw their real earnings decline. Black, Hispanic and white families were all adversely affected by the decline in inflation-adjusted pretax income.

According to the study, families at the lowest end of the economic scale saw their income plummet from an average of $9,308 in 1973 to $6,142 last year, calculated on the basis of the buying power of 1984 dollars.

For the median middle-income family, real income declined from $28,988 to $25,836—a drop of 10.9 percent. Of that decline, 10.5 percent, or $3,019, was recorded in the 1973-84 period.

The average income of all black families with children declined 10.6 percent since 1973, from $20,708 to $18,504, the JEC said. The income of Hispanic families fell 6.9 percent, from $23,280 to $21,663, while that of white families dropped 7.6 percent from $33,859 to $31,298.

OSHA standards issued belatedly on job hazards

By Arlee C. Green

The Reagan Administration, after years of balking at lowering worker exposure limits to benzene and formaldehyde and attempting to impair the protections in the cotton dust standard, issued new rules for all three. But all three fall short of safeguards that unions sought.

In response to court-imposed deadlines, the Occupational Safety & Health Administration released proposed standards for benzene and formaldehyde.

The final cotton dust standard contains only minor changes, as unions were able to halt the initial attempt of OSHA and the cotton textile industry to further weaken protections. Even an eleventh-hour assault by the Office of Management & Budget failed.

"We're glad to see that OSHA finally issued the proposals," said Margaret Seminario, the federation's safety specialist. "But you must note that the agency began its 'expedited rulemaking' on benzene in July 1983 and has stalled for five years in writing the formaldehyde proposal. Neither proposal is the best it can be."

Seminario said that OSHA's failure to include a short-term exposure limit in the

Import curb bill defies Reagan's veto warning

Congress defied a veto warning and sent President Reagan a labor-supported, job-saving trade bill that would limit textile, apparel and shoe imports, and hold out hope to the threatened copper industry.

Neither the 255-161 final passage vote in the House nor the earlier 60-39 vote in the Senate quite reached the two-thirds majority needed to override the anticipated veto. But the message from Congress came through loud and clear.

Democrats and Republicans alike took the floor during the debate over final passage of the bill to tell the President bluntly that his "free trade" policy is bankrupting America.

They spoke of the closed plants in their districts, of workers left stranded in one-employer communities and of the erosion of America's industrial base.

The White House had sought to sidetrack the legislation to spare Reagan the political fallout, but the pressure on Congress to act was too strong to be denied.

The House decision to accept the Senate version of the bill avoided the risk of delaying tactics and assured inclusion of relief for the import-battered shoe and copper industries. The original House-passed bill had dealt only with textile and clothing imports.

So massive has been the tide of import

Kirkland cites benefits

Labor spurs tax reform passage

The AFL-CIO called for House passage of the tax reform bill drawn up by the Ways & Means Committee and rejection of a business-tilted Republican substitute.

Both bills are expected to reach the House floor under a no-amendment rule before the first session of Congress adjourns in mid-December. If the Republican substitute is rejected, the House will vote on the bill the Ways & Means Committee approved by a 28-8 vote.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed the committee bill "a major improvement" over the Reagan Administration's tax proposal. It takes "a long step toward restoring fairness" to the federal tax system, he said.

The Administration bill would have penalized middle-income Americans, Kirkland charged, and would have taxed the job benefits of workers in order to give another generous tax cut to the very rich. It also would have squeezed public services—and increased individual taxes—by ending the present federal deduction for taxes paid to state and local governments.

By contrast, the Ways & Means majority chose to shift a share of the tax burden back to corporations and the very wealthy—who had pocketed the largest shares of the deficit-breeding tax cuts enacted early in the Reagan Administration.

Winning campaign

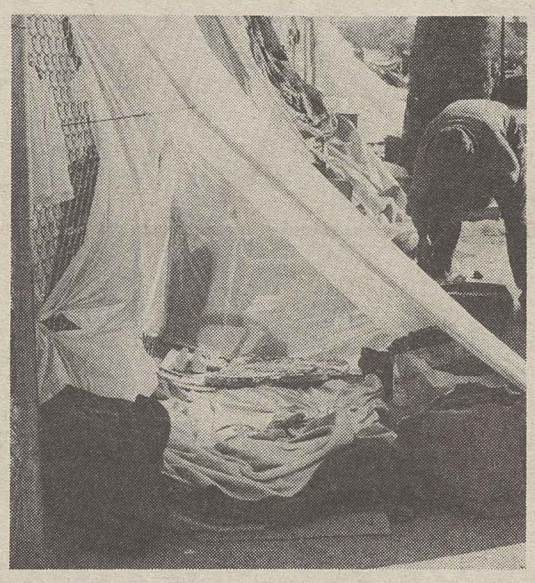
Kirkland noted labor's long, hard and successful campaign to put a majority of the House on public record against the attempt to make workers pay taxes on the value of health insurance and other employer-provided job benefits.

He praised the committee members who voted to exclude from the bill any new taxes on employee benefits, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who made the motion, and Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.). All 23 Democrats and three of the 13 committee Republicans voted for Rangel's motion.

Kirkland also welcomed the minimum tax the committee bill would levy on corporations and individuals that now shelter their profits and earnings from taxation.

Another big plus, Kirkland said, is the bill's elimination of 6 million low-income households from the tax rolls and simplification of tax filing by making the standard deductions more attractive.

Before voting 28-8 to send the bill to the House floor, the committee rejected a Republican alternative that would have given additional tax relief to corporations and high-income individuals, shifting the burden back to middle-income taxpayers.



The GOP plan, which may be reshaped before being offered as a substitute on the

Unions helping the needy

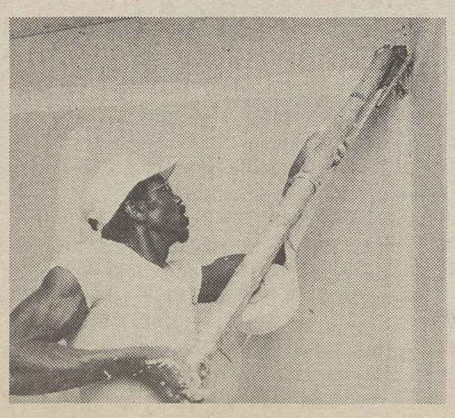
Phoenix—Union workers put the finishing touches on a sorely needed shelter for homeless men, the product of a team effort by organized labor, city officials and construction contractors.

The new facility can house 400 men and will open this weekend.

Pat Cantelme, president of the Phoenix AFL-CIO said the new shelter is essential to help house some of the city's several thousand homeless persons. He noted that many homeless people are forced to sleep in the city park and vacant lots near the new shelter.



Members of 14 building trades unions volunteered their time and labor to build the shelter while the Central Arizona AFL-CIO and the Phoenix Fire Fighters together donated $10,000 toward the city-run project. The union effort was coordinated by Joseph Costa, director of the Phoenix Labor Community Service Agency.

Earlier this year, union crews renovated a women's facility in the same complex, which opened its doors to the city's homeless women on Apr. 2.

Area contractors and suppliers donated building materials, and construction work on the men's shelter began after ground-breaking ceremonies May 30.

Workers literally rebuilt the entire facility, covering nearly 13,000 square feet, said Cantelme. New features of the shelter include an open shower area, laundry room and a dining and activity area.

Labor's cash and manpower contributions have exceeded more than $40,000, according to shelter director Art Stillwell. He praised the unions for having "taken the lead in this project."

Kirkland tells legislators

Reagan policies leave legacy of inequalities

Philadelphia—President Reagan's social policies "blight the hopes and stunt the lives" of minorities and his economic policies translate into "increasing economic inequality" for all working Americans, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared here.

"We are confronted with an Administration in Washington that seems intent on making us refight the old battles" for social and economic justice, Kirkland told the ninth annual conference of the National Black Caucus of State Legislators.

Over the last two decades, Kirkland reminded his audience, America took "enormous strides in the march toward social justice."

In that period, nearly 11 million Americans, almost half of them children, "escaped the grasp of poverty," infant mortality was cut almost in half, education and training programs opened "new avenues of opportunity," and millions of youngsters grew up "without ever having seen a 'white-only' sign" over a public drinking fountain or in a restaurant, or were denied job or college opportunities solely because of race.

Blighted hopes

But discrimination has not disappeared from America, Kirkland pointed out, and "21 years after the passage of the Civil Rights Act, inequality still blights the hopes and stunts the lives of millions of our citizens."

The goals of the labor and civil rights movements include school desegregation, quality education, decent housing and nutrition, affordable health care and full employment.

"But these are not the goals of Ronald Reagan," Kirkland declared.

With the President's approval, Kirkland asserted, the Justice Dept. has "systematically tried to erase decades of civil rights progress" by dragging its feet on the Voting Rights Act, going to court to block desegregation plans voluntarily adopted by local school districts, trying to give tax breaks to schools that "justify their racism on religious grounds," and attempting to repeal the Executive Order that bans discrimination by government contractors.

"They claim that they oppose these programs because they haven't worked," he told the state legislators, "but I suspect that the reason they're against them is that they've worked only too well."

Chronic unemployment

On the economic front, Kirkland continued, Administration policies have led to "chronic high unemployment" which today, even at "the peak of the supposed boom," is higher than at the depths of the 1971 recession.

Although the "official rate" of unemployment is stuck at the 7.2-percent level, he declared, if discouraged workers who have given up their job search and part-time workers who want full-time jobs are added in, "the real rate of unemployment jumps to 12.6 percent."

Noting that the Administration makes much of the number of new jobs created since the depths of the Reagan Recession, Kirkland pointed out that the 20 most rapidly expanding occupations—largely in the service economy—pay on average $100 a week less than the 20 manufacturing occupations that are in the most rapid decline.

"The steady erosion of America's industrial base is depriving millions of young American workers of the stable, well-paying jobs that sustain our standard of living and offer admission to the working middle class," he said.

Fading dreams

"For those young Americans trapped in low-paying service jobs, the American dream is fading fast," Kirkland told the legislators stressing that "for black Americans, the problem is even worse. In the last few years, black family income has fallen further behind white family income. And the rate of unemployment for black teenagers is double that for white."

Kirkland conceded that some of the job losses are "the irreversible result of technological change," but he insisted that many of the lost jobs have turned up in foreign countries because the Administration refuses to come to grips with the deepening trade crisis.

Five years ago, he said, the United States had a $40 billion trade surplus; this year it's headed toward a $140-billion deficit which represents almost 4 million jobs that have left this country.

Kirkland held out hope that, through the electoral process, the tides of fortune can be reversed. The labor and civil rights movements "take America's promise of equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity seriously," he said, and "our commitment does not waver."

First Thanksgiving

Pre-school youngsters of newly arrived immigrants get their first taste of American-style turkey and all the trimmings during a special Thanksgiving celebration at the Garment Industry Day Care Center in New York's Chinatown. The center provides day care services for 75 children of ILGWU members and is run by Ladies' Garment Workers Local 23-25, with help from the international, contractors and manufacturers and a city grant.

Economic indicators inch up but future remains clouded

The government's index of leading economic indicators inched upward three-tenths of 1 percent in October—the weakest advance in four months.

Although the figures, taken as a whole, were positive, the AFL-CIO said, they "indicate problems for the future," because building permits and orders for new factory equipment—both of which are vital to any sustained economic growth—declined last month.

Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald said that "the future continues to be clouded by the import threat to U.S. industries and jobs and the decline in real earnings for American workers."

At the same time, Federal Reserve Vice Chairman Preston Martin warned that there was a possibility the nation could sink into a recession as early as 1986.

"One can imagine a set of policy choices that could lead to a recession next year," Martin told an economic outlook conference, contending that the government's report of a sharp upturn in the gross national product in the third quarter was "spurious" and "built on shifting sands."

In recent weeks, government reports have shown that real earnings of workers are two-tenths of 1 percent below their level of a year ago, and that the trade deficit is sure to eclipse 1984's all-time record.

The weakness of the economy reflects the battering American manufacturers have been taking from foreign competition. Hobbled by an overvalued dollar, they have seen their foreign markets dry up and have had to fight a growing invasion of cheaper imports.

The October advance in the leading indicators was the sixth monthly improvement in a row, the Commerce Dept. said. However, except for a 1.3 percent gain last January, the monthly advances this year have all been below 1 percent. Economists said that this points to only sluggish growth, at best, for the balance of the year.

One of the "positive" indicators cited by the government was the growth in outstanding credit. But some economists contended that this could be the prelude to a significant drop in personal spending as families seek to work off their record-high debt burdens.

In other economic developments:

- New factory orders for manufactured goods slumped 1.1 percent from September to October, the second monthly decline in a row. Manufacturers' inventories declined seven-tenths of 1 percent, the Census Bureau said. It was the largest one-month drop since March 1983 and the sixth decline in the last seven months.
- Sales of new houses fell 5.5 percent from September to October, the biggest monthly decline since April, the Census Bureau reported. It was the third decline in as many months, following drops of 3 percent in September and 4.9 percent in August.
- Construction spending rose five-tenths of 1 percent in October, as increased activity in residential building offset a steep drop in commercial construction. The increase followed a four-tenths of 1 percent advance the previous month—down sharply from the Commerce Dept.'s original estimate of 1.9 percent for September. Residential building activity rose 2 percent last month while construction of shopping centers, office complexes and other commercial buildings declined 5 percent.
- The Labor Dept. reported that third-quarter manufacturing productivity rose at an annual rate of 3.7 percent as output increased 3.3 percent and hours worked declined three-tenths of 1 percent. The figures represented an upward revision of the department's earlier productivity estimates.

Federation calls for House okay of tax reform bill

House floor, would lower the corporate profits tax from 36 percent in the committee bill to 33 percent, and drop the top individual tax bracket from 38 to 37 percent. It also would restore special tax benefits for the oil and gas industry and add some new tax shelters. The present top tax brackets are 46 percent for corporations and 50 percent for individuals.

Republicans are counting on restoration of oil and gas tax benefits as a lure to gain the votes of oil state Democrats for the GOP substitute.

Kirkland expressed regret that the committee did not make use of tax reform to reduce the federal deficit, and instead abided by President Reagan's insistence that tax legislation be "revenue-neutral." One method to have done so, he said, would have been to establish a top tax bracket of 45 percent for incomes over $100,000.

But overall, Kirkland stressed, the committee bill will help America's middle-income as well as low-income households.

Mixed messages

President Reagan, who has proclaimed tax reform as his major domestic initiative has been getting conflicting advice from White House and Treasury officials as to whether the House committee bill or the Republican substitute comes closer to his proclaimed reform and simplification goals.

In the end, he stopped short of endorsing either version but said the legislative efforts represent "a good start but not an end product."

That was short of the strong presidential endorsement that Committee Chairman Rostenkowski said would be needed to get a tax bill through the House in view of the strong influence of business groups opposed to one or another segment of the reform package.

If the House acts, the Senate will take up tax reform in the second session—a congressional election year.

Tax justice coalition rallies support

Citizens for Tax Justice, a coalition that includes union and public interest groups, will mount a nationwide campaign to support the tax reform bill approved by the House Ways & Means Committee.

The coalition's tax policy director, Robert S. McIntyre, said the House committee achieved real reform. If its bill becomes law, "for the first time in years, General Electric and Boeing will be paying as much in taxes as the people who work their assembly lines, type their letters and wax their floors."

Eliminating tax shelters will spur economic growth, McIntyre said. "Companies can go back to investing in things because they make economic sense—not because the tax code turns losses into profits."

Under the committee bill, he noted, corporate income taxes would account for about 13 percent of federal revenues by 1990, up from an average of 7.8 percent over the past four years and just above the 12.5 percent in the year before President Reagan took office.

Excessive depreciation has been a chief means of corporate and individual tax avoidance, McIntrye observed. But while the Reagan tax plan would have allowed even more generous depreciation write-offs, the Ways & Means bill provides that "buildings and machines will be written off in a manner similar to the way they actually wear out."

The committee bill also goes further to curb abuses of foreign tax havens by multinational firms and closes a loophole "that allows many major defense contractors to escape income taxes despite huge profits."

Other pluses include limits on tax breaks for mergers and takeovers, along with partial closing of oil and gas industry loopholes the Administration wanted to retain.

For individuals, McIntyre noted, 61 percent of the tax reductions will go to persons with incomes under $75,000, as compared with 51.7 percent in the Administration proposal. At the other end of the scale, persons with incomes over $200,000 a year will get 15 percent of the savings under the committee bill compared to a 31.4 percent tax reduction in the Administration bill.

McIntyre said the tax justice petitions circulated earlier this year in a labor-supported campaign encouraged the House committee to "say no to the loophole lobbyists" and, as the petition urged, "restore the corporate tax."

GCIU electors confirm Norton as president

The board of electors of the Graphic Communications Union has declared James J. Norton president of the GCIU. He had been acting president since Aug. 28.

The board took the action after Norton received nominations from 228 of the union's approximately 650 locals. His three opponents, each nominated by just one local, fell far short of the constitutionally required nomination by 10 percent of the locals.

Norton played a key role in the recent merger talks between the GCIU and the Typographical Union. He said merger talks would resume early next year.

He had been the union's recording-financial secretary, a post which will now be eliminated.

Norton will fill out the unexpired term of past president Kenneth J. Brown, who retired last August.

Grand opening

A snip of the ribbon opens the new legislative headquarters of the New York State AFL-CIO in Albany. Joining in the celebration are AFL-CIO Regional Director Humphrey Donahue, State AFL-CIO President Edward J. Cleary, Albany Mayor Thomas Whalen, State Labor Commissioner Lillian Roberts and State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Paul Cole.

Pay, health, pension gains won in new RCA contracts

Some 9,500 Electrical Workers and 5,000 Electronic Workers have ratified new three-year contracts with RCA Corp., giving them pay increases of 8.5 percent plus lump-sum payments to replace annual cost-of-living adjustments.

Although the two unions negotiated separately, they coordinated their bargaining strategy on the national agreements covering employees at 12 plants producing television sets and parts, and other electrical products.

The new contracts provide an immediate cash bonus equal to 3 percent of annual pay, with a 3-percent wage improvement to take effect in December 1986 and a 2.5-percent increase in December 1987. They will also receive $100-credits in a stock ownership plan each December.

In addition, skilled workers' pay will increase by 5 to 20 cents an hour immediately, with another raise ranging from 5 to 15 cents an hour effective in June 1987.

Instead of annual COLA increases, employees will receive a $225 cash payment in June 1986, $500 in June 1987 and $525 in June 1988.

Employees with 30 years' service, and those whose combined age and years of service add up to 85, will receive a $5,000 termination payment. Regular monthly retirement benefits were increased from $14 per year of service to $15 immediately and to $16 by 1988.

The contract also provides benefit increases of up to 10 percent for those already on the retirement rolls.

The IBEW and IUE won a new health care plan which includes a number of cost-containment features but does not require employee copayments or increased deductibles. Dental benefits were increased as was the lifetime major medical maximum.

Under the agreement, it will take newly hired employees two years to reach full pay. They will start at 80 percent of the going hourly rate and will receive wage increases of 5 percentage points every six months until they have achieved parity with present employees.

Steady drop in real income besets most U.S. families

The average family headed by a woman suffered a 7.8 percent loss of purchasing power in the past 11 years, a situation which Draper called "a prescription for disaster," while two-earner families saw a 3.1-percent erosion in real income.

The study called the trend particularly disappointing in light of the fact that it took place in a period in which many women entered the workforce and the number of two-earner families increased dramatically.

"The increased participation in the workforce of second wage earners may result in only modest increases in income," the report said, "because many second wage earners work less than full time at below median wages."

The drop in real earnings, the JEC said, resulted from reductions in annual wages and salaries coupled with sharp swings in the gross national product—the nation's output of goods and services. "While there were a number of good years during the period," the study pointed out, "there have been many poor and mediocre years providing little progress for any but a few small sectors of the economy."

In making the report public, Rep. Dave Obey (D-Wis.), the JEC chairman, asserted:

"We have changed from a society in which families could expect steady financial advancement to one in which it is difficult to hold your own—and most families are not. There has been a very significant reversal in economic fortunes.

"Families with children are working harder to hold the line; but for the most part they are not making it."

A Republican economist on the committee took issue with the study—drafted by the JEC's Democratic staff—insisting that the analysis should have been based on the after-tax income to reflect the Reagan Administration's 1981 tax cuts.

Draper sharply disagreed. "Reagan's tax cuts were concentrated on the wealthy," she said, "and they zapped people in the low- and middle-income groups."

Whitfield nominated to key Labor Dept. post

Dennis E. Whitfield, a former official of the Republican National Committee, has been nominated by President Reagan to be Under Secretary of Labor.

He will succeed Ford B. Ford, who recently was nominated as a member of the Mine Safety & Health Review Commission.

Whitfield went to the Labor Dept. in April when Sec. William E. Brock joined the cabinet.

OSHA delays hit

New health standards termed short of need

proposals was a "mistake which could result in harm to workers."

On cotton dust, Seminario noted that protections for some non-textile workers were removed completely, while wage retention was won for workers unable to wear respirators who are transferred to less hazardous jobs.

The Auto Workers led the charge to pry a formaldehyde standard out of the Administration. UAW President Owen Bieber pointed out that "after five years of delays, OSHA has finally offered an outdated, inadequate proposal that would actually allow some employers to increase formaldehyde exposures."

OSHA has twice denied petitions from the UAW and 14 other unions for an emergency standard on formaldehyde. Each time OSHA promised prompt action on issuing a proposed standard. Court action by the unions resulted in an order requiring OSHA to issue its proposal by Dec. 3, 1985.

Bieber stressed that the substance of the formaldehyde proposal "is extremely disappointing and illustrates the aggressive interference of the OMB into the regulatory process."

Dr. Frank E. Mirer, director of the UAW's health and safety department, said the union will argue in the OSHA public hearings, set to begin Mar. 11, that formaldehyde should be treated as a carcinogen, and that stringent short-term exposure limits should be included in the standard.

Proposed limits

The proposed formaldehyde standard would lower worker exposure limits from the current 3 ppm to either 1.5 or 1 ppm. OSHA said it is considering either limit with an action level at one-half that amount.

Further, OSHA contended that because there is "substantial controversy over formaldehyde's potential carcinogenicity to humans," it proposed two revisions. One would simply lower the permissible exposure limit if formaldehyde is judged simply a mucous membrane irritant.

If, however, formaldehyde is shown to cause cancer in humans, then a comprehensive standard would be issued.

The results of a formaldehyde carcinogenicity study done by the National Cancer Institute are due to be released in January.

Michael Wright, director of the Steelworkers' health and safety department, said, "We're gratified the proposals are out, but we're sorry it took lawsuits to force the Administration to act. I'm convinced that without the legal actions, they wouldn't have done it." Wright said he, too, suspected that the delay was caused in part by OMB.

The USWA, which participated in the formaldehyde lawsuit, led the legal action on benzene.

The proposed benzene standard would reduce the permissible worker exposure limit to one part benzene per million parts air (1 ppm) averaged over an eight-hour workday, down from 10 ppm.

OSHA said four sectors of industry would be principally covered by the measure—petrochemicals, petroleum refining, tire manufacturers, and coke and coal chemicals.

The benzene proposal will permit the use of respirators during installation of engineering controls, cleaning and maintenance operations, in emergencies and in situations where engineering and work practice controls are not feasible.

Medical surveillance will be required for workers exposed above an action level of one-half ppm for 30 or more days per year or above 1 ppm for 10 days a year. Included in the medical surveillance would be workers who were exposed to levels above 10 ppm for more than 30 days in the year prior to the effective date of the standard.

Attack blunted

The attempt by OSHA and industry to severely reduce worker protections of the cotton dust standard was thwarted by unions, said Eric Frumin, job safety director of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

After the OSHA hearing in 1983, the industry dropped many of its demands for changes and agreed to limited revisions, none of which involve outright elimination of protections for textile workers.

For non-textile workers in knitting, classing and warehousing, however, all protections are being eliminated. A study by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health will be performed "to confirm the earlier studies and assure that workers remain healthy," OSHA said.

Action levels were set at one-half the current permissible exposure limits for yarn operations, waste houses and weaving sectors. Frumin explained that for those plants whose workplace exposures are below the action level, medical examinations for workers will be required only every two years.

Workplace monitoring will also be reduced for those plants whose initial monitoring shows exposures below the permissible levels, Frumin pointed out.

Oklahoma RTW drive pushed by Blue Cross head

Oklahoma City, Okla.—The head of the Oklahoma Blue Cross/Blue Shield is raising funds for a "right-to-work" drive in this state, the Oklahoma AFL-CIO charged.

State Federation President Rex Reynolds disclosed that Ralph Rhoades, president of the health insurance firm and chairman-elect of the Oklahoma Chamber of Commerce & Industry, sent a letter on Blue Cross/Blue Shield stationery to business executives, soliciting funds for the compulsory open-shop fight.

Reynolds said that Rhoades has thus far refused a request to meet with AFL-CIO officials to discuss the matter. The state federation intends to keep pressure on the Blue Cross/Blue Shield official to halt the practice, he added.

In addition to "right-to-work"—which was defeated by the voters in 1964, and which is the target of an all-out conservative drive in the next session of the legislature—Rhoades requested funds to lobby for undercutting workers' compensation and elimination of the prevailing wage law.

Five AFL-CIO unions are involved in a coordinated organizing drive to sign up an estimated 37,000 Blues workers across the country.

Machinists strike over job security

East Hartford, Conn.—Frustrated by management's stubborn refusal to deal effectively with the critical issue of job security, 8,000 Machinists struck three Connecticut plants of the Pratt & Whitney Group.

While unionists manned picketlines at installations in Middletown, North Haven and Southington, another 8,000 IAM members at the main plant here voted overwhelmingly to reject management's contract proposals. Although 55 percent of the East Hartford workers voted to join the strike, the vote fell short of the needed two-thirds majority.

The IAM walkout is the first at Pratt & Whitney in a quarter century. In addition to the Connecticut facilities, the company has operations in Maine, Georgia and Florida.

With more than 8,500 jobs lost to new technology at Pratt & Whitney over the past five years, the IAM went to the bargaining table asking for adequate job security for the dwindling workforce, as well as a wage package worth 14 percent over the three-year life of the proposed new agreement.

Hard bargaining

Pratt & Whitney, a division of the giant United Technologies Corp., refused to include any job-security language in the contract, offering only a "letter of intent" indicating it would pay laid-off workers up to $1,500 for retraining assistance.

The IAM, noting that the company's own documentation showed that 1,000 jobs will be eliminated under procedures scheduled to go into effect in the next 12 months, sought to modify the proposal to guarantee rehiring preference for workers displaced by technology or reductions in force.

When the company refused to make this modest change, production and maintenance workers at the three facilities voted overwhelmingly to strike.

The company's "final offer" called for a $300 one-time bonus to each employee, plus lump-sum payments equal to 3.5 percent of wages in each of the first two years and wage hikes ranging from 17 to 62 cents an hour in the third year.

The aircraft engine manufacturing firm was attempting to keep its production lines running by putting 3,000 supervisors on the floor of the three struck plants.

At the same time, management issued a threat that it would begin hiring "permanent replacements" for the striking IAM members.

Cornell papers link job loss to failed Reagan policy

The "alarming persistence" of recession-level unemployment, three years into the so-called recovery from the Reagan Recession, demands concerted labor-management-government efforts if the economy is going to get back on its feet.

That's the conclusion of a 265-page book, "Economic Dislocation and Job Loss," published by Cornell University's School of Industrial & Labor Relations. It is based on papers presented by representatives of unions, business, government and private organizations at an April 1984 conference in Washington.

Labor officials taking part in the symposium included President William H. Bywater of the Electronic Workers, President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers, President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. and Sec.-Treas. Jack Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

Blame for the "devastatingly high rate" of joblessness is laid squarely on the Administration's tight monetary policies and its cuts in federal domestic programs, coupled with a lack of modernization of plants and equipment, an overemphasis on military spending, plant closings due to unchecked imports and barriers erected abroad to keep U.S. goods out of world markets, and the movement of American industries overseas in pursuit of "plentiful, cheap" labor.

Immense suffering

"The suffering wrought by this dislocation and job loss upon millions of individuals, their families and communities has been immense," the introduction to the book asserted, "and many analysts, unfortunately, expect a continuation of the underlying causes."

The publication focuses attention on the causes and impact of the problem, takes a hard look at short-term labor market projections, outlines a range of proposed remedies, and examines the experiences of European countries in dealing with similar problems.

Although no consensus emerged from the conference as far as remedies are concerned, the book points to hopeful signs in that labor, management and government officials are engaged in continuing discussions on the subject.

Here are highlights of the union officials' papers included in the Cornell publication:

● The problem of worker dislocation under the twin impact of imports and technology "represents a degree of human despair and economic waste that demands immediate action," Samuel declared. It will not go away by itself, just because the economy is climbing out of the depths of the recession.

Skewed statistics

The IUD president said the situation is obscured by the way the government reports unemployment statistics. "Dislocated workers who, out of desperation, are reduced to taking part-time jobs are counted as fully employed," Samuel said. And those who go from $10-an-hour jobs to employment paying only the minimum wage "are counted as fully and satisfactorily employed, even though their families may be close to destitution."

In the past, he pointed out, technological change usually resulted in more, and often better-paying, jobs. But today's workforce is increasingly tilted toward "low-skill workers who perform simple, repetitive tasks," plus upscale jobs for scientists and engineers. But those in the middle—trained mechanics, factory workers and skilled office workers—face the "extinction of their jobs."

● Winpisinger likened the present crisis to that which the nation went through in the 1920s and 1930s, when capital and technology "failed us as a people and delivered us into the Great Depression."

Employers are using technology as an excuse for union-bashing, demanding that workers give back hard-won economic gains, Winpisinger said. "If we resist concessions in bargaining, we're told we'll be automated out of existence. If we resist automation and technology, we're told the corporation will shut down and move overseas."

The IAM president called technology "just another job blackmail threat and a degredation of living standards," which, he said, "contains the seeds of class conflict and struggle." To avoid class warfare, he recommended a share-the-work, 30-hour week with no overtime and no loss of pay.

As for management's threats to "flee to exploitable lands," Winpisinger said the answer should be to "tell them to get the hell out," and then slam the door on the products they want to ship into the American market.

● Bywater branded the Reagan Administration "the chief villain in causing economic dislocation and lost jobs," and called for congressional action to deal with the record-shattering trade deficit.

The IUE, he said, "knows full well how thousands of high-tech jobs can be wiped out due to surging imports and unfair trade practices." In the past 10 years, the number of production workers in the American color television industry plunged from over 41,000 to fewer than 16,000, while thousands of other jobs were lost in plants producing parts and components.

Dubious practice

Compounding the problem, he said, has been the offshore relocation of domestic manufacturers and the "dubious practice" by some producers of licensing technology to overseas competitors, setting the stage for still more imports flooding into the United States.

● With the jobs of the UFCW's shoe workers being wiped out by imports, and those of its packinghouse workers by automation, Wynn recounted the union's efforts to try to "alleviate some of the trauma of job loss."

In 1981 the UFCW received a $750,000 Labor Dept. grant to fund the union's economic dislocation program keyed to providing linkage between workers in need and community resources to help meet those needs, and mobilizing retraining and job placement resources.

During the program's two-year existence—a period which saw 90,000 UFCW members lose their jobs—50,000 workers received help. But in 1983 the Administration refused further funding because of "budget constraints and cuts in all government programs dealing with job training assistance to displaced workers," Wynn said.

● America is undergoing a "painful transition" as the industrial base declines, Sheinkman pointed out, and it is incumbent on both the public and private sectors to build into the system adequate protections for workers and their communities.

Unproductive efforts

"Our major industries close one plant after another, abandoning rather than rebuilding aging machinery, swallowing up smaller companies rather than investing in new productive techniques, and waging a new war on unions through decertification and union-busting," he declared.

"They must not be allowed to leave shattered lives behind at every turn," Sheinkman insisted.

Labor must continue to fight for policies that assure rational change that strengthens the country's economy and protects the living standards of working Americans, the ACTWU official said. High on its agenda must be adequate job-security provisions in collective bargaining agreements and the maintenance of decent wage scales.

And management must "recognize that a skilled, well-paid and stable workforce is an asset to a healthy economy," Sheinkman said. Business "needs to be able to sell what it produces, and as our middle class declines, so does its demand for goods and services."

Copies of "Economic Dislocation and Job Loss" can be obtained for $14.95 through the Full Employment Action Council, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., 815 16th St., NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Davis-Bacon rule on overtime pay upheld by court

Philadelphia—The Davis-Bacon Act requires construction contractors on federally funded projects to pay prevailing fringe benefits for overtime as well as straight-time work, the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals ruled.

That's the interpretation that the Labor Dept. gave to a New Jersey defense contractor who had argued that he shouldn't have to pay his non-union workers prevailing benefits for their overtime hours because the law didn't specifically require it.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. had intervened in the case in support of the Labor Dept. decision and provided evidence that the overtime interpretation was clearly in line with prevailing area practices.

The contractor, G&C Enterprises, had first challenged the Davis-Bacon policy before the Labor Dept.'s Wage Appeals Board, and lost.

Allowing a contractor to avoid making employment benefit payments for overtime hours would reverse the intent of Congress, the board said. The legal requirement to do so in accordance with the Davis-Bacon Act is "standard knowledge in the construction industry," it noted.

The firm then carried its argument to a U.S. district court, and lost again. District Judge Ann Thompson found "no basis" for the employer's argument.

At the appellate level, the three-judge panel unanimously affirmed the lower court's ruling.

UTU wins back pay award for Trailways workers

Bus drivers and mechanics at Trailways, Inc. will receive more than $3.5 million in back wages to compensate Transporation Union members for management's contract violations.

Arbitrator Paul E. Glendon found that Trailways violated its two-year collective bargaining agreement with UTU when it unilaterally cut wages 10 percent and froze cost-of-living adjustments. Trailways imposed the wage cuts when the union refused contract concessions last August.

Good life at the top

Chicago—The 60 top executives of the Beatrice Cos. are being rigged out in multi-million-dollar "golden parachutes," even if they don't have to bail out following a forthcoming takeover of the food conglomerate.

The stock options and bonuses will be worth $75 million. Since Beatrice has agreed to pay the executives federal taxes on the additional pay and benefits, the actual cost to the company will be closer to $150 million.

The biggest windfall goes to William W. Granger, Jr., who will collect a whopping $7 million for his seven months of service as Beatrice's board chairman—a cool $1 million a month.

What makes the payoff different from most "golden parachute" arrangements is that the custom is to give benefits to its top executives only in the event of a hostile takeover—and then only if the officials are fired.

In this case, the takeover is a "friendly" transaction under which Donald P. Kelly will pay $6.2 billion to acquire Beatrice, which had bought out his Esmark Inc. last year for $2.8 billion.

The biggest beneficiaries of the lavish separation package—who will collect the largess even if they aren't separated from the new firm—will be the six most senior officials. They will share a payout worth $23.5 million. And better yet, they won't have to pay one penny of federal income tax on the payouts.

Who said bosses can't be nice guys?

Boston hotel workers score major gains in 3-year pact

Boston—Beating back management demands for major concessions, 4,000 Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees won a new three-year contract to avert the city's first major hotel walkout.

After the eleventh-hour agreement was hammered out, HERE members employed at nine of Boston's biggest hotels hoisted Local 26 President Domenic Bozzotto on their shoulders and paraded through city hall where the negotiations took place.

"The good news is we won," Bozzotto told hundreds of cheering union members when the settlement was reached just minutes before a midnight strike deadline.

"We go back proud, we go back strong, we go back with the dignity and the justice we have made ourselves," he said.

The hotel workers won 6 percent wage increases in each year of the three-year agreement, despite management's insistence on a 4-percent pay hike contained in its "final and absolute offer."

In addition, the contract calls for a 26-percent hike in contributions to the health and welfare fund with vesting after four years' service, increased pension contributions, and improvements in holiday, vacation and sick-pay provisions.

Management had sought sharp cutbacks in all these areas and had insisted, up to the end, on a five-year agreement.

The new contract also contains strong anti-discrimination provisions and, in an industry where more than half the workers are women, provides for annual employer-paid seminars on workers' rights to be free of sexual harassment.

Morrell strikers return with new UFCW contract

Some 2,700 members of the Food & Commercial Workers are returning to work after ratifying a new three-year contract which ended 12-week-long strike at the John Morrell & Co. plant in Sioux Falls, S.D.

The packinghouse workers won a $1-an-hour pay hike over the life of the contract, which improved long-term disability payments, increased the night differential and removed restrictions on the "30-and-out" pension plan.

Elsewhere, the union resumed bargaining with Geo. A. Hormel & Co. More than 1,700 meatpackers have been on strike at the firm's Austin, Minn., plant since mid-August.

No negotiations appeared in the offing, however, at either Wilson Foods Corp. or Farmstead, where UFCW members continue to work under indefinite extensions of their previous agreements.

UFCW locals in Ohio have won agreement from three regional meatpacking firms on contracts that meet the union's national goal of bringing the base labor rate in the pork processing industry up to at least $10 per hour.

The settlements cover 1,100 workers at the Sugardale Foods, Inc., plant in Canton and Superior Brand Meats, Inc., in Massillon, and 300 workers at Dinner Bell Foods, Inc., plants in Defiance, Archbold and Troy. The latter settlement also applies to Dinner Bells' Wilson, N.C., plant where striking UFCW members returned to work following a five-week walkout.

Meanwhile, the strike-lockout of 22,000 members of the UFCW and the unaffiliated Teamsters at 10 Southern California grocery chains, which began Nov. 5, continues with no progress toward settlement.

Some 1,100 supermarkets from Los Angeles to the Mexican border are affected by the strike-lockout.

At issue are management's demands for a wage freeze, a two-tier wage system, and major work-rule concessions.

In Northern California, 3,700 UFCW meatcutters are voting in a mail referendum on a new three-year contract with that region's supermarkets.

MEBA sets campaign for air controllers

The Marine Engineers are planning to open a nationwide campaign to organize federal air traffic controllers.

MEBA was the parent union of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization that was disbanded after President Reagan fired 11,000 controllers in 1981.

MEBA President Gene DeFries said the union, through its District No. 1-Pacific Coast District, will launched an organizing drive shortly. DeFries is also president of the district.

The district's executive committee recently voted to provide sufficient funding to run an effective campaign for Federal Aviation Administration employees, DeFries said.

Improvement needed

"There is a widespread recognition of the need for improvement in the conditions of the thousands of men and women employed in the air traffic control system," DeFries said. MEBA, which has non-maritime professional and public workers in its ranks, "is convinced we can best provide the facilities and skills for effective representation," he said.

DeFries pointed out that "a considerable number of controllers have asked us in recent months to undertake an organizing campaign."

The MEBA president emphasized that a new air traffic controllers organization "will indeed be new. It will not be a disguised rebirth of the old PATCO. The new union will be effectively and responsively geared to serving the needs of this new generation of air traffic controllers."

PATCO, which was an autonomous affiliate of MEBA, was decertified in 1981 by the Federal Labor Relations Authority.

The Government Employees earlier this year had planned to organize 600 controllers in New England. But the FLRA ruled that the controllers can only be organized on a nationwide basis.

Paperworkers reject plan on OCAW merger

St. Louis—A special convention of the Paperworkers rejected a proposed merger with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, and officials of both unions expressed regret at the inability to reach an agreement acceptable to delegates from each organization.

Nearly 1,300 UPIU delegates attended the special one-day convention, representing 250,000 members. They voted down the merger by a weighted rollcall vote of 14,803 to 5,396.

The OCAW, with some 120,000 members, had ratified the agreement last August at the union's convention.

Paperworkers President Wayne E. Glenn said the union's officers "will abide by the decision" of the convention.

Discussion preceding the vote indicated concern among local unions at some of the proposed constitutional changes, including a reduction in the number of delegates sent to conventions. Another point of controversy dealt with dues payments by members receiving sick benefits.

The merger agreement between the two unions had been shaped over a two-year period by committees that included the top officers of both organizations.

Columbia clericals win first contract

New York—More than 1,100 clerical workers won their first contract at Columbia University, raising base pay dramatically and giving them an average 8-percent wage boost each year of the three-year agreement.

It took a decade of organizing effort by Auto Workers District 65, nine months of intensive collective bargaining and a three-day walkout before the issue was resolved.

The UAW also won landmark agreements from Columbia on compensating workers victimized by race or sex discrimination in the past, setting up a joint affirmative action committee, establishing a joint health and safety committee, and creating a mechanism to deal with the effects of automation.

A slice of history

Rare volume of the history of the Knights of Labor is presented to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue by John H. Dunne, secretary-treasurer of the Professional & Technical Engineers. Dunne found it in a used book store. Titled, "Thirty Years of Labor," the book was written by Terrence V. Powderly, who headed the Knights of Labor from 1879 to 1893.

Congress challenges Reagan on import-relief legislation

damage that the coalition supporting the legislation included nearly half the Republicans in Congress as well as the bulk of the Democrats. Unions representing garment and textile workers joined with employer associations in the lobbying effort.

One out of eight industrial workers in the United States works in these industries, despite the loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs in recent years. The trail of closed mills and factories runs through the South, through the industrial Midwest, and along both the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

The picture is similar in the shoe industry, with idled plants from Maine to Missouri, and in the western-based copper industry. In both these industries, the International Trade Commission has certified the damage from imports and has recommended remedies that President Reagan has turned down.

It was against this grim backdrop that the pressure for congressional action finally burst through the White House barrier.

As sent to the President, the legislation would roll back textile and clothing imports from South Korea, Taiwan and Hong Kong—the three biggest suppliers to the U.S. market—by 14 to 30 percent. Nine other nations would be limited to a 1-percent-a-year rise in exports to the United States. Even with these restrictions, imports would account for some 42 percent of the domestic market.

The bill would impose an eight-year quota on non-rubber footwear imports, limiting them to 60 percent of the U.S. market. Shoe imports this year are expected to account for 80 percent of U.S. sales. The legislation would also require the President to negotiate import restraints with other copper-producing nations.

Need for legislation

The opening section of the bill, representing the "findings of Congress" as to the need for legislation, points up the magnitude of the problem. It notes that the nation's trade deficit in textiles and apparel exceeded $16.2 billion last year, an increase of 53 percent from the previous year.

The current level of imports represents more than a million "job opportunities lost to U.S. workers."

As for the Multi-Fiber Arrangement that was supposed to have regulated the growth of textile product imports, the goals have not been met—in part because of "the failure of the United States to enforce adequately its rights," Congress found.

The result, the legislation noted, has been "closed plants or curtailed operations," workers left without jobs, and "serious hardship" to hundreds of communities.

This indictment was largely ignored by U.S. Trade Rep. Clayton Yeutter in a letter to a House member reiterating the Administration's opposition to the bill. The bill would undermine the ability of the United States to "effectively negotiate" with its trading partners, Yeutter insisted.

House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), who opposed but did not try to block the measure, argued against singling out particular industries for relief and promised to bring comprehensive trade legislation to the House floor early next session.

Farm bloc fears

Several farm state representatives who spoke against the bill voiced fear of retaliation against U.S. agricultural exports.

But House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., said American industries "have been absolutely slaughtered by Reagan policies." Passage of the bill, he said, will send "a signal to the world that the U.S. Congress does not share the President's soft line on trade."

Republicans supporting the measure reminded President Reagan pointedly of his campaign pledge to protect the textile industry from further import damage.

The House consensus was that damage-control legislation couldn't wait and the bill was approved with 180 Democrats and 75 Republicans voting for passage, to 61 Democrats and 100 Republicans opposed. In the Senate vote last month, 35 Democrats and 25 Republicans voted for the bill; 28 Republicans and 11 Democrats opposed it.

IUD expands list of brazen union-busters

Two giant West German multinationals and a small but vigorously anti-union American firm joined the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s "dishonor roll" which turns the spotlight on the worst labor-bashing companies in America.

The inclusion of BASF America Corp., a wholly owned subsidiary of the huge BASF Aktiengesellschaft, and Lehigh Portland Cement, part of Heidelberger Zement Co., marked the first time that foreign-owned companies were placed on the list.

The third 1985 nominee is Trojan Luggage Co., of Memphis, Tenn., a small American firm which, the IUD said, "is pursuing union-busting with the same zeal as the larger nominees."

Unions involved in the disputes with the newest members on the "dishonor roll" include the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Chemical Workers at BASF; the Cement, Lime & Gypsum division of the Boilermakers at Lehigh Portland, and the Furniture Workers at Trojan.

Two-faced firm

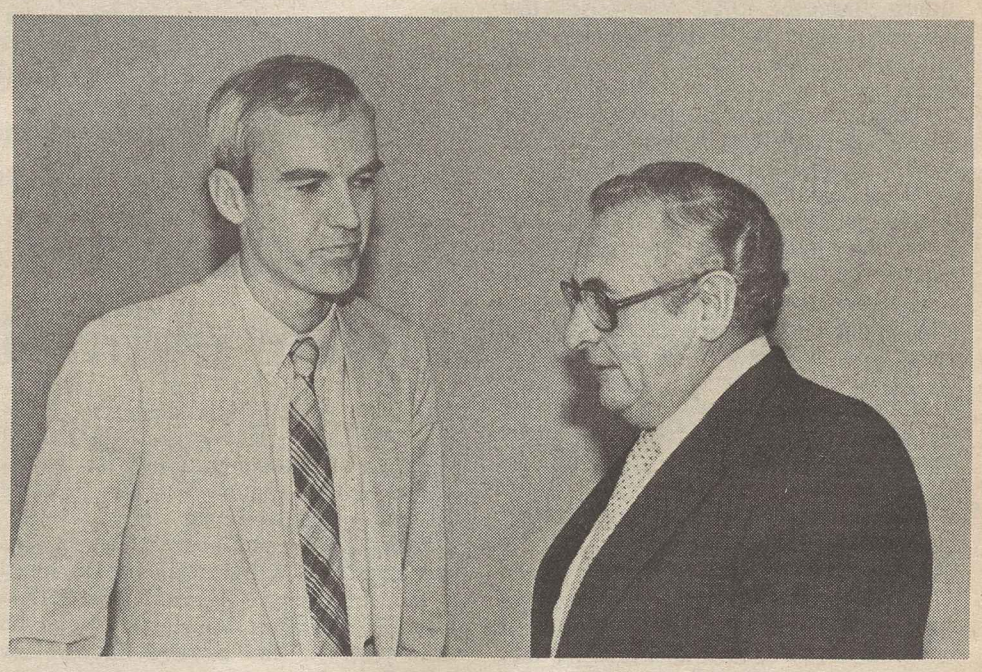
IUD President Howard D. Samuel accused the two West German firms of "operating like Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

"They treat their unions and workers at home with respect and dignity," Samuel said, "but in this country they seem to be operating under the bold belief that they can ignore our labor laws."

Foreign companies which find it profitable to operate in the United States "should behave like exemplary citizens," Samuel said, and most do. But BASF and Heidelberger are the exceptions, and labor intends to pursue legal and legislative remedies "to assure that such behavior by foreign corporations does not become the rule."



Six of nine previous nominees remain on the IUD's "dishonor roll"—Faberge, Inc., Indiana Desk Co., Louisiana Pacific Corp., Marval Poultry Co., Phelps Dodge Corp., and Proctor & Gamble. Three others—AP Parts, Capital Cities Communications, Inc., and Litton Industries—were removed following a turn around in their relationships with their unions.

Labor lifts boycott against mime troupe

The San Francisco Mime Troupe has been removed from the AFL-CIO "unfair list," the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. announced.

The action was taken at the request of Actors' Equity, which had been instrumental in having the group cited by the AFL-CIO department in May.

Removal of the theatrical group came after it signed an agreement with Equity covering its current eastern tour. Alan Eisenberg, executive secretary of Equity, said negotiations are continuing between the union and the mime troupe.

New WISH leader

AFL-CIO Vice President Marvin J. Boede, new chairman of the Workers' Institute for Safety & Health, meets with WISH Executive Director Vernon McDougall. Boede, president of the Plumbers & Pipefitters, succeeds J.C. Turner, president emeritus of the Operating Engineers. Communications Workers President Morton Bahr and IUOE President Larry Dugan were both elected to the board of trustees.

The First Round

THE ABORTED ATTEMPT to cut the pay of America's workers under the guise of tax reform was thwarted in the House, thanks to the alert sounded by the trade union movement and the response of union members across the country.

The same strong response by union members helped block the Administration's attempt to force cutbacks in city and state public services by ending the federal deduction for state and local taxes.

It was outrageous that a Congress which had put the nation so deeply in debt in order to give billions of dollars in tax reductions to corporations and the wealthy should have seriously considered taxing the employment benefits of workers in order to further cut taxes on business profits.

But at the start of this year, the threat was very real. On that issue, some of the Democratic "tax reformers" were on the same wavelength as the Reagan Administration.

As a result of your postcards and letters, reflecting the grassroots lobby fostered by international unions and by the AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies, the tide turned.

House members got the message and a strong majority joined in sponsoring a resolution rejecting taxation of health insurance and other employer-provided benefits. And members of the Ways & Means Committee found out that a lot of voters, not just mayors and governors, were concerned with the future of cities and states.

Let's hope that the Senate got the message, too. But if there's any doubt, you'll be hearing from your union. And your senators will be hearing from you—again.

Unbalanced Politics

IT'S NOT SURPRISING that the Reagan White House is spinning its wheels in an effort to get Congress to reshape the Gramm-Rudman balanced budget plan the President not long ago so ardently embraced.

As someone should have explained to the President earlier, government can't function effectively in such a straitjacket.

The President has expressed concern about the impact on the nation's defense, and properly so. But there are equal grounds for concern over the impact on the domestic functions of government, and on safety-net programs that will be most needed in times when tax revenues are lowest.

Most curious of all is the renewed attention being given to the thoroughly discredited balanced budget constitutional amendment.

Surely, the losing struggle to turn Gramm-Rudman into workable legislation should be a loud and clear warning of the pitfalls of trying to hammer a balanced budget amendment into the Constitution.

Working Union

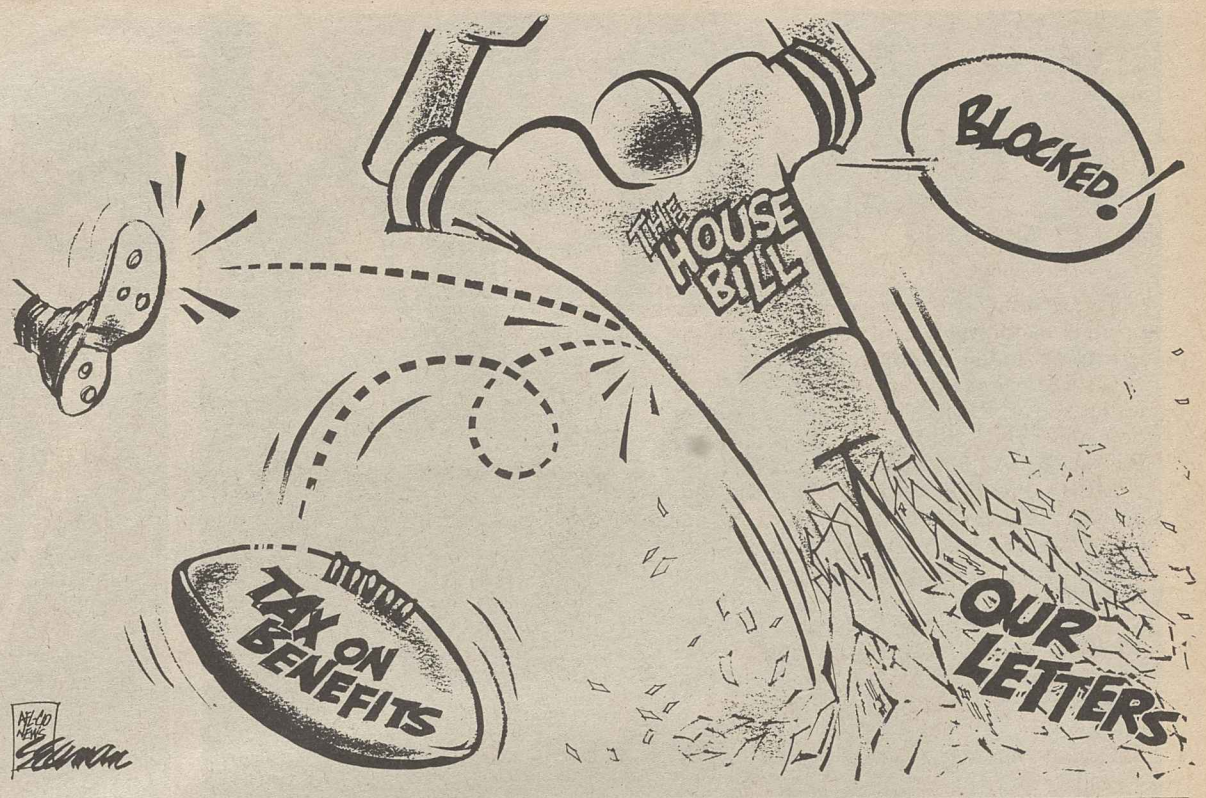
THANKS TO an enterprising reporter, Washington area newspaper readers got a revealing glimpse of the unionized sector of the construction industry from the viewpoint of workers and employers.

An Iron Worker, a veteran at his trade but a new member of the union, was enthusiastic about the union's training program he attended two nights a week.



"I've worked all over the U.S.," he told the Washington Post reporter. "On the non-union side, I got no training. You go out on the job and learn by mistakes . . . and accidents." Working union, he said, "you don't go out with untrained people, and I found out what I'd been missing for 15 years."

On the management side, two different contractors used almost the same words in explaining why they are better off paying union wages to workers who earn them.

With union crews, said one, "we have highly skilled labor. We can use less men, get it done quicker, bring in the job on time."

From another major employer, "It may cost me $120,000 more to use union labor, but I can finish the job two months earlier."

Or as the trade union movement's founders put it, "a fair day's work for a fair day's pay."

Private charity not enough as hunger, poverty deepen

By Press Associates, Inc.

During the Thanksgiving holiday, religious and other private relief organizations reported that they were strained to the limit in providing a hot meal and a little warmth to growing numbers of impoverished and homeless people.

Two days after Thanksgiving, leaders of labor, religious, civil rights, women's rights, children's defense, the elderly, and citizen action groups gathered in five cities for public hearings, rallies and speak-outs on poverty in America.

In Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, New York and Des Moines, Iowa, the voices of the poor, including displaced workers and other "new poor," were heard in churches and soup kitchens along with front-line poverty workers and experts. The community events were followed by sessions in which local, state and national strategies to combat poverty were discussed.

The events, named "Thanksgiving Action on Poverty," were sponsored by a labor-backed coalition of 37 organizations. They declared that poverty amid plenty is "a national tragedy and a moral scandal. At a time of public thanks and private giving, we believe that private charity is not enough."

Public investment

"Only public investment," they said, can provide adequate "opportunity, education, nutrition, preventive health care, job training, and insurance against adversity."

The call to action noted that "the conditions of poverty in America have worsened dramatically over the past several years. Economic vulnerability now extends well into the formerly secure middle class."

The call was issued at a Washington press conference where a "State of the Union" report on poverty and economic vulnerability was released. The 39-page report, prepared mostly from government data by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, contained some surprising and disturbing facts, including these:

- One in four Americans lives on a poverty-level income for at least a year in a given decade—the "revolving door" of poverty.
- About one in seven Americans currently lives below the poverty line, which is $10,609 for a family of four. Of nearly 34 million poor, more than 13 million are children. More than one out of every five children now lives in poverty.
- Of those living in poverty, 57 percent are female, 68 percent are white, and 32 percent are minority. One third of blacks and more than one of every four Hispanics is poor.
- The number of those who work full-time year round and are still poor is over 2 million, nearly double the number eight years ago. The reasons include an increasing tax bite on lower-income workers since the late 1970s and the fact that the minimum wage, at $3.35 an hour, buys 25 percent less than it did in January 1981, the last time it was adjusted.
- Of the workers permanently displaced in the past five years, most are either still unemployed or working at jobs that pay less than their former jobs. Many have slipped into poverty.
- The 1984 poverty rate of 14.4 percent is at its highest since 1966, except for the recession years of 1982 and 1983. There now are 4.4 million more poor persons than there were in 1980.
- The growing gap between upper and lower income families has been growing, especially since 1980, and is now wider than at any time since the end of World War II. Census data show that all income groups, except the richest fifth of the population, had less after-tax income in 1983 than in 1980.
- Federal budget reductions since 1981 cut deepest in already inadequate programs for poor and moderate-income people. For example, in no state do Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) payments for a family of four reach 75 percent of the poverty level. Even combined AFDC and food stamps do not equal the poverty level. Despite the rise in poverty, the food stamp program currently serves fewer people than at any time in the past five years.

Newly elected AFL-CIO President George Meany shares gavel with CIO President Walter Reuther at Dec. 5, 1955, merger convention.

RWDSU President Alvin Heaps shows off merger convention badge to Tom Moran and Bill Gillen—all delegates to the 1955 convention.

Labor history buffs mark merger's anniversary

By Candice Johnson

The 30th anniversary of the AFL-CIO merger was marked at federation headquarters with a special program organized by the National Capital Labor History Society.

Labor historians and educators joined union representatives and delegates from the historic 1955 convention for a bit of reminiscing and a look to the future of the trade union movement. The program was held on Dec. 5, the anniversary date.

Alice Hoffman, a labor historian at Penn State University, discussed the oversimplified view many historians and labor reporters held of the AFL and CIO at the time of the merger and even today.

The CIO was deemed "radical and forward-looking" while the AFL was cast as "stodgy and old," Hoffman remarked.

She said the AFL-CIO merger oral history project, funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities and set up by the George Meany Labor Studies Center, attempted to address that misapprehension.

Oral history

Hoffman called the oral history project valuable because it broadened and contributed to the understanding of the 1955 merger. Discussions of the friendship between Mrs. George Meany and Mrs. David Dubinsky and their husbands' relationship, for example, added "a humanizing dimension to the events."

The interviews also "make a powerful statement on the seminal role of George Meany in the merger process," Hoffman stressed. Throughout the interviews, it was clear that Meany was essential to the agreement and process of merger, she said.

Hoffman traced the roots of merger to the recognition of both the AFL and CIO that raiding was ineffective and costly.

"When Meany showed AFL leaders that nearly $4.1 million was spent to organized the already organized, with only 8,000 new members to show for their efforts, those hard figures showed how counterproductive raiding was," she noted.

On the CIO front, she pointed out, rivalry between Walter Reuther and Steelworkers President David McDonald threatened the survival of the CIO, pushing it toward merger.

Hoffman noted that merger of state and local organizations was often more difficult than national merger, especially in states where power was nearly equally distributed between the AFL and CIO.

Jacqueline Brophy, an associate at the George Meany Labor Studies Center who reviewed the Michigan AFL-CIO merger, agreed.

She noted that the national merger agreement allowed two years for state organizations to merge. While some acted right away, Michigan was one of 14 that missed the deadline.

Brophy cited "different orientations" and politics as the key stumbling blocks to merger, noting that the state AFL leadership was close to the Republican party while the state CIO was active in rebuilding the Democratic party.

The state CIO, dominated by the Auto Workers, differed greatly from the AFL which was heavily influenced by the Teamsters and Detroit Local 299 President James Hoffa, she said.

Hoffa already was under fire from the ethical practices committee formed under the AFL-CIO's national merger agreement, Brophy noted. "He used his influence to block merger in the state," she said.

The Michigan AFL-CIO was born when George Meany rescinded the charters of both organizations in 1957 and called a new constitutional convention, "with tremendous turnout," Brophy said.

Duplication ended

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pointed out that merger meant an end to duplicate state, local and national organizations, union raiding and much confusion among rank and file workers.

He noted that the federation has become the focal point of the modern labor movement, with affiliated unions providing direct access to rank-and-file members that would not have been possible 30 years ago. The regional conferences, the "one-on-one" program, the political endorsement process, and union membership surveys all result from a sense of stability and security organized labor has enjoyed since 1955.

Young termed the labor movement more open to change, new ideas and new concepts than at any other time in its history. Recognizing that society and the workforce has changed, labor will alter its traditional collective bargaining goals to concentrate more on health care, flextime and other working conditions, Young said.

But "doing better for working people" should remain labor's principal goal into the AFL-CIO's next 30 years, he concluded.

House rejects Reagan cuts in college student programs

The Reagan Administration's attempt to slash loans and grants for college students was rejected—overwhelmingly—by the House.

It approved by a bipartisan 350-67 vote a five-year extension of higher education programs the Administration sought to curtail drastically. The Reagan budget proposed to cut college aid by about 25 percent and end guaranteed loans to students from middle-income families.

The budget cut was described by an Administration spokesman at the time as marking "a major philosophical shift" by returning the burden of college costs to parents and students.

Instead, the House renewed the program with some liberalization—including an increase in the loan limit for college juniors and seniors and a longer grace period after graduation before repayment must start—but made other changes to hold down costs.

Pell grants, which are available to low-income students to cover up to 60 percent of college costs, would rise from the existing $2,100-a-year ceiling in $200-a-year increments to $3,100 in fiscal 1991. About 2.6 million students now receive Pell grants.

Increased limits

The guaranteed loan limit would remain at $2,500 a year for freshmen and sophomores, but would double to $5,000 for juniors and seniors. The existing 5 percent loan origination fee would be phased out, dropping 1 percent a year. But the subsidized interest rate of 8 percent would rise to 10 percent in the fifth year of repayment, when college graduates are expected to be able to afford larger payments. The bill would also tighten loan collection procedures.

Funding would be continued for work study programs, but the institutions would be required to match a larger share of the cost. Their present 20 percent share would go to 25 percent in the 1989-90 academic year and to 30 percent the following year.

Also in the bill is a new program, with a $110 million authorization, to strengthen historically black colleges and universities and assist minority students in science and engineering studies.

The Administration is expected to press the Senate to make cuts the House rejected, but education assistance has traditionally carried substantial bipartisan support.

Senate ducks curb on PAC spending

The Senate set aside a campaign reform bill that sought to curb the influence of free-spending political action committees, but left open the possibility of action in the second session.

Sen. David L. Boren (D-Okla.) sought to force a vote on his reform bill by offering it as an amendment to an unrelated measure the Senate was considering.

The Boren bill would move in a direction the AFL-CIO supports by limiting the amount of campaign funds candidates for Congress can receive from political action committees.

It also would reduce the amount a PAC can contribute to any candidate and tighten rules governing independent spending by a PAC to support or oppose a candidate for federal office.

There is now no ceiling on the total amount a candidate can receive from the multitude of political action committees. Boren's bill, which is cosponsored by Sen. Barry Goldwater (R-Ariz.), would put a $100,000 ceiling on total PAC contributions to a House candidate, or $125,000 if there was also a contested primary election. The Senate ceiling would be based on the state's population, with a maximum of $750,000.

The amount that could be contributed by a PAC to a single candidate in a primary or general election would be trimmed from the present $5,000 to $3,000. However, Boren would let the ceiling on an individual contribution rise from $1,000 to $1,500, which the AFL-CIO has opposed.

Averting an immediate showdown, which probably would have led to the tabling of the Boren amendment, an agreement was reached to send the bill to the Senate Rules Committee for hearings that Chairman Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.) promised to hold early in the new year. But Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole (R-Kan.) refused to make a firm commitment that a committee-approved bill will be scheduled for floor action.

According to just-released figures compiled by the Federal Election Commission, some 3,000 political action committees contributed a total of $113 million to candidates for Congress in 1984, with about 70 percent going to incumbents.

Corporations and trade associations led in congressional contributions, followed by union political action committees.

By far the biggest spender was the National Conservative Political Action Committee, which used much of its $19.3 million in outlays for "independent" negative advertising opposing liberal incumbents. Such expenditures do not count as campaign contributions for the opposing candidates. Two other right-wing PACs were next in line—the Fund for a Conservative Majority and the National Congressional Club set up by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.).

Texas unions to launch savings association

Houston—The Texas labor movement is planning to organize a savings and loan institution here to support union-built construction projects and other activities that will benefit unions in the state.

Joining forces in the venture are the Texas AFL-CIO, the Building Trades Council, the Industrial Union Council and the Houston Gulf Coast Building Trades Council.

In announcing the decision to seek a federal charter, Texas AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard said that the financial institution should be in operation within a year.

"Our intention is to offer union members every service that competing financial institutions offer," Hubbard said. The savings and loan will have "a 100 percent union workforce" and will open branches in every Texas community "where there are enough union members to support an institution of this kind," Hubbard said.

Serving on the board will be former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, now a professor at the University of Texas in Austin, and Calvin Guest, former president of the Bryan Savings & Loan Association. They have served as advisers to the labor movement in organizing the financial institution.

House broadens hazardous waste cleanup program

The House voted to expand the labor-supported toxic waste disposal program and to replenish the "superfund" that finances the cleanup.

Funding will continue to come primarily from higher taxes on petroleum and chemical producers, the chief sources of toxic contamination. The oil and chemical industries lobbied hard to spread the cost to all types of manufacturing through a form of value-added tax, but lost on a key 220-206 vote.

The AFL-CIO had attacked the value-added concept as a form of national sales tax that would shift the cost largely to middle-income and low-income consumers. It would be an inefficient as well as a regressive means of funding the program, Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote House members.

The oil-chemical lobby had better success in the toxic waste bill the Senate passed last September, and the funding mechanism is a major issue to be resolved in a House-Senate conference.

Also to be resolved is the size of the superfund. The cleanup program was launched in 1980, after the Love Canal contamination had dramatized the environmental threats of abandoned hazardous waste sites. The superfund to pay for the cleanup of sites when those responsible for the dumping could not be found was allocated $1.2 billion for its first five years.

Hazardous waste dumps were found to be more widespread and the health risk greater than had been anticipated. The cleanup program got off to a slow start, marred by scandals in the Environmental Protection Agency that included sweetheart deals that let polluters escape liability for their dumping.

After the ouster and resignation of more than 20 EPA officials, including Administrator Anne Burford and Assistant Administrator Rita Lavelle, the program got back on track.

Only 6 cleaned up

But only six toxic dumps had been cleaned up when the program expired at the end of September, and there was near-unanimous agreement that it should be renewed and expanded. The Reagan Administration proposed $5.3 billion over the next five years, the Senate bill raised the amount to $7.5 billion, and the House set a $10 billion total.

The legislation would require the Environmental Protection Agency to begin a cleanup of at least 600 hazardous sites during the next five years. Cleanups would have to meet standards of environmental laws such as the Clean Water Act. A provision sought by the AFL-CIO establishes special training for workers employed in the cleanup of toxic sites.

Communities near chemical plants would be assured the right to know what chemicals are being handled or stored in the facilities.

The right-to-know provision was strengthened by the 212-211 adoption of a labor-supported amendment. The House, however, rejected another labor-backed amendment that would have set up a procedure for persons injured by hazardous substances to sue in federal court for damages.

Under the House-passed financing provision, the Superfund would raise about $3.1 billion from a tax of 11.9 cents a barrel on crude oil, another $2 billion from chemical feedstock taxes, $2 billion from a waste disposal tax, smaller amounts from various other special taxes and $1.6 billion from general tax revenues.

Pushing tax reform

Wheelbarrow full of petitions with one million signatures for tax reform is delivered to House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski in support of legislation to close loopholes that allow profitable corporations to avoid paying a fair share of taxes. Union members across the country helped circulate the petitions from Citizens Organized to Restore an Effective Corporate Tax. (Story, Page 8.)

Recovery stalls with 8.3 million still out of work

Unemployment stood at 7 percent in November, a slight dip of one-tenth of 1 percent from the previous month, leaving more than 8.3 million Americans still out of work and another 5.5 million involuntarily working only parttime.

A significant factor in the decline was the shrinkage in the labor force last month—down 92,000 from October—the AFL-CIO pointed out.

With the economy choking on a glut of imports and reeling under the impact of the record-smashing trade deficit, much of the reduction can be traced to manufacturing workers leaving the labor force because jobs aren't available, AFL-CIO economist Henry Schechter said.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics will not update its figures on discouraged workers until next month. At the end of September, more than 1.2 million Americans fell into this category.

Congress enacts scheme to force balanced budget

By David L. Perlman

Congress passed and President Reagan immediately signed into law a balanced budget requirement that the AFL-CIO warned could send the economy into a tailspin at the first sign of a recession and gravely weaken the ability of government to meet domestic and military needs.

Despite widespread skepticism, the Gramm-Rudman amendment to the debt limit bill passed the Democratic House almost as easily as it had the Republican Senate.

It sets a rigid timetable of annual reductions in a deficit that has grown to $200 billion a year as the result of the heavy tax cuts and huge defense increases under President Reagan. The zero-deficit balanced budget is supposed to be achieved by 1991.

If Congress is unable to meet the deficit reduction figure for any year, the President must impose across-the-board cuts in federal spending, half in the military segment of the budget and half in domestic spending. The self-financing social security system and some safety-net programs for the needy are exempt from cuts, but other needed programs would be on the chopping board.

Deficit reduction could be achieved by closing tax loopholes as well as spending cuts, but it won't be if the President has his way. Reagan said he will veto any new taxes and has insisted that tax reform legislation be "revenue-neutral."

The balanced budget measure was shaped originally by Republican Senators Phil Gramm of Texas and Warren B. Rudman of New Hampshire, with Democrat Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina as a cosponsor. As the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted, "its radical changes in our government structure" were not considered by any committee before they came to the Senate floor.

Reagan's red ink

Republicans saw it as a defense against Democratic attempts to tie the huge Reagan budget deficits around their necks.

The White House, which had given lip service to a balanced budget constitutional amendment even as Reagan was sending his red-ink budget proposals to Congress, embraced the idea. Conservative ideologues around Reagan saw it as a way of forcing the elimination of government programs Congress had refused to abolish.

Only later would the Administration realize the implications of mandatory budget cuts on defense programs that Reagan wanted to expand. But after waffling for the better part of a week, Reagan opted for the balanced budget timetable even though Defense Sec. Caspar Weinberger was saying publicly that it would be a disaster.

Reagan's comment, the night before Congress took final action on the measure, was that he "heartily" endorsed it, but was "concerned" that "it could have adverse effects on maintaining adequate levels of defense spending." Reagan again insisted that the cause of the deficit was too much government spending, not inadequate tax revenue.

The Senate approved the budget-slashing mandate by a 61-31 vote, with Democrats split down the middle. Twenty-two Democrats joined 39 Republicans to support the bill; 22 Democrats and nine Republicans opposed it.

Armour workers supported on backpay, rehiring claims

By Gene Zack

The National Labor Relations Board has given ConAgra Inc. the choice between negotiating with the Food & Commercial Workers on the rehiring of 800 former employees of Armour Food Co., which the midwest conglomerate acquired two years ago, or facing one of the largest hiring discrimination suits in history.

NLRB General Counsel Rosemary Collyer informed union and management attorneys that she was prepared to issue an unfair labor practice complaint unless the company comes to terms with the UFCW for the workers at plants reaching from San Francisco to Charlotte, N.C.

At issue is some $40 million in back wages, benefits and accrued interest—or about $50,000 per worker—the union estimated.

UFCW President William H. Wynn hailed the board's action, declaring that "it sends a clear message to other employers that they cannot violate workers' rights with impunity."

ConAgra purchased 39 Armour meatpacking plants and distribution centers from Greyhound Corp. in December 1983. Among them were 13 plants covered by a UFCW master contract providing a base rate of $10.69 an hour. When ConAgra reopened 12 of the plants two days later, it hired new non-union workers at between $5.50 and $6.50 an hour.

The conglomerate "deliberately failed to offer employment" to the unionized workers, said Jerry Mayer, NLRB assistant general counsel, in order to "avoid incurring an obligation to bargain" with the UFCW. ConAgra's clear intent, he said, was to hire less than a majority of the former employees at each of the plants.

The union pointed out that in some

Delegates map AFA contract, growth goals

San Francisco—The Flight Attendants' convention charted a bargaining course for 1986 and developed an action plan to address the AFA's concerns in the not so "friendly skies" of airline deregulation.

The union's new flight plan includes an organizing campaign that specifically targets non-union carriers formed after deregulation and a stepped-up communications network for local unions.

AFA President Linda Puchala noted that the union will sit down at the bargaining table next year with 13 of the 15 carriers AFA represents and urged local unions to begin preparations for those sessions.

Delegates voted to set up local communications committees and media training sessions for attendants and established a series of educational workshops on contract issues to prepare for the 1986 bargaining sessions.

Delegates also voted to affiliate the AFA with the Food & Allied Service Trades Dept.

Airline deregulation was a major concern among the delegates, and AFA Vice President Susan Bianchi Sand pointed out that since 1979 when regulations were lifted, "employees are earning up to one-third less, but are being twice as productive."

She said industry surveys indicate nearly 85 percent of the total airline market soon will be controlled by only six or seven carriers, and that AFA members will feel the effects of rapid consolidation.

Merger mania

"Decisions to merge will be made on whether you can buy an airline, not whether you can run it. Employees will be fighting for a job and seniority against each other, and unions will be left to clean up the mess," Sand warned.

Other sessions covered safety issues, legislative training, workshops for local union members and the National Right to Work Committee's attacks on the Railway Labor Act.

The delegates also paid special tribute to the five Trans World Airlines attendants who were hijacked to Beirut, Lebanon, last summer. They were honored for their courage and the contributions they made to their profession.

Congressmen join IAM members on picket line at the U.S. Capitol.

Capitol Hill food workers hit evasion on bargaining

Protesting a double standard under which Congress enacts legislation to safeguard American workers but exempts itself from the law's coverage, employees of the House restaurants and cafeterias set up a picket line on the Capitol steps.

More than 75 percent of the 200 Capitol restaurant employees have designated the Machinists as their bargaining agent, but their supervisor, Capitol Architect George White, has rebuffed repeated requests to negotiate a contract.

Carrying signs proclaiming "Justice Denied House Restaurant Employees," and "If Unions Are Good for Poland, Why Not the House of Representatives?" the 50 unionists were joined on the informational picket line by several House members, including Representatives Barbara Mikulski (D-Md.), Ron Dellums (D-Calif.), Mickey Leland (D-Tex.), Don Edwards (D-Calif.), William Clay (D-Mo.), Mervyn M. Dymally (D-Calif.) and Charles A. Hayes (D-Ill.)

Clay and Edwards are spearheading a drive to secure bargaining rights for the restaurant workers. In a letter to Rep. Frank Annunzio (D-Ill.), chairman of the House Administration Committee which has jurisdiction over the matter, the congressmen accused White of employing "every imaginable stonewalling tactic" to avoid granting union recognition.

IAM President William Winpisinger, in a letter to all House members, declared that "Congress may exempt itself from the provisions of this country's labor laws, but it cannot exempt itself from a moral and ethical obligation to deal with its employees by the same standards it has prescribed for all other employers."

The average wage of the restaurant employees is $5 an hour, they have no effective grievance procedure, and the promotion system "absolutely reeks," the IAM said. Although 80 to 85 percent of the workers are black and 70 to 75 percent are women, most of the promotions go to white males, the union charged.

'Recovery' leaves 8.3 million jobless

statistics was the report that only 31 percent of all workers eligible for unemployment insurance were receiving benefits as of mid-November.

The BLS attributed this to three things: tighter state eligibility requirements, the back-to-back 1980 and 1981-82 recessions which left many workers without enough time on the job to be eligible for benefits, and the large proportion of women in the job market who haven't worked long enough to qualify for unemployment compensation.

Schecter said there was another reason. The number of those unemployed 26 weeks or longer increased from 14.6 percent in October to 16.3 percent in November. "These workers have exhausted their benefits," he said, "but the economy hasn't found a place for them."

Although total nonfarm employment increased 182,000 from October to November, the AFL-CIO pointed out, 154,000 of the new jobs were created in service-producing activities and only 28,000 in goods producing.

The Administration boasted that 10 million new jobs had been created since the depths of the Reagan Recession in November 1982. But only 2 million of the jobs were in the goods-producing sector, as workers went back to their jobs after extended layoffs, while more than 7.7 million were in services.

The BLS report showed that the unemployment rates of 6 percent for adult men and 6.4 percent for women were unchanged from the previous month. Among white workers, the rate edged down from 6.1 to 5.9 percent, but among blacks it rose from 15 to 15.9 percent.

For teenagers, the overall rate declined from 20.1 to 18.4 percent. For black teenagers it rose from 39.7 to 40.9 percent.

Frontlash leader feted

Jessica Smith, past executive director of Frontlash, chats with AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and the organization's new director, Joel Klaverkamp, left. Smith, who is now organizing director for the Seafarers, was honored at a Washington reception for her contributions to the labor movement during her five years as head of the youth support organization.

William Gomberg dies, economics consultant

Philadelphia—William Gomberg, labor economist and industrial engineering consultant to a number of unions, died of cancer Dec. 8 at the age of 74.

Gomberg's association with the labor movement dates from 1934, when he established the management engineering department of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

He retired from the University of Pennsylvania's Wharton School in 1982 as professor-emeritus, and until recently served as an international economic consultant to the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs.

Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue wrote Gomberg's wife, Adelaide, that "his knowledge and judgment were a valued asset to the cause of working people at home and abroad."

plants, information about job applications and interviews was not posted before the shutdown. In at least one plant, workers were told that they would not be rehired because the new owners did not want the union in their plants.

According to the NLRB, three of the plants hired none of the veteran workers and no more than 15 percent of the union members was rehired at any one installation. Company-wide, a board spokesman said, only 10 percent of the UFCW members got their jobs back.

Call for recognition

Wynn called on management to recognize the UFCW as the collective bargaining agent for ConAgra's Armour workers, adding:

"It is now clear that, but for the company's unlawful discrimination against UFCW members, the UFCW would have represented a majority of workers hired by ConAgra when it commenced operations in the plants formerly covered by a master agreement" between Armour and the union.

In addition to the San Francisco and Charlotte plants, the pending suit covers Armour workers in Chicago, Pittsburgh, Kansas City, Portland, Ore., Nampa, Idaho, Mason City, Iowa, Arlington and Garland, Tex., Norfolk, Va., Eau Claire, Wis., and Mobile, Ala. All were reopened by ConAgra except the Pittsburgh facility.

Cable firm slapped for wage chiseling

A Birmingham, Ala., cable television company has been found guilty of discriminating against unionized workers by granting them smaller merit wage increases than those given non-union employees with similar performance evaluations.

The company violated federal labor law by giving non-union workers raises of $10 to $35 a week in October 1983 while limiting union members to raises of only $5 to $10, the National Labor Relations Board said.

It ordered the employer to grant union workers retroactive increases to bring them up to the level of non-union employees with comparable evaluations.

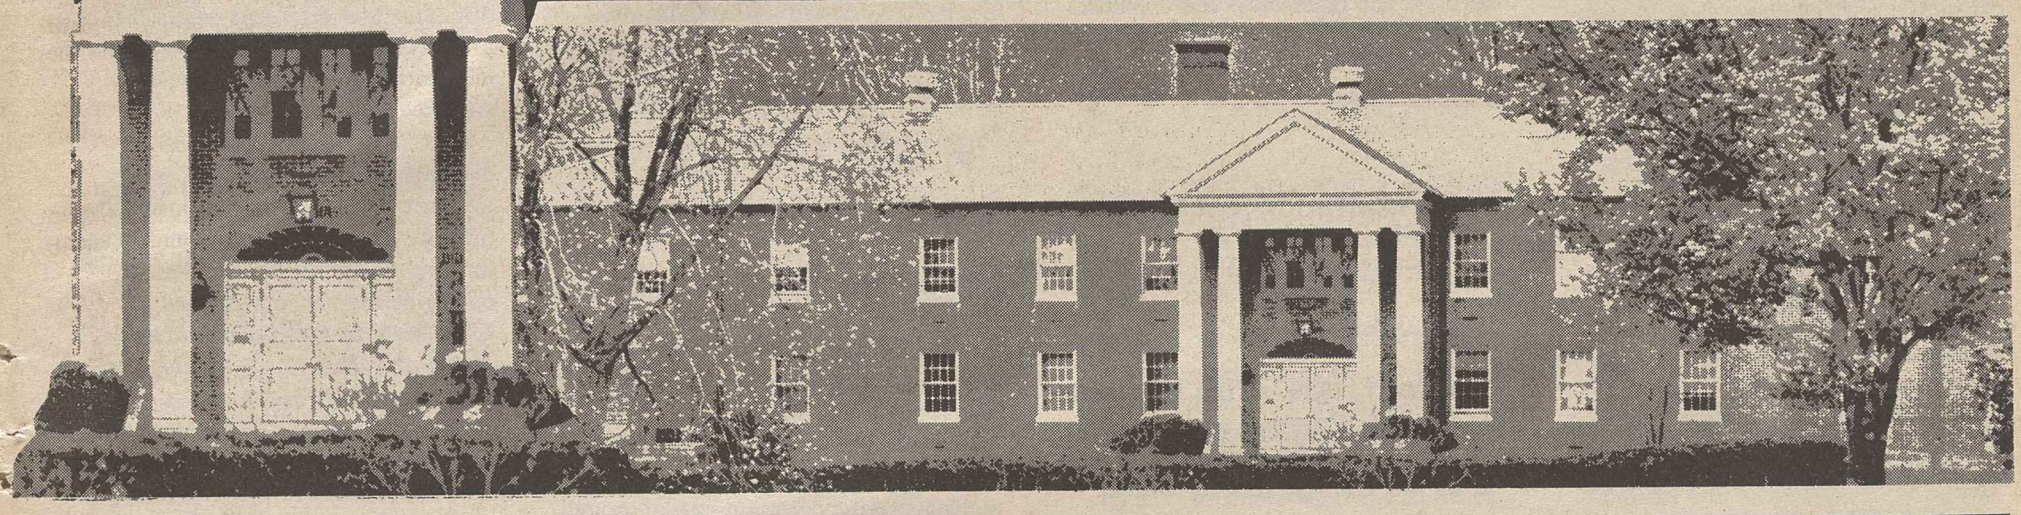
The case was brought by Communications Workers Local 10902 against Leeds Cablevision, Inc., and Cablevision, Inc., two affiliated suppliers of cable television services. The companies were considered a single employer because they shared common officers, management, ownership, and control over labor relations.

R-T-W state fails in bid to nullify union-shop pact

In a sharp rebuff to Virginia's "right-to-work" law, a federal court has upheld the union-shop provision in the Amalgamated Transit Union's contract with the transportation network that serves the District of Columbia and its Virginia and Maryland suburbs.

U.S. District Court Judge James C. Cacheris held that the transit system and ATU Local 689 had "the authorization to enter into a union-shop agreement" for the 5,600 Metro bus drivers, subway operators and mechanics, 700 of whom work in Virginia.

The state had challenged the contract provision, which has been in effect since 1972, insisting that the transit workers in Virginia were barred from the protections included in the agreement because of the state's compulsory open-shop law.



Judge Cacheris brushed the argument aside, pointing out that the Metro system was established under a congressionally approved interstate compact. Federal law, he said, supersedes state law.

The Virginia attorney general's office said that no decision has been made on whether to carry the case to a higher court. But Mark A. Rosen, the ATU's attorney, called the ruling "a clear-cut victory that should discourage any appeal."

Labor studies for union leaders

The George Meany center will offer leaders of AFL-CIO affiliates 34 opportunities to sharpen their skills during the first six months of 1986. Dates and course descriptions appear on the following three pages.

An application to register for any of these institutes is on the third page. There is no charge for tuition to any of these courses.

The classes will focus on activities and skills asked of almost every union officer and staff employee. In addition to the institutes on personal development organizing, collective bargaining and union building, this year's subjects include: The Craft of Negotiating, Individual Rights in the Workplace, Organizing Techniques for Public Employees, Working Women's Concerns, the Elements of Persuasion, TV: The Cool Medium, and Advanced Teaching Techniques.

All but three of the 36 classes will meet at the Silver Spring, Md., campus of the Meany Center. Off-campus institutes are scheduled for the University of Oregon, Eugene, and for Phoenix, Ariz.

In addition to these institutes, open to all fulltime leaders of AFL-CIO unions, affiliated unions have scheduled 25 training session and conferences at the George Meany Center during the next six months.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development has scheduled three programs for Latin American trade unionists. The African-American Labor Center will bring African trade unionists to the campus in April.

The Center will try to accommodate any AFL-CIO affiliate that wants to use the campus for its own leadership conference or staff training session. Anyone interested should get in touch with Robert Pleasure, executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Avenue, Silver Spring, Md.; telephone 301/431-6400.

George Meany Center Institutes January to June 1986

★ Pension Trustee Training for Public Sector Unions

Jan. 5-9, 1986

This four-day institute, co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Department, is for full time union officers and staff of public employee unions who are serving, or expect to serve, as pension fund trustees, as a result of collective bargaining or legislation.

The program will focus on: The basics of pension plan structure and operation; analysis of actuarial, trustee and other financial reports; pension fund investment performance; and a review of public sector union activity.
Coordinators: Richard Dwyer and Jeffrey Macdonald

★ The Craft of Negotiating

Jan. 12-17, 1986

In difficult economic and social climates, union leaders can maximize existing bargaining strength through skillful negotiating techniques. This institute, on The Craft of Negotiating, will explore successful techniques.

Negotiations between trade union administrators and lawyers, merchants, and providers of services will be discussed. Negotiating theory will be explored. The aim is to improve the skill of the participants in collective bargaining, grievance handling and union administration.

Maximizing opportunities for successful settlements through negotiating tactics will be distinguished from approaches that lead quickly to impasses.

The recommendations of the Harvard Negotiating Project and similar negotiating theories will be discussed and evaluated.

This institute differs from courses in negotiating techniques in that The Craft of Negotiating Institute will focus on sharpening individual skills and developing tactics for all types of negotiations at the bargaining table, in grievance resolution, and in everyday administration and leadership situations. Videotaping will be used to help participants identify their own strengths.
Coordinator: Robert Pleasure

★ Teaching Techniques in Labor Education

Jan. 19-24, 1986

This institute explains and demonstrates the techniques most commonly used in labor education. It is designed for those who teach in union conferences, summer schools or night classes. Cosponsored with the AFL-CIO Department of Education, this is a basic institute for union staff members who want to upgrade their teaching skills.

Individual sessions will demonstrate techniques—lecture, discussion, buzz groups, role playing, films, and use of materials. This institute will emphasize techniques to get students talking and hold their interest. Practice teaching is part of the program.

In today's labor movement, many union staff members are teaching their specialty although they do not have "education" as part of their titles. Unions have specialists in health and safety, women's concerns, legislative issues, grievance handling, communications, financial procedures, community services and other areas that members need to know about.
Coordinators: Marjorie Rachlin and Richard Dwyer

★ Arbitration Techniques: Preparation & Presentation

Offered four times:

Jan. 26-31, 1986, at the University of Oregon, Eugene, and Jan. 19-24, Feb. 23-28, and Apr. 27-May 2, at the George Meany Center

The way to learn to prepare and present grievance cases to an arbitrator is to do it. That learning is best done at an institute such as this when a union member's future is not at stake.

This institute concentrates on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators who are willing to share their knowledge.

During the week, there are practice sessions on the preparation of cases, the techniques of presentation with emphasis on two areas that union representatives find difficult: opening statements and handling witnesses.

Participants tell us that the most helpful part of this week is the videotaping of the mock arbitration proceeding, with the playbacks for analysis and discussion. The arbitrator who has heard the cases takes charge of this session.

Discussions focus on what matters can be arbitrated, the selection of arbitrators and the law of arbitration. Since discipline and discharge cases cause more than half of all grievance arbitrations, special attention is paid to the investigation of such cases and to the rules that arbitrators use.

This institute is for union representatives assigned to arbitration. It will help experienced representatives analyze and brush up on their techniques. Those who concentrate on the final steps in the grievance procedure will find it helpful.
Coordinator: David Alexander

★ Psychology of Leadership

Feb. 2-7, 1986

Your success as a union leader is directly related to your ability to work with people. Leadership is a craft that can constantly be improved. This institute is intended to help you become a stronger, more popular leader.

You'll learn to recognize and evaluate your own leadership characteristics, skills and style.

You'll see yourself as others see you; public speaking sessions will be videotaped and played back for you. A speech coach will make suggestions.

You'll understand how committees and other work groups reach decisions and how they can be influenced.

You'll create a simulated work team using techniques that illustrate how team members are motivated.

You'll learn how to handle anger in yourself and others.

Here is an opportunity to increase your leadership ability by expanding your understanding of yourself and others.
Coordinator: Gene Morrill

★ Labor Law

Offered twice:

Feb. 2-7 and June 8-13, 1986

Laws affecting responsibilities in bargaining, servicing and union administration will be the focus of the Labor Law Institute. Organizing law will not be covered so that the participants can concentrate on a thorough examination of laws affecting internal union administration and collective bargaining, including the problems arising from bankruptcies and plant closings.

Major topics to be covered are:
Laws dealing with internal union affairs—Three aspects of Labor-Management and Disclosure Act (Landrum-Griffin): members' rights

(Title I), election procedures (Title IV) and current enforcement practices under Title II, the reporting provisions.

The duty of fair representation—The union's obligation to represent fairly all workers in the bargaining unit on grievances, in negotiations, and other activities concerning job rights.

Laws affecting bargaining—Basics of the Taft-Hartley provisions on exclusive representation, duty to bargain, access to information, the laws affecting strikes, lockouts, picketing and boycotts. New developments in the law affecting bankruptcy, plant closing and successorship will be emphasized.

Equal opportunity obligations—Laws, regulations and court rulings on what constitutes "discrimination" and their impact on contracts. Instructors will deal with issues such as discrimination, comparable worth, affirmative action and pregnancy disability.
Coordinator: Lawrence Rogin

★ Contract Negotiations: Private Sector

Feb. 9-14, 1986

This institute on the techniques of contract negotiating is for full-time officers and staff who negotiate agreements in the private sector.

Early sessions will discuss the role of the chief negotiator at different points in the bargaining process including: the preparation and design of initial proposals, developing commmittee work and record-keeping procedures, the structure and function of opening statements, styles of language and economic bargaining, and preparing for and directing the ratification process.

Actual bargaining table tactics such as the timing and structure of counter-proposals; avoiding bargaining bottlenecks; effective communications at the bargaining table and the use of mediation will be developed through the use of case problems.
Coordinators: Richard Dwyer and Jeffrey MacDonald

★ Alcohol & Drugs: Standards of Discipline & Discharge in Arbitration

Offered twice:

Feb. 17-21 and June 29-July 3, 1986

This course focuses on the substantive rules develped by arbitrators around discipline and discharge cases. The program complements the Center's courses in Arbitration Techniques and Advanced Arbitration.

Classes will cover just cause in discipline and discharge, proof and evidence in alcohol-related misconduct, off-duty misconduct, proof and evidence in drug-related misconduct and employee assistance programs.
Coordinators: Richard Dwyer and David Alexander

★ Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications

Feb. 23-28, 1986

Here's an opportunity for a union editor to get some coaching on the basics of newswriting and editing and to pick up ideas from other union editors on how a publication might be made more effective. Classes will focus on newswriting, feature writing, headline writing, photo editing and makeup and layout.

Participants will hear specialists on:

- How to make a union publication more readable, more credible and more useful to union members;
- How to cope with problems of delayed mail deliveries and skyrocketing postal rates;
- How to avoid suits for libel and slander, copyright infringement, and violations of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

This workshop is co-sponsored by the International Labor Communications Association. It is open to any union editor or would-be editor of a local, district council or state publication.
Coordinator: Gordon Cole

★ Organizing Techniques for Public Employees in Certified Units

Feb. 23-28, 1986

This institute will study successful methods of attracting and signing public employees in units where the union is already the certified bargaining agent. The class, co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Department, will concentrate on the basic attitudes and concerns of public workers and techniques to identify and develop internal organizing issues.

Case problems will be used with participants working in small groups on different organizing situations for which they will develop short and long-term strategies. Their conclusions will be examined and critiqued by the group.

Sessions will be devoted to recruiting, developing and rewarding internal organizing volunteers and new programs to attract members.
Coordinator: Jeffrey MacDonald

★ Fact Finding and Interest Arbitration

Mar. 2-7, 1986

Many states require fact finding as an impasse procedure in public employment. Interest arbitration is often required in the protective services and a few states require it for all public disputes.

Participants will analyze the experience with the various forms of interest arbitration and fact finding, and discuss the strategies that are most effective with each. Participants will engage in a simulation, so that they get practical experience in handling of current issues in front of a neutral.
Coordinator: Lawrence Rogin

★ Advanced Organizing

Mar. 3-13, 1986

This two-week workshop is cosponsored by the AFL-CIO Department of Organization and Field Services. Those who want to participate should apply to their own union's director of organizing or to the international union officer in charge of organizing.

The international unions nominating individuals to attend this workshop will send those names to the AFL-CIO Department of Organization where a final selection will be made. Organizers, whatever their titles, who supervise and direct organizing staffs will be given priority.

This program places heavy emphasis on short and long-term targeting and resource allocation strategies along with the effective training, development and direction of organizing field staff.
Coordinators: Jeffrey MacDonald and Russell Allen

★ Organizing in the Construction Industry

Offered three times:

Feb. 2-7, 1986, at Phoenix, Ariz.; Mar. 9-14, 1986, at the University of Oregon, Eugene, and Apr. 27-May 2, 1986, at the George Meany Center

The challenge of organizing in the construction industry in the face of the unique employment patterns in the building trades will receive the special attention that it requires.

Multi-employer collective bargaining and benefit systems, the transient nature of work in construction and the unique legal framework create special challenges and opportunities for construction trades organizers.

The institute will assist each participant in exploring the need to match the organizing campaign to the particular customs and practices of that participant's craft and industry.

This institute is offered in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Department.
Coordinator: Robert Pleasure

Nondiscriminatory policy for students

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Inc. admits students of any sex, age, race, color, national and ethnic origin to all the rights, privileges, programs, and activities generally accorded or made available to students at the school. It does not discriminate on the basis of sex, age, race, color, national and ethnic origin in administration of its educational policies, scholarships and loan programs and athletic and other school-administered programs.

★ Computers for Local Unions

Offered twice:

Mar. 16-20 and May 18-22, 1986

This institute is designed to provide union staff with information about the uses of mini and microcomputer systems for their organizations. Uses for union computers will be discussed with suggestions for staff training and computer maintenance.

Classes are taught in plain, nontechnical terms by instructors who are computer specialists and unionists as well. There will be "hands-on" workshop sessions for participants using state-of-the-art minicomputers.

Information will be provided to help union staffs assess their computer needs, and also to give some practical background for dealing with vendors.
Coordinator: David Alexander

★ Television: The Cool Medium

Apr. 6-9, 1986

This is a three-day workshop to coach union leaders who are confronted occasionally by reporters and TV cameras.

Participants will have three exercises facing video cameras: A hostile confrontation, a panel discussion and an in-studio interview.

One session focuses on working with TV reporters—controlling an interview, recognizing deadly questions and avoiding no comment. Another concentrates on relating to the camera: gestures, posture, eye contact, dress and makeup, body language, relaxation techniques and visual aids.

The Labor Institute of Public Affairs assists in the coaching.
Coordinators: Gordon Cole and Gene Morrill

★ Effective Union Action for Civil Rights

Apr. 6-10, 1986

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department's annual conference on Effective Union Action for Civil Rights is planned especially for civil rights and women's rights designees of AFL-CIO unions. The conference is useful as well for all union staff members and elected officers.

The conference includes reports and discussion on current issues of civil rights activities and law. Participants have an opportunity to exchange ideas with government officials, with academics and leaders of organizations with a particular commitment to civil rights and equal opportunity.
Coordinator: Jacqueline Brophy

★ The Evolution of Work and the Labor Movement

Apr. 13-18, 1986

This course will examine the unions' role in the changing workplace. Discussion will center on how unions will deal with the new technology, the new workplace, and the new workforce.

Participants will examine new methods of managing the workplace: Quality of Work Life and Employee Involvement programs and the unions' role in these programs.

Strategies unions have adopted for organizing when confronted with such programs will be studied.

The course will analyze the effect of economic dislocation and changing technology on workers and industries. Participants will review union programs to assist workers hurt by economic dislocation, from severance pay and pension rights to transfer rights and retraining. Collective bargaining rights of the union and legislation to assist workers and communities will be covered.
Coordinators: David G. Alexander and Richard Dwyer

Who Is Eligible, General Rules

Eligibility

To participate in labor studies institutes or programs at the George Meany Center, one must be a full-time officer, representative or staff employee of an AFL-CIO affiliate.

Registration

Early registration is advised. Labor studies institutes are limited to 25 participants, not more than three from the same union. The Center reserves the right to postpone or cancel any institute.

Hours

Registration for most labor studies institutes begins at 4 p.m. on Sundays with the first session at 7 p.m. Morning classes begin at 9 a.m. running until noon. They resume at 1:30 p.m. and run until 4:30 p.m. Advance notice will be given of evening events.

Accommodations

Unless their homes are within commuting distance, participants are expected to live on campus. The campus guest quarters can house 141. Most rooms are singles with queen-size beds; a few are doubles with twin beds. Each room has its own private bathroom and study desk. Maid service is furnished. The rooms are spacious and pleasant. Participants are invited to bring their spouses.

Meals

Meals are served cafeteria style in the Dining Hall. Breakfast is from 7:30-8:30 a.m.; lunch, 12-1; dinner 6-7 p.m. Wakeup calls are made at 7 a.m. for all students.

Costs

There is no tuition charge at the George Meany Center. Room and board charge for a student in residence is $70 a day, single occupancy; $50 a day, double. This includes three meals. Students who commute are charged $7 a day to cover lunches at the Center.

Deposit

A deposit is required with each application for registration in an institute, workshop or program at the George Meany Center. For students who do not live in the area, the deposit is $70 which will be credited to the final bill for room and board. For commuters living in the Washington, D.C., area, the deposit is $35. Those applying for an institute at the University of Oregon, Eugene, must enclose a deposit of $25.

The deposit is refundable if registration is cancelled and notice of cancellation is received by the Wednesday before the program. Please make check payable to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The Center asks each participant to settle for the bill by cash, personal check, American Express, Master Charge, Visa or Bank Americard before leaving the campus.

Dress

Dress is informal at all times. Those who want to take part in athletic activities should bring sports clothes.

Discipline

A labor studies institute is no junket. All who come should do so with serious purpose. All sessions start on time. Participants are expected to be prompt. The Labor Studies Center is free to cancel anyone's registration at any time.

Certificates of Completion

Participants are expected to attend all sessions. The Center will award certificates on the basis of full attendance.

★ Union Issues for Working Women

Apr. 13-18, 1986

More women are working, more women are active in unions, and more women need to be organized. These changes have brought greater awareness of the special problems of working women, and unions have responded with a wide range of solutions.

Some of these "women's" issues arise from the segregated structure of jobs and the concentration of women in jobs where pay is low. To deal with this problem unions have been working on pay equity, upgrading, promotions and training, and special health and safety issues such as VDTs.

Maternity, childcare, aging dependents are difficult burdens for women—and men—who must work a regular schedule. Unions are seeking solutions to these problems through parental leave, short-term leave, more child care options.

This program provides facts and perspective and considers the ways unions can approach these issues in bargaining, contract administration and legislative action.

As more women become officers and staff members of their unions they want to upgrade their union skills. They want to understand better the structure and operations of their unions and the AFL-CIO. They are anxious to learn how best to work in the labor movement to make programs successful. During this institute participants take part in sessions to broaden their leadership skills.

★ Organizing Techniques

Apr. 13-18, 1986

This program is for full-time international or local staff members who have responsibility for organizing.

Participants will discuss the changing nature of the work force. A simulated organizing exercise will teach the mechanics of an organizing campaign. The exercise will be videotaped so participants can see themselves in action as organizers. You will work with prospective members, interviewing workers to determine interests and issues. You will discuss ways to develop leaders and make an organizing committee work effectively.

The course will cover the law on organizing and Labor Board procedure—from the organizer's viewpoint.

Participants will study anti-union techniques being used by employers and labor relations consultants to defeat workers' efforts to organize. Countervailing measures will be suggested.

Coordinators: Jeffrey MacDonald and Russell Allen

★ Planning & Funding Labor Education Programs

Apr. 20-25, 1986

This institute, co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Department of Education, will explore methods for helping full-time union officers and staff prepare, develop and fund labor education training programs for union activists. This institute will help unions look at new ways of providing education and training resources and materials to increase the skills of local leaders.

Sessions will cover the development of new material and curricula for training local activists and leaders with emphasis on the use of public schools, university and college facilities.

The institute will examine alternative sources of funding for education and training programs through collective bargaining and foundation grants.

Coordinators: David G. Alexander and Richard Dwyer

★ Negotiating Contracts with State and Local Agencies

May 11-16, 1986

This institute on contract negotiating techniques is for union officers and staff who negotiate labor agreements with state and local agencies. Federal sector negotiations are not addressed.

Early sessions will discuss the role of the chief negotiator at different points in the bargaining process including: the preparation and design of initial proposals, developing committee work and record-keeping procedures; the structure and function of opening statements, styles of language and economic bargaining, and preparing for and directing the ratification process.

Actual bargaining table tactics such as the timing and structure of counter proposals, avoiding bargaining bottlenecks, effective communications at the bargaining table and the use of mediation will be developed through the use of bargaining simulations and case problems.

Although fact finding and interest arbitration are frequently an important part of the bargaining process in the public sector, they are addressed in another Center program.

Coordinators: Jeffrey MacDonald and Richard Dwyer

★ Advanced Editing Skills

May 11-16, 1986

This is a class for union editors who have completed the Newswriting and Editing workshop and are ready for more coaching. Instruction will focus on three editing skills:

Layout and Makeup—Type selection, making your layout more interesting, symmetrical vs. asymmetrical design, using boxes, legibility, a second color, and copy fitting.

Picture Editing—Picture sources, posing pictures, cropping, reducing and enlarging, pairing pictures, picture series, picture pages, line art, screens, silhouettes and writing captions.

Headline Writing—Headline type faces, headline type sizes, headline grammar and punctuation, character counting, news and feature heads.

The class will divide into teams, each to produce its own newsletter.

The workshop is limited to 20. Participants will be asked to bring copies of one recent issue for critiquing on layout, pictures and headlines.

Coordinator: Gordon Cole

★ Making Your Case: How To Argue Persuasively

May 18-23, 1986

This course will deal with the subject of evidence and proof and persuasive argumentation in cases union representatives handle: grievance hearings, arbitration hearings, representation cases before the National Labor Relations Board.

Participants will prepare hypothetical cases, present their case to the group, and then hear a critique of how they handled their evidence and their arguments.

The grievance case will be in the pre-arbitration step of the grievance procedure, with a stipulation that the union is seeking a reasonable settlement short of arbitration if at all possible.

In the NLRB case, participants will be briefed on the issues that must be developed by the union at the hearing and what it will take to prove their case.

The arbitration case will involve various types of evidence—exhibits, witnesses—and will follow a discussion of what constitutes convincing evidence.

Coordinator: Russell Allen

★ Advanced Education Techniques

June 8-13, 1986

This program follows the basic institute on Teaching Techniques in Labor Education, a program which concentrates on teaching skills. While that program provides overall training in the fundamentals of labor education for union staff members who are teaching a variety of subjects, this advanced program is a specialized institute focussed on topics of concern to experienced labor educators.

This institute, which is co-sponsored with the AFL-CIO Department of Education, is particularly designed for labor educators and administrators who have responsibility for directing programs.

Coordinator: Richard Dwyer

★ Individual Rights in the Workplace

June 8-13, 1986

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has identified the union need to "continually seek out and address new issues of concern to workers." These new needs often go beyond the scope of collective bargaining. Among professional employees, for example, they are becoming a central workplace concern. The desire for the freedom to provide quality work, to be free from abuse, to limit intrusion by employers into personal lives, is now vitally important to many individuals in the workplace. Therefore, it must be of concern to union leaders.

This institute will examine the role of the union representative in protecting the individual rights of union members at work. Emphasis will be on such subjects as workers' rights on the job, the use of polygraph tests, the testing of employees as a condition of employment and collective bargaining agreement provisions relating to alcohol and drug abuse.

The institute will review arbitration and court decisions and their effect on the individual rights of workers.

Coordinator: David G. Alexander

★ Negotiating for Employee Benefits

June 15-20, 1986

This institute is for union staff and officers who have the responsibility of negotiating labor agreements in the private sector and who would like to improve their knowledge and negotiating skills in the area of employee benefits.

Part of the program will be devoted to discussion of two benefit programs—pensions and health insurance.

However, the program will include presentations on group life and disability insurance, group dental, and deferred income programs such as Employee Stock Ownership Plan.

Each benefit area will be looked at in terms of basic plan design, operation and bargaining goals. Recent collective bargaining developments in each area will be reviewed for their impact on bargaining strategies.

Coordinator: Jeffrey MacDonald

★ Occupational Health and Safety

June 22-27, 1986

Every year hundreds of thousands of workers become ill and die as a result of exposure to toxic substances on their jobs. Thousands more are killed in the workplace because of hazardous conditions. And thousands are injured because of unhealthful or unsafe conditions that could have been prevented.

This institute is designed to provide union officials with a range of skills necessary to respond effectively to the complex problems relating to chemical and physical hazards in the workplace.

After this five-day program, a union representative should be able to use a mix of problem-solving approaches: contract negotiations, grievance procedure and arbitration, the National Labor Relations Board, safety and health committees, OSHA inspections, the OSHA appeals process, other government safety and health agencies, and mobilizing community support around health and safety issues.

Participants will be coached in recognizing health and safety hazards, the nature and cause of occupational diseases, relating specific OSHA standards to workplace conditions, worker and union rights under OSHA, using the media for safety and health purposes; and dealing with occupational safety and health issues in negotiating and administering a union agreement.

Degree candidates here for week of January 26-31

Seventy-five officers, staff and other union activists are expected at this year's first week in residence, Jan. 26-31, for those working for Antioch University degrees at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Each person chooses two courses to study for each six-month term. During the week on campus they meet daily with their two professors and do the first written assignments. Then they go home and complete the remaining assignments over the next five months, sending each to the instructors and getting back comments.

Among the subjects offered in the term beginning Jan. 26 are Collective Bargaining, Labor and the American Political System, Labor Movement Past and Present, Labor Law, Economic Policy Issues, American Unions Face the Future, and American Literature of Social Protest.

For more information write to College Degree Program, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

Reagan signs bill

Congress approves rigid budget scheme

In the 271-154 House vote, the bill was supported by 153 Republicans and 118 Democrats, and opposed by 130 Democrats and 24 Republicans.

Some Democrats backed the measure as the only way to force Reagan to accept the inevitability of a tax increase. And some supported it because they feared a political backlash if they voted against a balanced budget.

Some members of both parties argued that the strong and perhaps unconstitutional budget medicine was necessary to bring pressure on both Congress and the President to act more responsibly.

Opponents did not let the historic abandonment of congressional responsibility pass unchallenged.

Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.) acknowledged that the efforts of the House conferees had made the original Gramm-Rudman plan "a little more fair." Nevertheless, he warned, it will damage the economy and the nation "in a thousand ways."

Recession trigger

The final version of the legislation allows Congress to vote on whether to postpone the deficit reduction timetable if the economy is sunk in recession, with a growth rate under 1 percent for two successive quarters. But before that point is reached, Obey noted, unemployment would be rising and government resources would be shrinking. And a post-recession recovery would be retarded by an abrupt return to the deficit reduction timetable, he warned.

To Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), "Gramm-Rudman is a suicide pact" that would dismantle the nation's defenses. Sen. J. Bennett Johnston (D-La.) saw it as "a freight train bearing down on every American, not just the Pentagon." It would be silly "if it weren't so tragic," he said.

The expressions of concern were in tune with the AFL-CIO's opposition to "a lock-step process for bringing the budget into balance without regard to the impact on people, programs and the economy."

"Gramm-Rudman would be devastating to the programs that fight recessions," the AFL-CIO warned.

The measure was attached to a "must-pass" resolution raising the debt limit so that government checks wouldn't bounce. A House-Senate conference clarified some of the confusion of interpretation that clouded the hastily passed Senate bill, and the President was given some flexibility on where to make defense spending cuts.

Final decision

Ironically, the legislation makes technocrats, not elected political leaders, the judge of whether deficit reduction targets will be reached without the across-the-board spending cut. Both the Congressional Budget Office and the President's Office of Management & Budget will submit revenue and spending estimates to the General Accounting Office, which will make the final decision.

In the original Senate version, the balanced budget process would not have begun until after the next congressional elections, sparing incumbents some politically difficult votes. But at the insistence of House conferees, a start will be made for the final half of the present fiscal year, which began Oct. 1. By present estimates, close to $12 billion will have to be cut from the budget by Mar. 1, 1986, half from defense.

Under the legislation, President Reagan will be required to submit a budget for fiscal 1987 that will not exceed the $144 billion deficit ceiling for that year. Office of Management & Budget Director James Miller has reportedly given the President a hit list of federal programs to be terminated or heavily cut back.

The bill to which the Gramm-Rudman amendment was attached raised the federal debt ceiling above $2 trillion, more than double what it was when Reagan took office.

Kirkland cites labor's role supporting freedom for all

American labor stands "without embarrassment or apology" on the "fundamental liberal principle that human beings should not be kicked around" either at home or abroad, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland proclaimed as he accepted the American Heritage Award of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith.

Kirkland was praised by the ADL for possessing the quality of "equity"—which, the organization said, "impels him to denounce totalitarianism whether of the right or the left, to champion the rights of a single man or a group or a nation with the wholehearted vigor only our very greatest social reformers have possessed."

In accepting the award on behalf of the millions of members of the trade union movement, Kirkland said labor's worldwide program "begins and ends with freedom and the rights and responsibilities that freedom entails." He rejected the suggestion that unions should "stick to workshop issues and trust politicians to determine the fate of Polish or Chilean or South African workers."

There was a time, he said, when there was widespread agreement that liberalism meant a recognition that tyranny anywhere in the world threatened freedom and democracy everywhere; that equal rights, equal justice and equal opportunity should be the national goal; that a strong federal role was essential to economic and social reform; and that the nation had a primary duty to improve educational opportunities and fully develop the skills, talents and economic opportunities of its youth.

These concepts, Kirkland stressed, "served this nation well, liberated it from the depths of a catastrophic depression and brought about some sweeping reforms"

"It is no secret that the broad liberal coalition that espoused these principles has dissolved into a spectrum of neo-conservatives, neo-liberals, and old fools whose chief point of agreement is that the liberal agenda is out of date," Kirkland declared.

Embracing despots

As a result, he said, "we find spiritual leaders who preach the gospel of avarice, and social thinkers who oppose public housing, integration, affirmative action and comparable pay for women.

"We find political leaders undermining, dismantling and paralyzing the government they were elected to administer.

"And we find those on both the left and right whose concern for human brotherhood embraces despots and slavemasters of every stripe.

"One and all, they are marked by the conviction that human rights and human values are inconvenient, expensive and expendable."

The trade union movement is unwilling to abandon its principles, Kirkland added, and will continue to "do battle on all issues affecting the people's welfare, at home and abroad."

Marine tanker firm on Unfair List

The AFL-CIO has put Sonat Marine Inc., the nation's largest marine transporter of petroleum products, on its Unfair List because of management's union-busting tactics.

The action came in the wake of Sonat's refusal to recognize the bargaining rights of masters, mates and tug captains represented by the Seafarers, and chief engineers represented by Marine Engineers District 2. They have been covered by union contracts for the past 20 years.

In launching the Sonat campaign through the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., the federation said the attempt to remove some members from the bargaining unit would deny them longstanding union rights and benefits.

The unions assailed the company's attempts to freeze wages, slash manning scales on its fleet of 49 tank barges and 37 tugboats, and eliminate or sharply reduce current employee benefits.

The SIU and MEBA, which together have a total of 600 members employed by Sonat, have filed unfair labor practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board, accusing the company of refusing to bargain in good faith.

Five years ago, Sonat Inc., a Birmingham, Ala.-based pipeline and energy company, acquired Interstate Ocean Transport and created Sonat Marine. The SIU struck the new firm in 1981 in a successful bid to win a new contract. When that agreement expired in 1984, Sonat unleashed its union-bashing assault.

The decision to place the company on the Unfair List followed action by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., which adopted a boycott resolution at its biennial convention in Anaheim, Calif., in October, warning that Sonat's actions could set a "dangerous precedent" for the industry.

Pilots set up air safety foundation

The Air Line Pilots announced establishment of an independent foundation to advance aviation safety through research, testing, seminars and publications.

ALPA President Henry A. Duffy said the new Aviation Research & Education Foundation will seek to:

- Reduce the frequency and severity of airplane accidents and near-accidents.
- Improve pilot aeromedical standards, including the detection, prevention and treatment of aeromedical ailments.
- Increase public, government and industry knowledge of aviation issues that affect the safety of commercial airline flying.

Duffy said the foundation will seek contributions to fund air safety programs and, in turn, will make research grants to academic and other groups undertaking safety-related studies.

The foundation's board of directors will include four top officers of ALPA plus Dr. H.L. Reighard, former air surgeon for the Federal Aviation Administration; C.O. Miller, president of System Safety, Inc., and John J. O'Donnell, past president of ALPA.

South Africa protest

Newspaper Guild Sec.-Treas. Charles Dale calls on South Africa to end media censorship and lift a press blackout covering much of the country during a protest at the South African embassy in Washington. Journalists delivered the first batch of petitions condemning the news restrictions, with more than 1,500 signatures collected so far. A committee of journalists is continuing the petition drive.

Court upholds union rights to check workplace hazards

Boston—An appellate court decision upholding a union's right to have its own industrial hygienist measure noise levels in a workplace reinforced the AFL-CIO's interpretation of the National Labor Relations Act and kept open the possibility of a future reversal of a controversial new NLRB policy.

The NLRB last January scrapped a long-standing policy that placed a union's request for access to a workplace in order to carry out its representation function in the same category as a request for information needed for bargaining.

Instead, the NLRB adopted a more restrictive policy that sought to "balance" the union's desire for access against the employer's interest in excluding "outsiders" from company property.

But even by that test, the NLRB found, the Holyoke, Mass., Water Power Co. had violated federal labor law by denying Electrical Workers Local 455 the right to have an industrial hygienist of its choice measure the noise levels in a fan room where the company provided ear muffs for workers who had to maintain and repair the equipment.

Information needed

The case reached the U.S. 1st Circuit Court of Appeals when the company challenged the NLRB order to provide access. The AFL-CIO filed a brief in the case to argue that the union's right to relevant information rather than the NLRB's newly adopted "balancing" test should provide the basis for upholding the union's right to measure noise levels.

In the decision, a three-judge panel of the appeals court agreed that the company was required to grant the union hygienist access to the fan room. It noted that the information sought "clearly was relevant to the union's statutory duty to bargain about conditions of employment."

The court noted that the labor board "reached the same result by a different route." Because the result is the same by either test, the court held, it was not necessary to decide whether the NLRB acted properly in holding that the stricter access rule that previously had been applied only to a union that did not have bargaining rights also should apply to a union that already represents the workers and is carrying out its bargaining function.

On a related issue, the court noted that "the fact that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has promulgated a noise standard does not make the requested information irrelevant."

"The union is entitled to bargain for a standard that exceeds the one established by OSHA," the court declared.

Rail unions blast denial of worker protections mandated by Congress

The Interstate Commerce Commission is ignoring existing law which provides safeguards for railroad employees displaced by mergers and abandonment of rail service, a Senate subcommittee was told.

The Railway Labor Executives Association accused the ICC of "usurping" the authority of the Railway Labor Act, the National Mediation Board and the National Railroad Adjustment Board by allowing railroad management to renege at will on collective bargaining agreements.

From the passage of the Emergency Railroad Transportation Act of 1933 through the Staggers Rail Act of 1980, the RLEA said, Congress has sought to guarantee just treatment for workers and their families adversely affected by changing times in the railroad industry.

But the ICC has ignored legislative mandates, the unions said in testimony submitted by James R. Snyder, legislative director of the United Transportation Union and chairman of RLEA's legislative committee.

Instead, it has adopted a policy that is "intolerable and incompatible with continued peaceful labor relations in the railroad industry," the RLEA said as it called for legislative actions to compel the ICC to protect the interests of railroad workers.

The Staggers Act, Snyder said, recognized that deregulation would cause "severe harm to railroad employees and their families." It included specific language denying the ICC the authority to "relieve a carrier of its obligation to protect the interests of employees."

Discretion abused

But the ICC has seized on language in the law authorizing it to impose employee-protection provisions "at its discretion" as an excuse to "never exercise that discretion," the RLEA said.

The unions accused the ICC of misreading the intent of Congress, ignoring a half-century of precedents set by the commission, and disregarding repeated court rulings which reenforced workers' rights.

In "zealously promoting the concept of deregulation in the railroad industry," Snyder told the subcommittee, the ICC has taken the position that collective bargaining agreements negotiated under the Railway Labor Act are "burdensome to rail management" and therefore should be eliminated.

"The commission apparently theorized that if much of the economic regulation of the rail industry was a burden which impeded its competitive ability and should be removed," rail labor said, "certainly employee protective provisions and collective bargaining restrictions were at least as burdensome to competitive ability and warranted removal as well."

Congressional intent

When it enacted the Staggers Act, the RLEA said, Congress "did not intend to lessen traditional employee protection or impair the Railway Labor Act rights of railroad employees."

Because the ICC stance constitutes a complete reversal of congressional intent, the subcommittee was told, "that error can only be corrected" by amending the law to make clear that the commission must impose adequate protections for workers adversely affected by mergers, abandonment of service, and other actions taken in pursuit of deregulation.

Union-busting

San Francisco—One of the Interstate Commerce Commission's lawyers has admitted that the commission is engaged in union-busting.

The Railway Labor Executives Association went into federal appeals court here to challenge the ICC's refusal to impose labor protections in a case involving the Northwest Pacific Railroad.

The ICC took the position that it was not in the public interest to insist on employee safeguards.

When one of the judges asked whether the commission's action amounted to union-busting, the ICC attorney conceded that it was.

Tax bill uncertain

Congress session grinds to close

A Republican rebellion against the closing of corporate tax loopholes put a big question mark on the future of tax reform legislation—and the influence of President Reagan within his own party.

Still uncertain as the AFL-CIO News went to press was whether a labor-supported tax reform bill that has been endorsed by the Administration as a step forward will pass the House before the end of the session.

The timetable was thrown askew when the House voted 223-202 against the procedural rule providing for consideration of the tax reform bill.

Only 14 Republicans supported Reagan on the issue, a stunning repudiation. Democratic defections stemmed from an unusual combination of oil state congressmen trying to protect the industry against loss of special tax privileges and House members from districts with large numbers of federal employees, who wanted an opportunity to vote on deleting a tax change that would adversely affect many federal and postal workers when they retire.

Tax bills are normally taken up under a rule strictly limiting amendments. The rule that was defeated would have allowed a vote on a Republican substitute bill, but not on separate sections of the measure approved by the Ways & Means Committee.

Reagan on spot

Reagan had urged Republicans to vote for the committee bill if the Republican substitute were defeated so that the legislation could be acted on by the Senate next year. Under the Constitution, tax bills must originate in the House.

Oil interests and corporations trying to kill the bill brought a small army of lobbyists to Capitol Hill before the vote on the rule.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill said it was up to Reagan to deliver the Republican votes if he wanted to keep tax reform alive. Only 14 Republicans voted to call up the bill.

If the President can't deliver the votes, O'Neill said, Dec. 11, when the rule was rejected, "will be remembered as the date that Ronald Reagan became a 'lame duck' on the floor of the House."

As the congressional session moved into its final week, a letter signed by three Democratic senators helped defuse the danger of a labor-opposed subminimum youth wage being pushed through.

Senators Howard Metzenbaum (Ohio), John Melcher (Mont.) and Christopher Dodd (Conn.) wrote their colleagues that they considered the subminimum wage proposal "nothing more than a hoax." They indicated they were prepared to filibuster any attempt to sneak the measure through as an amendment to an unrelated bill.

A presidential veto of a job-saving bill to curb textile, apparel and shoe imports was expected to close out the first session of the 99th Congress.

The labor-endorsed measure passed both the House and Senate by large majorities, but short of the two-thirds that would be needed to override a veto.

If the bill were allowed to become law, import-swamped industries employing more than one out of eight industrial workers would be given a reprieve. Besides setting quotas for textile, clothing and shoe imports, the legislation would have required the President to negotiate import restraints with the leading copper-producing nations.

Rubber Workers ask tire import curbs

Akron, Ohio—With 50,000 Rubber Workers' jobs lost to imports in the last decade and another 6,300 scheduled to go down the tube in the next six months, the URW urged Congress to save what's left of the American tire and rubber industry.

Calling the import menace "a growing cancer in our nation," URW President Milan Stone noted that tire imports have risen from 8 percent to nearly 25 percent since the mid 1970s. As a result, 26 U.S. tire plants have shut down.

And there's more trouble ahead, Stone said. The union has been notified of new plant closings which will wipe out 1,600 jobs at B. F. Goodrich in Miami, Okla., 850 at Goodrich in Oaks, Pa., 1,650 at Firestone in Albany, Ga., 1,200 at General Tire in Waco, Tex., and 1,000 in a partial Firestone shutdown in Des Moines, Iowa.

To provide effective protection for the beleagured industry, the URW said in letters to all members of the House and Senate, Congress should enact legislation putting a lid on foreign producers' share of the domestic market.

Noting that every imported automobile comes equipped with five foreign-made tires plus numerous components which could have been made by URW members, Stone also called for a rollback in auto imports at least to the level that existed when voluntary restraints were in place.

Other nations, Stone said, have aggressively pursued their own interests through subsidies and other devices which aid firms sending their products into the American market. But the United States has failed to follow suit. "As a result," he said, "Americans will continue to suffer further job losses until action is taken to remedy the critical situation which exists."

The URW is cosponsoring a labor-management government conference Dec. 18-19 to address the needs of dislocated workers in the tire and tube industry. The two-day session, with assistance from the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, will focus on retraining, education, career change and improving job-seeking skills.
